L. C. J. Pray, Misheer, what had your husband for his part?

Mr. Willow. Had he any share of the money lent by Sir Charles Carter?

Mrs. Duffin. My Lady Ivy gave him an annuity of 100*l.* of Sir Charles Carter's money.

Mr. Willow. Do you know any body else that had any of that money?

Miss.

Mrs. Duffin. The Attorney had took of the false money too.

L. C. J. What Attorney do you mean?—Mrs. Duffin. Mr. Selous.

L. C. J. Had he, how came he to deliver it?

Mr. Duffin. Yes, Madam, what do you know of counterfeiting any false?

Mrs. Duffin. My husband once had the imposition of a seal in his hand, with which he said he was going to use Mr. Duffin's, to have it counterfeited, & I do not remember what the seal was.

Mr. Duffin. When the dock-wire witness, how did he use to put the money to them?

Mrs. Duffin. I have seen my Lady herself write some great Letters of the names laid upon other papers, which Mr. Duffin could not so well hit, and he has writ the self.

Mr. Duffin. Can you tell the names?

Mrs. Duffin. Truly, I do not remember what names.

Mr. Duffin. We have another witness who will give you an account of some Letters of my Lady's, which we shall desire to be read. Witness Elizabeth Key. (Hush now don't.)

Mr. At. Gen. She talks of Glor's lease.—

L. C. J. She says, she does not know whether that be the deed, there were so many forged, Mr. Attorney. But the witness thou, my Husband did forge a writing he called Glor's lease.—

Mrs. Duffin. She had two or three mortgages forged.

Mr. Duffin. Come, Madam, where have you these Letters?

Mrs. Duffin. I had these Letters from Mr. Duffin.

Mr. At. Gen. Why, where had you these bodies?

Mr. Duffin. That is the ask I use Mr. Duffin's for my Lady's with, at Mrs. Lee's House, at the table in the kitchen.

L. C. J. Who did he write for?

Mrs. Duffin. For my Lady's, I did not know what they were that were written, but he said they were forged; and with ink out of these bottles he said he could make new-written writings look like old ones very soon.

Mr. Duffin. Did you ever speak with my Lady's? Do you know her hand?

Mrs. Duffin. I do not know these Letters to be her hand; but Mr. Duffin gave me them as her Letters.

Mr. Duffin. Sir Charles, General, pray, will you look upon them; you know my Lady's hand.

Sir Charles. I do for—they are all of a hand, and I think they are my Lady's. I believe it truly.

Mr. Duffin. Then is signed T. Lee. (All the Letters were read.)

Mr. Duffin. Your Lordship is one of these Letters tells Mr. Duffin, he intends to let Sir William Selous's mortgage on foot, and he should have half what he recovered. If it were a true mortgage, why should he have given him half?

L. C. J. They were very great together, that is plain; they were very false. What were Mr. Duffin's merits towards my Lady, I cannot tell. Will you go on? It is late.

Mr. Duffin. This is all we shall offer at present, till we have occasion further from them.

L. C. J. Well, what say you to this, Mr. Attorney?

Mr. At. Gen. If they have done—

L. C. J. They have, they say.

Mr. At. Gen. Then may I please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I shall begin to answer their evidence about the self. They have produced some imaginative evidence out of many Records, to convince us of the supposition. In truth, it they had not brought in of this very thing, it had been a thread objection, because we could not have been persuaded to have given an answer to what we could not have fancied: we should have been accused of. But upon their words they have got as upon the search as well as they, and we can give as good an account of it. They tell you they had their hint from my Lady's; but that has had them into a great error, for he is mistaken himself in the computation of this time, as he is in a great many other things.

Mr. Duffin. I know he is mistaken; but I depend not upon his remarks of that time. I had only, I had the general hint about detaching fortunes from thence.

Mr. At. Gen. But yet for all your confidence of the demonstration, your foundation fails: For, my Lord, to refute the fact, we shall show that the King of Spain, Charles V. who was likewise Emperor, reigned his Crown the 25th of October, in the 26 and 36 years of Philip and Mary. It is true, the Parliament-Rolls, in the title of these relating to the first day of the session, there the file that was used at first could not be altered. But the fact of their being the King and Queen of Spain, was so notorious to all the world, that we shall show you is mistaken of the Rolls of that year, the title was in our deeds, in that the title might be various: But that will not prove our deeds false. It may be, the Casars of Law might not take notice of it, as to alter the file till the 11th of May, though we have not searched for far among them, but in the common conversations which are upon Record in the Rolls, there it is altered. And as to the time of their becoming King and Queen of Spain, we have an History that tells you the very day when the King reigned, which was the 25th of October.

L. C. J. I tell you, Gentlemen, methinks Mr. Attorney has been very forward to do, in giving very imaginary answers to two objections I put, they would give delivery Mr. Noble's title to the land, by a piece of art once that they had not had, but that Mr. Noble had brought of it and that was the letters, which, with much confidence of the victory, was produced: and yet, when it was so, to me it seemed the flabbergasting enemy the defendant's Cause had; but that you are to have with you, and must judge upon it. Now he tells you again, Mr. Noble has been a blab of his tongue, and could not keep the secret to himself, but must bring that the deed were forged, for the title of the Queen's name is changed, and by this bringing they have invoked the business, and can show Records for it. But now instead of Records, the up shot is a little story of History. Can you not an answer to these great numbers of Records brought by the other side? Is a printed History, written by I know not who, an evidence in a Court of Law?

Mr. At. Gen. My Lord, besides that, which we must submit to your Judgment, whether, upon such a point of fact in a foreign Country, to be done such a day, a foreigner's History, not printed for this purpose, shall be a sort of evidence, but I say, besides that, here is a Gentleman, Mr. Clerk that fetched the Rolls, and he will tell you what they are in this point.

Mr. Clerk. I did fetch in the Rolls, and find many in that year like these. And my Lord's Cause is utterly mistaken; he says it was not altered till the 4th and 5th years of Philip and Mary.

L. C. J. I care not what my Lord's Cause says, but what the Records say, let us see them.

Mr. Clerk. I saw a great many in that year.

L. C. J. Lord, Gentlemen, what do you make of us, to keep as here with I do not know what? Mr. Attorney, he tells us that Mr. Noble was to great a blockhead to bring this, and so we were prepared for an answer; but all the answer is, my Lord's Cause is mistaken, and there are many Records, but we have none of them, Præsumptum, Præsumptum. If he did bring us, and you know it, and would not bring records to wipe off the objection, it is ten times worse than if he had been unwisely without an exception of it.

Mr. Duffin. My Lord, I dare affirm that there are none of the Rolls of that year in, till after Easter-Term—

L. C. J. Lord, Sir, you must be cunning too, we tell you your objection was very ingenious, but that must not make you insolent; you cannot say any, but you must be cunning over it. The objection is now upon them, let them answer it if they can. Have you any of the Records here?

Mr. At. Gen. We have not, it seems, my Lord.

L. C. J. Then this must pass unanswer'd, and must be left to the Jury.

Mr. At. Gen. But, my Lord, they have got a little farther in this case, and indeed far more than becomes them, I think, to lay assertions upon my Lady's Cause, as if she were frequently guilty of forgery. And for that Sir Charles Carter has said, that the deed purporting to be a mortgage of a house in St. Martin's-lane for 1500*l.* and this mortgage, he says, he was told of by some that did not; whereas he did likewise desire to see it; and without seeing it, he declared, he would never be satisfied of the reality of the thing; and thereupon Mr. Solicitor Wright brought it him, and he saw it, but was not permitted to see the witness's names, and thereupon he was more dissatisfied than before about it. But if Sir Charles Carter had given any the least intimation of such a thing, now we would have credited them with a light of it in Court, where he should have had his full view, for my Lady has a bill, and it is a true mortgage, and for a real evidence. But he says this is related, and he did that, as it happened, to suppress any inquiry after it. But with reverence to Sir Charles Carter, the fact is otherwise. My Lady Selous's deed, from a debt from my Lady's, for nine years due for four Pences; and the reckoning being made according to my Lady's quality, was made so high, that it paid off the mortgage. But he has the deed still.

L. C. J. But what say you to the deed of sale, and my friend Swan's note-out of the lease, and the debt of 50*l.* and that, but a little before acknowledged by my Lady—

Mr. At. Gen. I give an answer to that, we say, he has been pleased to give me a great deal of pretence; and as he is master of the commission, to adorn the Story with abundance of flourish of his own kindness and interests—

L. C. J. Mr. Solicitor, you are not to judge of that, whether it be flourish only or substance; the Court and the Jury are the Judges of that, and truly I think it very material to the Cause; I assure you I do; for the debt be taken off as it can, it thickens very much; I must speak my mind.

Mr. At. Gen. When I am over-ruled, I acquiesce in the Judgment of the Court.

L. C. J. Pray, Sir, apply yourself to answer the evidence.

Mr. At. Gen. I do so, my Lord, as well as I can. The next witness is this Gentleman, Mrs. Duffin; she swears, that she saw her husband, Mr. Duffin, counterfeit many deeds, she does not particularise them: And here have been likewise several Letters read that did import a trans-action and correspondence between my Lady's and him.

L. C. J. Pray, Mr. Solicitor, remember the words the law that lease of Selous's, and that called Glor's lease.

Mr. At. Gen. My Lord, this witness that swears this, is not only a Person fit to be believed, but accompanied by a Record; and for that, my Lord, I shall shew you. Mr. Jehyns, as we well know, had his story for the matter about which the new witness: for Mr. Jehyns, on the behalf of Alderman Forster, undertook to pay 50*l.* to Mr. Duffin, to procure somebody to trace the deed, called Glor's lease, as he forged. Upon this deed was an information exhibited in this Court against Mr. Jehyns for falsification; and upon full evidence Jehyns was convicted for his endeavour. And the Record of this conviction we have here, and desire to have produced and read.

L. C. J. And I tell you, Mr. Solicitor, that is no evidence in this Cause.

Mr. At. Gen. Why, pray, good my Lord, did not they here just now

L. C. J. But the information put in by Mr. Attorney Noble, pray, remember, was not sufficient to be read, because we against any of the Parties, had three Parties.

Mr. At. Gen. But pray, my Lord, give me leave to apply it to the objection here made in our case, to the credit of our deed. They say it is false, because my Lady's said to forge deeds; and particularly Duffin, they say, did once forgive her Glor's lease. Now to answer that, we came to show that my Lady's did not forge Glor's lease; but there was indeed an offer to forgive Duffin in secret if forged, when indeed it was not, for which trick Jehyns, that was the agent, at allurement, was convicted; and that conviction is, I think, a good evidence that it was not forged.

L. C. J. None in the world, Mr. Solicitor, and that from the very evidence that has been given in this Cause this day. For it is plain, if you will believe this woman, [and yet let us go to the contrary] that there was coming into the Court to have sworn the truth, which would have perhaps cleared Jehyns, but my Lady's would needs keep her away. Now if Duffin were to give a great name to forge, he would not think to swear, so private that he forgery: And then how easy a thing was it, had Jehyns been the great Saint in the World, to have got him convicted upon what Duffin came to swear against him; though, had she come then in, Duffin would have appeared and not as all fit to be credited.

Mr. At. Gen. My Lord, I have then one thing more to offer; I cannot tell indeed whether it be material, for it from I have been in unhappy as to offer more things that have not been thought material.

indebted 1000. upon her taking the four pounds from my Lady Selkirk, if she had to great a sum owing her. And when a lovely answer is thus given by the Countess for my Lady Jay, that she and others were called upon for nine years diet? Whom Sir Charles Greville's women, the owned herself upon the account indebted 1000. and there was no borrowing for diet, but that she had grain for three quarters of a year after Sir William's death, as she had in several times before.

And now, while it is in my memory, I would remind you of one thing more before we come to the other witness, there is a thing that to me seems this business very home upon my Lady Jay: How comes it to pass my Lady Jay should be so wonderful kind to my Lady Selkirk's daughter, as to part with 1000. to be forced, to have the house filled upon her, without any consideration in the World that I can hear of? That is such a melting piece of kindness, that they would do well to find out some plea to authorize it. It seems upon Sir Charles Greville's desire to see this pretended mortgage, and its being brought him by my Brother Wm., who is now dead, the was wonderful careful that he should not see the witnesses to it, it was to be precious and tender a thing: But, alas! it is all melted down and gone of a sudden, without any consideration at all whatsoever; and the can readily join up Sir Charles Greville to settle this upon Mr. Duffin, the Lady Selkirk's daughter, and enter into bond not to disturb the enjoyment.

Thus there comes another evidence, and that is the Gentleman Mrs. Duffin, who it seems they would have to be a loose sort of creature, but she thinks she has a good reason upon her tongue: for she does directly swear that the was present, and saw Mr. Duffin her husband forge that very mortgage. Sir Charles Greville speaks of it, that my Lady Jay directed it, and gave her order to put fifteen on the ink to make it look old; that the law him writing in a parchment, which he told her was Greville's leaf, and other things, and all for my Lady Jay. Nay, she tells you my Lady Jay was to extraordinary an artist at the making of such an affair, that this rather-woman, Duffin, was not so desirous of it as she; for he could not write the four great Letters of the name that were to be put to the forged deed, but she did that herself, and the rest he did. How far she is to be believed, I must leave to you; you hear what is objected against her about the forgery in her belly; and I do not know what; whether that will take off the credibility of her testimony, I leave to you. She doth give a very firm and large account how they used to order their matters to make the ink look old, (as I said) they put fifteen on it; then they rubbed the outside of the deeds in dirty windows, and after that used to lay them in a balcony for the rain to come upon them in the night, and so dry them in the sun, or by the fire, to throw them up. And this she says was their method, and process they used. All which the Plaintiff's Counsel urge, to show the probability that these deeds of theirs are forged.

Then they tell you, which is yet somewhat more to strengthen her evidence, there is a woman, that though she speaks out of Mr. Duffin's mouth, and that can be no evidence against my Lady Jay, yet says, she received from him a parcel of Letters, which are sworn by Sir Charles Greville to be all of my Lady Jay's own hand-writing; which Letters have been read to you: and they show a great familiarity between my Lady Jay and Mr. Duffin, a great care and concern for the promotion of this Duffin, the Gentleman's husband, and of some deeds that were likely to be thought true and undisputed. And she tells him as the latter end of one, that she is solicited till the trouble be over: But she was relieved to see on 1. Sir William Selkirk's mortgage, and if that thing did go well, he should have half.

That supports the credibility of the woman's testimony: But besides that, there is another thing that looks very unwarranted, because Mrs. Duffin does directly swear, that out of the 1000. paid my Lady Jay by Sir Charles Greville, 2000. was paid and given to her husband, and Mr. Selkirk forthwith had 2000. more: For what service, I wonder, must my Lady Jay be so liberal to Mr. Selkirk and Mr. Duffin? Let Mr. Selkirk thank and make himself as he pleases, it will tick upon him; and I must confess it looks unwarrantable, his getting my Lord of Selkirk's lead to pick notes out of it, and then to have such a mortgage trumped up in this manner. It is very rank, I assure you.

Thus is the substance of the evidence that has been offered by the Plaintiff, to prove and induce you to believe these deeds forged.

Now, in answer to this, they on the other side would offer, that Sir Charles Greville's evidence is a surmise upon them. They say they have such a Writing, and such and such Deeds, Greville's leaf, and Selkirk's mortgage; but they are not prepared to give such an answer as they would have done, had they had none. Here has been likewise great struggling and striving to have the verdict read to overthrow Mrs. Duffin's testimony; but that cannot be allowed to be given in evidence between these parties. Then they would have read her husband's oath, he being dead; but that is no point of evidence at all neither; for in case the man were alive, it would not be evidence what he should have heard his own wife say. If both of them indeed had been heard together, and testified against my Lady Jay, it had been good evidence; or they both might have testified for her. But by the Law the husband cannot be a witness against his wife, nor a wife against her husband, to charge them with any thing criminal, except only in cases of high-treason. This is no known a common rule, that I thought it could never have borne any question to debate.

This is the substance of the evidence on both sides, as near as I can recollect it, save only that which indeed I should have mentioned before, the Defendant had produced an exemplification of a verdict obtained the last Michaelmas Term. To which they for the Plaintiff answer, We were not then prepared to answer your deeds, which were very new, surprising and unexpected to us: We have now given new evidence that we never gave them, and it was a verdict obtained by forgery: We now show our boundaries better than we could then, and so that they make to be the result of the whole matter.

Now upon the main, after this very long evidence, though the Cause has been discussed as much as ever any Cause could be discussed before; and though the event of it be a matter of considerable value, yet the matter of fact is as clear as the sun at noon-day; and a plain point of fact it is, and must be decided upon. If we do admit all their deeds to be good deeds, without any consideration of the forgery, pre or con, yet it is the well-polls, ditch, orchard, garden, &c. can be taken to be seven acres; then the boundaries upon the mill or half-bay, which may be the Fane's law, that will answer both the deeds of the Plaintiff and of the Defendant, and though never so many houghs be built upon it, it will signify nothing in the Cause. And that it is so, whereas the Defendant's surveyor swears, that 200 acres will not be made up without the lands in question; the Plaintiff has brought two surveyors, that swear there is full 200 acres, and more, without them. So you have two surveyors on the one side, and one on the other; and you yourselves have viewed it.

After this long evidence, Gentlemen, you have had as good an account of the substance of it, as I can give you by my notes and memory recollect. If any of the Gentlemen that are of the Council for the Plaintiff, or for the Defendant, do think I have omitted any thing that is material, on either side, they have free liberty to remind the Court of it. You are the Judges of this fact, whether this land do of right belong to the Plaintiff or to the Defendant: And I leave it to your consideration.

After which, the Jury withdrew to consider of their Verdict, and the Court adjourned. That Evening the Jury gave in a private Verdict before a Judge; and appearing the next morning at the Bar, were called over, and demanded if they did abide by the Verdict they had given the night before; to which they answered, Yes; which being declared by the Secretary to be for the Plaintiff, the Jury were discharged.

Then a motion was made by the Plaintiff's Counsel, that several deeds produced by the Defendant, that were detected of forgery, might be left in Court, in order to have them pursued, and convicted of the forgery. The Court, upon debate of the matter, and the Plaintiff's Counsel declaring they would prosecute an Information of forgery, the deeds of the 13th of November, and the 22d of December, 2 and 3 Philip and Mary, were ordered to be left with the Clerk of the Crown till further Order; and in the mean time the Plaintiff to have Copies of them from the Clerk; and by Rule of Court a Trial at Bar is ordered in Michaelmas Term.

In Trinity Term there was an Information against Lady Jay, for forging and publishing the said two Indentures, as follows.

Rex versus Jay.

XXXVIII. The Trial of William Disney, Esq. by the King's Special Commission of Oyer and Terminer, held at the Marshalsea in Southwark, on Thursday, June 25, 1685, for High-Treason.

A SPECIAL Commission of Oyer and Terminer for the County of Surrey, being appointed for the trying of Mr. Disney, before the Lord Chief Justice of England, and other his Majesty's Judges; he was brought before the King's Commissioners at the Marshalsea, on Saturday, on June 23, in order to his Trial upon an Indictment for High-Treason: "For printing and publishing a most vile and traitorous Paper against his most sacred Majesty and his Government, to-wit, The Declaration of James Duke of Monmouth, and the Nobles, Gentlemen, and others now in Arms, &c." And being arraigned thereupon, he pleaded Not guilty, and desired he might have Counsel granted him, but was denied; the Court telling him it was not allowable in capital Cases: yet upon his further request, he had leave to make use of what Books he thought fit to prepare for his defence, and allowed till the 25th.

On Thursday the 25th, he was brought to his Trial, in the Mellinger's docket, that was upon a Warrant for the apprehending of William Disney, Esq. he took some files of Musketeers, and two or three Gentlemen to his assistance, when approaching to the house of one Tyrril, a Gardener in the parish of Lambeth, on Monday June the 25th, 1685, between twelve and one of the clock in the morning, he broke into the apartment of Mr. Disney, where entering his chamber, he found the prisoner in his shirt, who cried his breeches! but the Mellinger replied No, saying, if he had a Night-Gown he might put it on. Immediately after viewing his breeches, there was found a dagger in his pocket, and also some other things, likewise a brace of pistols, and a great hanger in the posture of a Scimitar.

His maid Sarah disent was supposed to be in bed with him, by reason her cloaths were upon his bed: his daughter about eleven years of age otherwise abouts was in another part of the room a-bed alone. The Mellinger further deposed, that getting into the Printing-house, he there found the Forms (as Printers call them) of the traitorous Declaration in the Printing-rooms, there being by computation about 950 of them printed on one side, and about five of the said traitorous Declarations perfect. Upon the Mellinger's questioning how they came there, he pretended ignorance. The evidence appearing very plain, and he making little or no defence for himself, was found guilty of High-Treason, fastened to be drawn, hanged, and quarter'd, which was accordingly done at Newington-Common in the County of Surrey, on Monday the 29th of June, 1685, and his quarters set upon the City-gates.

A true and full Account given by the Messenger of St. George, concerning the Behaviour and last dying Speech of William Disney, Esq. June 29th, 1685.

BETWEEN nine and ten of the clock in the morning, I was sent for by the High Sheriff of Surrey, to officiate as Ordinary at the execution of the prisoner at the Marshalsea. Before he was brought out, a neighbouring Miller and I (upon the Sheriff's motion) went into the room where he was, when the reverend Parson (having first him the right before) ask'd him whether he had considered of those things which he had formerly offer'd him; and did very piteously press him that he would give glory to God, by a full and ingenuous confession of his crimes, intimating to him the fatal consequences that might have followed, if he had persisted that evil way; how many men's lives might have been lost in the quarrel, whose blood he was so far guilty of, as he contributed to the increase of the rebellion, by his printing the traitorous paper (or words to the same effect). To which the prisoner answer'd (with some signs of discontent) to this purpose, that he hoped (speaking to the Miller) he did not come to press him to embroder himself now! that he had nothing to say that might bring any person into trouble, and his time was short, so he desired not to be troubled about any such matter; so that he would pass'd over we parted. Finding him resolved not to make any discovery, I only told him, I did intend to meet him at the place of execution, and he thanked me.

When he came to the gallows, and was in the cart, I came to him and asked him, how he desired to improve those few moments of his life that were yet to come? He answer'd, in prayer. I asked him, Will you pray for yourself, or shall I pray for you? He answer'd, I will pray, and desire you to pray for me. Whilst the executioner was preparing the rope, I showed him the Bible, saying, Sir, what comfortably precious do you remember out of this word of God for your present use? He answer'd, Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief. And then he proceeded in general terms to acknowledge himself a great sinner against God; but affirm'd that he had made his peace with God, that he had confid'd his soul with humility and tenderness, and had beg'd God's pardon; and did not doubt but God had for the merits of his Son Jesus Christ pardon'd all his sins, and he was now under very comfortable hopes that he should soon be happy, not upon the account of his own merits, but the merits of Jesus Christ. I told him this was very good, if his hopes were well grounded. He replied, His hopes were grounded on the Scriptures, which assured him that Christ did to save sinners. Whereupon I recounted to him some other gracious promises of God to true Penitents; as that of Abraham, If the wicked man turn away from his wickedness, and doeth that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive, &c. After which he made his address to God in prayer, that he would forgive him all his sins, and sanctify this his affliction to him; and prayed God to bless the King, and that he may be merciful and kind to his subjects, as well as just to his enemies: he further observed, how gracious God was to him in giving him this admonition, (as he call'd it) for God might have taken him off by some sudden death, or deprived him of his senses; And then (he said) it must have been worth my me, but now God hath given me time to be think myself; so that, though the labour and the shame of this death, having to many spectators (upon whom he look'd) may somewhat discompose me, yet I have peace and comfort within. Afterwards he desired me to pray with him, which I did briefly, according to his mind and present example: and closing with the Lord's Prayer, he answered every petition deliberately, and calmly: he declared that he lived in, and did now die in the Communion of the Church of England, which he reputed again in these words, the Protestant Church of England. After Prayer, I asked him, whether he would sing some part of a Psalm? He answer'd No. Then I ask'd him, whether he had any thing more to do or say? He answer'd, I have nothing more but to return you thanks for your care of me. And I pray God bless you and bear your prayers for me, and mine for you, and our Saviour Christ for us both. And so I left him going to his long home.

Thus, according to the best recollection of my thoughts, is the sum, and as near as I can remember, the words that pass'd between Mr. Disney and me.

Andrew Wilson.

XXXIX. The Trial of Sir Edward Hales, Bart. for neglecting to take the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, with his Plea thereto, upon the King's dispensing with the Stat. 25 Car. II. and the Opinion of the Judges thereupon, 1686.

Palmer, 2 Jac. II. In the King's-Bench.

Arthur Golden Plaintiff, in an Action of Debt of 500l. grounded upon the Act of 25 Car. II. for preventing Dangers from Popish Recusants.

Sir Edward Hales, Bart. Defendant.

THE Plaintiff declares, That the Defendant, after the first day of English-Term 1673, sc. 28 Nov. 1 Jac. II. at Hockington in Kent, was admitted to the office of a Colonel of a Foot-Regiment.

That being a military office, and a place of trust under the King, and by authority from the King.

And the Defendant held that office by the space of three months, next after the 28 Nov. 1 Jac. II.

And from thence, till the time of this action begun, he was, and still is an inhabitant and resident of the parish of Hockington.

And the Plaintiff taking it by protestations, that the Defendant within three months next after his admission into the said office of Colonel, did not receive the Sacrament in manner as the Act directs, but neglected to receive it;

Averts, that the Defendant did neglect to take the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, either in the Chancery, or in the King's-Bench, or at any Quarter-Sessions in Kent, or in the place where he was resident, either the next Term after his admission to his said office, or within three months after.

And that the Defendant after such neglect, sc. 10 Mar. 2 Jac. II. at Hockington in Kent, did exercise the said office, and still doth, contrary to the Statute of 25 Car. II. * for preventing dangers from Popish Recusants.

Where-

* 25 Car. II. cap. 2. An Act for preventing Dangers which may happen from Popish Recusants. For preventing dangers which may happen from Popish Recusants, and preserving the minds of his Majesty's good Subjects, he is enacted, &c. That every person that shall bear any office, civil or military, or who shall have command or place of trust under his Majesty, or within the Realm of England, &c. shall personally appear in the Court of Chancery, or at the King's-Bench, or at the Quarter-Sessions in that County where he shall reside, within three Months next after his admission into any of the said offices, and there, in open Court, take the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, and shall also receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the usage of the Church of England, in some Parish-Church, upon some Lord's-day, immediately after Divine Service.

And

prerogative, but to secure him from his enemies, and for the preservation of the Government; and the King's bailiffs what will be used for his own security, and the Government's prerogative. No Act of Parliament can discharge the subject from his allegiance which he owes to the King, every one is bound by his allegiance to serve his Prince when he shall be required. Therefore an Act of Parliament can disable any man to serve the King. But they object, that this Act doth make no one incapable, but all his own election.

If this were so, it would be in the election of some or all the subjects to incapacitate themselves to serve the King, and the King would be unwilling; for if it were not in the power of the King to force the subject, he would not (it may be said) be served at all, as in the case of Sir John Rolfe, cited by the other side; he neglected to take the oath, and thereby the office became void; so that the next elected might refuse, and the next. In the mean time the King's service lies neglected, and no business of the Country can proceed, for want of a Sheriff. To pardon murder, is a prerogative solely and infrequently incident to the King, who may dispense with Statutes restraining it, 12 C. 13. He may dispense with any Statute. Hobart 146. 3 light. 339. In 3 July, the Lord Cokes speaking of Acts of Parliament that were made to release the King's power of pardoning murder, says, that such Acts are good for King's service, but not binding. C. 18, 19. There are several Statutes cited, with which the King by his prerogative may dispense, as the Statute 36 H. VI. which doth enact, that no man shall be Sheriff of one County two years together. Yet it was adjudged by all the Judges of England, says that Book, that the King may dispense with it; the Statute of 4 H. IV. 31, that no Abbot shall be Justice, or other Officer whatsoever in any part of Wales; and yet the King may dispense with it. The Statute 8 R. 2. 22. and 33 H. VIII. 24. do enact, that none shall be Justice of the Peace in the County where he was born, and yet the King with a special non assensu may dispense with that Statute. And in Parliament 30. 13. the King may grant to a man to be an Escheator for life, notwithstanding that Statute.

To answer the Statute which has been cited, which the King cannot dispense with: I say, as to the Statutes of Simony and Ufury, the King cannot dispense with them; but what is that to the matter in hand? For there is no reflection of the Subjects service, but the King may have the benefit notwithstanding. Then as to the Statute 5 Ed. VI. 16. against buying and selling of judicial offices, of which Statute, there is a clause in the 1st Article. 134. that the King may not dispense with that Statute: There is a difference between that Statute and that for that doth enact, that if any person shall bargain and sell any office, Uf. shall forfeit the office, Uf. and all such bargains and contracts shall be void; and that he that shall give any sum of money, Uf. for any such office, Uf. shall be a disabled person in Law, to have, occupy, or enjoy the said office, Uf.

Now the Statute doth disable the party upon doing such an act, to take the office; for the making the bargain is prior to taking the office, and thereby he is disabled to take it, so that he can never have the office legally vested in him, if the King cannot dispense with a conditional subsequent, and if that does not come near this. And for this reason I humbly pray Judgment for the Defendant.

Then the Lord Chief-Justice Herbert says that:

Chief-Justice. THIS is a case of great consequence, but as of little difficulty is ever any case was, that raised so great an expectation, for if the King cannot dispense with this Statute, he cannot dispense with any Penal Law whatsoever.

As to the first point, whether the King be admitted to plead this dispensation, and pardon to this action, Uf. (having not pleaded it to the indictment) I think it may be; for the Court shall not be bound by the finding of the Jury below, for (if for any thing that does appear) did plead it there, and the Jury might have gone against the direction of the Court, yet that shall not conclude us; but if the party has good matter to discharge himself, we may then as: as if a man be convicted of an assault and battery against the Defendant, the Plaintiff may give the former conviction in evidence, but yet he must also prove the battery, or else he shall not recover.

And this being an affirmative, it shall not bind, because the Plaintiff was not put to the trial first.

As to the second point, whether the King can dispense with the Act or no, I think it a question of little difficulty. There is no Law whatsoever may be dispensed with by the Supreme Law-giver; as the Laws of God may be dispensed with by God himself; as it appears by God's command to Abraham, to offer up his son Isaac: So likewise the Law of Man may be dispensed with by the Legislature, for a Law may either be too wide or too narrow, and there may be many cases which may be out of the conveniences which did induce the Law to be made; for it is impossible for the which Law-maker to foresee all the cases that may be, or are to be remedied, and therefore there must be a power reserved, able to dispense with these Laws. But as to the case of Simony, that is objected by the other side, that it against the Law of God, and a special offence, and therefore makes in Uf. which I do agree the King cannot dispense with. And as to the cases of Ufury and Non-Residence, those cases do come under that rule, that the King cannot dispense with them, because the subject has a benefit by them; for in case of Ufury the Bond is made void by the Statute, and therefore if the King should dispense with it, the subject would lose the benefit of the avoiding the Bond. And as to the cases of buying and selling of offices, they are objected, there is no need of refusing, whether the King could dispense with that Statute or no, because the party was disabled to take any such office by the contract, and

* See Chief-Justice's Reports, page 11. if Uf. where this Case is largely reported.

† Richard Baron, in his History of the case of Thomas, First Baron, Edwards Baron, a Gentleman of a noble Family in Kent, desired himself a Papist, that he had long designed to be, and had come to that resolution, that he would from thence forth, there was no need to be given him any more of his office, where the Church the law-giver was concerned. He had an Employment, and not taking the Tith, his conscience was set up to inform against him, and to deliver the 200 l. to the Church the law-giver. When this was to be brought to trial, the Judges were divided about these opinions; and such as were not clear to judge as the Court did stand, were there were two (and some to a third). The Bar went in a solemn proclamation, and in Twenty-Two Judges were given.

And in page 471. the Baron says, But Judges, who are before-hand determined how to give their opinions, will not be much moved, even by the strongest arguments. The Barons once said on this occasion at the Bar, were rather a little firm for a week-end in a Trial, here with what arguments the Judges would maintain the Judgment that they should give; but they made nothing of it: and without any arguing gave Judgment for the Defendant, as if it had been as a Case of course.

the disability was attacked by force before the office was vested, so that the King could not remove the disability, and therefore it is to be said, that if it had been in this case, if the Defendant had by his neglect or refusal to take the oath, rendered himself incapable before he had taken the King's dispensation; for the King's dispensation coming before the disability attacked, it does prevent it.

The case of the Sheriff is much a stronger case than this, and comes up to it in every particular, for that Statute doth disable the party to take, and the King to grant; and there is also a clause in that Statute, which says, that the Patent shall be void, notwithstanding any assent to the contrary; and there is a penalty of 100 l. like to our Case; and yet by the Opinion of all the Judges of England, the King has a Power of dispensing with that Statute; yet that Statute does expressly say, the King shall not dispense with it by a non assensu: so if an Act of Parliament had a clause in it that it should never be repealed, yet without that clause, the same Power that made it, may repeal it. Besides, that Statute makes the Patents void at the time of granting them; but by that Statute the Patents are good at the time of granting them, and continue so 'till the next assent to take the oath, for during of which the Patents bear three months time. And if the case of the Sheriff be Law, as it hath been taken ever since Hos. Vill. the contrary, and is cited for good law in many of our books, and never till now questioned; for the common course and experience have been according to it, then I defy all the world to show me any material difference between that and this, only that this is the stronger case of the two, in many particulars. But because the case has been denied by the Plaintiff's Counsel, it does concern us to take the opinion of our Brethren, it being a matter of so great consequence in the Clergy for if it be not law, then there are some Sheriffs that be not lawful, and so have not power to return the Jurors, and then we have no power to try and give Judgment upon any offenders; and it also concerns us who put into our country, to take advice of it: for if that case is not law, our gentlemen, which are an assent to the 23 H. VIII. 24, may not be good, and so we have no authority to go the Circuit; and therefore I will ask the opinion of all the Judges, as well in this case as this.*

On Monday the 21st of June, after having consulted with all the Judges, his Lordship delivered their Opinions in open Court, thus:

1. In the Case of Galvins and Hells, wherein the defendant pleads a dispensation from the King; it is debated, whether or no the King had such a Prerogative? Truly, upon the argument before us, it appeared as clear a Case as ever came before this Court. But because men fancy I know not what difficulty, when really there is none, we were willing to give so much countenance to the Question in the Case, as to take the advice of all the Judges of England. They were all assembled at St. James's, and this case was put to them; and the great case of the Sheriffs was put, whether the dispensation in that case were legal? Because upon that depended the execution of all the Law of the Nation: And I must tell you, that there were ten upon the place, that clearly delivered their opinions, That the Case of the Sheriffs was good Law; and that that all the Attorneys grounded upon Indictments found by Juries returned by such Sheriffs, were good, and not erroneous; and consequently that men need not have any fears or scruples about that matter. And in the next place, they did clearly declare, that there was no imaginable difference between that Case and this; unless it were, that this were the much clearer Case of the two, and liable to the fewer exceptions.

My Brother Poult said, he was inclin'd to be of the same opinion; but he would rather have some more time to consider of it: But he has since sent by my Brother Hallway, to let us know, that he does concur with us. To the eleven Judges, there was one Dissenter, Brother Strait; who yet continued his dissent, and said, that the King cannot dispense in this Case: But that's the opinion of one single Judge, against the opinion of eleven. We were furnish'd in our Judgment before, and having the concurrence of eleven out of twelve, we think we may very well declare the opinion of the Court to be, that the King may dispense in this Case: And the Judges go upon their grounds;

1. That the Kings of England are sovereign Princes.
2. That the laws of England are the King's laws.
3. That therefore 'tis an inseparable Prerogative in the Kings of England, to dispense with penal Laws in particular Cases, and upon particular necessary Reasons.
4. That of their reasons and those necessities, the King himself is sole Judge: And then, which is consequent upon all,
5. That this is not a trust invest'd in, or granted to the King by the People, but the ancient remains of the sovereign Power and Prerogative of the Kings of England; which ever yet was taken from them, nor can be. And therefore such a Dispensation appearing upon Record to come in time enough to save him from the forfeiture, Judgment ought to be given for the Defendant &c.

And perpetuo et capite per hollum.

This Judgment making a great noise, the Lord Chief-Justice, in judgment of his opinion, published the following Vindication.

A Short Account of the Authorities in Law, upon which Judgment was given in Sir Edward Hales's Case: Sheweth by Sir Edward Herbert, Chief-Justice of the Common-Plays, in vindication of himself.

HAVING been called to a place of Judicature in difficult times, and after my most sincere resolutions and uttermost endeavours of discharging the duty of that place, with a good conscience, having yet bad the had fortune to fall under the greatest infamy and reproach that is possible for any man to lie under, of perjury and breach of trust; in giving a Judgment in Sir Edward Hale's Case, contrary to Law, and contrary to my knowledge and opinion (for that only can make it criminal); and which, they say, leads to the subversion of all our Laws, contrary to the oath that they judge takes, and to that high trust reposed in him, to judge to the best of his understanding, according to Law. Although I cannot help to me off that universal ill opinion that the malice of some people, who understand the nature of this Case very well, has made upon most men who do not understand it; yet in order to clear myself to all just and disinterested persons who are only my enemies by mistake, I think myself obliged to give some short account of that Judgment, and the grounds upon which it was given: and that I will do, not by making an elaborate and legal argument, to make out by reason of my own, that the Judgment then given is conformable to Law; which whether it be or no, is like to be confuted in Parliament, and to whose determination I shall as entirely and cheerfully submit, as any other person in the Nation. But I shall first show, not all the variety of Cases that we meet with in our Books, touching the King's power of dispensing with Acts of Parliament; for that would swell this Paper as an unreasonable length, and discompose many from reading any part of it; but only some few of the chiefest and plainest authorities in Law, upon which the resolution in the Case of Sir Edward Hale was grounded. I shall not only cite the Books and Pages where those Cases are to be found, but transcribe the very words, that every body may be convinced, that if we were in a mistake, it was no wilful mistake, but that we had the authority of former Judgments given by great men before us [and for which they were never questioned] to lead us into it.

The Case (for I must here it upon my memory, not having any Copy of the Record by me) was shortly this:

An ancient popular was brought against Sir Edward Hale, upon the Statute 5 Cal. II. c. 2. for the penalty of good, wherein the Plaintiff declares, that whereas it was provided by the Statute, &c. (setting forth the Statute): Notwithstanding which, the Defendant having a commission to serve the King as a Colonel of Foot, and not having received the Sacrament, nor taken the oaths and tests, &c. within the times prescribed by the Act, and after the times expired wherein he ought to have received the Sacrament, and taken the oaths and tests as aforesaid, he did execute the said Office, and continued to act by colour of the said commission; of which he was indicted and convicted at the Assizes in Kent, &c. whereby the action accrues to the Plaintiff for the penalty of good. The Defendant pleads, that before the time expired, &c. he had a dispensation under the great seal to act, non est tunc Statute.

To which the Plaintiff demurs.

And Judgment was given for the Defendant, that his Plea was good.

And first, it will be necessary to know what this dispensing Power is, which is warranted by our Judgment, and that will best appear by the definition of it, which is in the 17th. cap. of the Statute 25 Hen. VI. c. 8. in the Case of Monmouth: Dispensatio non prohibet de jure. De iure Regi concessio prestat impunitatem preiudicium de iure particularibus: et dispensatio de iure prohibet preiudicium de iure particularibus. For true it is (says the Book) that in as much as an Act of Parliament, which generally prohibits any thing upon a penalty that is popular, or only given to the King, may be incommode to divers particular persons, in respect of persons, time, or place; for this purpose the Law gives a power to the King to dispense with particular persons.

And in the 17th. cap. 63. in the Case of good Statutes, which was the opinion of all the Judges of England, a Nullum, it is related, that the King may dispense with any particular person, that he shall not incur the penalty of the Statute, but it be an Act made pro bona publico, and that this is a truth and confidence infamously ascribed to the royal person of the King. I cite these two first cases, chiefly to shew, that a Dispensation as its nature is particular, and given to particular persons by name; which is all the power that is attributed to the King by our Judgment. And this I mention, because of an unprofitable mistake of most People that talk of the dispensing Power, as though the King's declaration of Liberty of Conscience, whereby all the Laws that concern Religion are at once totally suspended and laid asleep, were warranted by it. Let that declaration stand or fall upon its own bottom, I am from the Case I am now speaking of, far from being able to do so. And having by these Cases cleared the nature of all dispensations, which are always granted to particular persons (as Sir Edward Hale's was in our Case, who was the first, and I think the only, person who then had such a Dispensation), I shall now cite some of the chief authorities upon which our Judgment was given in that case: And the first and greatest case that I cite, wherein the King's dispensing Power is defined and limited, is in the Year-book of Hen. VII. fol. 11. of H. VII. fol. 12. in these words: "There is a diversity (says the Book) between maius prohibetio and minus, as is a Statute forbids any man to coin money, and if he do so he shall be hanged; this is maius prohibetio; for before the Statute coining money was lawful, but now it is not so, and therefore the King can dispense with it. So if a man ship well in any place but Galley, it is maius prohibetio, because it is prohibited by Act of Parliament, and the King can dispense with it, and so in like cases: But that which is minus in the King, nor no other person can dispense with; as if the King would give a man power to kill another, or license one to make a nuisance in a highway, this were void; and yet the King can pardon these things when they are done." These are the very words of that Book, and my Lord Vaughan dissenting off, and explaining this case in the case of Thomas Sewall, in his Rep. p. 332. 3rd. Edit. here a Dispensation differs from a Pardon. For a Dispensation does not pardon, and makes the thing prohibited (no otherwise) lawful to be done by him that has it. And therefore the King cannot dispense with maius in his, because they never were, and never can be, made lawful: But even these (says the Year-book) may be pardoned after they are done.

From these Cases results this plain Syllogism: Wherever is not prohibited by the Law of God, but was lawful before any Act of Parliament was made to forbid it, the King, by his Dispensation, granted to a particular person, may make law again, so that person who has such Dispensation, though it continues unlawful to every body else.

But to execute any office without taking the oaths and the tests annexed to any Acts of Parliament made to forbid it, was lawful.

Therefore the Dispensation granted to Sir Edward Hale, did make it lawful for him to do so, though it contained unlawful for any body else.

In this argument the premises are not of our own, we derive them out of our law books; and the authority of those books have more than a count question, and appear to us as any indifferent person, whether it can be criminal in Judges, to draw a necessary conclusion from possible and book-cases that have been taken for Law for so many ages together.

The next great Case is the resolution of all the Judges of England, in 2 Hen. VII. in the Exchequer-Chamber, upon the King's Power of dispensing with the Statute of 25 Hen. VI. cap. 8. That no man should be Sheriff for above a year. The record in the preamble, and the words of the Statute, is contained under our Statute of 25 Car. II. cap. 2. as it is in every particular, and in some goes beyond it, for the words recited in our Law Statute are only in these words, For preventing abuses which may happen from Ralph Rowlands, and yet it is the words of Sir Henry's great Statute. The cause of making the Statute of 25 Hen. VI. to be for preventing the immoderate damage of the King and his People, perjury, manslaughter and great oppression. The Purview reads,

1. That no man shall be Sheriff for above a year.
2. That all Letters Patent made for above a year shall be void.
3. That no Non-obstante shall make above glad (which shews that the Parliament thought the King could otherwise have dispensed with this Act by a Non-obstante).

4. Where acts by colour of such Letters Patent shall forfeit goods.
5. He shall be attainted to bear the office of Sheriff in any County of England.

6. Every Person for such offence shall be void.

Notwithstanding all this, it was adjudged in that Case before cited by all the Judges of England, (who were at that time as learned as ever law upon the Bench); I say, it was adjudged by all the Judges in the Exchequer Chamber, that the King's Dispensation with that Statute was good.

Having then this Case before us, if we would have judged the Dispensation not good in Sir Edward Hale's Case, it must have been upon one of these two grounds: that is, either, 1. In the first place, we must have found some difference between the King's power in that case and in this, which I cannot, after the well-considered, does not appear to me, and I wish any man would shew us any such difference if he can; or else, 2. We must have adjudged that maius prohibetio given in the Exchequer-Chamber by all the Judges of England for long ago, and which has been taken for good Law ever since, we must adjudge no Law; whereas the known rule is, that after any point of Law has been solemnly settled in the Exchequer-chamber by all the Judges, we never suffer it to be disputed or drawn in question again.

But our enemies living the force of this argument, have had the confidence to say, that that point is not related in that case, &c. they might with as more difficulty affirm, Then that we saw false things as they thought, to be named of the Ten Commandments, we can only reply in our case as in that, that if we have eyes to read, and common sense to judge, we are there relieved. Included there is another point about the Sheriff's paying his accounts, which the Judges were divided in; but in the point of the dispensation they all agreed, or else, that other point could never have come in question.

But to put that beyond all controversy, we have two things to offer.

First, That it has been cited as adjudged in several books of great authority.

Secondly, It has been the constant practice to have such dispensations in all times for ever since that resolution.

As to the first, though I might cite many books, yet I will only cite three or four of the chiefest and greatest authorities; and the first shall be Fitzherbert, in his abridgement of this very case, Tit. Grant. 33. who lived near this time, and could not easily be mistaken in the sense of the Year-book: The Patent, says he, was given to a Sheriff by the Justice; but the Statute says expressly, it shall be void, therefore it is only made good by the King's dispensing.

2. Next to him shall be Plowden, who, as all Lawyers will certify, is as little like to be mistaken in the sense of the Year-book, as any Reader we have; and he, in his Commentaries, p. 502. in the title between a Grandee and the Bishop of Lincoln, after citing the case both out of Year-book, and out of Fitzherbert's abridgement, has these very words where the Statute was, That the King's grant to any man to be Sheriff of any County for longer time than a year shall be void, notwithstanding any clause of non-obstante to be put into the patent: There it is held, that the King's grant to the Earl of Northumberland, to be Sheriff during life was but a clause of Non-obstante, because of the phrase words of the Statute before-mentioned; and such clause of Non-obstante, the first to the Earl was good.

3. Next is my Lord Coke, who asserts the King's prerogative to be void; but his terms are not his own terms, as we could guess to do, in giving Judgment in Sir Edward Hale's case: For in his seventh report, page 215, he says these words: "No Act can bind the King from this prerogative, which is sole and inseparable to his person, but that he may dispense with it by a Non-obstante, as a sovereign power to contraind any other subjects to serve him for the publick weal, and this is fully and inflexibly annexed to his person, and his royal power cannot be refused." 4. by any Act of Parliament, neither in Tyot not in Hephobol, but that the King by his royal Prerogative may dispense with it: For upon the Commandment of the King, and Obedience of the subject, does his Government consist, as is provided by the Statute of 25 Hen. VI. cap. 8. That all Patents made or to be made of any office of Sheriff, &c. for term of years, for life, in his Majesty or his heirs, are void and of no effect; fully, any clause or parcel of non-obstante, put or to be put into such patents to be made notwithstanding. And further, whosoever shall take upon him or them, to accept or occupy such office of Sheriff, by virtue of such grants or patents, shall stand perpetually disabled to be or bear the office of Sheriff within any County of England, by the same authority. And notwithstanding that by this Act, First, The Patent is made void. Secondly, I believe is refrained to grant any Non-obstante. Thirdly, The grantee disabled to take the office: yet the King by his royal prerogative (power of contraind) may command by his subjects, that he will in his wisdom deem think meet and profitable for himself and his we have not always so much light to guide us, as we thought we had in this case. We often meet with cases of this kind, and very ill fitted by former judgments, where we are forced to dig truth out of the mire, to compare and distinguish, to discern and sift, and gather the seeds of the Law out of the confusion of disagreement, and very often contradictory arguments, as well as we can. And after all our labour and our pains, we appear to be in darkness, it was never yet supposed as a crime. The Judge is content if in a way of error, not only without any accusation, but without the least reflection upon him that gave it. Nor can a mistake in judgments be so criminal in a matter of a greater concernment, than it is in matters of the least consequence: It would be very mischievous and very dangerous, if it should. For if in questions of Privilege, any mistake shall be made, especially on the one hand, when Judgment is given for the King, who succeeding Princes may not be as angry at any mistakes on the other hand, I cannot imagine. And when once affairs are come to this pass, there will be great encouragement for any man, that pleads his own fault in a way of error, to undertake that very next day, to make his own fault his duty, without it, to undertake that very next day, but very dangerous, and very mischievous employment, a great freedom to give Judgment according to their opinion and their confidence, and great relief upon the relations of those, who know they shall be sure to go with their lives and fortunes for any mistake of theirs, either to the King or the People, as either of them shall happen to get the upper hand. For my own part, I thank God, I can lay this two things: I will, that for this time past together, wherein (with very little remission) I have sat as a Judge in several Courts, though I may be justly accused of many mistakes and misdeeds, yet I have never given Judgment in any one Case against the clear dictates of my reason and my conscience. And the second thing is, that I never gave Judgment in any controverted Point, wherein I had a doubt, and so great authorities to warrant it, as I have to warrant that Judgment which was given in Sir Edward Hales's Case. And this I say, not to set up that opinion again in a Pamphlet, which was so ill advised in a Court of Justice, nor to oppose my Sense to the Judgment of the Nation; for I think it is very fit that this dark Learning (as my Lord Playfair calls it) of Dyspepsia, should receive some light from a determination at Parliament, that Judges for the time to come, may judge by more certain Rules, which Acts of Parliament the King may, and which he may not dispute with, but I have said these authorities at this time in my own defence, and for these particular purposes; in the first place, to show,

1. That we are not the first inventors of this dispensing Power, but that it has been allowed without controversy, to the Kings of England in all ages, that they might dispense with many Acts of Parliament.

2. That if our Judgment was erroneous, and that the King could not dispense with that Act of Parliament, yet that error was but an error in that single Case, and had no such large and mischievous consequences as is pretended. For this, because we judge that the King could dispense with that Statute, for others to conclude from thence, that therefore he has a Power to dispense with all other Statutes, especially such as concern, or well in any of the subjects any manner of interest whatsoever, in their lives, liberties, or estates; or that, because the King may dispense with a penal Law, wherein a disability is annexed to the breach of it as a penalty, and that penalty not to be secured before a legal conviction, and where the King's dispensation makes the thing dispensed with lawful, and consequently prevents any conviction or penalty at all: For others to conclude from thence, that therefore the King may dispense with such Statutes, where a precedent disability is actually laid upon any man, as there is upon the Members of both Houses, till they have been the one and with privilege; and therefore without question, is not in the King's power to dispense. I say, these are consequences which may flow from the heated imaginations of angry men, but have no warrant or foundation at all from the Judgment given by us.

I have one thing more to say in my justification, which is, that if I have been guilty of so heinous offences as I am accused of, where is the temptation or reward? If it was to keep in my Judge's place, which otherwise I might have lost, I can only answer, That if that were the case, I then became the worst man in the world, only to keep that, which it is pretty well known, I was with much difficulty, with the persecution of my friends, prevailed with to accept; and for any other reward, whereof I am acquainted with the circumstances of my fortune, will, I am confident, notwithstanding the false and idle reports, of I know not what great reversions lately fallen to me, as easily acquit me of having been corrupted by the King, to give a pernicious Judgment in this Case, as of having stung myself by taking bribes in cases between party and party.

All that I have to add more, is, that howsoever that I have lost in my defence may happen to be understood at present, yet I could not deny myself the satisfaction of having put in a Plea of Innocence at least, that whatsoever shall happen to me now, may perhaps meet with a more equal Judgment, as afterwards; for as I ought to be much less usually to me to lose my life, if any body be very fond of taking it, than to let the allegations that are every day cast upon me, to pass in silence, or suffer myself to be transmitted to posterity under the character of a hypocrite of my Religion, or a subverter of the laws and liberties of my country.

Sir Robert Atkins, at the End of his Enquiry into the Power of dispensing with Penal Statutes, reads the following short Argument upon the Pleadings of the after-mentioned Case of Sir Edward Hales.

THIS is the Point argued by the Plaintiff's Counsel, which it appears by the Declaration, and it is now confuted by the Defendant's joining demurrer, that the Defendant had been indicted for this offence, in exercising the Office of a Colonel without having taken the Oath.

And upon the Indictment he either did plead this Dispensation, or might have pleaded it. And he is now convicted, according to the direction of the Act of 25 Car. II. in that he now comes too late to plead it to this Action: For he cannot falsify the conviction, nor aver any thing against the Record of it, and bring the fact to be tried over again in this Action; but is concluded and estopped in Law to say any thing to the contrary of that Record, by which he is found guilty of the offence against this Act of Parliament.

The Defendant either did plead this Dispensation or Pardon to the indictment, in discharge of the indictment, and it hath been over-ruled by the Judges at the Assizes (as by Law it ought to be, being no good Plea): Or he might have pleaded it, if he had been advised at that time a good Plea. And not having done it, he had elapsed his time, and now comes too late to plead it, being convicted of the crime.

To this was objected (as I have) that the Plaintiff, if he will take the advantage of an Estoppel, ought to have in force by way of replication to the Defendant's Plea, and so have relied upon it.

For the Rule is, That he that pleads an Estoppel, must rely upon it as an Estoppel.

It is true, if a man will plead an Estoppel, he must rely upon it. But in this Case the Plaintiff does not plead the Estoppel, but the Estoppel appears by the Declaration, and the Defendant's own Plea together: So that there was no need for the Plaintiff so far that forth by way of replication, which doth sufficiently appear by the Defendant's own Plea, now. That he did not take the Oath within the time limited by the Act, and the conviction is concluded by his Plea, and joining in demurrer.

If a man recover a debt upon a bond, and before execution dies, if his Executor file a Scire facias upon that judgment, the Defendant cannot plead any Plea that he might have pleaded before, as non est factum, or by Writ of Error, or the like, for he is concluded by the Judgment.

In John and Jane's Case, in Styler's Rep. fol. 43, by Styler, Chief Justice, a man shall never rely limited by Styler's Rep. (that) that is an equitable suit at Law for any matter that he might have pleaded before.

There is no Estoppel in this Case, for the Conviction is upon an Indictment, which is the King's suit: and this is the fact of another, viz. the new Plaintiff, and so they are two distinct facts.

The conviction upon the Indictment is an Estoppel against the Defendant himself, of which any man may take the advantage, and he himself shall never be admitted to aver against it: As in Mogge's Case, in Lesser's first part, fol. 3.

An attorney for treason is an universal Estoppel, of which any stranger may take the advantage, not only against the Party accused, but against his wife too, if he sue for dower. And it does not run in privacy: Ily Adams, 68 Bar.

Where a man is attainted by his own confession of a felony, a stranger is not estopped to say he was not guilty: But if a man confess felony, and after enjoin 7. S. of his land; and after A. is attainted of this felony by verdict, then 7. S. is estopped, and may not aver that A. was not guilty, because he claims under him: much less shall A. himself aver against the verdict, that he is not guilty.

If a man be accused of felony, all the World, says Grevill, in Anthony Rep. 8. is estopped to say the contrary 3. As also serje, if he be convicted, by the same reason 5.

As to that which is objected, that the conviction is upon an Indictment (which is the King's suit); but this is another fault, and therefore the verdict shall not conclude the Defendant in this fact:

This is not another fact, but in effect an execution upon the conviction, and grounded upon that Record, and therefore not merely a new fact, but a dependent action; as a Writ of error, or an addes Superiorem, or a Scire Facias upon a Record, or dependent facts, or an action of debt upon a Judgment.

By the Act of 25 Car. II. c. 2. hath made it criminal in any person, after his neglect of taking the two Oaths, or of the Statute, by the time limited, to execute any fact or office of trust; and for such offences hath made him voidable as the Assizes: and upon a conviction the offender incurs [among other penalties] the forfeiture of good, and gives it to any one that will sue for it as an action of debt.

So the Statute hath decreed the method of trying the offender, and of convicting the offender, by Indictment as the Assizes.

And if he that sues for the forfeiture shall be driven to prove the offence over again, then the conviction at the Assizes serves for nothing, but was all in vain. And such contrivance denotes the intention of the Law-makers, for they intended this for the only trial, and not to have several trials: For suppose it should be used again in this action, and a verdict pass for the Defendant, there shall be trial again trial, and verdict against verdict: and such contradictions ought to be made of Acts of Parliament, as may not elude, but agree with the intent of the Law-makers; and so as that no words, clause or sentence, shall be altogether idle and insignificant.

And this conviction upon the Indictment is the very ground of the Action of debt brought by the new Plaintiff, for the words of the Act are, And henceforth lawfully convicted upon any indictment, every such person shall forfeit all his goods and chattels 300 l.

So that all there be such a conviction, there is no forfeiture incurred of 300 l. nor so often can be brought for the 300 l. The offence must be proved and determined before any action can be brought; and therefore the proof of the offence, whereof the Defendant is convicted, must not be made in this action over again: if it must, what serves the conviction for?

Suppose the Plaintiff here had brought this action, after the neglect of the Defendant of taking the Oath, and of receiving the Sacrament, and his neglect in his office after such neglects, and before any conviction upon Indictment, and had only aver'd, that the Defendant had been neglected, and yet aver'd, would this action have then been brought? Or, suppose there had been a conviction, but the Plaintiff had not let it forth in his declaration, but had only aver'd the offence committed, would then have been a good declaration? Surely it would not. This proves that the Record of the conviction is the very ground and foundation of this action, and the action would not lie without such conviction; so that it is not a mere new action, but a dependent action.

And the usual difference is where the action is a dependent action, depending upon a Record, and grounded upon it, and where it is a collateral fact, not depending upon that Record.

* 7 E. 2. s. 1. Estoppel 142.

An Admonition against the Sheriff for a sequestrum of one taken in execution; this is a dependent Admonition, and is grounded upon the Record of the Judgment given against the party that sequestrum. The Sheriff cannot aver any thing against that Record, and examine it over again; nor can he take any advantage of error, or erroneous proceeding, in obtaining that Judgment. Sawmiller's Rep. 2. part. 108.

So is an Admonition of debt grounded upon a Judgment, or in an Admonition quæritur, to be relieved upon a Judgment.

And in our Case, this Admonition of debt for the scot, is grounded upon the conviction; which must stand for truth as long as it remains in force, and not avoided by error or attempt. A writ of Error to reverse a Judgment, is a dependent Admonition: In error, the Plaintiff may not aver any thing against the Record. Admonition servat Widdell, Style's 18 part. 94. Error was found in the King's Bench to reverse a Judgment given in the Palace Court: And the Plaintiff in error alleged for error, that the Duke of Gloucester (who is principal Judge of that Court by Patent) was not there. It was agreed by the Court, that it might not be alleged for error; for it was contrary to the Record.

But for Car. in an Admonition of trespass, or false imprisonment, which, (says that Report) are collateral Admonitions, may be safely and safely that, it be taken upon the Judgment.

So if a man be indicted and convicted of an assault and battery, and afterwards the person so assaulted brings his Admonition for the battery, this hath no dependence upon the Indictment or Conviction, for it may be found, that there were no Indictment, but is a distinct and collateral fact. The Indictment and Verdict is no estoppel, nor can so much as be given in evidence: as is held by the whole Court, in the Case of Samuel versus Yerdelly, and Tobell, 20 Car. II. B. R. Kelly's 2. part. 384. The like in an appeal of murder, Kelly's 2. part. 229.

Another ground upon the offender against this Statute of 25 Car. II. is, that he shall be obliged to sue in any Admonition. Now suppose a person convicted at the Assizes, faces an Admonition, may not the Defendant in that Admonition take the advantage of that disability, and plead the conviction? As in case of an Outlawry pleaded in disability there need not be set forth all the proceedings in that suit wherein the Plaintiff was outlawed, but he may plead the record of the Outlawry and rely upon it; and it shall not be examined whether there was any just cause to sue him to the Outlawry, or not.

The Indictment, the Defendant's Plea to it, and the Verdict upon it, have determined the matter of fact, that the Defendant is guilty of the offence against this Act of Parliament.

The Act itself has pronounced the Judgment, which consists of many particulars, one whereof is, that the Defendant shall forfeit scot, to him that will sue for it, and the action of debt for the scot, brought by the Plaintiff, grounded upon all these, is in the nature of an execution.

And all these put together, are not several and distinct suits, but in effect all but one suit and process, end depending upon the other.

The second Point is, Whether the Disposition pleaded by the Defendant be a good bar to the Action of debt? And this is properly called, The great Point of the Case:

For which the Reader is referred to Sir Robert Atkyn's Large Pamphlet, of The Enquiry into the Power of dispensing with Penal Statutes.

Two Sir Robert adds a Postscript: Being some Animadversions upon a Book writ by Sir Edward Herbert, Lord-Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, entitled, A Short Account of the Authorities in Law, upon which Judgment was given in Sir Edward Hele's Case.

[After a short Apology for making some Animadversions upon the said Book, he proceeds thus:]

THE Chief-Justice Herbert, says pag. 67. gives us the definition of a dispensation out of Sir Edward Hele's 12th Rep. fol. 88. viz. Dispensatio modo prohibita est de jure Domini Regis concessa, propter inopiam rationis privationem de consuetudine particularium.

And again, Dispensatio est mali prohibiti provide relaxatio utilitate civinecessitate concessa.

Upon the word Genus, I would gladly be satisfied, when, or by whom that Power was ever granted to the King; where had we find that Grant? It is clear, that whoever hath the true power of making a Law, may justly dispense with that Law. And therefore Almighty God, being the sole and supreme Law-giver, might dispense even with the moral Law; as he did with the sixth Commandment, when he commanded Abraham to sacrifice his son Isaac; and with the eighth Commandment, when he commanded the Israelites to borrow the jewels of the Egyptians, and to go away without restoring of these.

But it stands not with reason, that he who hath but a share with others in making of a Law, (as the King hath no more) should have the power, by himself alone to dispense with the Law, unless that power was expressly intrusted with him by the rest of the Law-makers; as power is hath been done.

Sir Edward Coke, in his 7th Rep. in the case of Penal Statutes, fol. 36. towards the lower end, does affirm, that this dispensing Power is committed to the King, by all his subjects. So that it is not claimed Jure Divino, but by grant from the People. But where in any such Grant we know not.

I have, as I conceive, made it appear in my larger argument, p. 14. that the first mention of Dispensation with Laws, began with the Pope, about the time of Herbert III. and by our King Henry VIII. on occasion, and by encouragement from the Pope, is that it was not by the Grant of the People, but over exclamation against by all good men, and generally by all the People; and ever fervent against by a multitude of Acts of Parliament.

It is true, the dispensing with laws hath ever since been practised; and they began at first here in England to be used only in Cases where the King alone was concerned, in Statutes made for his own profit, wherein he might have done what he pleased. But it is but of later times that they have been stretched to Cases that concern the whole Realm. See my Argument, fol. 13. Hence it evidently appears, it cannot be a legal power given to the King; for that must ever be by prescription, and refrained to those cases that have been used time immemorial, and must not be extended to new cases.

* Jefferies versus Coler. And Dr. Druys Case, 1 R. 140. And Mackay's Case, 6 R. 46.

Now there hath been no such usage as will warrant the dispensing with such an Act of Parliament as is now before us, that of 25 Car. II. c. 2.

The Chief-Justice Herbert, from the definition before recited, and these two authorities of Sir Edward Coke, in his Case of Monopolies, and that other of penal Statutes, frames an argument to prove, that the Dispensation granted to Sir Edward Hele, was good in Law.

Because a Dispensation is properly and only in case of a Male Prohibitum; he thence infers, that the King can dispense in all cases of male prohibitum.

Which is a wrong inference, and that which Logicians call, Fallacia à dicto, quod est ad dictum simpliciter. Because he can dispense with laws, that therefore he can dispense with all, is no good consequence.

It appears by the late Chief-Justice Vaughan's Reports, in the Case of Thomas and Sarrel, (who is often cited by the Chief-Justice Herbert) Vaughan's Rep. fol. 339. the fourth Paragraph, that his opinion is, that the King cannot dispense with every Male Prohibitum; and he gives many instances of such Male Prohibitum that are not dispensable, fol. 342, and 354. parag. 4.

Therefore the Lord-Chief-Justice Herbert should, as I conceive, regularly first have given us the definition of Male Prohibitum, 250 such as are dispensable, and four as are not dispensable; and thus have shown, that the Dispensation granted to Sir Edward Hele, fell under the first part; But that learned Reporter, the Chief-Justice Vaughan (so often cited by our now Lord-Chief-Justice) in the aforesaid case of Thomas and Sarrel, fol. 352. the last Paragraph infra en, quereis with the very definition of Male Prohibitum, and Male in se, and says it is confounding.

From whence I would observe, and from the whole Report in Thomas and Sarrel's case, that the notion of dispensation is as yet but crude and undigested, and not fully shaped and formed by the Judges.

The Pope was the Inventor of it, our Kings have borrowed it from them; and the Judges from time to time have refined and distilled it up, and given it countenance. And it is still upon the growth and encreasing, till it hath almost subverted all Law, and made the royal power absolute, if not diffuse.

I must agree, that our Books of late have run much upon a diffinition, viz. Where the breach of a penal Statute is to the particular damage of any person, for which such person may have his Admonition against the breaker of that law; there, tho' it be but Male Prohibitum, yet the King cannot dispense with that penal Law, according to the rule in Brooke's:

Res non patitur gratum fore cum respectu à domo alterius.

For instance, these are several Statutes that prohibit one man from maintaining another's suit, though in a just cause. See Prædict de pace Regni, in his chap. of Misnomers, fol. 59.

Now it is held that the King cannot dispense with those Laws, because it would be to the prejudice and damage of that particular person, against whom the suit is so maintained by another; for there can be no maintenance, but it is to the wrong of a particular person.

So of carrying a distress out of the Hundred.

But there are many other penal laws, where, by the transgressing of them, no subject can have any particular damage, and therefore no particular Admonition for the breach of them.

As upon the Statute that prohibits the transgression of wood, under a penalty. By the breach of this Law, that is, by the exportation of wood, no one particular man hath any damage, more than every other man hath, but it is only against the publick good.

And the breach of such a penal law is possible only at the King's suit, by Indictment or presentment.

And the like where such a penal Statute gives an Admonition popular, to him that will sue for the penalty, who hath no right to it more than another, till his suit be commenced.

In these cases, it is commonly held, that the King may dispense with such penal Statutes, as to some particular persons, and for some limited time, (whereof they make the King the sole Judge) because, as the reason is given in the Chief-Justice Vaughan's Reports, fol. 344. parag. 2. such offence wrongs none but the King. This is now the common received opinion and diffinition. And the breach of such kind of Statutes, are said to be only the King's damage as his publick capacity, as supra per Governor, and wronging none but himself. Lord Pauley Rep. fol. 342. parag. 3.

But if we will narrowly search into this diffinition, and weigh the reason for given, we shall find it is without any just ground.

The damage done to the particular person in the Cases post, is the first part of this diffinition, are merely his own proper and peculiar damage; and he is intitled to his particular action for it, in his own proper personal right; and therefore if he discharge and dispense with them, it is as wrong to any other man: he may do what he will with his own.

But the Cases in the second part of this diffinition, are where the King hath a right to the suit, and the offence and damage are said to be to him only.

But are they (as the former) in his own personal right, as his Locum or officium, it seems easy to say are they to him but as a subject for the Publick, for which reason he is called Creditor Publicus? And may he therefore, upon the like reason dispense with them, or dispense of them, as a subject may do with his own particular interests?

Again, shall a publick damage and injury to the whole Nation, be more dispensable by the King, than the loss of one privilege man?

—fall Re Legislatio quædam
Publica generis severitate—

And therefore, in my apprehension, the King cannot, in such cases of Dispensation, be truly said to wrong none but himself, and it is not agreeable to the definition before given, Uniusus Compensator, for the King wrongs the whole Realm by it. Whom if he grants a dispensation with a Penal Law of the first sort of this diffinition, his only wrong is one particular person.

The cases and authorities for dispensations in our Books that were granted in ancient times, will generally be found to be only where the Penal Statutes were made for the King's own proper interest and benefit at his discre-

King with the Statute of Mortmain. For in such cases it was to the King's own loss only, in cases where the King might by Law have given away by his order for uses. So the King may in his Point of grant of lands, dispense with the Statute, 1 Hen. IV. cap. 6. that requires there shall be mention of the true values of them. And by a new statute to those Statutes (which is now generally cited) the King hath in effect declared, that it is his pleasure to grant those lands, whatever the value of them be, more or less, and the Statute does by express words give a liberty to the King in that case.

The King is not a trafficker for others in such cases, nor can their dispensations be said to be chiefly to the damage of the Public. And such Penalties Lawfully imposed concern the King's own revenue or profit, may justly be thought to be intended, to be made only to put the King's matters into an ordinary method and course, and to save the King's labour, as the Lord Hobart says; and to prevent the King's being surpris'd or mis-inform'd, when Parliament is gain'd from him, and not design'd to tie the King's hands, or to restrain his power; as out of all doubt was done and intended by the Law-makers in our Act of 25 Ger. II.

But in all the late cases and authorities which we meet with in our Books concerning an objection, and dispensations, as in the time of King Hen. VII. and to downward to this day, we find them being usually upon such Penalties Statutes as merely concern the public good and benefit, and the Laws of such a nature, by the breach of which the whole Nation suffers: while some particular persons, it may be, by giving a large fine, or a yearly sum, obtain the favour to be dispensed with and exempt from a Penal Law, while all others continue to be bound by it.

As for example: where a Statute forbids the exportation of Wool, or of Cloth under or without it, under a penalty such a Law is greatly for the public good, and it takes care that our own people shall have employment and maintenance. Yet this is such a Law, as according to the mode of dispensation, the King may dispense with, there being no particular damage to one man more than to another, by breach of such a Law, although it be a mighty damage to the whole Nation: for by such a dispensation, the person so dispensed with to export such white Cloth uncoloured, will have the free trade, which before the making of that Penal Statute was equal and common to all. I wish the House of Commons would enquire what vast riches have been heretofore gotten by such as have obtained the dispensations with this Penal Statute, besides the sums they paid to the Crown for them. These are most Monopolies.

In such a case it is their duty to insist, that the Law should stand by its Law. It had been better for the Nation, that such Laws were never made, being no better observ'd: For later again the dispensation is neither Children, nor Necessaries permit.

Look into the case of Tanner and Berril, and you will find few or no cases of dispensations cited out of our Books, but of the time of King Henry VIII. and much more of very late times: so that the ill practice is still improving and spreading.

The Lord Chief-Justice Hobart, in the next place, page 618, proceeds to mention the true case of Hen. VII. a resolution of all the Judges in the Exchequer-chamber, upon the King's dispensing with the Statute of 23 Hen. VI. cap. 8. That no man should be dispensed above one year. This is the great leading case and authority, upon which the main stress is laid to justify the Judgment given in Sir Edward Hales's case.

I would avoid repeating what I have already so largely said to this authority, to which I must refer my Reader, by which I hope it is notwithstanding made out, that the King neither hath, nor ever had any just right or power to elect Sheriffs: but the right of electing was anciently and originally belonging to the Freeholders of the several Counties, and since it was unjustly taken from them as they have ever been on the losing hand, it hath been lodged in the great Officers of the Realm, as the Lord-Chancellor, Lord-Treasurer, Lord Privy-Seal, and the Judges, &c. as appears by the several Statutes.

And they are to make such choice every year in the Exchequer, on a day appointed by the Statute for that purpose. So that the Sheriffs are by these Statutes to continue in their offices for one year only, and the King cannot hinder such election.

Only by his Patent or Commission to the Sheriff, hath he used to signify to the Sheriff himself that he is chosen; and to publish to all others who the person is that is chosen. This is all the will of the Patent; but it is the proper election of those great Officers that truly vests them in their Office.

And it does as clearly appear, that when former Kings have dispensed with a Sheriff's continuing in his Office for longer than one year, contrary to the several Statutes for forbidding it, the King hath so done it by virtue (not of his prerogative, but) of a special Act of Parliament enabling him to do so, for some extraordinary occasions, and for some limited time only. See for this the Statute of 4 Hen. V. cap. 5. in the Statutes at large, and my larger argument, fol. 37.

The truth is, the power of dispensing is originally in the Legislators. He only can dispense with a Law, that can make a Law. The power is equal; and the Legislators can confer the same power upon the King or any others, for some convenient time, &c. as appears by the last institution of the Sheriff, and divers other like cases, mentioned in my foregoing argument, where I have also observed many other things upon that resolution of a Hen. VII. concerning Sheriffs.

The Chief-Justice Hobart supposes the mischiefs arising in the preamble of that Statute of 23 Hen. VI. cap. 8. concerning Sheriffs continuing in their offices longer than one year, to be equal, if not greater (as he judges) than the mischiefs recited in the Statute of 25 Ger. II. by Popish being in offices; and from thence, I presume, would infer, that the case of Sir Edward Hales is not so fatal in the consequence, as the case of a Sheriff.

I may appeal to any ordinary Judgment, and to the late experience and trial we have so lately had, and to the danger we were so lately in (from which Almighty God, by no less than a miracle, hath in great mercy delivered the Nation), whether the mischiefs that could any way possibly arise from the dispensing with the same (I mean the Statute concerning Sheriffs) be comparable to the mischiefs arising from putting Popish into office, and intrusting them with our Religion, and all our Civil Rights.

The Chief-Justice, upon these words of the Statute concerning Sheriffs, viz. That as Noa offitantes shall make them good, infers page 618. that those words do shew, that the Parliament which made that Act concerning Sheriffs, was of opinion, that had it not been for that clause, the King could otherwise have dispensed with that Act by a new statute.

Any. This is no more than a strained inference, and that it is very far from drawing any such opinion in that Parliament. It rather signifies, that had not the Parliament intended that clause into the Act, the King might have done again, as he had frequently practis'd before, viz. granted dispensation upon that Statute: which ill practice they endeavoured to prevent for the future, not approving the practice, nor owning the power of doing it. Ex verbis mortuorum vivamus again. A good Law rather condemns a customary practice before used.

I heartily desire my Reader (as I have done in my foregoing larger argument) candidly to observe and examine of what sort a man should have been, which the resolution of the case of a Hen. VII. urges to warrant that resolution; as those cases concerning the true value of lands, which the King grants; and that concerning the shipping of wool to a certain staple, &c. and let the Reader judge how vast a difference there is between those Statutes in the nature, and import, and reason of them, and this weighty important Statute now before us; and how little that resolution of a Hen. VII. can be warranted by the cases there cited, being of it inferior and quite a consideration, in comparison of the principal case.

It is true, Sir Edward Coke (in the twelfth Report which goes by his name, be truly say) hath given that resolution given in 2 Hen. VII. found out new and different reasons and arguments, which are not urged, and therefore I presume never so much as thought so, at that time by the Twelve Judges, who gave the resolution in his case of 2 Hen. VII.

Thus says Sir Edward Coke, in his relation of the Religion used in the west parts of the World: those of the Roman Religion made their greatness, wealth and honour, to be the very roll by which to gauge out the Canons of their Faith; and then did tell Clerks on work to devise arguments to maintain them.

Sir Edward Coke seems to justify that resolution concerning Sheriffs, from this ground, viz. That the King hath a foreign power, as command any his subjects to serve him for the public weal. And this is (says he) fully and sufficiently consent to his power, and that this royal power cannot be restrained by any Act of Parliament, 12 Rep. fol. 18.

I am to be no lessely amazed to the King's person, appears by the several Acts of Parliament, which I have cited to this purpose in my larger argument, fol. 37, viz. when the power of dispensing with Popish Statutes, was given to the King by the Parliament, and by him accepted for some short time. And the whole Parliament have in divers cases themselves exercis'd this very power.

Judge of the weight of the reasons said to be given them by Sir Edward Coke, by that one instance of his in the case he puts of purveyance, 12 Rep. fol. 19, which (he says) cannot be taken from the King, no, nor by Act of Parliament.

Yet we have lived to see it lately taken away by Act of Parliament; which is a just indignation of a Parliament (which is of the highest authority in Law) may therefore be taken from the King.

And is the King in truth restrain'd from commanding his subjects to serve him for the public weal, either by those Statutes that disable Sheriffs to continue in their offices longer than one year, or by our Statute of 25 Ger. II. that disables Popish Recusants to bear public offices: because these very unlawful, unseemly, and dangerous persons are disabled to bear offices of trust and power (and thus by the King's own consent to the Act, and by the advice of the great Council, the Parliament), and indeed of the whole Realm?

Does the King by this (which the Judges mis'd a restraint) want for choice of persons to serve in offices? Doubt the public weal suffers by this restraint: Is it not rather preserv'd by it? Hath not the King's Protestants subjects enough to bear offices? And are Popish Recusants (who account Protestants Heretics), and to be removed out and deliv'd up, and with whom they hold no faith, is to be kept, and against whom they have been continually plotting mischief? are these the fittest to be intrusted with the defence of the Protestant Religion, and with our Lives and Estates, which are all concern'd, more or less, in every public office and trust?

And are those persons (the Popish) that have a dependence upon the See of Rome, and a foreign power, fit to be intrusted with the power of the Nation, with the Militia, and the Sea-ports?

Is not this to commit the Lamb to the custody of the Wolf?

This Act that disables Popish to bear offices, cannot be justly said to be a restraint upon the King; that expression sounds ill, and takes the matter by the wrong branch. It rather imports the King's declaration and resolution, by advice of his great Council, to employ none in offices and places of trust, but such as are most capable and fit, and will most faithfully answer the great ends for which they are to be intrusted, that is, the preservation of the Protestant Religion, which is the true English Interest.

And this agrees with the rules of the Common Law, that if an office be granted to one that is indiscreet, the Grant is void, though granted by the King himself. Of this I have treated more largely in my argument, fol. 37.

The Lord Chief-Justice Hobart, page 619, asks the question, Whether to many solemn resolutions of all the Judges of England in the Exchequer-chamber, are not to be relied upon for Law? And I answer, that if they were ten times as many more, yet they are not to be relied on against many express public Acts of Parliament directly to the contrary. For what words could the Parliament use more emphatical, and express, and more weighty to the purpose, than by saying, that no persons, or a dispensation, or a Grant of such a thing (prohibited by that Law) shall be absolutely void, and void facts adjudg'd void, and the person made incapable to take? And is not a Judgment in Parliament, and by Act of Parliament, of the highest authority?

But (says the Chief-Justice, fol. 619.) the constant practice hath been to dispense with the Statute of Sheriffs. I answer, it hath also been a very frequent practice too for the King, to make such persons Sheriffs, as were none of the number nominated or chosen as aforesaid by the Chancellor, Treasurer, Judges, and other great Officers; and it passes for current that he may so do, though it be a vulgar error: for it hath been relieved by all the Twelve Judges, to be an error in the King. See Sir Edward Coke's 2^d Inst. or Magnum Charta, fol. 559. and yet it is practis'd to this very day.

Twelve

The Chief-Justice, page 629. seems to excuse Pay's Recusants for not qualifying themselves for offices, by taking the oaths and the rest, &c. for that no man (such he) hath it in his power to change his opinion in Religion as he pleases, and therefore it is not their fault. It is an error of the mind, &c.

Ans. Here is no occasion taken to find fault with them for their opinion; let them keep their Religion still, if they like it so well, who hinder them. This Act of 25 Car. II. imposes no penalty upon them for their opinion; but is there any necessity of their being in offices? Must they needs be Guardians of the Protestant Religion? The penalty upon them by this Act, is not for their opinion, but for their presuming to undertake offices and trusts, for which they are by King and Parliament adjudge'd.

Page 630. The Chief-Justice Fagbush is brought in, arguing for the King's power of dispensing with (Nominal) nuisances (as he is pleas'd to call and distinguish nuisances). The word nominal, as there understood, imports, that though a Parliament declares any thing to be a nuisance, (as sometimes they do in Acts of Parliament, to order them indispensable) which yet in its proper nature would not otherwise be so censur'd to be; that such a nominal nuisance (as he holds) may however be dispens'd with by the King, though regularly by Law the King may not dispense with any nuisance.

Ans. Shall any singular or particular person, though a Chief-Justice, presume to call that a mere nominal nuisance, which a Parliament by a solemn Act and Law have adjudge'd and declared to be a real nuisance? Are we not all concluded by what a Law says? This arrogance is the mischief now complain'd of.

The Chief-Justice Herbert, page 630. says, that from the abuse of a thing, an argument cannot be drawn against the thing itself. I agree this is regularly true; yet we have an instance to the contrary in the Scripture, in that part of the Brass Serpent. But in our case the abuse doth arise from the very nature of the thing itself, from the constitution of it.

For the King practiseth no more in dispensing, than what their resolutions of the Judges allow him to do by this pretended prerogative. The error is the foundation.

They have made his power to be unlimited, either as to number of persons, or as to time, how long the dispensation shall continue. Sir Edward Coke says, and so the other Books, That the King is the sole Judge of this.

See notes Revers, see Tempora parant.

The Chief-Justice Herbert, fol. 630. cites two clear concessions (as he is pleas'd to call them) of all the Commons of England in Parliament, which he effects much greater authorities than the several resolutions of all the Twelve Judges.

But how far these are from concessions, will easily appear to an indifferent Reader. They are no more than prudent and patient avoiding of disputes with the several Kings. And there are mischiefs of the like in the old Parliament-Rolls.

It is but an humble clearing of themselves from any purpose in general, to oblige the King of any of his prerogatives (which have always been touchy and tender things), but it is no clear nor direct allowance of that dispensing their mention'd, to be any such prerogative in him.

However, I am glad to see an House of Commons to be in so great request with the Judges. It will be as at some times, more than at others.

Yet I do not remember, that in any argument I have hitherto met with, a vote, or order, or opinion of the House of Commons hath been cited for an authority in Law, before or now. Will the House of Peers allow of this authority for Law?

It will be said, that this is but the acknowledgment of parties concern'd in Interest; which is allowed for a good testimony, and throughly against themselves.

Ans. I do not like to have the King and his people to have divided interests. Prerogative and the people's liberties should not be lock'd upon as opposites. The prerogative is given by Law to the King, the better to enable him to protect and preserve the subjects rights. Therefore, it truly concerns the people to maintain prerogative.

I could cite several Parliament-Records wherein the poor House of Commons have been forced to submit themselves, and humbly beg pardon of the King, for doing no more than their duty, merely to avert his displeasure. See the case of Sir Thomas Hoby, whom the King adjudge'd a Traitor, for exhibiting a Bill to the Commons for the avoiding of the outrageous expenses of the King's house, 20 R. II. ann. 14, 15, 16, 17, and 23, and the Commons were driven to discover his name to the King, and the whole House in a mournful manner craving pardon for their maintaining of that Bill.

No doubt, as good an authority against the Commons for so easily yielding in a matter so forced, and so far above them. Yet afterwards a 2^d Inst. men say, that Judgment against Sir Thomas Hoby was reversed. As for the diffinition, page 622. of a disability actually incur'd before the making in an office, and where the disability is prevented by the coming of a dispensation; I answer, that its being prevented, is but Potus Principis, and a begging of the question. And so this diffinition I have (I think) fully spoken in my larger argument, fol. 40.

The late Parliament, in making this Act of 25 Car. II. had, no doubt, a prospect that probably the Crown would defend upon a Pay's Successor, and they levelled this Act against the dangers that might then befall our Religion and Liberties, and they thought it a good security. but it is all nullified and come to nothing, by occasion of this Judgment in the case of Sir Edward Halm. And that must be justified by a Net Justice.

As to the objection that the Chief-Justice families might have been made against him, or advice given him that he should rather have parted with his place, than to have given a Judgment so prejudicial to the Religion he professes, page 622.

This, I say, that for my part I should never have advis'd him to have parted with his place, much less to have given a Judgment against his own opinion. But let his opinion be what it was, yet seeing the clear intention of the makers of the Law contrary to that his opinion, and knowing the desperate effects and consequences that would follow upon the dispensing with that Act, (for we were upon the brink of dissolution by it) and taking notice (as this Chief-Justice and the rest of the Judges needs must) that the King had first endeavour'd to have gain'd a dispensing power in this matter from both Houses (which was the fair and legal course), and that yet these very Parliaments which, out of so great a consideration for their times, had sever'd look'd to many prerogatives, and complied at the King's taking and collecting of the Customs, (but in truth the Collection, and all that had any hand in the receiving of them, accord'd a Præsumption by us) not to mention the ill artifice used in gaining the Exchequer; yet that Parliament of the King's boggl'd at the dispensing with the Act of 25 Car. II. knowing the mighty importance of it.

And though they could not but take notice that so many Judges at once had been remov'd, because they could not swallow this Bitter Pill, and others brought into their places, as might be justly suspected, to serve a turn, and the King's learned Council could not at first find out this prerogative to do his work with, till so many ways had been attempted, and all prov'd ineffectual, sure in such circumstances it had been prudence, nay the duty of the Judges to have refus'd the determination of it to a Parliament, and the rather, because it was to establish a Law newly made, and the consequences so dreadful, and the intent of the Law-makers so evident.

And this hath been frequently practis'd by Judges, in cases of far less difficulty and consequence. This I have also enlarg'd upon in my large argument, page 26.

Objct. But it might have been a long time before any Parliament had been call'd.

Ans. We ought to have Parliaments once a year, and after if need be, and seldom presumptive off our Regis, pace Legis; and we then should in great need of a Parliament even for the sake of this very case.

And these faulty Judgments are one ill cause why Parliaments meet so often; the work of Parliaments is taken out of these hands by the Judges. And it is the interest of some great Officers, that Parliaments should not be call'd, or else be hastily prorogued or adjourn'd.

As to the point of the learned Adams, which the Lord Chief-Justice seems to justify, I conceive he mislikes the force of the objection. Edward Adlam may be a true man, but this Action against Sir Edward Hale is suspected not only to have been injudiciously and brought by Crown houses, him, and his friends and friends, but it was feign'd and feign'dly prosecuted, and his honesty and honesty defended.

This solemn resolution was given upon a few short arguments at the Bar, and without any at the Bench, and upon other reasons (as I have heard) which were then made use of, are now given by the Chief-Justice; but the times will not bear them.

After all, I intend not by this to do the office of an accuser, nor to charge in a crime. But as I think myself bound in duty, on the behalf of the whole Nation, of myself, (though a small part and member of it) and of my friends, I hardly propose, that the judgment given in Sir Edward Hale's case, may, after a due examination, (if there be found cause) be legally reversed by the House of Lords, and that several approv'd of and confirm'd by a special Act of Parliament.

But as that Judgment of the Lord-Chief-Justice was of the utmost consequence, and his Vindication far from satisfying the People, Mr. Atwood, a very considerable man in his profession, at that time, undertakes to answer the Chief-Justice. I therefore to fit the whole matter in a true light, and to observe an exact impartiality, Mr. Atwood's Examination of the Chief-Justice's Account, is here inserted, as follows.

The Lord Chief-Justice Herbert's Account examin'd by William Atwood, Esq. Barrister at Law, wherein is shown, That Justice William in Law, whereby he would excuse the Judgment in Sir Edward Hale's case, are very unjustly cited, and so at all appear.

WHERE it is not the approach of our times, to have had men advis'd to Courts of Judicature for other merits besides Integrity and Learning in the Laws of their Country; it might seem a great piece of vanity in me, to answer a Book stamp'd with the name and authority of a Chief-Justice.

Yet, perhaps, I might be thought, not without cause, to take this as my more immediate Province; having been the last of the profession who remain'd in public companies to draw, how weakly that innocent Book-trade, 2 Hen. VII. in relation to Sheriffs, has been mislead, or misled, to serve for cause to that bulky Judgment in Sir Edward Hale's singular case.

Wherefore, how needless were the Chief-Justice may find it, to make productions of his sincerity, and Account, p. 616. this may superfluous any such from me. Nor would I willingly call him a pretensionary to apparent fact (especially considering that weakness of Judgment manifested by this defence), did he not give too great occasion for it. 1. From the large steps which he took to precipitate, and, as I am well assur'd, to solicit that resolution. 2. The manner in which he deliver'd it, wisely differing from what he now prints. 3. The unfairness of his present quotation. And, 4. The uncharitable, not to say spiteful, of these instances which he is pleas'd to give in his sincerity.

I shall not dispute, or repeat his Lordship's fair of the case; but the question upon it being, Whether the King may by his prerogative dispense with the Statute 25 Car. II. cap. 2. requiring all persons in any office under the King, to take the oath against Popery, I shall enquire,

1. Whether those Books, which he relies on as authorities for his Judgment, give any colour to it?

2. Whether, admit they did, they would countenance the resolution as he deliver'd it?

3. Whether these Instances which he offers of his sincerity, may reasonably be taken for fact?

4. Whether he in any measure clears himself from the imputation of being highly criminal?

His Lordship, like a master-disputant, begins, as he thinks, with a definition of a Dispensation, which he says, Account, p. 617. is given by the Lord Coke: Dispensatio male prohibita est de jure Domini Regis concessio, propter indignitatem personarum aut similia particularia, et de dispensatione propter necessitatem personarum, aut similia, ut in officio personarum.

Where, I must say, he very successfully begs the definition of a dispensing power, with the person in whom 'tis suppos'd to be lodged; nay, and the reason too why it should be so, which neither the Lord Gely, nor common sense, gives him any warrant to bring into the definition. He compares it then, according to this, a dispensing power, in some case or others, is vested in the King, which yet is far from proving any thing to his purpose, for either the King may in all cases dispense as to particular persons, and thus his dispensation of malum prohibitum, as p. 617, and malum in se, falls to the ground; or else it reaches only to those cases, in which the judgment or sanity of Judges has ascribed it to him.

He adds out of the Lord Coke, (p. 617.) 1st Rep. p. 88. as an enlargement upon what he calls the definition, Jeagueh or an Act of Parliament, which generally prohibits any thing upon a penalty that is popular, or only given to the King, may be incommuted to shew particular persons, in respect of age, sex, time, or place, for this purpose the Law gives a Power to the King to dispense with particular persons. Where the Lord Coke manifestly defines the penalty, to shew as is given the King as Head of the People, upon which account only he calls it popular; nor, indeed, can be thought to take in what is granted to any subject that will inform, it being mentioned without distinction, whether before or after an Informacion commenced.

And that the Lord Coke's words here, 7 Rep. p. 58, ought not to be restrained further, is yet more evident, from the case of Peal Statute, on which Sir Edward Herbert's mis-representations will occasion my more particular Remarks.

As Sir Edward, considering what interest he has here, may be presumed something convenient with Priests and Jesuits, he might, among others of his ilk, have censured the learned Saunders (a), who alter the definition, which he makes to be Legis benevolencia, in a distinct Chapter shews, with whom the ordinary power of dispensing (which he distinguishes from that which is delegated) is lodged, where he says, ch. 14. p. 395. Certain of our habers auctoritate potestatem dispensandi, qui legem iustit. And even from the reason, Quia qui contra iustitiam patitur potestatem. So that none can have this power, but he, as he who is vested with the legislative power, or, as far as it is delegated from thence. That the King has not the legislative power of dispensing, in what I have formerly proved at large (b), and it lies on the other side to shew, that the dispensing power has been delegated to him. Yet thus much may be said on the contrary:

First, That the King could not in Law be presumed to have exercised such a power by himself; for that the ancient Law provided, that he should have a Council whole in Parliament, who (as the Charter affirm'd to be hereditary of the ancient Law, and from at the Coronation of Hen. III. hinc (c)) were facti consilium Domini Regis et Regni solutio tractatus, &c. for accusations personarum contra justitiam established, and thus it was asserted the Law long before it was altered by the impeachment of Roger Mortimer, &c. III. part of which was, that Wortem ita est ordinatum in Parlamento sub auctoritate Regis, that four Bishops, four Earls, and four Barons, should stand by the King, Parliay Counsellors; without whose assent Nal gron Batellus in se Feud: nevertheless Mortimer would undertake to manage all by himself, approaching royal Power (d). And it is easily to be shewn, that such a Council was in use, or continually in use, as the right of the Kingdom, from the time of the Conquest, confirm'd 28 Hen. III. till the end of the Reign of Hen. VI.

2. A Power to grant any assente to the Statute, could not have been a right in the Crown at Common Law, for we have clear proofs of its origin and confirmation beginning from the fulgurant fountain of Rome, as a honest populi lawyer censur'd with a deep sigh, 35 Hen. III. This was assente Matthieu Perle calls, a dispositio adversus apud all Regem et Justitiam. And when, the year after, King Henry urged the example of the Pope for any assente, the Prior of Jerusalem says, God forbid you should use this unchristian and unchristian word; as long as you assente Justice you may be King, and as soon as you refuse it, you will cease to be King, which shews how little foundation in Law it then was thought to have; and what the whole Nation thought of the Pope's use of it, may be seen at large, in Matthieu Perle, and Sir Thomas Aquinas's words in the 4th Quæstion (e).

Farther, the reasons given why the King ought to have this power, fail here upon many accounts.

1. In that the interest of the whole, of which the Legislators are the best Judges, when they make the Law without exception, ought to outweigh all private inconveniences.

2. The Law has provided a more certain and equal remedy, having taken as sufficient care for the meeting of Parliaments, once a year at least, and I may say, (f) sitting too, as it has for the sitting of the common Courts of Justice, as appears from the several Statutes in print, and others in the Rolls, which avoid the common evil upon the words, quousque si non est factum.

And there were, like the famous triennial Act, provisions for the greater certainty of meeting to often at least, but no recourses from the old Law, which, as appears both by the Mirror, and the life of King Edward (g), was for the great Council to meet twice a year at London.

3. The great reason assign'd in the Latin quotation from the Lord Coke, propter necessitatem providendi de omnibus particularibus, which is alter distinguish'd, as to person, time, and place, and by no means to be applied to the case in question: For, 1. The Law was made but very few years before their Lordships' protestation, and not given more incommode by length of time, to any particular person, than it was at the making of the Act. 2. The Law-makers had in their immediate prospect every particular person of the Realm's continuation; and the time when, and place where the danger would happen, if any such were commision'd.

Let us now see what help we can have from his second quotation from the Lord Coke, which is 7 Rep. fol. 73. But he intends, I suppose, fol. 37. and would have it believed, that it was the opinion of all the Judges in England, 2nd 11. that the King may dispense with any particular person, that he shall not incur the penalty of the Statute, though it be an Act made pro bene pacis, and that this is a trait and confidence irreparably annexed to the royal person of the King, Account, p. 617. In which, 1. He again overthrows his distinction of malum in se, and prohibitum, making that provis at large, in relation to any Statute pro bene pacis. 2. He manifestly perverts the Lord Coke's words, whose words are, 7 Rep. fol. 36. W. a. a Statute is made pro bene pacis, and the King, as head of the Commonwealth, and the fountain of Justice and Mercy, is by all the Realm styled with it is a trait and confidence irreparably annexed and committed to his royal person, as he is high a point of Sovereignty, that he cannot transfer it to his subjects in the power of any private person, or to any private act, for this was committed to the King, by all his subjects, for the public good. But trist it is, that the King can, upon any cause moving him, in respect of time, place, or person, be made a non obstante is dispense with any particular person, that he shall not incur the penalty of the Statute.

Where the sole question was, of transferring over a penalty granted in the King, as entrusted by all the Realm to see the Statute put in execution, by incurring the penalty. This trust is assigned irreparable, and not to be transferred over, but that wherever the same may dispense with the penalty granted to himself upon which, I shall say, our Chief-Justice has made a very full breach; for what is this to the informer's pain, concerning which the question before him was? But surely there is a mighty difference between these two propositions: "Where the subjects have entrusted the King with a Statute made for the public good, this trust is irreparable, and cannot be transferred to another: but the Statute so entrusted, may be dispensed with;" which is all that is to be gathered from my Lord Coke: And thus, "That an Act be made for the public good, yet the King may dispense with it, and that is a trait and confidence irreparably annexed to the royal person of the King;" which is Sir Edward Herbert's perverse comment. In their, Lord Coke's words, Where the King is entrusted with the execution of a Statute made for the public good, he may dispense with that Statute. Sir Edward Herbert says, he may dispense with any Statute made for the public good. Upon which 'tis to be observed, that the question in the Lord Coke, was not of dispensing, but granting over the penalty: which penalty, he says, is not to be transferred over: the other would make it of dispensing, and that that power is irreparable, and not to be transferred, is apparently changing the force of the question.

His next step is to the Year-book of H. 7. fol. 11. 12. in which he went on to find the power, which he calls the trist, and great case which he cites, wherein the King's dispensing power is defended and limited.

"There is a diversity, says the Book Account, (p. 617.) between malum prohibitum, and malum in se; as Statute forbids any man to coin money, and if he does, he shall be hanged; this is malum prohibitum: For before the Statute, coining money was lawful, but now it is not so, and therefore the King can dispense with it. So if a man ship wool in any place, but Calais, it is malum prohibitum, because it is prohibited by Act of Parliament. But that which is malum in se, the King, nor no other person can dispense with: as if the King would give a man power to kill another, or license one to make a nuisance in the highway, they were void, and yet the King can pardon such things when they are done." Upon this case 'tis observable, that the power of dispensing is here ascribed as relation to things, and not persons: wherefore according to this, taken in Sir Edward Herbert's latitude, the King may grant dispensations to all in general, where the matter is only malum prohibitum: Whereas he himself owns, that the nature of a dispensation is particular, and given to particular person by name. 2. Many things in Magna Charta, they say, are not, but male prohibita: and in Magna Charta itself may be dispensed with, as he himself owns, that the King may dispense with some parts of Magna Charta: And methinks he could not but be sensible of this contradiction. Wherefore the rule there, admit it were a Judgment in Law, as it was not, being only spoken alter, by one of the Judges (h), can be applied only to such cases as are threefold. The first is that of coining money, which goes upon the ground in Reynolds's Reports (i), where 'tis said, that such Statutes as give a Privilege may be dispensed with: And that of shipping wool at Calais, the King's Staple, is of the same nature, and both sufficiently shew the distinction of malum prohibitum from malum in se, to relate barely to such things as become evil by accident, as they are as well as accidental things: which is how any interferences with the rights of the subjects in general, or particular.

And I much wonder that Sir Edward Herbert should cite my Lord Vaughan, in the case of Thomas and Sorrell, as confirming what he would infer from the Year-book, when Lord Vaughan says, fol. 332. That old Rule has more confirmed men's Judgments in the felicit, than ratified them, and fol. 333. himself denies that the King can dispense with every malum prohibitum by Statute, though prohibited by Statute only.

Oh, but my Lord Vaughan shews, that a Dispensation does jur dare, and makes the thing prohibited to all others, lawful to be done by him that has it. Does any part of every malum prohibitum? By no means: Wherefore we may apply it to these cases in question, which concerned men's interests about which the King had a Privilege by Statute Law: and the dispensing with that, falls within the rule in Reynolds (j), agreeing with the Lord Coke, in the case of Peal Statute (k). Yet even thus much was a point gained by the Privilege, since the 13th of H. VII. for it is then made a doubt before all himself: which I would be loth to think that Lord Fagbush is (a), who owns, that the King cannot dispense in any case but with his own right, and not with the gift of any other, which he confines not to his ideal persons, but considers fully, (as he says expressly (b)), if the wisdom of the Parliament must first make an Act in relation, pro bono publico, the importation of foreign manufactures, that the subjects of the Realm may apply themselves to the making of the said manufactures for their support and livelihood, to grant to one or more the importation of such manufactures, without any limitation, non sibi the said Act is a Monarchy, pro, and said (c). For this I am free, particular persons are not entitled to act upon their own accounts. Indeed he supposes the King may, of licence, bestow the quantity, and that for present use (d), not by way of merchandise, as not being against the end of the Act. Wherefore in our case all subjects being understood as Protestants, their support and encouragement being provided for by the Act, and the letting Papists into the Government signify the end of it, who can doubt but Lord Fagbush would have pronounced Sir Edward Hales's dispensation void?

And whereas our Judge falls in his exordium, Acumt, p. 632. That though this Law was made for the interest of Religion, the offence is not directly against Religion, but against a political Constitution, tho' made for the interest of Religion, he might not only have learnt from Lord Coke, that the subjects have such an interest as the King cannot dispense with in what is made void to conscience, that is, in rebus, for the good of the Church; but Lord Fagbush says (e), that there are many points not to be dispensed with, and influences in some things, which are substantive in fact.

Now, besides what already has been shewn, to dubble these three last influences urged by Sir Edward, that they are not pro bono publico persons, as that rule is vindicated from misapplications, may appear, in that neither of them affect all the people in general. As to the Clergyman, they can only do injury in their respective positions where they are beneficed, and the Magistratus in part of Wells where he is an officer, not besides, can the Clergyman be supposed much to prejudice the interest of Religion, being the Pluralist cannot supply his Cure but by one qualified, and the Island might be a good man, and good Minister. And yet even these would fall within Lord Fagbush's acceptance of his own rule (f); for he shews that laws made for the benefit of but part of the Kingdom, Artificers and Husbandmen, cannot be dispensed with to any one person, to frustrate the ends of the Statute.

This leads to another ground which he makes with the Lord Fagbush's authority, in answer to the objection, that the Law was made pro bono publico, Act, p. 632. and is substantive in fact for the people. Indeed Lord Fagbush will have it, that the sole reason why a Statute cannot be dispensed with is, quia, that the Law was made pro bono publico, because all Laws were made for public good; and yet dispensations had been allowed in fact, nor was the degree of public good which they altered the case; yet he shews that the extent of it does, and forma full to keep to Lord Coke's rule, where the People had entrusted the King with the Law, as Head of the complicated body, there the trust was entirely in him; but when the law extended in interest not only to individual persons, but to a considerable part of the Nation, much more than to all, in order of which cases the Statute is pro bono publico person, in number of state can the King dispense. And that the Statute in question is of the largest extent, appears as the Nation is a Protestant Nation, the religion established by Law, and these provisions necessary means to preserve it, and therefore though the Papists have no benefit by it, they are not in Law, in this respect, any part of the people; for people always is taken for them that have legal interests. Thus when the Statute provides (g) that the People of Counties shall choose their Sheriffs, it relates not to all the People in general, but only to Freeholders.

Secondly, shewing thus far, that these grounds which our Judge pretends to have gone upon afford no maintenance even to his palliation of the judgments, they will appear much less to conscience if it was declared; which to evince, I shall here let it down officiis words, from that careful reporter Mr. Blosby.

It was on that memorable day, when, as another mark of his sincerity, he directed the willing Jury, and concurred in the infamous sentence against that excellent Author Mr. Toland, when the Jury was gone out, the Chief-Justice took occasion to inveigh against spreading of scandalous reports about cases depending in the Court; and to prevent any thing of that nature in the case of Sir Edward Hales, he thought fit to deliver the opinion of the Judges in this manner:

Chief-Justice. In the case of Graham and Hales, wherein the Defendant pleads a dispensation from the King, it is doubted, whether or no the King had such a prerogative? Truly, upon the argument before us, it appeared as clear a case as ever came before this Court: But because men fancy I know no what difficulty, when really there is none, we were willing to give so much countenance to the question in the case, as to take the advice of all the Judges in England. They were all agreed, as I remember, that the King had no such power, and the great case of the Ship Money was whether the dispensation in that case were legal, because upon that depended the execution of all the Law of the Nation? And, I must tell you that there were then ten upon the place, that clearly delivered their opinions, that the case of the Ship Money was good Law, and that all the Attorneys grounded upon Indemnities found by Juries returned by such Ship Money, were good, and not erroneous; and consequently, that men need not have any fears or scruples about that matter. And in the next place, they did clearly declare, that there was no imaginable difference between that case and this, unless it were, that then there was the clearest evidence of the two, and liable to the former exception, My Brother Pennington was inclined to be of the same opinion, but he would rather have some more cases to consider of it; but he has since sent by my Brother Hilbush to let us know that he does concur with us. To these eleven Judges, there is one dissenting, Brother Stuart, who yet outwitted his conscience, in the King cannot dispense in this case. But that was opinion of one Judge, Judge, against the opinions of eleven? We were a full Court, and our judgments before, and having the concurrence of all, we were a full Court, we think we may very well declare the opinion of the Court to be, that the King may dispense in this case, and the Judges go upon it, grounded.

1. That the Kings of England are sovereign Princes.
2. That the Laws of England are the Kings's Laws (h).
3. That therefore, 'tis an inseparable prerogative to the Kings of England, to dispense with Penal Laws in particular cases, and upon particular necessary reasons.

4. That of those reasons, and those necessities, the King himself is sole Judge; and then, which is consequent upon all,

5. That this is not a trust invested in, or granted to the King by the people, but the ancient remains of the sovereign power, and prerogative of the Kings of England, which never was taken from them, as they may be Authors of such a dispensation being pleaded by them. Declaration in this case, and such a dispensation appearing upon Record, to come true enough to save him from the infidelity, Judgment ought to be given for the Defendant, good pro and in rebus for all.

'Tis evident, that these propositions are very wide from any thing that he has, or could have urged from the Books, unless upon a branch of infamy has been fit upon the Judges. The examples of which, work in several ages, one would have thought, might have given notice in caution; yet indeed, he might have had more of this kind from those on the other Crown, who, I think, are now justly well affected of their nation. However, proof of dispensing the King has, the Books suppose it to be entrusted by the people; but according to this resolution, it came down from Heaven the Lord knows how. And as he goes upon this supposition of an absolute sovereignty in the King (i), inseparable from his person, as such will have it, unless that he granted, all that he builds upon it, are but chaff in the air: for this we are to have recourse to our constitution, to see what that power in the Prince is, which the great Parliament says, is, a power of grace, "derived from the people." But for that we have no occasion, from any so much as pretended proof of his assertions; nor can any be offered but from the resolution of the infamous Ship Money Judges, which seems to run parallel to this, but is indeed far short of it, for though they made the King the sole Judge of the Kingdom's necessity, yet they supposed it to be at a time when there was a real danger to be prevented by the exercise of this Judgment, whereas here it is abused to the bringing in what the Parliament liboured to prevent.

But I must observe, Acumt, p. 632. 2. That whereas Sir Edward Hobart owns the dispensing power to be of dark learning, and that it is very fit it should remain in rebus to a determination in Parliament, that Judges may judge, by more certain rules, ad hoc of Parliament the King may, and ad hoc he may not dispense with. Grant his premises, and there can be no darkness in it; for the power will extend to all cases, as far as the legislative does; and that he has determined positively in this point, Acumt, p. 637. where he makes all things, not forbid by God's Law, to be dispensable by the King. Nay, if he might dispense with every malum prohibitum, that is not malum in se, without such qualification as I have shewn ought to be, it would go farther, even as far as God's power (s), who never dispenses with more than his own positive Laws, nor such as are founded upon eternal reasons: and thus the positive Laws of God and Man would be subject to the pleasure of the Prince. 2. He has taken it out of the power of the Parliament to fix the bounds of his extraordinary power; for what he alienates power, he says, never was taken from the Crown, nor can be; because, in rebus, "in the ancient remains of the sovereign power and prerogative of the Kings of England. Whereby the way, there is an implication contrary to what he would infer; for that implies, that 'tis but the remains of a power diminished and impaired. 3. His granted and royal resolutions are not only very different, as it obvious by the comparison, but very contrary: Acumt, p. 632. One says, 'tis a dark learning; the other, the case is as clear as ever came before the Court.

Thirdly, Thee his infanciness is sufficiently evident from every part of his defence, yet it may not be unprofitable for the Publick, that he should be followed to these influences in which he glories; for which, 'tis not enough for him to shew some one Act wherein he is singular, if he follows the multitude to sin in others, even of the same kind; which if he does, he can no more acquit himself of Perjury and breach of Truth, Acumt, p. 616. than the rest of the tainted herd.

In matters of blood, Acumt, p. 621. he affects the reputation of great tenderness, and thinks he has been scrupulous even to a fault. For, says he, in fine upon Acumt, that he has been advised Præ by Wyll and Wyll Judge then, which seems to run parallel to this, but is indeed far short of it, for though they made the King the sole Judge of the Kingdom's necessity, yet they supposed it to be at a time when there was a real danger to be prevented by the exercise of this Judgment, whereas here it is abused to the bringing in what the Parliament liboured to prevent.

But I will not say that the Judges could as well acquit himself in the case of Lord Braddon. The latter's heroic merits of the Crown, too great to be rewarded, and the former's hereditary valour, dangerous to those who had reason to fear brave spirits, occasioned the rigorous prosecution of both. father was obliged to change his foul, till he might become more equal, not unassailable of our Saviour's advice, or rather precept, Where persecuted in one County, is to flee into another; that tho' he contemned Death, he might not provoke it. The five falling into their hands, each his life and honour, which the friends were bound to maintain, were lost by him, were delivered for a freer trial. In subsequence to which, the Cause of life, and the selling Jury, to find him guilty of high treason, chiefly upon a supposed conspiracy to drive the Duke of Gloucester, which, if true, were but felony by a Statute (s), as to that part, yet in force, and so could be no evidence of murder. Nor would it follow the fact to be found specially, tho' he pretended not to answer the Cases and Records, which were cited to these, that the matter alleged could not be true; nor did the then Solicitor undertake the task, notwithstanding that flow of reasoning, which he laboured to set aside the authority of Lord Coke (t), pleading expressly and unanswerably for that injured Hero, (of whom the Age was not weary) the Lord Ruffe.

Nor was the picture of Lord Bismarck's craft left defective due the matter, for besides the foundation Servus, who came to defy us with another King, there was but our witness in the eye of the law – his indeed is foi et loy heard, as that he might be heard, being an apostrophe (ex) but no way could be, considering how far he had been drawn, with his letters about his belt, even to (a) contradict himself. The other by no means legal, being under an outlawry for High-Treason, unexcused! For though the execution of that Judgment (foi et loi in law) is pardoned by the King, yet the crime was by no means pardoned, to let him right as to fame; which though the Council offered to make good, they were not suffered to speak so it; and yet the point is very (ex) clear by ancient authorities, and confirmed by later, without any thing really to the contrary. Nay, farther, though before all these things, such a testator was urged in arrest of Judgment, upon which Judgment had (ex) recently been affirmed, yet, without enquiring whether the fact were true, or the Book law, that, with its own *ex*press words, and the life of man, and the peace advanced in the Government, is some little the better off. Such was Sir Edmund great incorruptness and tenderness where the life of man was concerned.

He adds a trope in a eulie before himself, and the other Wharpers of the High-commission-Courts, but his singularity therein can be no excuse for his being at all upon a commission apparently against the Statute, which may say not only to the power of King and migration, but which is a commission extended to him, the Imperial Bishop, who it really had, and such a commission it was, as necessitated compliance with the Act (2 long since repealed), which not only made M. VIII. Head of the Church, but gave him power, which he afterwards delegated to Lord Cromwell, (F. 34 R. VIII. c. 10.) to redress all errors, heresies and abuses, as Epistolar authority.

Fourthly, I suppose it is by this time pretty evident, that Sir Edward's crime will admit of no extenuation; but the aggravations are many, it is alarming.

3. That he (Acc. p. 623.) and his brethren were the inventors of this diffusing Power, in such extent as he contends for in the Print, but much more in his oral resolution.

That the Test. P. B. contains an error in that single case, but of large and mischievous consequences: and if the King could dispense with that Statute upon the reasons given, and circumstances as coming in the How. Hale's case, others may well conclude from thence, that therefore he has a power to dispense with all other Statutes, even such as confer or withhold any of the subjects any manner of interest whatsoever, in real lives, or offices, or honours, or franchises, or liberties, or other such things, and that such a dispensation is a disability actually incurred before the dispensation, therefore, by reason of this case, the King may dispense with such Statutes where a precedence disability is actually laid upon a man, and as there is upon the Members of both Houses, till they have taken the oaths and affirmations prescribed. There are not consequences which may flow from the bestial ignorance of angry men, but such as have warrant and foundation from the law itself.

25. His is for preserving the wisdom of the Nation, as to make the breach less toward the undue continuance of Slavery, equal, may be beyond what they could devise for the security of their religion, or their honor, so an undervalued the holy religion, which I think be yet perfect when however it would not come up to the point, according to the difference which himself receives. See p. 618. Speaking of the Statute 23 H. VI. c. 1. He says, "The recital in the preamble, and the whole part ⁴ view, if compared with our Statute of 7 Jas. VI. c. 2. equals it in every particular, and in some goes beyond it: For the mischief therein is this: Large-Statute are only in their words, "For preventing dangers which ⁵ may happen from Popish Recusants, and quelling the minds of his Majesty's jellies of good subjects: The other, "For preventing the importable damage of the King and his People, by poverty, manslaughter, and great ⁶ opportunities." Then he goes on to the view, expost against non-assent, to creating a disability, but, according to the usual style, he does not mention it, and even says, "but he had rather not to dwell there, as has been sufficiently evinced already." The questions here are two: Whether the mischief intended to be prevented are equal in both? 3. Admit that were equal in degree, whether they are in extent? Which if they

the other side, I suppose he thinks the English imposture gives the odds; as if Papiery were an Epitaph to repentance in our Protestants, for what they ought to do their utmost to prevent; as if it did not carry the belly of it, perjuries, manslauhters, and great oppression, by wholesale; or that matches more remote and accidental, as the continuance of sheriffs, may abate to corruption, and that occasion the other fatal train, could equal the more immediate and certain consequence, unless by good laws prevented, of French conversions, proceeding from fixed principles. But then to give Judging to frustrate this necessary law, at the same time the Papists and the King of their own disposition to lead them, to make a law, that would alter the law as our own laws are; still us, the Law and his Court by way of emanance, that is, the great Council, Parliament, are above him (45).

and that, as the sole interest of the subject in the law about Sheriffs, is to be neither equal, nor so immediate as in our Statute, there needs a new way to show the difference of the extent: The peace only of particular Counties, and that by small inferrible degrees, in there coerced, Nay, admit the King had the power, and should to violence that trust which Mr. Edwards will have to be imposed in him, (Ms. p. 610.) as to extend it to all Counties, where he puts in the Sheriffs, yet this could not affect all the People; because there might be a retreat to Lancaster, Middlesex, and Westminster, in either of which has it been pretended that the King had such a power, all the late violence of force, and treachery of Kings, gave that unhappy sale of perjury, manslaugers, I may say murder, and oppression; before which, Lancaster was a perfect Gyrene in an English King.

3. But what can excite our Chief Justice's so apparent faltering both Reynolds and Love-holds? Of course, at least, his thoughtless negligence in not going to the fountain-heads, but setting up the verdicts of a jury against the facts themselves; and the extraordinary opinion of argumentation. The Judges, say the very annotations of Reporters, furnish to any matter in question, against solemn resolutions; which, either without falsifications or criminal negligence has occasioned the answering objections with a case which never had a refutation, but what he and his brethren gave, when he was brought in by head and shoulders, only to be leading calf to this.

4. He could not but know, that the case was finally argued against Edwards Hadley; either he, or the late Edwards and Hadley, having given the law on both sides: wherefore turn criminal for the Chief-Judge to say that the Chief-justice "clear upon the subject." I am far from being unmerciful to our great lawyer, but in consequence of his being so leading ought to be argued thus at least; this was but once: And the learned Hadley, if Edwards who could have for it in the trial light, was refused to be heard to this, though he resorted it.

5. Our Chief Justice might easily have found that the beginning of an applicant's was within time of many, which would not be enough to entitle the King too prerogative. For as 'tis in Powder, every prerogative contains a prerogative, for it tells in usage (5); that is, such as are not derived from known Grants of the People. And he might have learn from that great man, where he would find time to do this, that Prerogatives are equal to divide Quillets, but in Jack Cade as chief, which apply upon fundamental principles; for which demerit may be to arise, million of. Prerogatives are in no person (6).

And though we call it a penance, as I observed before, are exemplified of what that time, as well as P. III. yet that diligence and faithful search into antiquity, Mr. Prynne, shows, that they were then made use of, only to revoke force indifferent grants or privileges, but not to elude, subvert, or dispute with any penal Laws, or Acts of Parliament, till they were introduced by religious persons, after the Statute of Mortmain, 7 Ed. I. to elude and frustrate the Act. And he tells us, I am thus far shewn it is no other than a penance; for they might have said in Lord Paget's case, 7 Jac. 1. that the King is that wife dispensed only with his own right; and concludes not the penit Law.

Though effective influences of Judges are but evidence of the law and facts are to be examined and ruled by the constitution and fundamental maxims of the inherent rights and liberties of a free-born People; yet Sir Edward had had the diligence to read what might have occurred on this subject, or the honesty to hear it from others; he might have known that it is far from being a feigned point, that the King might defend his particular person, as to whatever is not prohibited by the law of God; and that his disposition makes the thing prohibited lawful to be done by him that has it (a). The farther we look back since this power has come in question, the less does it seem allowed.

In addition, the petitioners stated that the affiant of that Council, which as I observe before, was not done in Parliament, had granted to merchants-demands, that before, the false liberty about flagle commodities which merchants-alike had, though this was not by the King alone, and for the benefit of native yet the merchants, fearing that they might be unspended in time to come for their merchandise, which they so had passed by virtue of such grant forefought as they were made out of Parliament, for their surety, obtain a ratification and confirmation in Parliament.

"By superior power ordain'd of God, we understand not only Princes, but all politic States and Kingdoms; some where the People, from whom the Nobles have the least interest to the sword that Princes have in their Kingdoms: And in Kingdoms where Princes have rule by the sword, we do not mean the Princes' private will against his Laws, but his prerogative derived from his Laws, and agreeing with his Laws."

XL. The Proceedings against Mr. SAMUEL JOHNSON; who was tried at the King's-Bench Bar, Westminster, for High-Misdemeanours (and found guilty of writing and publishing two seditious and scandalous Libels against the Government); on Monday the 21st of June, 1686. 2 Jac. II.

SAMUEL JOHNSON having been arraigned upon an Information for high misdemeanours, in writing, printing and publishing two scandalous and seditious Libels, &c. and therein pleading Not Guilty, was, by a Rule of Court, brought again to the Court of King's-Bench, Westminster, on Monday, June the 21st, in order to take his trial:
when a Jury of Knights and Gentlemen of the County of Surrey being sworn, the Information was read; the substance of which was, "That he, the Prisoner, had, in the Parish of St. George's, Southwark, on the 29th of May, in the second year of his Majesty's reign, maliciously and defamingly published two pernicious, scandalous and seditious libels, to raise and stir up sedition and rebellion in his Majesty's liegesubjects, &c." The title of one being, An Humble and hearty Address to all the English Protestants in this present Army. Which is as follows:

An Humble and hearty Address to all the English Protestants in this present Army.

Gentlemen,

NEXT to the duty which we owe to God, which ought to be the principal care of men, of your profession especially, because you carry your lives in your hands, and often look death in the face: the second thing that deserves your consideration, is the service of your native Country, wherein you draw your first breath, and breathe a free English air. Now I must desire you to consider, how well you comply with these two main points, by engaging in this present service.

Is it in the name of God, and for his service, that you have joined yourselves with Papists, who will undo fight for the Malt-hoek, but burn the Bible; and who seek to extinguish the Protestant Religion with your swords, because they cannot do it with their own? And will you be aiding and abstaining in set up Malt-hoek, to reach that Popish Kingdom of darkness and idolatry amongst us, and to train up all our children in Popery?
How can you do these things, and yet call yourselves Protestants?

And then what service can he do your Country by being under the command of French and Irish Papists, and by heaving the Nation under a foreign yoke? Will you help them to make forcible entry into the houses of your countrymen, under the name of Quartering, directly contrary to Magna Charta, and the Præsumption of Right? Will you be aiding and abetting in all the murders and outrages which they shall commit by their void conscience? Which were declared illegal, and sufficiently punished by both Houses of Parliament (if that had been any need of it), for it was very well known before, that a Papist cannot have a conscience, but by the law is utterly disabled and disabled. Will you exchange your birth-right of English laws and liberties for martial, or club-law; and help to destroy all others, only to be saved last yourselves? If I know you well, as you are Englishmen, you hate and scorn these things. And therefore be not unusually yoked with idolatrous and bloody Papists: Be valiant for the truth, and show yourselves men.

The same considerations are likewise humbly offered to all the English Soldiers, who have been the bulwark of this Nation against Popery and Slavery, ever since Elizabethe.

And the other, viz. The Opinion is this, that Resistance may be used, on only our Religion and Rights should be invaded: "Tending to withdraw them from their duty and allegiance, and to excite and stir up the following, viz. to mutiny and rebellion, &c." After this, the Information was read, by the King's Counsel, opened to the Jury, as to the nature and circumstances, together with the evil consequences that might attend such bold and dangerous attempts: which being rendered largely and exactly, as to the particulars mentioned in the said Information, whereunto the Prisoner was charged, they proceeded to call their witnesses to prove the fact.
And first Mr. Bolton, at the Three Bynkers in Southwark, being sworn, gave evidence, That coming acquainted some time since with the Prisoner, and about a fortnight before his Majesty's death, discoursing with him, the second of these Libels was mentioned: And soon after he sent him a box with some sheets of these in it, to be disposed, and gave him notice that he had a second Paper in the Press; and withal, a caution not to publish these he had sent before, till he had received that which should be the former Libel before-mentioned. And further, that about six or eight months before that, the Prisoner had sent him other Libels to dispose of;
and being thereof the Libels mentioned in the Information, he gave evidence, that he had received that which he sent him, and could give no account of what was in it, as to particulars.

And Mr. Wintour, sometime servant to the Prisoner, being sworn, gave evidence, That by her master's or mistress's directions, he was not certain which, she took a paper, and caused him to carry a box, wherein one of the Libels mentioned, viz. the second, was inclosed to Mr. Bolton: And that she, viz. by the like order, carried other papers look; some of which were the Address, &c. And being asked by the Prisoner, how she knew that? His reply was, That she knew it, inasmuch that he had read the title, and very well remembered it.

The Paper that carried the box gave evidence, That the said had hired him to carry a box to the Three Bynkers, and that he went with him, and paid him according to agreement, and that he took it up in Spital-fields. After this, the teller, who searched the Prisoner's lodging with the Right Honourable the Earl of Sunderland's warrant, being sworn, gave evidence, That he found a Paper in writing, upon a table or stool, which appeared in Court to his part of the copy, or the same with the paper, entitled The Opinion, &c. he viewing, upon sight thereof, that it was the same he found in the prisoner's lodging. Then was the Book of the Velly, or Parish affairs of St. Paul's, Covent-garden, produced; wherein the Prisoner, sometime past, had given an acquittance for money received, as an assistant Curate, &c. which being compared with the paper, seemed not to differ in the kind. But no other evidence appeared in that case, than that the Book had been always kept in the Velly, and for the most part under lock and key, and it being put to the prisoner, he did not greatly deny it. When for a further confirmation, John Dore, a Printer, and his wife, were sworn. The former deposing, That he had printed a book for the prisoner from a manuscript, and that hand was very like that of the Libel produced in Court; but he had never seen him write, and therefore could not be positive that that manuscript was his own hand.

As for his wife, her evidence was, that the prisoner paying her some money, she had given him an acquittance; but that, as she conceived, he wrote all but her name; for going up stairs, he soon returned with an acquittance, which she falsified.

This being what materially was given in evidence for the King, the Prisoner had leave to make his defence. who after some discourse, alleged, That he had been confused, and had not had opportunity to prepare for his defence, as not having leave to go to his Counsel. To which the Court replied, That he had leave upon the motion made on his behalf, to send for Counsel; and that they ought not to be refused coming to him. Then he urged several other matters, which being over-ruled by the Court, he proceeded to insist, that he hoped, that seeing he was indicted for a seditious and scandalous Libel, the Jury would consider whether those papers they had heard read, were his or not? But was told, that the Jury ought to consider it only as to the matter of fact, whether he was guilty of writing or publishing these, &c. and that the rest lay in the breast of the Court to consider. "I beseech me argued, That though they might be free, yet it was no subornation, as it was laid in the indictment, because the box was sealed. But being fully satisfied in that point, and those papers appearing likewise to be true, the counsel for the King summed up their evidence to the Jury, now appearing on the behalf of the prisoner.

After which, the Court gave the charge, putting the Prisoner, as well as the Jury, in mind of the great mischief that such Libels might occasion:
And minded him likewise, that it was within a small matter of High-Treason; and that, if he had been found guilty of that degree, were not the laws, and those who managed them, tender of life, &c.

After the charge was given, the Jury withdrew, and returning within a quarter of an hour, brought in the Prisoner guilty of the High Misdemeanour.

Nov. 16, following, Mr. Johnson's sentence was pronounced by Sir Franis Biddle, as follows: To pay 500 marks to the King, and to lie in prison till it was paid; to stand three times in the pillory; on the Monday following, in the Palace-yard, Westminster, on Wednesday, at Charing-Cross; and the 2d day after at the Royal Exchange, and to be whipt by the common Hangman from Newgate to Tyburn.

After Sentence was put upon him, in order to load him with the greater ignominy, the Court, on presence of request to the Church, moved, That before the execution of the sentence, he should be degraded from the order of Priesthood. This ought to have been done, according to the Canon, by his own Diocesan, the Bishop of London; but that Prelate was then under a suspension himself, because he would not obey the King's Orders to suppress Dr. Sharp, now Archbishop of York, for preaching against Popery in his own Parish Church of St. Giles's near St. Paul's. Dr. Carver, Bishop of Darham, Dr. Sper, Bishop of Bath, and Dr. Wintour, Bishop of Peter-burgh, being then Correspondents for the doctrine of London, in the place

† This is printed in Mr. Johnson's Works, p. 10, 106, which being too long to insert here, the Reader is referred to it.

‡ Mr. Johnson, who was tried on an Inform. &c. in the King's Bench, for writing Johnson's Address, and these two Libels, and committed Prisoner to the King's Bench, till he should pay 500 marks, which he was not able to pay this sum. Thus he was condemned of criminality, in the great City of London, when he was for the Laws of England condemned by the Judges, who find it more to whipt the Court than to do their duty. See Journal of Mr. S. Johnson, p. 7, to his New.

of the fulgured Bishop, were appointed to degrade Mr. Yafey, which they performed in the Chapter-house of St. Paul's, where Dr. Sherlock and other Clergymen attended: Dr. Selindford, then Dean of St. Paul's, refused to have any hand in it.

When they came to the formality of putting a Bible in his hand, and taking it from him again, he was much affected, and purred with it with difficulty, kissing it, and saying with tears, that they could not however deprive him of the life and benefit of that sacred Dispensation. It happened that they were pulled of an accident, in some shipping him of his cask, which, as might be particularly to be feared from, rendered his degradation imperfect, and afterwards forced him his benefice.

On the 11th of December, 1686, the sentence was put in execution; which Mr. Yafey endured with as much courage, and as Christian a behaviour as ever was discovered on any such occasion: tho' at the same time he had a quick feel of every stripe which was given him, with a whip of nine cords knotted, to the number of 117.

In the first Parliament after the Revolution, when the House of Commons was preparing an Act of Indemnity, Mr. Yafey was advised by his friends to get a full life put into it, that he might have his remedy at Law against facts as had been his illegal oppressions. They seemed to be sensible that they were oppressive, and could not justify what they had done. About that time the Lord Bishop of Durham gave Mr. Yafey and his lawyer a meeting, and made his peace with him, to their mutual satisfaction.

Sir Francis Wafers, who presented the Sentence against him, fear a relation of Mr. Yafey's to tell him a feigned story, that Sir Francis lay dangerously ill, and could not die in peace, unless Mr. Yafey would forgive him: To which he replied, that he heartily forgave him what injury he had done him. Some few days after, the same person brought Sir Francis to Mr. Yafey, as he was walking in Whitechapel, where Sir Francis kissed him, and told him, That his Christian and kind answer had proved a reviving Cordial to him. To which Mr. Yafey replied, that he heartily forgave the injury done to himself; but as he had been an enemy to his country, he hoped he would be made accountable for it; in being a common baying with him, that he was obliged to forgive his own enemies, but not the enemies of his Country.

The Parliament taking Mr. Yafey's case into consideration, resolved, That in Trinity-Term, 1686, the Judgment given against him in the King's Bench, upon an information for a misdemeanour, was cruel and illegal.

A Committee was at the same time appointed to bring in a Bill for reversing that Judgment: and being also ordered to enquire how Mr. Yafey came to be degraded, and by what authority it was done. Mr. Clerk, the Chairman, some days after, reported his case to this purpose:

"That in Trinity-Term, 1686, an information was exhibited against Mr. Yafey, in the name of Sir Robert Senguer, Attorney-General, for writing and publishing a scandalous and seditious Libel, entitled, de laudibus et bonis Actibus, &c. That the same Term they forced him to plead, got a Jury to find him guilty, and Sir Francis Wafers pronounced the following Sentence upon him: To pay five hundred marks to the King, or to be in prison till 'most paid'; To stand three in the pillory, in the Palace-yard, at Charing-cross, and at the Old-banck; and to be whipt by the Common Hangman from Newgate to Tyburn. The Judges then in Court, were the Lord Chief Justice Hobart, Sir Francis Wafers, Sir Robert Wright, and Sir Richard Hildway. That

"apprehending 'twould be a scandal to the Clergy to have so infamous a punishment inflicted on a Minister, they desired Mr. Yafey might be first degraded: In order to which, being a prisoner in the King's Bench, in the diocese of the Bishop of Winchester, he was summoned to appear on the 20th of November, in the convocation-house of St. Paul's, to the diocese of London, his Living being within that diocese, and brought thither by Hendon-Corpus: where he found the Bishops of Durham, Chichester, and Peterborough, Commissioners to execute the jurisdiction of the Bishop of London, during his absence, with some Clergymen, and as many Spectators. A Libel was exhibited against him, charging him with great misbehaviours, tho' some were specified or proved. That Mr. Yafey demanded a copy of the Libel, and an Advocate, both which the Bishops denied, and immediately proceeded to sentence, that he should be declared an infame person, that he should be deprived of his Rectory, that he should be a mere Layman, and as Clerk, and be deprived of all right and privilege of Priests: that he should be degraded himself, and of all vestments and habits of Priesthood. Against which proceedings Mr. Yafey protested, as being against Law, and the 12th Canon, not being done by his own Diocese. But his protestation was refused, and was also his appeal to the King in Chancery.

"After which, they proceeded to degrade him, by putting a square cap on his head, and then taking it off: by pulling off his gown and girdle, which he demanded as his proper goods, bought with his money, which they refused to find him, but he could not get them till he paid twenty shillings. Then they put a Bible into his hands, which he not parting with readily, they took it from him by force. That on the 22nd of November, the Judgment in the King's Bench began to be executed with great rigour and cruelty: that Mr. Yafey, the Under-sheriff, took off his cap on the pillory, and put a iron cap on his head, and whipp'd with a whip of nine cords knotted, which was showed to the Commission. That Mr. Yafey had also an information exhibited 22nd inst, for the like matter as that against his husband.

"On all which, the Committee came to the following resolutions: which, on the report, were all agreed to by the House, That the Judgment given against Mr. Yafey was illegal and cruel: That the Ecclesiastical Commission was illegal, and consequently the judgment of the Bishop of London, and the authority committed to the three Bishops null and illegal. That Mr. Yafey was not being degraded by his own Diocese, if he had desired of it, was illegal: That a Bill be brought in, to reverse the Judgment, and to declare all the proceedings before the three Bishops null and illegal. And that an Address be made to his Majesty, to recommend Mr. Yafey to some Ecclesiastical Preference, suitable to his services and sufferings."

The House likewise ordered, That in the said Bill the proceedings upon the Ecclesiastical Commission should be declared void.

The House presented two Addresses to the King in behalf of Mr. Yafey: But tho' his Majesty was incalculable enough to have complied with their request, Mr. Yafey could never obtain any Church-Preferment. Mr. Yafey, however, being a man of such merit, did not pass altogether without a reward: for the King gave him three hundred pounds a-year out of the Exchequer, for his and his son's life, besides a thousand pounds in money, and likewise bestowed a place of about a hundred pounds a-year on his son.

XLI. The Trial of Rowland Walters, Dearing Bradshaw, and Ambrose Cave, Gent. (for murdering of Sir Charles Pym, Bart.) at the Sessions held at the Old-Bailey, on Friday the first day of June 1688, before the Right Honourable Sir John Shorter, Knt. Lord-Mayor of the City of London, and Sir Bartholomew Shower, Knt. Recorder of the same City; together with others his Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the City of London, and County of Middlesex.

Clerk. CRYER, make Proclamation.

Crier. Oyes, Oyes, Oyes!

Clerk. Keeper of Newgate, bring the Prisoners to the Bar.

(Which was done).

Clerk. You the prisoners at the Bar, those men whom you shall hear called, and personally appear, are to try between our sovereign Lord the King, and you who are arraigned, upon your several lives and death: if you shall except against any one of them, you must speak before they be sworn.

Clerk. Crier, call Henry Dyer.

The Jurors (sworn) are as followeth:

Henry Dyer,	Richard Cliffe,	John Hill,
Giles Bagge,	Samuel Burge,	Obadiah Whitman,
Matthew Forster,	William Filmer,	John Read,
Timothy Wafers,	John Frith,	Francis Willis.

Who were all sworn.

Clerk. Crier, count these, twelve good men and true.

Clerk. Crier, make proclamation. (Which was done).

Clerk. You Gentlemen of the Jury, last upon the Prisoners at the Bar, and hear in their charge a tryal indicted by the names of Rowland Walters, Dearing Bradshaw, and Ambrose Cave, Gent. for that they met having the gift of God before their eyes, but being incited and seduced by the Devil, and their own wicked Hearts, on the fourth day of May, in the fourth year of the reign of our sovereign Lord King James II. in the Parish of St. Nicholas Cole-Abby, in and upon Sir Charles Pym, Bart. feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, did make an assault; and that he the said Rowland Walters, having then and there on his right-bow, a certain Rapier made of iron or steel, of the value of about 5*l*. and how the said Sir Charles Pym in and upon the right side of him the said Sir Charles Pym, a little above the right eye, did strike and thrust in afore-said, giving him the said Sir Charles Pym, a little above the right eye, a mortal wound, the breach of one inch, of the depth of ten inches: and that they the said Dearing Bradshaw, and Ambrose Cave, were present, aiding, abetting, and assisting him the said Rowland Walters, in the perpetration of the said wilful murder of him the said Sir Charles Pym. In that they there, the prisoners at the Bar, with malice aforethought, did intentionally kill and destroy, and wilfully murder him the said Sir Charles Pym, against the peace of our Sovereign Lord the King, his Crown, and Dignity, and against the form of the Statute in that case made and provided. Upon this Indictment they have been arraigned, and have answered should not Guilty, and for their Trial, have put themselves upon God and their Country, which Country you are. Your Jurys is to enquire, whether they, or either of them committed this felony and murder as afore-said; if you find them, or either of them, guilty of the said wilful murder, you are to remove such goods and chattels they, or either of them, had at the time of the committing of the said wilful murder; but if you find them not guilty, you are to say so, and hear your evidence.

Mr. Walters. My Lord, I humbly desire these Gentlemen may be tried before me.

Count. That cannot be, Mr. Walters, because you are all three put into one Indictment.

Count for the King, My Lords, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am here retained a Counsel for the King, against the Prisoners at the Bar, who all three stand indicted for the murder of Sir Charles Pym, Bart. in the Parish of St. Nicholas Cole-Abby, thrusting him through the body near the right eye, giving him a mortal wound, of which he then and there instantly died. The other two prisoners stand indicted for aiding, abetting, and assisting him the said Walters in the said murder.

Another

And so Count for the King. My Lords, this Murder fell out on the fourth day of May last, after this manner. We the said Sir Charles Pym, our Mr. Merrydell, Mr. Noddy, and Sir Thomas Middleton, and others, dined at the Swan-Tavern upon Fish-street; after they were come into the house they were a while after which the Fellows in the bar came into the house, and took another room to dine of beef and other things. But one of Sir Charles's company desired to have a plate of it; upon which Mr. Clough told them these Gentlemen had bespoke it for dinner; but he said he would get them a plate of it, which was first up, and ordered to be reckoned into Mr. Waters the butcher's bill. After dinner they drink their healths, and returned their thanks for the beefs, and towards the evening Sir Charles Pym and his friends came down stairs, and met the gentlemen at the bottom, and Mr. Caw asked them how they liked the beef that was first up; upon which one in the company answered, and told them, They did not feed it, for they had paid for it. Upon which further words arose, and Mr. Bramble drew his sword, and fell upon Sir Charles Pym; but he got out into the street. After which Mr. Waters came forth, and plucked Sir Charles Pym by the arm, and forced him to fight with him, saying, Here is my hand, and here is my sword; and so forth with him in the street, he received this mortal wound, and fell down dead. After this, Mr. Waters took him by the nape of the neck, and dashed his head upon the ground, and cried out, God damn you, you are do! and fled forth, Let the fowls alone on his body. My Lord, this shall be proved to be done without any manner of provocation; and if I hope you, Gentlemen of the Jury, will find him guilty of wilful murder.

Clark. Call Mr. Merrydell, Mr. Noddy, Mr. Palmer, and Mr. Bridgen. (They were sworn.)

Mr. Merrydell. My Lord, on the fourth day of May last, on a Friday, Sir Charles Pym, myself, and three Gentlemen, who in Court, came to dine at the Swan-Tavern on Fish-street. We called for meat, and Mr. Clough, the man of the house, told us, we might have fish, for he had no meat, but what was bespoke by Mr. Waters and his company. We desired him to help us to a plate of it, if it might be got, which we had brought up stairs; after dinner we drank the Gentlemen's healths to wit, and returned thanks for it. A while after Sir Thomas Middleton went away, and about an hour after that, or thereabouts, Sir Charles Pym and the rest of us came down to go away; and when we were in the entry, Mr. Caw met us, and asked Sir Charles how he liked the beef that was first up, who answered, We did not know you sent it, for we have paid for it. Then the boy that kept the bar told us, that he did not reckon it the bill; upon which Mr. Caw seemed to take it ill: But, my Lord, I cannot be positive whether Mr. Bramble and Mr. Palmer were at any words. Then I took Mr. Caw to one side into the entry, and he thought that I had a mind to fight him, but I did what I could to make an end of the quarrel. (Upon which the Court highly commended Mr. Merrydell.)

Clark. This was in the entry, but where was Sir Charles Pym?

Mr. Merrydell. He was then in the entry.

Clark. Where was Mr. Waters?

Mr. Merrydell. He was at the door, my Lord; I well cannot swear positively to any particular passage as to the murder; but Mr. Waters called Sir Charles Pym rogue, and gave him very ill words, and I saw him take him by the neck, and forced his head downwards, and said, God damn him, he is do, to the bell of my remembrance, my Lord. Then, I took Sir Charles up in my arms, and pulled the sword out of his hand, and then Mr. Waters fled, God damn him, let it fly in his guts, or in his body, or words to that effect.

Clark. Was Mr. Caw or Mr. Bramble at the place where Sir Charles fell?

Mr. Merrydell. No, my Lord, they were in the entry (cuddling there).

Clark. What came of Mr. Waters afterwards?

Mr. Merrydell. My Lord, he lay'd a little till I had pulled the sword out of his body, then he ran away.

Clark. Did they draw their swords in the entry?

Mr. Merrydell. I cannot tell that?

Clark. Did you for them draw their swords?

Mr. Merrydell. I cannot say Sir Charles Pym's sword was drawn, but I saw Mr. Waters draw his sword in the street.

Clark. Do you know whether Mr. Waters was wounded or no?

Mr. Merrydell. I do not know that, for I did not see the wound given.

Clark. Mr. Waters, will you ask him any questions?

Mr. Waters. Yes, my Lord: Mr. Merrydell, what did you say to Sir Charles Pym in the Fish-monger's shop? Did you not say, Go, and fight him, and I will be your second?

Mr. Merrydell. My Lord, I do not remember one word of that.

Clark. Mr. Merrydell, were you in any Fishmonger's shop?

Mr. Merrydell. Yes, my Lord, I was there; but I do not remember one word between Mr. Merrydell and Sir Charles, as to, as I hope for salvation, I did not say thing, and that's all I have to say.

Clark. Cryer, call Mr. Noddy.

Mr. Noddy. My Lord, I went and met with these Gentlemen that dined with us at the Swan-Tavern, and we had fish and two beef marrow-bones, and a plate of beef for dinner; and when we came down to go away, these Gentlemen met us, and said, God damn you, how did you like the beef? which raised a quarrel among us; but immediately, after I thought it was all over, I saw Mr. Waters run Sir Charles Pym through.

Clark. Was his sword drawn?

Mr. Noddy. Yet he drew his sword.

Clark. Where was Mr. Bramble?

Mr. Noddy. I cannot tell where he was dimly; but, my Lord, I heard Sir Charles Pym say nothing to Mr. Waters.

Clark. Cryer, call Mr. Palmer.

Mr. Palmer. My Lord, after the reckoning was paid, we came down stairs, and called for a coach, and because it rained, there was none to be had, and these Gentlemen followed us into the entry, and to words to the same purpose as already said between them; after which, I met Mr. Bramble, and we fell out on the Fish-monger's shop.

Clark. What began?—Mr. Palmer, I know not, I cannot remember that.

Clark. Were you not in drink?

Mr. Palmer. My Lord, we drank nine or ten bottles among five of us; Vol. VII.

after which Mr. Bramble and I drew out swords, and then Mr. Merrydell came and took him away from me into the entry, and in the next time, while we were talking in the entry, the business was done.

Clark. What your words put up again?

Palmer. I had put up mine.

Clark. Did you take notice of what passed between Mr. Waters and Sir Charles Pym?

Mr. Palmer. I heard nothing of high words.

Clark. Yes, yes, it was all about the beef.

Clark. Cryer, call for Mr. Prosser, the Bar-keeper.

Prosser. My Lord, I made the bill for the reckoning.

Clark. Did you put the beef upon the bill?

Prosser. No, I did not; when they came down stairs, the coach was first for them, viz. for Sir Charles Pym and his company, and the reckoning was paid. When Sir Charles Pym and the rest of his company came down into the entry, Mr. Waters came out of the room, &c., and I heard them argue about their dinner, and they came to me, and asked me what was to pay for beef, and I told them nothing.

Clark. Did you for the man killed?

Prosser. My Lord, I did not see him killed, nor I.

Clark. Who was it that quarrelled with the coachman?

Prosser. My Lord, Mr. Noddy quarrelled with the Coachman about his flying; the Coachman refused going with him, because his Horses were hot.

Clark. Cryer, call Mr. Bramble.

Mr. Bramble. My Lord, between eleven and twelve o'clock in the morning on the fourth of May last, Sir Charles Pym came to Mr. Clough's door in a coach, and asked him what he might have for dinner; a while after he might have a mutton and some fowls, and I sold a mutton to Mr. Clough; for Sir Charles went to the Exchange, and I saw no more of him till I saw him killed. While I was in the house, came in one Mr. Allen and others, to enquire for Sir Charles Pym, and Mr. Clough told them that he had bespoke a dinner, and was gone to the Exchange, on a mutton and some fowls; but one of the Gentlemen desired a bit of the beef that was first up, for Mr. Clough said he would get a plate for him. So I went to the door, and the Coachman came, and his horse's being hot, he desired to go away because his said; but Mr. Noddy put his foot upon the coach, and the Coachman after pulled his Bay out of the coach, and drove away. And after that, I saw Mr. Caw and others come to the door, and pulled each other into the next shop, and were at very high words; and so afterwards they went into the entry again, and Sir Charles Pym and Mr. Waters came out without the door, the latter of which said, Here is my hand, and here is my sword; but they returned back again into the Tavern, and within two minutes came out again, and I saw Mr. Waters thrust Sir Charles Pym through his back.

Clark. Did you for him do any thing to him after he was down?

Mr. Bramble. No, my Lord, I did not.

Clark. Did you see any thing of the sword that was the kernel, and drew his sword, and found upon his girth, and then you say, that you saw Sir Charles Pym come out with his sword drawn? Was his sword drawn?

Mr. Bramble. I did not see him draw it; but it was drawn.

Clark. Where did he receive his wound?

Bramble. Within a foot of the kernel; I was but a little way off, but I did not see him beat his head against the ground.

Clark. Cryer, call Mr. Fletcher.

Mr. Fletcher. My Lord, on Friday in the evening on the fourth of May, I was going by the Tavern-door about seven o'clock at night, and I heard a noise, and a talking of going to the church-yard of the town to be merry; and turning myself back to hear further, I saw Mr. Waters come out of the door and draw his sword, and Sir Charles Pym came out, and drew his sword; and presently Mr. Waters's sword was through Sir Charles Pym's body almost a foot, and he fell down crinkling immediately; and when he was down, I saw Mr. Waters hit him in the kernel, and rake him by the nape of the neck, and after that, God damn him, he fell down flat in his body; and afterwards I saw Mr. Merrydell pull the sword out of his body.

Clark. Did you see Mr. Bramble there when Sir Charles fell?

Mr. Fletcher. My Lord, I saw none there but Mr. Waters and Sir Charles, they were out of doors, and the rest were in the entry.

Mary Webb and Sarah Webb were called, who could give little or no evidence as to matter of fact, as concerning the death of Sir Charles; and being innocents, could not tell what they might have seen.

Clark. Cryer, call Mr. Allen.

Mr. Allen. I know but very little of the matter, but that there was a plate of beef first up to us, but we knew not from whence it came, till afterwards the Drunken bought up some of the Gentlemen's butter half an up; after which, we drank their healths, and returned them thanks for it. After which, I went to the Coffee-house, and had my food about half an hour, and presently heard a cry of murder, and I came down, and saw Sir Charles Pym lying with a wound in his body, and another in his head, but I did not know who it was, nor them; but I asked who did this business, and exhorted the people to take them as soon as they could.

Clark. I think you said that Mr. Bramble's sword was drawn?

Mr. Allen. Yes, it was, but I believe that he did not know that Sir Charles Pym was killed.

Mr. Bramble was called, but could depose nothing material.

Clark. Mr. Waters, you have been here indicted, together with Mr. Bramble and Mr. Caw, for the murder of Sir Charles Pym, but I have heard you have heard what charge hath been laid against you, which hath been a very strong one, and now it behoves you to make your defence as well as you can.

Mr. Waters. My Lord, I was no way the occasion of the quarrel; when I came thither, I asked for some meat, and having not eaten all the day before, we had a piece of beef, of which Sir Charles Pym and his company had none, who afterwards drank our healths, as I was informed. For my part, my Lord, I never saw the Gentlemen hit in any ways; and I am very sorry it should be my misfortune to kill him in the quarrel. Sir Charles Pym asked me, saying, God damn you, Sir, what have you in do to make it? I went presently, my Lord, to a Filibanger's, where Mr. Mirrival was, and Sir Charles Pym came, and Mr. Mirrival said to him, Sir Charles, Down you, Sir, go and fight him, and I will be your second. And presently they came upon me, and I drew my sword in my own defence, and he ran me eight inches into the thigh, and at the same pail, I had the misfortune, my Lord, to run him into the body.

Coat. Would you ask Mr. Mirrival any question?

Waters. Yes, my Lord. Mr. Mirrival, did you see me strike Sir Charles's head upon the ground?

Mirrival. No, Sir, I did not see that; neither did I say any such thing in the Filibanger's shop, as to bid Sir Charles fight you.

Coat. Cryer, call Matthew Perna.

Perna. My Lord, all that I saw of the business was, that when the Coachman was called to the door, Mr. Nash came and threatened him if he did not fly; then Mr. Cave and Mr. Bradshaw were in the entry, and I heard them discourse about beef, and some of them said, You give us beef, and we will pay for it; and there was answer made, they were Ruffals that said so, for that did not. There was one of the Gentlemen in our shop sitting of us, but, let me come to him, I will tell him.

Coat. Do you know the man?

Perna. No, I do not know who it was.

Mr. Waters. It was wounded at the same time, my Lord.

Coat. That is admitted of.

Mr. Waters. Let him be asked, whether I beat the head against the ground.

Perna. No, my Lord, I did not see him do that.

Coat. He had a wound, the question is how he came by it; whether he might not fall upon it himself, it was a flaying wound?

Mr. Waters. Yes, my Lord, let Sir Charles's sword be sent, all blood. [But that gave no satisfaction on either side.]

Coat. Mr. Bradshaw, what have you to say for yourself?

Mr. Bradshaw. My Lord, I was there, but I know nothing of the death of Sir Charles Pym, nor how he came by it; there were some words said amongst us, and I desired them to cease, for fear a further quarrel should ensue upon it.

Coat. Mr. Cove, what have you to say?

Mr. Cove. I know no more of the matter than this Gentleman saith: I saw not Sir Charles Pym killed.

Coat. Cryer, make proclamation.

Cryer. All people are commanded to keep silence upon pain of imprisonment.

Then Mr. Baron Juyner turned up the evidence as followeth:

Baron Juyner. Gentlemen of the Jury, you have three persons indicted, viz. Mr. Waters, Mr. Bradshaw and Mr. Cove, for murdering Sir Charles Pym, Bart. and have had several witnesses called for the King, against the prisoners at the Bar; the first of which was Mr. Mirrival; and he gives you this account, and 'tis all that each and every are given, and it agrees on all sides, and he tells you, that all these Gentlemen were to dine at Mr. Gladly's, at the Swan-Tavern in Old Fish-street; and that they were there at dinner, it is very plainly proved. And being there, it seems that some of these Gentlemen had bought a fifth-denier, some fells, and had some, viz. a plate of beef, and he tells you also, that when dinner was over, some words did ensue concerning the reckoning, and that one of the companies were got down stairs in the entry, where a further quarrel did ensue. Mr. Mirrival tells you further, that Mr. Bradshaw and he quarrelled, so there was a scuffle in the entry, after which things were pretty well quieted there: it comes Mr. Waters and Sir Charles Pym, and while Mr. Mirrival was securing the first quarrel, they, viz. Sir Charles Pym and Mr. Waters were got out at the door, and Sir Charles was flopping down, and Mr. Waters was pulling upon his neck and throwing him down.

So said Mr. Mirrival, and when he went to take the sword out of his body, he saw him a dying man.

The next evidence was Mr. Nash, and he observes to you, that one of the Gentlemen did say, that the quarrel was not intended against them; and he gives an account of the story, how that it was about the beef; how that Sir Charles was run through by Waters, but he did not let him knock his head against the ground.

Mr. Nash gives the like account, and saith, that whilst they were a scuffling in the entry, Sir Charles was killed at the door.

The next evidence is the Drawer, who tells you of a squabble that Mr. Nash had with the Coachman at the door, and how that there was leftward of the Gentlemen behind, and that the Coachman was unwilling to wait because it rained, his horses being hot, they might catch cold; whereupon he put his foot-boy into the coach, and threatened the Coachman if he went away: this was before they left out about the meat.

The next evidence was one Mr. Bradshaw, he gives the same account, how that a quarrel was amongst them, and how that Mr. Waters was on one side of the kennel, and Sir Charles Pym on the other side, and there they stood with their swords drawn; and as soon as they came close, they wounded each other, and Sir Charles Pym was killed; but he did not let his head knock against the ground.

Comes Fletcher, my Lord Mayor's Officer, and he tells you, that he was going by the door house into Broad-street, and he saw a man that was wounded flopping down; and he saw that Mr. Waters took him by the nape of his neck, and knock'd his head against the ground, and heard him swear, Let the sword stick in him. Sarah Webb and another woman speak it to be in the like manner; and one of them talks of Mr. Waters's pulling Sir Charles Pym out of the entry before he would come out.

All of all, Gentlemen, here was Mr. Allen, one of their company, who went away to the Coffee-house, and hearing murder cried out, he came and found Sir Charles Pym killed, and quite dead. This, Gentlemen, is the evidence that you have heard as near as I can give it you.

Now, for the prisoner Mr. Waters, he would have you believe, as if Sir Charles had struck him before he drew his sword; but he has not proved it: likewise speaks of Mr. Fletcher, but he does not remember that Sir Charles Pym struck him before he drew. But so it was, Gentlemen, there was a quarrel, in which that honourable and worthy Gentleman, Sir Charles Pym, lost his Life.

Now for Mr. Bradshaw, he confesseth that there was a quarrel; but he saith, that he did not know when or how Sir Charles Pym was killed; and for Mr. Cove, I do not find any thing objected against him, nor either of them.

Now, Gentlemen, I tell you what the Law is in this case: First of all, to begin with Mr. Waters, so as it seems with Mr. Waters, so you may be guided to deal with the other two. Now it hath not been made appear by any of the evidence that you have heard, that there was any premeditated malice between them, for they were never in company before, and knew not each other; so that there could be no manner of malice from him in particular.

The next Rep. Gentlemen, it is here is nothing that can impute a general malice upon Mr. Waters, for if I had no Jells to kill a man, and kill another with whom I do not quarrel, that cannot be any premeditated malice, but I rather think that there was a little heat of wine amongst them: and this whole action was carried on by nothing else but by a hot and sudden frolick, and I am very sorry that it should fall upon such a worthy Gentleman as he was. And if there was no malice premeditated, then he can be found guilty of nothing but Manslaughter; and as for the other two, they may be totally acquitted. If I have erred in the summing up of these evidences, or mistaken myself in any point, here are my Brothers to help me.

Then the Gentlemen of the Jury withdrew for about the space of half an hour, and returned into Court upon a scribble of conscience; one amongst them spoke to the Court as followeth:

Juryman. My Lord, we are not satisfied in our consciences concerning the death of Sir Charles Pym; we find in it malice fore-thought, because after he had run the sword through his body, he was not satisfied with that, but must knock his head against the ground; so we do take it, that the said Sir Charles Pym was maliciously murdered.

Mr. Justice Aldous. Gentlemen of the Jury, I shall endeavour to direct you in this case, and tell you what the Law saith. That it cannot reach a man's life, when no premeditated malice is proved; that there is none proved, appears very plain to me, and I hope also to you, because it hath been proved that these Gentlemen, viz. the prisoners at the Bar, and the deceased, had never been in company before.

Gentlemen, you are upon your oaths to serve the King as Jurymen; and I, as a Judge, am upon my oath to try the cause as well on the behalf of the living as the dead. So that upon the whole matter, Gentlemen, this can be called nothing else but a storm, an unprovoked tempest that such men are subject to; so that it does not reach premeditated malice, but subsequent passion; which fell passion was continued to that height, that Sir Charles Pym in the midst of it lost his life.

Then the Jury went out again for about a quarter of an hour; and returning, brought in Mr. Waters guilty of manslaughter; but the other two were acquitted.

A COMPLETE COLLECTION OF TRIALS, &c.

XLII. Proceedings in Parliament upon the CASE of JAY and TOPHAM; and the Defence made by Sir Francis Pemberton, and Sir Thomas Jones, for their Judgment given therein. 1 Will. & Mariz, 1689.

MR. Topham, Sergeant, attending the House, having by his Petition complained, That he had been a great Sufferer by several Prosecutions at Law for executing the Orders of the House, and that having pleaded those Orders to the Jurisdiction of the Court of King's-Bench, his Pleas had not been allowed, but Judgment was given against him. The House referred the Examination and Consideration of this Matter to the Committee of Privileges. Accordingly the Committee met and examined the Matter.

Sabbath 6th July, 1 Will. & Mar.

Col. Byrd reported the Fact as it appeared to the Committee, with the Opinion of the Committee thereupon, with which the House agreed, in these Words:

Resolved,
"That the House doth agree with the Committee, That the Judgment given by the Court of King's-Bench in Eagle Term, 22 Car. II. Exin, upon the Plea of John Topham (at the Suit of John Jay), to the Jurisdiction of that Court; and also the Judgments given against the said Mr. Topham, at the Suit of Several Parties, John Hillier, Thomas Stepling, Richard Blah, John Nalton, Thomas Herbert, Nathaniel Ross, &c. and Ruford Herwege, are illegal, and a Violation of the Privileges of Parliament, and pernicious to the Rights of Parliament."

The House being informed, That Sir Francis Pemberton and Sir Thomas Jones were Judges of the King's-Bench at that Time, ordered them to stand upon Wednesday next following.

Monday 10th July, 1689.

The House being informed, That Sir Francis Pemberton and Sir Thomas Jones attended, pursuant to the Order of the House; Sir Francis Pemberton was first brought in, and Mr. Speaker spoke to him to this Effect:

Mr. Speaker. The House has been acquainted, there was an Admon brought in the King's-Bench in Eagle Term, 22 Car. II. by one Jay against Sergeant Topham. To which Admon he pleaded the Jurisdiction of this House; and that it proceeded to a Demurrer, and the Plea was over-ruled by you as Chief-Justice; the House has sent for you to know upon what Ground you did it.

Sir Francis Pemberton. Sir, I know nothing of this Admon, I have been out of the Court now six Years this Vacation. If I saw the Pleadings, it may be I might give you some Account of it, but I cannot remember for many thousand Admons as were brought at that Time. But if you will let me know what the Charge is, I do not doubt but I can give you a good Account of it. You say, Sir, he pleaded the Jurisdiction of this House.

Mr. Speaker. That is, there was a Plea to the Jurisdiction of the Court of King's-Bench, That it was done by Order of this House; so it censures the Jurisdiction of this House.

Sir Francis Pemberton. That is quite new to me, for I know not what I was sent for. You were pleased to summon me to stand, but I did not know for what, nor do I remember any such Admon brought by Jay, I remember only an Admon was brought by John Jay against Topham. And I remember there was a Motion made to us for a new Trial in the Case, where there was good Damage given. And we did give them a new Trial, for we thought it necessary and unreasonable Damages.

Mr. Speaker. There were six Admons brought, but that which the House would be informed of, is the Admon that was between John Jay and John Topham.

Sir Francis Pemberton. Under Favour, I can say nothing to this Admon, but that I can say, if the Defendant should plead he did arrest him by the Command of this House, and should plead that to the Jurisdiction of the Court of King's-Bench (I can say nothing to this particular Action, but) I think, with Submission, I can fairly say, that such a Plea ought so to be over-ruled, and I take it, the Law is very close to that; but also what I said in my Charge, with respect to this particular Action, it you please to give me some Time to look into the Records of the Court.

Mr. Speaker. The House will consist of it, if you please to withdraw, and then give your Reason.

Sir Francis Pemberton withdraws.

Sir Thomas Jones brought in.

Mr. Speaker. Sir Thomas Jones, the Clerk of the House sent for you to shew: They have been acquainted, that in the Time of King Charles the Second, in the thirty-fourth Year of his Reign, there was an Admon brought by one Jay against Mr. Topham, that then was, and now is, Sergeant of the House of Commons. To which he pleaded, That what he did was by Order of the House, and thus he pleaded to the Jurisdiction of the Court of King's-Bench at that Time; they desire to know if you gave the Judgment, and upon what Reason?

Sir Thomas Jones. 'Tis so long ago I do not remember it, 'tis above seven Years ago; and I had not Notice at all of the Cause I was recommended to attend you upon; whether I did give any such Judgment or no, it will appear by the Record itself.

Mr. Speaker. We have examined the Officers, and they give us an Account, That Sir Francis Pemberton was Chief Justice, and you another Judge then.

Sir Thomas Jones. I was a Judge of the Court at that Time, but I cannot certainly say, we did give Judgment to over-rule the Plea; I hope, if we did, it was according to Law.

Mr. Speaker. Well, Sir, you may withdraw, if you please.

Sir Thomas Jones withdraws.

Sir Francis Pemberton brought in again.

Mr. Speaker. Sir Francis Pemberton, the House took Notice when you were in before, you said, when an Order of this House was pleaded to the Jurisdiction of the Court of King's-Bench, by the Law it ought to be over-ruled; and that you could give those Reasons that would satisfy the House it was so, they expect you should give them now.

Sir Francis Pemberton. Mr. Speaker, as to this Question concerning this particular Cause I know nothing, I know not what the Pleading was.

Mr. Speaker. The House does not expect any Thing of your Answer as to this particular Cause, but you seemed to make your Answer general, and therefore they desire to hear what you can say as to your general Assertion.

Sir Francis Pemberton. To satisfy the House of all together, I would desire to look into this particular Cause, for I do not know whether I was Judge or not then: If they will give me some Time, I will give them an Account of the whole.

Mr. Speaker. The House expects to have some Account now of what you said, that a Plea to the Jurisdiction of the Court of King's-Bench ought to be over-ruled.

Sir Francis Pemberton. If they please, since they charge me with this particular Cause, I will answer to the whole together.

Mr. Speaker. Well, Sir, if you please to withdraw.

Sir Francis Pemberton withdraws.

He is brought in again.

Mr. Speaker. Sir Francis Pemberton, the House did take Notice that you did affirm here, that if an Order of this House was pleaded to the Jurisdiction of the Court of King's-Bench, that it ought to be over-ruled, and that you take the Law to be clearly so, and that you thought you could satisfy the House in that Point. This is a general Assertion, and they expect nothing as to the particular Cause; but they do require you, that you would give them your Reasons why you maintain this Opinion.

Sir Francis Pemberton. The Question that was put to me by yourself was a new Question to me: I heard nothing concerning it, nor did I know what it was, that would be put to me. I did tell you my present Apprehensions of the Case you put, I did not speak of an Order of the House in general, but the Order that was in this Case, of the Order of taking him into Custody. That was the Question proposed to me. I had no Reason to speak of the Orders of the House in general, I can give no Account of them, but 'tis good to see, Whether the Order for taking him into Custody was pleasurable to the Jurisdiction? I did apprehend by the Law it was not pleasurable: If I was understood in any other Sense, I beg your Pardon, for I spoke it quod vis. The Case of Jay vs. the, which was, is being the Order of the House to take him into Custody, that being pleaded to the Jurisdiction of the Court of King's-Bench, whether that ought to be allowed or not? Therefore if it be looked upon as if I spoke in general, I did not adapt my Words as I should, but that is my Meaning.

Mr. Speaker. That comes much to the same Purpose, under Favour: You say, an Order of this House being pleaded in this particular Cause to the Jurisdiction of the King's-Bench, that Order ought to be over-ruled.

XLIII. Proceedings before the House of Lords, (from Jan. 7, 1691 to the 17th of Feb. following) between the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk, upon the Duke's Bill, Intituled, An Act to dissolve the Marriage, &c. 3 W. & M.

The 7th of January the said Bill was lodged in the House of Lords.

The 8th of January.

THE Dukes of Norfolk having received Intimation, that the Duke of Norfolk was this Day offering a Bill to the House of Lords, for dissolving the Marriage between them, and that the same was under debate before their Lordships, he was advised to present the following Petition.

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled,

The humble Petition of Mary Duchess of Norfolk, Sheweth,

THAT your Petitioner being informed, that the Duke of Norfolk is at this time offering a Bill to your Lordships, for dissolving the Marriage between him and your Petitioner,

Your Petitioner humbly prays he may be heard by your Lordships, before such Bill be received.

And your Petitioner will ever pray, &c.

M. Norfolk.

Upon which Petition, their Lordships were pleased to make the following Order, viz.

The Fourth 8 January, 1691.

A Bill having been offered to this House, on the Behalf of the Duke of Norfolk, to dissolve the Marriage between the said Duke and his Dutcheſs, it was ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That Her Grace shall have Notice thereof, and may be heard by her Council, at the Bar of this House, on Tuesday next at twelve of the Clock, when she hath to object against the receiving the said Bill. At which time the said Duke may also be heard by his Council, for the said Bill, if he shall think fit.

Munk, Jefeon, Cler. Parliamentar.

The Merits 10 January, 1691.

After hearing Counsel this Day, at the Bar, when they could object for her Grace the Dutcheſs of Norfolk, against the receiving of a Bill offered by his Grace the Duke of Norfolk, to dissolve the Marriage between him and his Dutcheſs, it was the Council of his Grace the Duke of Norfolk presenting the said Bill. And after Consideration of what was offered by Counsel, on either Side, and a long Debate thereupon:

This Question was put,

Whether the Duke of Norfolk's Bill should be received? It was resolved in the Affirmative.

Which Bill is as followeth:

An Act to dissolve the Marriages of Henry Duke of Norfolk, Earl Marshal of England, with the Lady Mary Mordaunt, and to enable the said Duke to marry again.

Enacted, as Henry Duke of Norfolk, and Earl Marshal of England, having been married to the Lady Mary Mordaunt, hath made full Proof that his said Wife is guilty of, and hath committed, Adultery on her Part: And forthwith as the said Henry Duke of Norfolk hath no Issue, nor can have any possible Expectation of Posterity to succeed him in his Honours, Dignities, and Estate, which the said Marriage be declared void by Authority of Parliament, and the said Duke be enabled to marry any other Woman: The King and Queen's Most Excellent Majesties, upon the humble Petition of the said Henry Duke of Norfolk, having taken the Premises into their Royal Consideration, for divers weighty Reasons, are pleased that it be Enacted, and be it Enacted, by the King and Queen's Most Excellent Majesties, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the Authority of the same, That the said Marriage between the said Henry Duke of Norfolk, and the said Lady Mary his Wife, shall from henceforth be null and void, and be by Authority of this present Parliament Declared, Adjudged, and Enacted to be null and void, to all Intent, Construction, and Use whatsoever. And that it shall and may be lawful to, and for the said Henry Duke of Norfolk, at any time or times hereafter, to contract Matrimony, and to marry (as well in the Lifetime of the said Lady Mary, as if she were naturally dead) with any other Woman or Women, with whom he might lawfully marry, in case the said Lady Mary was now living: And that such Matrimony, when had and celebrated, shall be good, just and lawful Marriage, and so shall be adjudged, decreed and taken, to all Intents, Constructions and Purposes. And that all and every Child and Children born in such Matrimony shall be deemed, adjudged and taken to be born in lawful Wedlock, and to be Legitimate and Inheritable, and shall inherit the said Duchy of Norfolk, Office of Earl Marshal of England, and all other Earldoms, Dignities, Honours, Honours, and Titles of Honour, Lands, Tenements, and other Hereditaments, from and by their Fathers, Mothers, and other Ancestors, in like Manner and Form, as any other Child or Children, born in lawful Matrimony, shall or may inherit, or be inheritable, according to the Course of Inheritances used in this Realm; and to have and enjoy all Privileges, Preeminences, Benefits, Advantages, Claims and Demands, as any other Child or Children born in lawful Wedlock may have or claim by the Laws or Customs of the Kingdom. And be it further Enacted, That the said Henry Duke of Norfolk shall be intreated to be Tenuant, by Courtesy, of the Lands and Inheritances of such Wife, whom he shall hereafter marry: And such Wife as he shall so marry shall be intreated to a Dower of the Lands and Tenements of the said Henry Duke of Norfolk, and of such Estate wherof she shall be Dowerable, as any other Husband, or Wife may, or might claim, have, or enjoy: And the Child or Children, born in such Marriage, shall and may derive and make Title, by Descent, or otherwise, to, and from any their Ancestors, as any other Child or Children may do, by Law, Statute, Restraint, Prescription, Ordinance, Canon, Constitution, Prescription or Custom, had, made, exercised, or used to the contrary of the Premises, or any of them, in any wife notwithstanding. And be it further Enacted, by the Authority aforesaid, That the said Lady Mary shall be, and is hereby barred and excluded of, and from all Dower and Thirds, and of and from all Right and Title of Dower and Thirds, unto, or out of any the Honours, Manors, Lands, or Hereditaments of the said Duke; and that all Concessions, Joinders, Settlements, Limitations and Creations of Uses and Trusts, of, unto, or out of, any Honours, Manors, Lands or Hereditaments, at any time heretofore made by the said Duke, or any of his Ancestors, or Trustees, unto or upon, or for the Use or Benefit of the said Lady Mary, or any the Issue of her Body, or for raising, discharging, or counter-securing any the Manors, Lands, or Hereditaments of the said Lady Mary, or any of her Ancestors, shall be from henceforth utterly void, and of none Effect: And all and every the said Honours, Manors, Lands or Hereditaments of the said Duke, or any of his Ancestors or Trustees, shall from henceforth remain and be, and for, the Use and Benefit of the said Duke, and such other Person or Persons, and for such Estates and Interests, and in such Manner and Form, as if the said Lady Mary were now naturally dead, without any Issue of her Body. And also, that all Limitations and Concessions, of any Use, Estate, Power or Trust, made by any of the Ancestors of the said Lady Mary, unto or for the Use or Benefit of the said Duke, his Heirs or Assigns, out of any the Manors, Lands, or Hereditaments, or any of the Ancestors of the said Lady Mary, shall be from henceforth void, and of none Effect.

REASONS offered to the Lords in Parliament, for receiving the before-mentioned Bill of Divorce, on the Behalf of his Grace the Duke of Norfolk.

THESE are having a Sentence for a Separation from the Ecclesiastical Court, is thought to be so Objection against the receiving or passing the Duke of Norfolk's Bill, for these Reasons, viz.

I. The House proceeds, in this Case, in their legislative and in their judicial Capacity; and in their legislative, all things must proceed originally by Bill.

II. That a Sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court can give the Duke no Relief, so to what he seeks by his Bill, viz. To dissolve his Marriage, and enable him to marry again; but that Relief must spring originally from the Parliament, without Relation to the Ecclesiastical Court.

III. That in Case there was such a Sentence, yet it would afford no Assistance in this Case: For the Parliament, in Cases of this Nature do not rely upon any such Sentence for a satisfactory Proof of the Fact; but bear Witnesses in voce, and thereupon proceed.

IV. That there are Witnesses now living to prove the Fact, which may be examined in voce; whereas, if they die during the tedious Proceeding in any inferior Court, then there can be no other Proof but Depositions taken in Writing.

V. That Mrs. Norton's Case was received Originally in Parliament.

12 January, 1691.

The Duke of Norfolk's Bill aforesaid having been Yesterday received and read, the Dutcheſs of Norfolk presented the following Petition to their Lordships this Day:

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled,

The humble Petition of Mary Dutcheſs of Norfolk,

Sheweth,

THAT your Petitioner being married to the Duke of Norfolk fourteen Years and upwards, never had or received from her Husband any Intimation of a Misdemeanor, on her Part, against him, which, joined to her Innocency of the Crime mentioned in the Bill, makes this Proceeding before your Lordships very surprising to her: Her Person, Estate, and Honour, which is more dear to her than her Life, being now brought in Question:

Your Petitioner humbly prays she may have a Copy of the particular Charge against her, with the Names of the Witnesses, and reasonable Time allowed her to answer the same, before any further Proceedings upon the Bill.

Mary Norfolk.

Upon which Petition the following Order was made.

The Merits 13 January, 1691.

Upon reading the Petition of Mary Dutcheſs of Norfolk, it is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That Sir Richard Rogers, Sir Charles Hele, and Dr. Osmund, do attend this House To-morrow at ten of the Clock in the Forenoon.

Munk, Jefeon, Cler. Parliamentar.

14 January, 1691. After having heard the Civil Lawyers, the following Order was made.

The Merits 14 January, 1691.

After hearing this Day the Civil Lawyers, pursuant to the Order Yesterday, upon reading the Dutcheſs of Norfolk's Petition, it is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That his Grace the Duke of Norfolk shall bring in the Charge against his Dutcheſs, and particularly to the Person, Time and Place, by Saturday next, at twelve of the Clock.

Munk, Jefeon, Cler. Parliamentar.

16 January,

26 January, 1691.

This Day the Duke of Norfolk brought in the following Charge against his Dutcheſs:

The Charge which Henry Duke of Norfolk, Earl Marshal of England, doth exhibit against his Wife, Mary Dutcheſs of Norfolk, before the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament aſſembled, pursuant to their Lordſhips Order of the 14th of January, 1691, is for the Crime of Adultery.

THE Person charged to commit the ſaid Crime with the ſaid Dutcheſs, is John Gwynn, of the Parſh of St. Margaret's, in the Liberty of Wynſhanger.

The Times when the ſaid Crime was committed, were between the Months of June and December, 1685, and ſeveral Times ſince.

The Places where the ſaid Crime was committed, are at Witchhall, Wynſhanger, and within the Parſh of St. Margaret's Wynſhanger, St. Martin's in the Fields, St. James's, St. Anne's within the Liberty of Wynſhanger: And in the Parſh of Lambeth, in the County of Surrey.

Norfolk, and Marſhall.

Upon which the following Order was made.

Die Sabbati, 16 January, 1691.

Upon reading, this Day, the Charge, which Henry Duke of Norfolk, Earl Marshal of England, hath exhibited against his Wife, Mary Dutcheſs of Norfolk, for the Crime of Adultery: It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament aſſembled, That her Grace the Dutcheſs of Norfolk do amend the Houſe on Monday next, or ſome Perſon on her Behalf, then to receive a Copy of the Charge against her.

Math. Jolyne, Cl^r Parliament^r.

29 January, 1691.

The Answer of Mary Dutcheſs of Norfolk, to the Charge exhibited against her by the Duke of Norfolk, before the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament aſſembled.

THIS Respondent in Honour, that the Charge exhibited by the Duke of Norfolk into this Honourable Houſe against her, as to Time and Place, is too general, and is not pursuant to the ſaid Order the End of your Lordſhips Order of the 14th Inſtant, made upon the humble Petition of this Respondent. Wherefore the doth humbly hope, and pray, your Lordſhips will not oblige her to make any further answer, 'till the Duke hath bring in a particular and certain Charge, as to Time and Place, against her.

And this Respondent doth the rather humbly ſubſt, That your Lordſhips would pleaſe to require the Duke to be particular, and certain in ſuch material Circumſtances of his Charge against her; for that it appears, by his own ſetting therein, that the ſuppoſed Crimes objected to her, and alledged to be committed, were ſome ſix Years before the Bill was offered to this Honourable Houſe: During moſt of which Time, as the Advice, and by the Approbation of the Duke, was, and continued beyond the ocean, to ſeek him in his Charge and Part; he frequently declaring, that when he ſhould be more eaſy in his Fortune, they ſhould live together.

M. Norfolk.

Upon which Answer the following Order was made. And the Duke's Second Charge delivered in the ſame Day.

Die Meriti, 20 January, 1691.

It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament aſſembled, That her Grace the Dutcheſs of Norfolk ſhall have a Copy of the Duke's Charge delivered this Day against her; and that ſhe, or Sir Thomas Proffitt, do attend this Houſe, on Morrow at 11 of the Clock in the Forenoon, to answer the ſaid Charge.

Mathew Jolyne, Cl^r Parliament^r.

Which Copy is as followeth:

The Charge which Henry Duke of Norfolk, Earl Marshal of England, doth exhibit against his Wife, Mary Dutcheſs of Norfolk, before the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament aſſembled, pursuant to their Lordſhips Order of the 14th of January, 1691, is for the Crime of Adultery.

THE Person charged to commit the ſaid Crime with the ſaid Dutcheſs, is John Gwynn, of the Parſh of St. Margaret's Wynſhanger.

The Times and Places when the ſaid Crime was committed, were at Witchhall, in the Months of June, July, Auguſt, ſepte, or one of them, in the Year 1685. At Wynſhanger, in the Months of July, Auguſt, or ſepte, ſome, or one of them, in the ſaid Year 1685. Served by Thomas Bowen, 29 Jan. before Sir of the Clock.

Upon which, the next Day, viz. the 30th of January, 1691, the Dutcheſs of Norfolk preſented the following Petition:

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament aſſembled,

The humble Petition of Mary Dutcheſs of Norfolk,

THAT your Petitioner was ſerved with an Order of this Honourable Houſe, late laſt Night, to attend your Lordſhip this Day, by Eleven of the Clock, either in Perſon, or by Sir Thomas Proffitt, to answer to a new Charge brought in against her, by her Husband the Duke of Norfolk.

Your Petitioner is adviſed, That, for her juſt Defence, it is neceſſary to alledge in her Answer ſeveral ſpecial Matters relating both to the Duke and herſelf.

That in this ſhort Time appointed by your Lordſhips, your Petitioner finds it impoſſible to inſtand Council, to prepare ſuch an Answer as ſhe is adviſed it neceſſary to put in.

Wherefore your Petitioner humbly prays your Lordſhips, ſhe may have convenient Time to put in her Answer to the ſaid Charge.

And your Petitioner will ever pray, &c.

M. Norfolk.

Upon which the following Order was made.

Die Meriti, 30 January, 1691.

Upon reading the Petition of Mary Dutcheſs of Norfolk, praying that ſhe may have convenient Time for answering to the Charge put in against her, by his Grace the Duke of Norfolk, Yesterday: It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament aſſembled, That her Grace the Dutcheſs of Norfolk ſhall peremptorily answer, by herſelf, or Proctor, to the ſaid Charge, at Eleven of the Clock in the Forenoon.

Math. Jolyne, Cl^r Parliament^r.

Accordingly, January the 31th, the Dutcheſs of Norfolk delivered in the following Answer:

I Mary Dutcheſs of Norfolk, under Proſtitution, That the pretended Charge of Adultery given against me, in the Honourable Houſe of Peers, was, and is general, inſufficient, and ſuch as, I humbly conceive, I am not bound by Law to give Answer unto. Yet knowing my own Innocency, and that I am not guilty of the pretended Crime, ſuch Proſtitution being ſet to me, I ſhall, and do, under the Matters and Qualifications hereafter mentioned, answer, and ſay, truly affirming, That having been married to his Grace the Duke of Norfolk for near 15 Years, he never did (ſill) this pretended Charge given against me, in the laſt preſented, or intimate unto me, that I had ever ſinned his Bed; but did always treat me with great Kindneſs and Reſpect. And about the Year 1685, at his Requeſt and Deſire, I did go with him from London to France, and there continued with him for ſome Time; where his Grace, being under an Indispoſition, and continuing ſo for ſome Time, he ſhewed ſuch Affection to me, and put to great Truſt and Confidence in me, that all ſuch Things that were adminiſtred to him, in order to his Recovery, he did not, nor would receive any of them but what came from my Hands, and I did with great Care attend him: And being recovered, he told me his Occaſion required him to go for England, but he would return to me in France within ſome ſhort Time, and being he came to England, and at his parting with me, he ſhewed great Affection to me, and an great Deſire of Love, with Tears in his Eyes, ſaid, He had The ſaid Duke's Pardons to ſit me, deſiring my Patience, and that I ſhould return into England to him in ſome ſhort Time. And after his Grace's Return into England, he having Notice from me that my Lodgings was inconvenient, and deſiring his Leave to change the ſame, he wrote me Word very affectionately, that God forbid he ſhould continue me to any Inconvenience, and left me to my Liberty therein. And before his parting with me, in France, as a Teſtimony of his Love and affection to me, he ordered ſome yearly to be paid unto me out of his own pocket, by Quarterly Payments, one and above the ſaid Maintenance ſaid upon me by my Father, upon my Marriage with him. And that after his Arrival in England, he made ſeveral Viſits to my Mother, the Counteſs of Peſborough, and with great Obedience and Reſpect, ſaid to her Biſhopage, and told her, he had left me well and ſafe in France; and ſaid, that his own Deſires were preſſing upon him; but if her Daughter (meaning myſelf) would conſent that the Maſter of Droghda, and other Places, ſhould be ſent upon him and his Heirs, he ſhould thereby be made a happy Man. And I coming into England, his Grace having put off Houſe keeping, and dwelling in the Counteſs of Peſborough's Lodgings at St. James's for about 15 Years, and I having him for Alimony (the ſaid Counteſs a Year not being paid unto me), he did not, during that time, ſaid any Crime against me, which had been proper for him to have done, to avoid Alimony, if I had been guilty. And I, the ſaid Mary Dutcheſs of Norfolk, being at Droghda as Peſborough ſaid, his Grace did write very affectionately to me. And that Diſturbances happening in thoſe Parts, in November, 1688, I left Droghda; and, with the Conſent of the Duke, went beyond Seas, and there continued 'till ſent for by my Father and Mother, and then returned, which was in or about October, 1691, with the Duke's Conſent. And then Applications being made to me by the Duke my Husband, to join with him in the ſale of Cyſle-Ryng, and other Estates: But I being adviſed, that this muſt be injurious to me, could not join therein which I humbly apprehend to be the true Cause and Occaſion of this Proceeding against my Honour, on the Duke my Husband's Part.

And I the ſaid Mary Dutcheſs of Norfolk, alſo affirming to my Proſtitution of my Innocency, and praying that I am guilty of the pretended Crime charged against me, and being unwilling to impeach my Husband of any Crime whatſoever, yet being adviſed, That, by the Laws of the Land, a Husband ſuing a Divorce for the Adultery of his Wife, he ought not to obtain any Sentence of Divorce, if he be proved guilty of the ſame.

Wherefore this Respondent doth aver, and is ready to prove, that the Duke her Husband was, and is guilty of Adultery, and hath continued in the Crime of Adultery for the ten Years laſt paſt, and does ſo continue.

My Lords.

It is my Miſtake to be thus accuſed. I had rather ſtand charged for High-Treſon before your Lordſhips, than with this unqueneſs Crime. In the Charge for High-Treſon, the Manner of Trials, and the Ways of Proceedings are known: Is the Punishment in this Caſe against me.

Your Lordſhips are now creating new Ways of Proceeding against me, and a new Law to puniſh me; and this for a Crime ſuppoſed, and alledged to be committed ſix Years paſt, in another Reign, after publick Indemnities in the ſessions of Parliaments, many Sessions of Parliaments, and Excommunications of others, without mentioning this Crime against me. My Council are to ſeek how to adviſe my Defence in the Proceeding, being altogether ſtrange, and without Precedent, or Example.

I had my Proſtitution now to be very violent, and my Proceeding to be very ſwift upon me, having had but one Night to prepare my Answer to this General Charge. I do in this Place publicly ſwear, I am innocent of what is objected to me, and am not guilty of doing any husband's Bed: I am not guilty of the Crime charg'd against me. I hope (being thus accus'd) I may, without Vanity and Van-Glory, for what is well known, that I am not only the Duke of Norfolk's Wife, but also born and defunct from Parents and Ancestors of the ancient Nobility: I beg your Lordships Assistance, and my Ancestors, who live in this House, know no such Proceeding: It is with Regret that I bring this Answer to my self, and against my Husband, but it being my Defence, I hope you will excuse me.

And it your Lordships shall, as your great Wisdom, proceed farther in this Matter, I hope, and do most heartily pray, that I may hereafter have convenient Time to make my Proofs, and full Defence; and then I doubt not of your Lordships Justice to me, as well as for my Husband, who sits and Votes with your Lordships.

M. Norfolk.

Upon the delivering the said Answer, the next Day the following Order was made.

Die Febris, 23 Januarii, 1691.

It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That his Grace the Duke of Norfolk shall produce his Witnesses, or Meritor at Ten of the Clock in the Forenoon, to be sworn. And that the Duke of Norfolk do stand this House, by himself, or Proxy, at the same Time, and may have Orders for Witnesses of the Bench.

Math. Jolyon, Cler' Parliamentar'.

Accordingly, January 23, 1691, the Duke's Witnesses were produced, and whose Names are as followeth,

Margaret Edmund	John Holt	Mary Boyl
Ann Barton	My Lord	Roe Jones
Richard Owen	My Lord	Ann Jones
Thomas Haden	Thomas Alder	John Hylton
Thomas Parry	Thomas Alder	William Boyl
John Forster	Thomas Alder	John Wood
John Reynolds	Margaret Fyler	Henry Dapin
Thomas Lloyd	John Walsworth	John Dapin

After these several Witnesses were produced, on Behalf of the Duke of Norfolk, and had given in their several Places of Abode, &c. the following Oath was administered to them:

O U shall now Answer me in all such Testimony as shall be desired you by the Honourable House, in relation to the Charge of Adultery, which is in the Title of Norfolk, against the Duchess of Norfolk, with John Gorman; as also that your whole Knowledge of this Matter, and shall speak the Truth, the whole Truth, and nothing but the Truth, as well upon the Matter as shall be demanded on Behalf of his Grace the Duke of Norfolk, as upon such Interrogatories as shall be asked on Behalf of the Duchess of Norfolk, without Fear or Affection in either Party.

So help you God, and by the Contents of this Book.

After the Oath administered, as aforesaid, the following Order was made.

Die Sabbati, 23 Januarii, 1691.

It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the Duchess of Norfolk's Proofs shall have a Copy of what was taken upon swearing the Duke of Norfolk's Witnesses at the Bar, on Tuesday next at Ten of the Clock in the Forenoon; and that the Duchess of Norfolk, by herself, Proctor and Counsel, shall attend, together with the Duke's Proctor and Counsel, at the same Time.

Math. Jolyon, Cler' Parliamentar'.

After Examination of Witnesses, on Behalf of the Duke, the following Order was made.

Die Martis, 26 Januarii, 1691.

After hearing this Day, the Witnesses on the Behalf of his Grace the Duke of Norfolk. It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That Friday next, at Ten of the Clock in the Forenoon, shall be, and is hereby appointed, for her Grace the Duchess of Norfolk to make her Defence by her Proctor or Counsel; and that his Grace the Duke of Norfolk's Counsel and Proctor be then present, and the Witnesses who this Day delivered their Evidence, or Oaths, on his Grace's Behalf: And that the Duchess may have an Order for such Witnesses, as she shall think fit to make use of, on her Grace's Behalf.

Math. Jolyon, Cler' Parliamentar'.

Upon which Order, the Duchess was advised to peruse the following Petition:

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled,

The humble Petition of Mary Duchess of Norfolk,

Sheweth,

THAT since the Examination of Witnesses before your Lordships against your Petitioner, upon Tuesday last, the utmost Endeavour and Diligence hath been used, to prepare for her Defence against the Time appointed by your Lordships.

That your Petitioner is very much concerned, that, for the necessary Defence of herself, the Bench be tried to be under the Charge sworn against her, one Moment beyond the Time given her by your Lordships.

But, upon a Consultation with her Counsel and Solicitor last Night, she is advised, that it is absolutely necessary for her to address to your Lordships for Time, 'till Monday next, to bring in her Defence, (since her most material Witnesses being remote from London, and though she has sent for them, and used all Means possible to get them ready by the Time appointed, she cannot be able to have them here before Monday next. Wherefore your Petitioner humbly prays your Lordships, (it being a Case of the highest Conscience and utmost Importance to your Petitioner, to give her Time, 'till Monday next, to bring in her Defence.

And your Petitioner shall ever pray, &c.

M. Norfolk.

Upon which Petition the following Order was made.

Die Febris, 29 Januarii, 1691.

Whereas this Day was appointed for her Grace the Duchess of Norfolk to make her Defence; upon reading the Petition of her Grace the Duchess of Norfolk, praying, (it being a Case of the highest Conscience, and utmost Importance to her) to give her Time, 'till Monday next, to bring in her Defence; after hearing her Counsel at the Bar, and upon Oath made that some of the Duchess's material Witnesses are out of Town, it is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That her Grace the Duchess of Norfolk hath twenty Time given her for making her Defence, 'till Monday the Fifth Day of February next, at Eleven of the Clock in the Forenoon.

Math. Jolyon, Cler' Parliamentar'.

Accordingly the Duchess of Norfolk began her Defence; and the following Order was made.

Die Lunae, 1 Februarii, 1691.

It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That on Wednesday next, at Eleven of the Clock in the Forenoon, the House shall proceed in hearing the Duchess of Norfolk's Evidence; and that all the Witnesses that have been sworn on either Side, do then attend the House.

Math. Jolyon, Cler' Parliamentar'.

Which they did, and the following Order was made.

Die Martis, 3 Februarii, 1691.

After having this Day heard several Witnesses on Behalf of her Grace the Duchess of Norfolk, as also for her Grace the Duke of Norfolk, It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That her Grace the Duchess of Norfolk's Counsel shall proceed in her Grace's Defence on Thursday next at Twelve of the Clock.

Math. Jolyon, Cler' Parliamentar'.

They proceeded accordingly, and the following Order was made.

Die Sabbati, 6 Februarii, 1691.

After having this Day heard several Witnesses on the Behalf of the Duchess of Norfolk. It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the Council for her Grace the Duke of Norfolk shall proceed to examine Witnesses, on Tuesday next at Twelve of the Clock.

Math. Jolyon, Cler' Parliamentar'.

Which accordingly they did, and the following Order was made.

Die Martis, 9 Februarii, 1691.

After hearing some Witnesses this Day, on the Behalf of his Grace the Duke of Norfolk. It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the Council for her Grace the Duke of Norfolk, as also the Council for her Grace the Duchess of Norfolk, shall be heard on either Side; at Twelve of the Clock, so soon as the Evidence on either Side; and that Mrs. Sandridge, and Mrs. Sturges, do then attend to be heard.

Math. Jolyon, Cler' Parliamentar'.

The Council attended accordingly, but not heard; and their Lordships were pleased to make the following Order.

Die Febris, 11 Februarii, 1691.

It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the Council for her Grace the Duke of Norfolk, as also the Council for her Grace the Duchess of Norfolk, shall be heard on either Side; at One of the Clock in the Afternoon, to hear the Evidence on either Side; and that Mrs. Sandridge, and Mrs. Sturges, do then attend to be heard.

Math. Jolyon, Cler' Parliamentar'.

After Evidence summed up, this following Order was made.

Die Febris, 12 Februarii, 1691.

After hearing this Day the Counsel, and a Civilian, for his Grace the Duke of Norfolk; and also Counsel, and a Civilian, for her Grace the Duchess of Norfolk, who summed up the Evidence for their Grace's favourably, It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That on Tuesday next, at Twelve of the Clock, this House shall proceed in the Debate of this Business; and that no other Business whatsoever shall intervene: And that all the Lords in and about the Town shall be summoned then to attend; and that the Officers that summon them, give the House an Account of what Lords they summon.

Math. Jolyon, Cler' Parliamentar'.

The Matter was accordingly entered upon; and, after some previous Debates by their Lordships, they were pleased to adjourn 'till the next Day, when they proceeded, viz.

Die Martis, 17 Februarii, 1691.

The Depositions taken at several Times before, on the Behalf of his Grace the Duke of Norfolk, as also those taken on the Behalf of her Grace the Duchess of Norfolk, were read at the Table, by the Clerk; and are as followeth, viz.

The PROCEEDINGS of the LORDS upon the Evidence.

Rowland Owen examined on the Behalf of the Duke of Norfolk, against the Duchess of Norfolk.

ROCHESTER Oath faith, That Mr. Rogers, about Six Years since, being the Duke of Norfolk's Butler, ordered him to carry the T-bag out, the Lodgings being open, he saw Mr. Gorman in Bed with the Duchess of Norfolk, the Duchess kept out of the Bed, and put on a Morning Gown, and Gorman hid himself in Bed; this was between Five and Six o'Clock in the Evening, about a Footing before Bartholomew Day; he did not tell the Duke: He is sure it was Gorman; he saw him often, twice or thrice a Day; the outward Door of the Lodgings was shut, but he opened it with a Key he had.

Rowland Owen gave a second Time, faith, he never had the Key of the Lodgings but once, that Mr. Rogers gave him the Key, when he went (as he told him) to the Blue Pots in the Hay-Market, to help the Duchess's Supper; he had been a few not from Knight then in the Lodgings, nor any other Woman but the Duchess of Norfolk; he faith, he Margaret E. Howard examined on the Behalf of the Duke of Norfolk, against the Dutchess.

Margaret Ellwood faith, She came a Company to see the Lodgings at Windsor, in the first Year of King James's Reign, about three or four of the Clock in the Afternoon; a Woman told her that her Lady was not there, but the opening the Door, saw my Lady upon the Stairs in an old Petticoat, Mr. Gorman's Breeches were down; he pulled them up, and laid her Hand on his Sword, saying, God damn you for a Whore, How have you the Impudence to come here? My Lady bid him kick her down; he scattered some Coyners, that is, Men's Natives, on the Boards; the two on Nicholas, but her Kase, or a little above. Another Time after, the third Gorman's Handkerchief and Ruffian in my Lady's Bed; my Lady's Woman told there was Gorman's Name upon them. Another Time, the first Mr. General told Mr. Gorman out of my Lady's Closet. She saw Gorman's Legs within her's when she came the first Time into the House, and his Breeches went about his Heels. The first Time was in the Kitchen and at Time, Mrs. Kynfane told her it was Gorman's Linnen.

Witness produced in the Credit of Margaret Ellwood.

Captain Charles Potts faith, He both known Margaret Ellwood six or seven Years, and that he was Servant to the Duke of Norfolk, and that she behaved herself well and prudently there; her Husband was a Soldier in his Company, and was, as he hath heard, a Shoemaker.

John Fenot faith, he knew Margaret Ellwood, who was the Duke of Norfolk's Servant, about two or three Years, he never heard any Scandal, or Disgrace of the Woman, but that she carried herself civilly; he knows not whether she kept an Alehouse in Windsor.

Lazarus Perrell faith, He knows Margaret Ellwood, she lived in his House in Brass-Martin, next Eggle will be two Years. He knows nothing amiss of her; he took Care for her Lying; he never knew her keep ill House; he took a Room in his House, some of the Rent is behind, he thinks thirty-two Shillings, her Husband and the Woman gave him a Bond for it.

Witness given on the Behalf of the Dutchess, for impeaching the Testimony of Margaret Ellwood.

Michael Hadson faith, He hath been acquainted with Margaret Ellwood, about three, four, or five Years; When he first knew her, her Husband was a Soldier in the Duke's Company, and he was, as he hath heard, an under Housekeeper; he believes she was turned out of the Duke's Service, afterwards he sold Drink in a House of his at Windsor, and went away in his Debt by Night, without paying him; the took her Goods with her, this was in 1689.

John Hoad faith, She knows Margaret Ellwood; she lived in a Cellar of her's, and in a Back-House of her's, but not at the same Time, three Quarters of a Year, in Brass-Martin, about Michelland faith; she paid the Landlady but eleven Shillings and Six-pence; Her Course of Life was not good; she was in an inferior Condition, her Husband was a Cobbler in a Stall, and she had five Children.

* Observations upon the foregoing Evidence.

Here is a foul and a suspicious Story in this Deposition of Margaret Ellwood, wherein the Duke largely upon the Credit of her own Testimony, without any Colour or corroborating Evidence to support it: Only Capt. Charles Potts, John Fenot, and Lazarus Perrell, are produced to speak in his Partial Reputation. The first faith, he behaved himself well and prudently in the Duke's House; the second and third, that they know no ill by her.

There were produced on the Behalf of the Dutchess, and to invalidate the Testimony of Margaret Ellwood, three six Witnesses, Michael Hadson, John Hoad, Mary Trevis, Mary Javis, Anne Roff, and Mary Roff. Mary Trevis, Mary Javis, and Anne Roff, do all depose, that about Christmas last, speaking of the Dutchess, and Mr. Gorman, Margaret Ellwood told each of their Witnesses respectively, that she never saw or knew any Thing of ill by the said Dutchess; and yet Ellwood's Accusation bears Date in the first Year of King James. Mary Trevis further saith, that upon the next Sunday after Christmas last, Ellwood told her, upon borrowing a Scarf of her, that it might be five Pounds in her way, for the Duke was to be divorced from the Dutchess, and he had sent his Charge for her, and she was to be a Witness. Anne Roff speaks also to the same Effect, how Ellwood told her there would be a Divorce, and the Duke had sent for her to be a Witness; and likewise faith, That Ellwood's Husband told her, that his Wife was to have thirty Pounds per Annum settled upon her, and five at Windsor, and have the Shewing of the Cassin.

Mary Roff speaks to the same Purpose also, with the Witnesses above, as to what Ellwood's Husband said of Windsor, the Sentence, and the Divorce, adding also, that the Duke was to have a great Fortune (according to the common Rumour then about the Town); Mary Roff's Father was by, and heard all this: It was about a Week before the Duke of the Information that Discourse had passed.

Nay, the Dutchess was so close in the Matter, that she sent for Ellwood a little before Christmas last, and had her speak the Truth; as Ellwood herself owned to Mary Javis and Anne Roff.

To come now to the Quality and Credit of Margaret Ellwood. Hadson faith, she was his Tenant at an Alehouse in Windsor, in 1689, carried off her Goods by Night, and went away in his Debt.

He, likewise, she lived in a Cellar, led an ill Course of Life; her Husband was a Cobbler in a Stall.

Anne Roff says, That she had five Children, and that she had but Six-pence for Maintenance for herself and seven.

Mary Trevis faith, She hath but a slender Acquaintance with Margaret Ellwood; but the said Ellwood sent to borrow a Scarf of her the Sunday after Christmas last; and faith, That passing the next Day by her Scarf, she, the said Ellwood, desired it for a longer Time, for it might be five Pounds in her way, for she was to be a Witness for the Duke of Norfolk, who was to be divorced from his Dutchess, and that the Duke sent his Charge for her. I told her there could be no Separation as Marriage, except Adultery could be proved; and that I could not think it reasonable to believe, that so mean a Servant as this could be a Spectator to so great an Action as that was. She said, she thought she could do the Duke no Kindness in going, for she never saw any other Harm by the Dutchess, than that she Gentlemen come to and fro to the House; but the Duke had sent for her, and she must go.

Mary Trevis faith, She knows Margaret Ellwood, who she heard of, the Lady Dutchess sent for her a little before Christmas last, and said, Margaret, I desire you to speak the Truth, I would not have you divulge my Lord in the least. Margaret Ellwood said, She never knew no Harm by her Grace. The Dutchess demanded the Keys of her, and she gave them her; and the Dutchess gave them to her, the said Ellwood, again the next Morning: The Discourse was a few days before Christmas last.

Anne Roff faith, She knows Margaret Ellwood, who came to her House, and told her, about two Months since, that the Duke of Norfolk sent her his Wife, for there would be a Divorce between the Duke and Dutchess; and asking her what she would say, she answered, she could say little, but that she knew no ill by the Dutchess, but that she was a good, generous spirited Lady, and she never knew any ill Action by her in her Life. I bid her have a Care what she went about, for that would do the Duke but little Kindness. The Dutchess, the said, called for the Keys of her Lodgings, but gave her them back the next Morning. She faith, That last Week she went to her to demand a Debt, and she promised to come and pay it her. She faith, she went to the Porter at the Duke's to ask for her; but the Porter said she was not within, but meeting with her Child there, she said she was within, and brought her, the Wife, to her in the Duke's House, and she made her very well come, and sent her Husband with her, the Wife, to see her Children's Lodging at the Green Man, near the Duke's House: She faith, Ellwood's Husband told her, upon asking how the Cause went, that his Wife was to have 30*l.* per Annum settled on her, and to go to Windsor to live, and to have the Shewing the Cassin: She faith, That upon her going to see the Children, and commending their Lodgings, that Ellwood's Maid, or Woman, told her they paid four Shillings a Week for the Lodgings; she faith, the Children were well clothed, with good Frocks and Top-knots, and they used to be ragged, and that her Husband used to allow her but Six-pence a Day for her and her Children: She faith, That upon the next Sunday told her she had been with the Dutchess; and that her Grace bid her do nothing to divulge her Lord, but speak the Truth.

Mary Roff faith, She knows Margaret Ellwood, She faith, she heard Ellwood's Husband say, that the Duke of Norfolk had taken Care of his Wife and Children, and settled thirty Pounds per Annum on them, and her Habitations was to be at Windsor Castle; and said, that my Lord Duke would be divorced, for he was to have a great Fortune of Twenty Thousand Pounds a Year: This Discourse was the last Week, and her Father was present, and her Mother was just gone out.

Thomas

This was her Condition till near Christmas last, when all on a sudden, as Anne Roff deposes, she was taken into the Duke's House, the Children were shut out, and took'd up with good Frocks and Top-knots, (which were till then all in Rags,) Lodgings provided for them at four Shillings a Week, and she was to look to them, and use all possible Means of doing all this. But, in fact, the Change was not wrought by Miracle, and leans much toward the Discourse before-mentioned, that Anne and Mary Roff had with Ellwood's Husband.

The Question, at last, is briefly this: Whether is to be believed a Woman under so many scandalous Circumstances, and one that swears for herself too, or six Witnesses against her of so unquestionable Probity, that not so much as one of them could be impeached by the other Party?

To pass now to the palpable unlikeliness of the Story barely in itself, Ellwood was carrying Company, the says, to see the Lodgings at Windsor, and opening the Door, the saw and heard, as in her Deposition. How could she, that none of this Company could be proved, or so much as named to second Ellwood? For 'tis to be presumed, they must needs hear and see what passed upon this Adventure, as much as herself did; or if she had but named the Woman, who, she says, told her my Lady was not there, it might have served as a collateral Inducement, for the giving of some Sort of Credit to it. But in a Matter of this Importance, to have so many Witnesses within Reach of being found out, and none to appear, looks very ill on their Part, that were so much concerned to produce them: And if for Gorman's threatening her, and the Dutchess's bidding him kick her down, no People in their right Wits but would have try'd to stop her Mouth with fat Words and a good Birse in such a Case as this, rather than provoke her by Menaces and ill Language, to run open Mouth to the Duke with the Story, in Revenge, when this had the Dutchess's Honour and Estate so absolutely at her Mercy.

As to the Business of Mr. Gorman's Handkerchief and Ruffian, and his being let out of the Closet, the Countenance is all of the same Piece with the rest; for why were not the Persons named as the Discourse proceeded to prove the Particulars therein mentioned, as well as Ellwood? It is most certain, that the Prosecutors could easily have done it, and that it was properly their Business and Interest so to do; for what signifies Ellwood's little Testimony, under her Circumstances, without corroborating Proofs? She will say, that she is Company to see the Lodgings; a Woman that told her so and so, and another Woman and a Gentleman that said, and did this and that, and yet not one Creature at last to second her Deposition, nor any Pretence of an Exception to the Evidence on the other Side.

Simon Vassell examined as the Belliff of the Duke of Norfolk, against the Duchess.

John Farrel saith, That he was at Windsor to draw the Dutchess of Norfolk's Picture about fix Years since, and had the Duke's Closet to put the Pictures in. When he had done, and had been at Home two or three Days, Germans came to him much concern'd, and said, You can do the Dutchess an extraordinary Kindness, and will oblige the Lord and Lady Peterborough in the highest degree; then he showed me a Letter of the Dutchess to me, and read it to me: before that he told me there was a Sheet and Waistcoat, and they are known to be his: He said, I desire you to save the Dutchess's Honour, I desire you will be so much a Gentleman as to own them to be yours, and that you left them there: I desired to be excus'd, I could not do that without Prejudice. He told me the Lord and Lady Peterborough had discounten'd the Duke of Norfolk upon it, and if it were own'd not to be my Linnen, their Discountenance would hurt much upon him, that if there came any Evidence to affirm them, he would leave off the Picture. I refused him; he offered me a Piece of Gold, and told me I should make my Fortune by it; but I still refusing, Mr. Germans went away very much discontented: Mr. W being in the next Room, over-heard the Discourse between Germans and me, and told it, and spoke of it, or else I had not been here now.

John Rathenell sworn a Witness as the Belliff of the Dutchess of Norfolk, for investigating the Tiffenry of Simon Vassell.

John Rathenell saith, That he lives in Crown-Court in Crown-Garden, and is a Taylor: He saith, he knows Simon Farrel, and that he, the Witness, married his Half-Sister: He saith, that about a Quarter of a Year after the Belliffness of the Dutchess happened at Windsor, he was at Farrel's House about Eleven of the Clock in the Night, and Farrel lock'd the Door, and told him, he had deserv'd him by marrying his Sister, and said, he would be his Death, and drew his Sword, and commanded him to step, that he might slay him at his Pleasure; and the said Witness shuddring for fear of his Life, knowing his Farrel, and he drew the Witness about a dozen times with his Sword, and threatened him to take his Life, if he, the Witness, did not fetch his Wife down that Night, who was about twelve o'Clock, and which was about six Weeks after the day in; and he was to bring her to be whipt, and to bring six Rods with him: Upon this, the Witness's Promise to do this, he let him go, and he hath not seen him since, but in the Street. He had Half a Year before that been distracted for six Weeks, and he, the Witness, fetch'd Dr. Fagles to him once, and the Doctor came several times afterwards to him. One Night in that Distraction, he got from the Women that watch'd him, and ran about two Hours in his Shirt and Waistcoat, in a frothy Night, and cut his Feet, and was brought Home by the Watch. He said, his, the Witness's Wife, was to have been here this Day as a Witness, and was here, but not having an Hour to reckon, and being ill, is gone Home with her Midwife: He saith, he never durst go near Farrel since he should him: He saith, that Mrs. Farrel, after she came from Windsor, said, That the Dutchess had all People about her, and that she believ'd her to be much wrong'd, and said, she could clear her about the Scandal of the Linnen that was found, for whether it was, or was not Mr. Farrel's Linnen, he could do it, and said, supposing I had brought my Husband's Linnen down to be wash'd, and the Landlady fetching of it, she might take it up, and leave some of it behind.

Thomas Fyler examined as the Belliff of the Duke of Norfolk, against the Duchess.

Thomas Fyler saith, That he was Chamberlain to Mr. Germans, and carried the Dutchess of Norfolk often, about two Years since, in his Coach, and brought her Home, and the Footmen have had four Half-Crowns given them; and Mary, a Dutchess, his Helper, called it High-Mary: It was by Night, against a Light, that he saw her Face in the Coach; it was about seven or eight of the Clock at Night, about this time a-Year; he had seen her Face once in the Day-time, for looking out of a Safe-Window, two Stories high, in Mr. Germans's House, in Park-street: he know'd her Face well enough; he hath seen her before, and since she was married.

Windsor sworn as Belliff of the Dutchess of Norfolk, for investigating the Tiffenry of Thomas Fyler.

John Hall saith, That he lives at the Coffe in Tuttle-Street, and is a Jewer: he saith, he hath known Thomas Fyler two Years, and that about three Weeks since, they being drinking together, and talking concerning the Duke and Dutchess of Norfolk, he said, Mr. Germans had done all Things by him, in turning him off in Ireland, and in turning him off here; and he was resolv'd to be reveng'd of him.

Helen Grinley saith, He lives with Mr. Germans, and that he hath known Thomas Fyler above a Year and three Months, in Mr. Germans's Service; he heard him say, in the last Week of December last, in Mr. Gold's House, about three Days before he was turn'd away, that he thought it no more due to murder his Master, than it was to kill a Louse: He saith, he hath lived with Mr. Germans about a Year and a Half, and that he never saw the Dutchess of Norfolk with him; and that he hath never seen her come to him, lived with him in the Place where he now lives: He saith, he never saw Mr. Germans with a Woman that was called the Lady Beaumont, nor known any such Name, or Person.

Thomas Lloyd examined as the Belliff of the Duke of Norfolk, against the Duchess.

Thomas Lloyd saith, He knows one that went by the Name of the Lady Beaumont, at her House at Fear-Hall; one Germans, a Wine Merchant, took the House; he came thither about Midwinter, 1689. She was off and on these 'till last November. He hath seen the Person that went by the name of the Lady Beaumont, and it is the Dutchess of Norfolk, Gordon was her chief Man, and his real Name is Ryan. Her Brother, was pretended, which he hath said was Mr. Germans, was the chief Man that came there; sometimes he came once or twice a Week, sometimes once; he's cousin, as the Servants said, it was Captain Germans that came there, every Body said it was he: He knows him not by his Name, but by Head-say; if he could see him now, he could tell whether it was he; he hath not seen him since the Lady went away; he believes Germans was there every Month in both the last Summers; he cannot say that Gordon was ever there when Germans was there; he saw him several Times there in May, June, July, and August, 1691. Germans's own House was then pretty long: He cannot positively swear he was Captain Germans; he supposes, if he saw him now, he could know him.

Windsor sworn as Belliff of the Dutchess of Norfolk, for investigating the Tiffenry of Thomas Lloyd.

Alexander Herman saith, That he served Mr. Germans; he hath left his Service a Year and a Half, about eight Weeks after he came from Ireland with the King; he served him a Year and a Half: Mr. Germans was in Ireland with the King, in the Summer, in the Year 1690. He went to Ireland two Days before the King that Summer; he continued there four Months: He believes he went the last of May, or the first of June; he came back with the King; He, the Witness, served him all that while, and saw him every House every Day, and never stir'd from him; he came from Ireland in the same Ship with the Lord Peters, the Earl of Monmouth, and Mr. Felton; and he went to Ireland in the Minnow Yacht, with the Envoy of Scotland and Brandenburg, and the Marquis Mimozin. He saith, Mr. Germans was at Brighthelm in May last, he saw him there, and spoke with him there: He saw the Lord Peters and the Lord Lovely there with him; he lodged in the same Tavern there with him, for four Days, and saw him one after: He, the Witness, coming then for England, left him there. He never knew

* Observations upon the foregoing Evidence.

There needs no more to the overthrowing of Farrel's Evidence, whatsoever it is, than the Testimony of John Rathenell, to prove him Nix Comper; witness his Outrage upon Rathenell, the fantastical Freak of feeding at Midnight for fix Rods to whip his Sister-in-law; and another Fit, for a matter of six Weeks, when Dr. Fagles made him several visits to compose him, his Frenzy being so violent upon him, that he broke loose from his Keepers in a frothy Night, and cut down the Streets in his Shirt, till he was taken up by the Watch. This is the Sum of Rathenell's Testimony, and not one Word oppos'd either to the Credit of the Witness, or the Truth of the Depositions. But it may not be amiss, after all this, yet to speak a few Words to the Likelihood of what Farrel has here depos'd.

Mr. Germans came to see him, he says, with a Letter from the Dutchess, which he read to him, and in the Name of the Lord and Lady Peterborough, desir'd him to say, the Shirt and Waistcoat were his, but not one Word all this while of the Contents of the Dutchess's Letter. He says again, that the Shirt and Waistcoat were known to be his; now if they were known to be Mr. Germans's, what good could Farrel do by taking the Matter upon himself, when he saw four Weeks would do, there was a Piece of Gold offer'd him, and that would not work neither. The Dutchess and Mr. Germans were wonderfully pleas'd, sure, in this Case, from what they were in the Belliffness of Osborne and Edmund; there was no Purse of Gold, or Dutchess's Letter to tender the Matter, but, on the contrary, Edmund was threaten'd, posses'd, and desir'd, instead of calojnering him. And what was all this for at all, but only to remove a jealousy, and melt modesty, at the same time, to condemn themselves by a Confession out of their own Mouths, and improve the Sublimity into a Certainty. Can any Body imagine that they would not have done more to have suppress'd Osborne and Edmund's Evidence, than John Rathenell's, or Simon Farrel's, who swears farther, that his Wife heard all this Discourse between Germans and himself in the next Room, and told it at? Why was the not produced there, or the Person to whom she told it? But Roberts swears, that Mrs. Farrel said, the Dutchess had all People about her, and was much wrong'd, and that she could clear her about the Scandal of the Linnen, so that in plain, Mrs. Farrel was not an Evidence for the present Turn.

There is not one Word in Fyler's Evidence, true or false, that's worth the hearing, only it is levelled, upon the main, at the Dutchess and Mr. Germans, and John Hall gives the Reason of it, for this John Fyler, he says, was Mr. Germans's Coachman, who, he said, would turn him off, and he would be reveng'd of him. Helen Grinley testifies also, that some three Days before Fyler was turn'd away, he said, he thought it no more due to kill his Master, than to kill a Louse. So that the Evidence he gives, was grounded on the Malice he bore his Master for turning him off.

Lloyd's Deposition is nothing at all to the Purpose; or if it were not so pertinent, the Fallacies in it are sufficient to spoil it. For, in Truth, his Evidence, as to Mr. Germans's being at Fear-Hall, is only grounded upon Head-say and Report, and yet he swears to swear him to be there every Month in both the last Summers; and particularly, that he was several Times there in May, June, July, and August, 1691. Whereas Alexander Herman swears, that Mr. Germans went to Ireland in the Summer 1690, on the last of May, or the first of June, where he stay'd about four Months, and that himself saw and served him there, and says farther, that he was at Brighthelm in May last. Anthony Moore says also, being Barber to Mr. Germans, that he went beyond Seas, and the Campaign was almost over when he first shav'd him, when he came back from Scotland, which is a flat Contradiction to Lloyd's Evidence.

in her Court, she knew not who left it; and said, she thought nothing to it. Mrs. Knapp, saying, You may say something to it, Mr. You had not had this Oath in her Mouth, then the said, she had, and was the Duke of Norfolk's, and had told the Duke, that she had consented to go into Mr. Germain's House as a Post Maid, and he consented to let the Duke of Norfolk, by a letter tell the Duke of Norfolk, to let her not come but to seven Years before, but she had been a day or two, since the coming out of France, and that was not of the Duke of Norfolk which she saw on Captain Germain's Side, whereas Mrs. Knapp, which says, if she were sure it was not this, she had, she was sure it was not, the witness, at the night hour, and went to go home to her Children, if she would leave it, but she could not, went to Mr. Germain's, and two other Women, were present in Great Earl's House when the Dispute happened, which was the night the Order came out, the 14th, he wrought in Mr. Germain's House, he was one of the Ladies that in May 31 one of the Ladies on the Night gave Order to take down a Picture, she was reported that Captain Germain's Sister.

Elizabeth Knapp said, she knew Mrs. Knapp, who came into Mrs. Germain's first time she was subpoenaed, and she told the Paper in her Hand for her said said, she went to Mr. Germain's for a Post, and she thought she saw the Duke of Norfolk there, but she saw her sister coming from France, and was sure it was not her, and wished she might never see her Children, and him, if ever she saw her there.

Alexander Horne said, That he knows John Wadsworth well, he never saw any Dispute with her concerning the Duke of Norfolk's being in Mr. Germain's House; he said, he had been often at Mr. Germain's House, but he never had any Dispute with her concerning the Duke of Norfolk, nor never saw this Woman in his Mother's House in all his Life. He wanted on my Mother at Table, and in the Chamber, all the Time of his being, with her was a Year and a Half; he never saw a Lady in a Mother in his Mother's House.

Mrs. Knapp said, That she knows John Wadsworth, she was her Servant, but not long, for she was not honest, she, the Witness, being gone out, at her Return, she met her going away with her the Witness's Linen, and her Habit, &c. handled up. This is about 11 Years since.

Francis Knapp said, That he knows not John Wadsworth, nor ever Disputed with her, nor never saw her at Mr. Germain's House, nor did the Witness ever carry any Letters thence.

Witness examined on the Behalf of the Duke of Norfolk, against the Credit of John Hall.

Henry Dingley, juror, said, That he knows John Hall; he was a Woman at Mr. Germain's, when he, the Witness, was there; and Mr. Hall often said to him, that he believed it was the Duke of Norfolk that was there in the Mask, and that gave him Discomfort in his Work there; this was at Mr. Germain's House in Park-Street: He could not affirm it to be true, because he was asked, but really believed it.

John Hyatt said, That John Hall was employed by Mr. Germain, and a Lady that was asked; the Lady was the first that ever showed him his Work what he was to do, and the first Work he did was to make down a Partition, we talking among ourselves, that it was the Duke of Norfolk. John Hall has said, that the Duke of Norfolk was the Duke of Norfolk, not that he could say so of his own Knowledge, but that he had been often told it was so. He said, that Mr. Hall said him, the Day he the said Hall was examined here, that he had been asked more, he could have said more.

Witness sworn on the Behalf of the Duke of Norfolk, attesting a finding Resolutions.

Mrs. Judith Sturton said, That she was Servant to the Duke of Norfolk, when the Report was of the Duke of Norfolk and Mr. Germain, which was about a Week before the Duke and Duchess went to France: She was asked by the Lord Perceval, in the Presence of the Duke of Norfolk, in the Duke's House in St. James's Square (where they then the Duke), as if he would answer it to the Face of Almighty God, if she did know whether his Daughter was an Adulteress: Her Answer was, That she hoped for God in Heaven, the Duchess was as virtuous as any Woman alive, for ought she knew. She said, that what she said is true, and if she should pretend to say more, she should wrong her. She said, That no one was present, besides the Lord Perceval and the Duke, when they examined her; and that she saw no Lord Walsingham at that Time, and that she did not remember the said Mrs. Knapp being there concerning the Duke and Mr. Germain, and the never spoke with Mrs. Knapp, and she was not at Mr. Knapp's when the Duke was at Park-Street. She said, there was a Report, a Scandal, which she was sorry for.

Edith Sawbridge and Webb, produced on the Behalf of the Duke of Norfolk, to disprove the Testimony of Mrs. Sturton.

Edith Sawbridge said, That the Testimony following this unhappy Dispute concerning the Duke of Norfolk, Mrs. Sturton came into her Chamber, and she telling her what had happened at Mr. Knapp's, Mrs. Sturton replied, that it is nothing but what she expected before. The Witness replied, That if she, the Witness, had been as near the Duke of Norfolk as the said Mrs. Sturton, she would have prevented all this. To which Mrs. Sturton answered, Would you have had me when I was at Mr. Knapp's? The Dispute we had was, that Mr. Knapp told her, when I came from London on Friday Night, that the Duke of Norfolk was come, for the expected her Thence to be cut every Night before my Lord Duke went to Park-Street; I asked her the Reason of her Fear, she answered, Germain had laid with my Lady Duchess, and since my Lord Duke went to Park-Street, that when he came home he would hear of it, and he would kill her for a Slave, and if she should tell my Lord, Germain would cut her Throat. I bid her have a Care what she said, for she was dangerous Words: How can you prove this? She said, it was very true. The Witness asked her (Mrs. Knapp) how she knew that I was at Mr. Knapp's, instead of going home, went into the Closet. The Witness came, said, that she had all this to Mrs. Sturton, but she pressed Part of the day. Mrs. Sturton said, this was nothing but what she expected before. This was the Testimony when my Lord Duke came from Park-Street, this was about Bartholomew's Eve, in the first Year of King James's Reign.

Mrs. Sturton asked in, to confront this Edith Sawbridge, and examined.

Mrs. Judith Sturton further said, That she saw Mrs. Sawbridge once in the Duke's House in St. James's Square, and they talked of the Sister of Germain and the Duke of Norfolk: She said, she, the Witness, never heard Mrs. Sawbridge say, that Mrs. Knapp should say, that Germain had with the Duke every Night at Mr. Knapp's: She said, that she said to Mrs. Sturton, that she expected to hear that before now, the never said to Mrs. Sturton, Would you have had me when I was at Mr. Knapp's? She said, she remembered that Mrs. Sawbridge told her, that Mrs. Knapp said, that she was afraid that her Throat would have been cut when the Duke was at Park-Street. She remembers not that she asked Mrs. Sawbridge the Reason of Mrs. Knapp's Fear, or that she told her any thing of Mrs. Knapp's saying, that Mr. Germain had laid with my Lady every Night at Mr. Knapp's: She saw Mrs. Sawbridge, and disapproved with her; but she cannot say what Dispute she had with her.

Mrs. Elizabeth Cornish said, That she went with the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk into France, they went together very lovingly, and parted to: She thinks the Duke laid with her about a Fortnight; the Duke's Eye was ill, and my Lady was often to him; and when she did so, we retired: My Lady drew him by the eye, they sat and drank together every Day; they did not drink together that she knows: My Lord told her at Paris, at the Gate in the Monastery, that he would fetch her away suddenly; and they parted kindly. Mrs. Knapp was in the Monastery with the Duchess, and the Duchess continued there about fourteen Months, my Lord expected a great deal of Kindness to my Lady in going, and while he was there, there were Trains on both Sides at parting. When my Lord and Lady were together in the House called Le Hotel de Tournay, in Paris, we used to withdraw, not knowing what they had to say together.

Mr. Matthew Scott said, That he paid several Sums to the Duchess from the Duke: In May, 1688, he paid one Hundred and twenty-five Pounds for the Duchess to Mr. Grogg: He paid two or three hundred Pounds into France, when the Duke and Duchess were there: He cannot say, that he remitted any Money into France after the Duke came Home: He knows not that any Money was paid to Mrs. Mornay for my Lady by the Duke's Order.

Mr.

Mrs. Penelope Knapp, said, That John Wadsworth was her Servant a while, but was not honest, and that she had hidden some of her's and her Husband's Linen, and was going away with it.

Francis Knapp denies the Knowledge of Wadsworth, or any Dispute with her. She never saw her at Mr. Germain's, nor ever carried any Letters thence.

But here are two Witnesses brought in now to arraign the Credit of John Hall, which is as much as to say, that they had no Exception to any of the rest, or which is all one, to the Truth of the Matter; for John Hall's Evidence is by them confirmed over and over. And what is it that these two Witnesses have to say at last? Henry Dingley says, That he believed it was the Duke of Norfolk he saw in Mr. Germain's, but could not affirm it. And John Hyatt says, That they told it was the Duke of Norfolk, but he could not speak it of his own Knowledge; which amounts to no more than a bare He-say.

* Objections was also Dr. James of Mr. Judith Sturton, Edith Sawbridge, Elizabeth Cornish, Mr. Matthew Scott, and Mr. Robert Welborne.

THE Reader will find this Dispute about Mr. Germain and the Duchess, to be a Scandal of a Master of six Years standing, Had she, a well known, has been to the Short and Walford, and that he immediately told my Lord of it. Now Barstow swears likewise (with another full Oath between her Teeth), that this Short and Walford were sent by the Duke to the Lord Perceval. It follows now to be seen, what Course has been taken from the first to the last, for a thorough discovering of the Truth of this Matter, and how it comes to pass, that the Thunderbolt should hang in the Air so many Years after the breaking of the Cloud.

Mrs. Sturton is here upon her double Oath, first under the Shrift of the Duke and my Lord Perceval, who took her presently, and assured her, as ever she hoped to see God in Heaven, to declare what she knew as to the Duchess being an Adulteress: she pressed herself upon her Oath of Salvation, that the Duchess was as virtuous as any Woman alive for ought she knew: she swore the same thing over again at the Bar of the House of Lords; and being interrogated about the Short and Walford before spoken of, she swore likewise, that she saw no Short or Walford at that Time.

Edith Sawbridge was now produced against the Credit of Mrs. Judith Sturton, and lays the Stress of her Evidence upon what Mrs. Knapp said, which has been the very Fifth of the Question throughout the whole Cause, and the Prosecution has till been at it as Fast: when it came to any material Point, that is to say, only the Hear-ings, Witnesses are produced, and those that can speak upon Knowledge, and piously to the Faith, are withdrawn, or concealed, contrary to the Practice and Reason of all judicial Proceedings.

Mrs. Sturton is called to again to confront Edith Sawbridge, and denies every Article in her Deposition, one by one, that is of any Moment; but at the same time there appears no Exception on the other Hand, to the Credit of Mrs. Sturton. Neither is it to be imagined, that any Woman

Mr. Robert Williams ſaid, That about the Middle of November laſt, the Duke of Norfolk ſent for him by Mr. Scott, to meet his Grace in his Room, by the Lords Houſe, which accordingly he did: His Grace told him, there had been ſome Meſſages and Propoſals by Sir Robert Clayton and Sir Robert Hedges, but he looked on them both as Men of great Buſineſs, and could not attend on ſuch Matters, and therefore he ſent for him, knowing how he was willing to do any Service between them. The firſt thing his Grace deſired, was to acquaint his Wife, and the Lady Peterborough, and he thinks he named the Lord Peterborough, that he expected to be informed from the Dutcheſſes Equage; for, ſays he, I hear ſhe is ſetting up for a great Equage, and I deſire to be free from being obliged to pay for any of that: He told his Grace, that he thought he was miſ-informed, for all the Equage he ſaw, was a Coach, Coachman, two Footmen, a Pair of Horſes, and two or three more Servants. But, ſays his Grace, I formerly paid Money for her to ſue Abſolvit, and ſhould be unwilling to do it again. I preſume, my Lord Duke, ſhe has by this a Debt contracted while ſhe was his Grace's and the Dutcheſſes lived together. But, ſays his Grace, pray do you acquaint them of it, for this is what I expect.

Next, ſays his Grace, my Wife has ſome Pretensions upon Coffin-Rings, which I could ſell without her Conſent, by loſing Two thouſand, or Two thouſand five hundred Pounds: And beſides, I find the hath ſince a Pretention upon ſilvery, which I never knew till very lately, when I was upon ſelling that Reversion; but I ſhould have been an ill Man to pretend to the ſaid, if I had known of any ſuch Inſtrument; therefore, I would have you tell my Wife, that if ſhe will conſent to the Sale of ſuch Eſtates, and make me only in that Particular, let her conſider wherein I may make her ſelf, and I ſhall do it. I know ſhe was a great Lover of Diamonds, and I ſuppoſe it to ſell; and ſhe did once offer me a conſiderable Sum of Money for my Life in it: Therefore let her conſider of this Matter, and if ſhe can propoſe any thing for her Sale and Quiet, on ſuch Terms, I ſhall comply with her.

I do not ſay it to threaten her: But I am told, that for the Reaſon of there being either One-and-twenty, or Two-and-twenty Catholic Heirs of my Family, before one Proſtitution, if I would—(Here his Grace ſays) ſays His Grace, You underſtand me: Adieu as Adieu, his Grace was played to ſay again, If I would bring in a Bill of Divorce, I ſhould obtain it on that Account. He told His Grace he would be ſorry to hear of any ſuch Thing, but in Obedience to his Grace's Commands, he ſhould acquaint the Dutcheſſes with it. Accordingly he did, the ſame Day, and Lady Peterborough both. Her Grace was very angry at the Meſſage, eſpecially at that Part that mentioned a Divorce, and he was ſent the next Morning to Mr. Scott, to deliver him to acquaint the Duke, that as he was my Lord Peterborough's Servant, it was not fit for him to receive nor bring ſuch Meſſages: But if his Grace had any thing to ſay, it was moſt proper by a Servant of his own, or to ſend for one of his's. I carried the Meſſage the next Morning to Mr. Scott, and at my Return Home, the Dutcheſſes ſhewed me a Letter the Duke had writ to the Duke to the ſame Purpoſe, and which was ſent to his Grace, but not by him: The Dutcheſſes did declare, when he propoſed the Sale of Coffin-Rings and Bellay, as this Duke had deſired, that he would never content to it. By any of this Diſcourſe it did not appear to him, that the Duke ſhewed any Inclinations to live with the Dutcheſſes, nor did he underſtand it fo.

The Evidence being ended,

After a long Debate thereon, the Queſtion was put:

Whether the Bill, intitled, An Act to diſſolve the Marriage of Henry Duke of Norfolk, Earl Marſhall of England, with the Lady Mary Anne, and to enable the ſaid Duke to marry again, ſhall be read a ſecond Time?

It was referred in the Negative.

Mark Juſtice, Cler' Parliamentor's.

Woman ſhould dare to ſwear falſe, in a Caſe where two ſuch Witneſſes ſhould be privy to the Perjury.

It follows now to be ſeen, what Courſe has been taken for a thorough Diſcovery of this Intrigue, according to the uſual Methods of Honour and Juſtice. The Examination of Mrs. Sturton by the Duke and my Lord Peterborough, was as follows, firſt and private as the Caſe required; and it was while the Chamber was ſtill too: So that there was no Time loſt when they enter'd upon the Scrutiny. It will be ſeen in that which follows, by what Degrees the Heat of this Calumny cooled, and what brought it to an end.

The Duke and Dutcheſſes went for Fraser together, about a Week after the breaking out of this Calumny, and Elizabeth ſtood waited upon the Dutcheſſes, who ſwore, that they went lovingly together, and parted with tears on both ſides; my Lord telling her Grace at parting, that he would fetch her away ſuddenly. They eat and drank together every Day, and were frequently together in private; but he cannot ſay they lodg'd together. So that that far, in all outward Appearance, the Miſunderſtanding ſeem'd, in ſome Meaſure, to be compoſed.

Mr. Scott ſpeaks only to the Matter of Means and Accompt, which is little or nothing to the Purpoſe in this Caſe, except only as to the One Hundred Twenty-and-Five Pounds: mentioned to be paid by him for the Dutcheſſes's Uſe; which was a Quarterly Payment out of Five Hundred Pounds per Anno, adjudg'd, and order'd by the High-Commiſſion Court to be paid to her, in lieu of Alimony.

But Mr. Robert Williams comes to the very Merits of the Caſe, and the preſent State of the Queſtion. He depoſes, that in November laſt the Duke ſent for him, and told him (among other Things by the bye), that the Dutcheſſes had ſome Pretensions upon Coffin-Rings, and alſo upon ſilvery; and thereupon order'd the Witneſſes to give her Grace to underſtand, that if ſhe would conſent to the Sale of ſuch Eſtates, and make the Duke only in that Particular, let her beſt conſider wherein he himſelf might make the Dutcheſſes eaſy too, and upon ſuch Terms he would do it.

His Grace told the Witneſſes further, That there being One or Two-and-Twenty Catholic Heirs to the Family, before one Proſtitution he ſays, if (ſays his Grace) I would bring a Bill of Divorce, (I do not ſay it to threaten her) I could obtain it that Account. The Witneſſes acquainted both the Dutcheſſes and the Lady Peterborough, the very ſame Day, with the Subſtance of this Meſſage, her Grace taking it very kindly to be told of a Divorce, and the next Day the Dutcheſſes ſhew'd the Witneſſes a Letter the wrote to the Duke upon this Occaſion, declaring, that for Coffin-Rings and ſilvery he would never part with them.

It appears from hence, That upon the Examination of Mrs. Sturton, and other neceſſary Enquiries into the Grounds of this Scandal, the Violence of the firſt Impreſſion was far taken off, that according to the Evidence of Elizabeth Conſell, my Lord was pleas'd to treat the Dutcheſſes with all Inſtances of Tendereſs and Reſpect, both upon their Fallage into Fraser, and upon the Piece there, theſe of the Red only excepted. In this ſame Matter he continued four five or fix Years now, without any Speech, or thought of a Divorce, that ever the Dutcheſſes heard of, till the Middle of November laſt, in a Meſſage by Mr. Williams from the Duke, and that was but upon a certain Condition ſenther: however it was improv'd afterwards into a Bill, that upon the ſeventh of January following was formally brought into the Lords Houſe.

The Reader will need no other Light to a true Underſtanding of the Strait her Grace was in upon this Subject, and the Diſadvantages ſhe was expoſed to, than what he has here ſet before him, in the Order of the Journal itſelf: Where he will find the Dutcheſſes ſeem'd for Time to produce Witneſſes, and prepare her Defence, that it was a wonderful Providence the ſhould do as much as ſhe did; though in the mean while, her Grace had loſt the Benefit of ſeveral conſiderable Witneſſes, for want of Time to find them out, and bring them together. Now as for Mr. Williams's Depoſition, it carries the Conſequence rather of a Treaty than an Accuſation; the Duke's Part is only a calm, deliberate Diſcourſe, conſidering the reciprocal Eaſe both of himſelf and of the Dutcheſſes. Terms are propoſed and granted, and one Word or Glaſs of Reſpect from one End to the other of it. Mr. Williams, (upon the Duke's ſaying him, to the Lords Bar, if by his Diſcourſe he underſtood an Inclination to live with the Dutcheſſes) ſays no, did not gather from his Words, as if he had any Thought of living with her; the only bad Thing ſaid, was that about his Catholic Heirs, which ſeem'd to turn the Caſe of Adultery into a Caſe of Religion. Let any Creature judge now, whether the Dutcheſſes durſt to have ſaid it out ſtrict, if he had ſaid any of ſo bad a Crime, when he might have been ſafe and free, as appears by the Propoſal, upon Terms ſo much more eaſy.

To make a ſhort Summary now of the Whole, a Word firſt to the Character and Quality of the Witneſſes.

There is Oliver, a Street-Porter, brought in as a Witneſs to the Privacies of the Dutcheſſes's Bed-Chamber, beſides ſeveral unſufferable Exceptions to the Particulars of his Evidence. There is Edward, a Cobler's Wife, and a ſilencing little Slut, that's palpably deſtitute of Faſtity as the other. Hedley, a poor trucking Footman, that was turn'd off for his ill Behaviour. Jewell, a beggarly Wench, that cheated her Landlady, and ſet herſelf in this Caſe at the Lords Bar. Perſley, a Painter, and by Intervals a Madman. Fyler, a Coachman that was turn'd off by his Maſter, and ſwore to be revenged of him. Lipſy, under ſeveral manifold Miſtakes, but nothing to the main Caſe. Gerke, Andoſey, Hemmy, Reynolds, and Margaret Fyler, ſay not one Word to the Purpoſe. Wadſworth, a pilfering Servant, that rob'd her Miſtreſs, and her Evidence moſt notoriously evil.

Now, as theſe Witneſſes are of very little Value upon the ſtock of their own Credit, to the Witneſſes againſt them cannot be deny'd to have a fair Reputation, on the other hand. And it is very extraordinary, that after the naming of ſo many Perſons in their Depoſitions, that laid, or did, or heard, or ſaw this, that the Proſecutors have not brought in ſo much as one Creature to ſecond the ſwearing Evidence; though it is ſufficiently known, they could have found them, if they would have ventur'd the Caſe upon that Streſs. It is to be conſider'd once more, what a Difference there has been betwixt the Demourſeur of the one Side and the other, towards the Evidence. What Promiſes, Flatteries, and engaging Obligations on the one Hand, and not ſo much as one Word or Deed, directly or indirectly, that look'd like a Practice or a Prepoſſeſſion on the other ſide of the Dutcheſſes.

Let this be taken in the ſecond Place; for it is a great Miſfortune, when offeſious Inſtruments, that are ſoreworn'd to broach Scandals, meet with eaſy and good-natur'd Diſpoſitions, that are too open perhaps to receive them. This may ſerve in ſome Meaſure, perhaps, to remove the Evidence of thoſe that are not wilfully deaf and blind; and for the reſt, it is left to Time and Providence to bring the Truth to light in its due Season, and to vindicate the Cauſe of the Innocent and Oppreſſed.

XLIV. The Trial between HENRY Duke of Norfolk, Plaintiff, and JOHN GERMAIN, Defendant, in an Action of Trespass on the Case, at the Court of King's Bench, at Westminster, November 24, 1692. 4 W. & M.*

THIS Declaration was a Trinity Term, the Fourth of William and Mary, Knew and Queen. To which the Defendants pleaded Not Guilty, and in Six Years. And it is replied, That it is within Six Years, whereas Time was joined, and a Jury of Twenty-Four Knights and Esquires being returned, Twelve did appear at the Bar, and were sworn, viz.

Sir The Judge. This you say was seven Years ago? Who did you tell of it?—Real. Ours. To the House-keeper.

Sir T. P. Præs. Who was he?—Real. Ours. One Mrs. Webb.

Sir T. P. Præs. Did you tell no body else?

Real. Ours. No, indeed, I said not one.

Mr. Ger. We will call another Witness.

Mr. Ger. Edmund. Do you know the Dutchess of Norfolk?

Mr. Ger. Edmund. Yes, my Lord.

Mr. Ger. Do you know John Germain?

Mr. Ger. Edmund. Yes, my Lord, about seven Years since; but I do not know whether I know him now.

Mr. Ger. Pray tell my Lord and the Jury what you know.

Mr. Ger. Edmund. It was my Business, being House-keeper, to look after my master's Affairs, and I being call'd down, I saw my Lady and Germain; and saw my Lady in an Pallace upon the Stairs, and my Lady said to Germain, Kid her.

Mr. Ger. Edmund. Tell how you saw her.

Mr. Ger. Edmund. Why, when I saw her, I saw her bare Knees, and Germain was next to her, and then I came away, she being angry, and so he came from her.

Ques. Was his Breches down?

Mr. Ger. Edmund. His Breches was down, and his Hat and Sword lay upon the Table.

Mr. Ger. What? Were was the Dutchess at?

Mr. Ger. Edmund. I saw her bare Knees, and he—

Mr. Ger. Was the lying down?

Mr. Ger. Edmund. Yes, and the Dutchess after I did see Mr. Germain come in, and he had his Hat on the Table, and unbutton'd himself, and went to Bed to her.

Mr. Ger. How do you know that?

Mr. Ger. Edmund. I open'd the Drawing-Room Door, and look'd through the Key-hole of the other Door where they was, and saw them go to Bed.

Mr. Ger. How do you know he was in Bed with her?

Mr. Ger. Edmund. Why I saw them, and there was a Wax Candle in the Chamber, and I could see them easily.

Mr. Ger. What Time was this you say you saw them in Bed? Had they any Children?

Mr. Ger. Edmund. Yes, my Lord, they had; tho' they were drawn on both sides the Bed, they left them open at the Foot.

Ques. Did you ever pretend this before?

Mr. Ger. Edmund. Yes, I did.

Ques. Did you ever swear this before?

Mr. Ger. Edmund. Yes, my Lord, in the Parliament I did.

Sir The Præs. You have liv'd in several Places since; did you never tell any body's Secret?

Mr. Ger. Edmund. To nobody but Mrs. Webb: And my Lady gave Orders not to mention it, that I should be put away; but I heard no more of it; but I had.

Mr. Ger. Do you know any thing else?

Mr. Ger. Edmund. I was making my Lady's Bed, with one Ann Burton, and I found Mr. Germain's Handkerchief and Ruffles in the Bed, at one Time.

Mr. Ger. Do you remember any Shirt and Waistcoat that was found?

Mr. Ger. Edmund. Yes.

Mr. Ger. Did you find his Handkerchief and Ruffles in my Lady's Bed?

Mr. Ger. Edmund. Yes.

Mr. Ger. Did you never let him come down Stairs?

Mr. Ger. Edmund. No, my Lord.

Mr. Ger. It is very much you never saw him come down Stairs.

Mr. Ger. Edmund. We set Traps for him to fall over; but he never came down to fall over them.

Sir The Præs. Do you know of any thing, but in the first Year of King James?—Mr. Ger. Edmund. No, my Lord, not I.

Mr. Ger. We will call another Witness, Mrs. Boykin. I think, Mrs. Boykin, you are married?—Mrs. Boykin. Yes.

Mr. Ger. What is your Christian Name?—Mrs. Boykin. Anne.

Mr. Ger. Pray tell my Lord and the Jury what you know.

Mrs. Boykin. I was House-maid and Servant to the Dutchess, in the last Year of King James's Reign: About Berlinburgh, my Lady Dutchess went to London with Germain, Nell Gwyn, and some others, and we did not expect them to come home that Night, but she did, and after they went to Supper, after that they went to Chaise; and then my Lady Dutchess had a great Mind to go to Bed, and bid us to make her a Fire, and so we did; and my Lady went to Bed, and said, 'Till the King and Queen should find for me, I would not stir till Eleven o'Clock to-morrow Morning. So the Candles were put out, and two Footmen stood to wait, because Mr. Germain said to be generous to the Servant; and they waited 'till Two o'Clock in the Morning, I ask'd them whether Mr. Germain had come down? and they said, No; for they had been there all the while; and if he came, he could not go, for they said, We have laid Chains and Smells in the Way, that if he came, he might fall over them; and the next Morning I saw a Man with a Paper-box in his Hand, and he ask'd me for Mr. Germain's Chamber, or Lodgings. I told him, I knew none he had there. My Lord, the next Day, my Lady Dutchess ordered me to make her a Fire, and Mrs. Kilgus was coming her Head, and old Gwyn came in, and said, Good Morrow to your Grace, how did you rest last Night? she said, very well. Then Col. Cornwall came in, and said to my Lady Dutchess, How doth Mr. Germain do? And she said, Why do you ask me? And Col. Cornwall said, He did not sit at Home last Night. I then told Gwyn said, We shall be five come out by-and-bye like a dreadful Music. And so I

* Two Years in Order of Time, Recalled the Germain the foregoing; but it seems, that Mr. Germain, it was thought proper to state before.

Went to make my Lady Dutchess's Bed, and found a Handkerchief and Rubbers. And Mrs. Knorr. — Yes, Com. how? Tell them you a-bath, and when I came, we lay a Sheet — Waitcoat, and I took them away, because it was a Place where any Body, as they came, might be there. And my Lord Duke was not in Town.

Mr. Gosselin. How came you to take Notice of the Rubbers and Handkerchief?

Ans. Knorr. Why, Mrs. Knorr said it was a Man's Rubbers.

Sir Th. Knorr. How long was this once? — In Eighty-five? Had there not been an Appeal? — Ans. Knorr. Yes, there was.

Sir Th. Knorr. Was there any Thing remarkable in the Bed?

Ans. Knorr. The Bed was stained.

Sir Th. Knorr. What is your Name now, Knorr? — Ans. Knorr. Yes. Sir Th. Knorr. What was your other Name? — Ans. Knorr. Knorr.

Sir Th. Knorr. Was you ever married?

Ans. Knorr. Sir, you know I could have so other Name if I were not married.

Sir Th. Knorr. You have lived in several Places.

Ans. Knorr. I have lived with my Lord of Clive, and my Lord Ferris.

Sir Th. Knorr. Did Garraway go by any other Name than he goes by now? — Ans. Knorr. Not as I know of.

Sir Th. Knorr. My Lord, we will call another Witness. Thomas Haydon, Do you know the Dutchess of Norfolk and Mr. Gosselin?

Ans. Haydon. Yes.

Mr. Gosselin. Pray what did you observe between the Dutchess of Norfolk and Gosselin?

Ans. Haydon. Sir I was a Servant to Mr. Sargent, that was the Dutchess's Steward, and when going away upon other Business, I walked Butcher at Windsor, and there came two Captains to play at Cards, one Captain asked if Mr. Gosselin was there? I told him, No. Now his Man, as I heard after, had brought Gosselin a Sheet and Waitcoat; but, as soon as his Man was gone, we found the Waitcoat and foul Shirt: And the same Day the Dutchess treated the Queen at Windsor.

L. C. J. When was this? — Ans. Haydon. It was in the Year 1685.

Sir Th. Knorr. Was this in the Year 1685?

Ans. Haydon. Yes, it was, for I took it down in my Book.

Mr. Knorr. Did you fence all this before the House of Lords?

Ans. Haydon. Yes, but only the Day of the Month I could not well remember that I had it refreshed my Memory here.

Sir Th. Knorr. We will call Mr. Haydon and Elizabeth Knorr. Mrs. Knorr. Do you know the Dutchess of Norfolk, or Mr. Gosselin?

Ans. Haydon. I knew nothing of them, but that they lay at my House.

Ans. Gosselin. Did you ever see Mr. Gosselin in at your House?

Ans. Haydon. Yes.

Ans. Gosselin. When?

Ans. Haydon. The first Year of King James's Reign.

Ans. Gosselin. How long? — Ans. Haydon. A whole Summer.

Ans. Gosselin. We will call another Witness. Elizabeth Knorr, Did you ever live with Mrs. Haydon? — Elizabeth Knorr. Yes.

Ans. Gosselin. How long? — Elizabeth Knorr. A whole Summer.

Ans. Gosselin. Did you ever see the Dutchess of Norfolk?

Ans. Knorr. Never.

Ans. Gosselin. Did you ever see the Dutchess of Norfolk and Mr. Gosselin together?

Ans. Knorr. No, but Mr. Gosselin's Servant said it was the Dutchess of Norfolk that was with Mr. Gosselin; and as he and I were making the Bed, I found a Handkerchief, marked with an M, and a Corset.

Ans. Gosselin. In whose Bed was this?

Ans. Knorr. Why, it was in Mr. Gosselin's Bed.

L. C. J. How long since?

Ans. Knorr. In the first Year of King James's Reign.

L. C. J. Wherein did you find the Handkerchief?

Ans. Knorr. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. What Mark had it? — Ans. Knorr. An M and Corset.

Sir Th. Knorr. You see how far we are gone.

L. C. J. All without the Statute.

Sir Th. Knorr. We shall then your Lordship, and the Gentlemen of the Jury, that my Lady Dutchess went by the name of my Lady Bateson, and Mr. Gosselin went by the Name of her Brother; and that he did take a House at Faux-hall, over the Water, the Man's Name was Somers, and he lived in that Place for three Quarters of a Year and more; and that he and Mr. Gosselin came constantly to her; and it was known to be the Dutchess of Norfolk, though he went by another Name, and her Servant, Henry Roper, also; that his Name was his, that the said Witness gave him a Key to her Chamber at Faux-hall.

[Henry Roper did not appear.]

Ans. Gosselin. Pray do you know one Mr. Gosselin?

Ans. Gosselin. Yes, Sir.

Ans. Gosselin. Pray, did he come to take any House of you?

Ans. Gosselin. Yes, Sir.

Ans. Gosselin. How long since? — Peter Striker. About two Years since.

Ans. Gosselin. Who did he take it for?

Ans. Striker. He told me for a Couple of Ladies that came from Holland, as he told me.

Ans. Gosselin. By what Name went they?

Ans. Striker. One by the Name of Mrs. Bryan, another's Name was Madam Bateson.

Ans. Gosselin. Did you know any Gentleman, called Mr. Gosselin, that lived near the G. R. Hall?

Ans. Striker. Indeed, Sir, I know not where he lived: I have seen one walk in the Garden, that went by the Name of the Lady Bateson's Brother.

L. C. J. Where in your House? — Peter Striker. At Faux-hall.

L. C. J. Who paid you the Rent?

Ans. Striker. One Half-Year, my Lord, was paid by my Lady Bateson.

L. C. J. What servants had he?

Ans. Striker. One that went by the Name of Gosselin.

Ans. Gosselin. We will call another Witness. Elizabeth Knorr. Do you know the Lady Bateson and Mr. Gosselin? — Ans. Elizabeth Knorr. Yes.

Ans. Gosselin. How often have you seen her? — Elizabeth Knorr. Often.

Ans. Gosselin. Who was this Lady Bateson?

Ans. Elizabeth Knorr. The Dutchess of Norfolk.

Ans. Gosselin. How do you know that?

Ans. Elizabeth Knorr. Because I have seen her coming out of the House of Lords; and they did it was the Dutchess of Norfolk.

Ans. Gosselin. Are you sure of that? — Ans. Elizabeth Knorr. Yes, Sir.

Ans. Gosselin. Did you know one Gosselin? — Ans. Elizabeth Knorr. Yes, Sir.

Ans. Gosselin. What he is?

Ans. Elizabeth Knorr. I know not, but I heard after, his Name was Knorr, but when he was on the Lady Bateson, he went by the Name of Gosselin.

Att. Gen. Tobs Dagly, Pray give an Account of what you know of the Dutcheſs of Norfolk, and Mr. Germaine?
Tobs Dagly. I was at work there, and I ſaw a Gentlewoman going to and fro, up and down Stairs, and I ſaid, Who that was? And I was told it was the Dutcheſs of Norfolk—There was a brave curious Bed, and I was laying to ſome of the Houſe, that it was a very fine Bed; and asking what it might be worth, they ſaid it coſt Seven Hundred Pounds: And I was then juſt married; ſaid I (I have a mind to bring my Wife hither, and give her a Plurſt upon it), and we laid all our heads together as if we were ſetting the Nation; and then they ſaid, that Bed was for the Dutcheſs of Norfolk; and I ſaw a Perſon there, who they ſaid was the Dutcheſs of Norfolk.

Serj. Birch. Reverend Ours, do you know Mr. Germaine at the Cock-Pit?
Rich. Ours. Yes.

Att. Gen. What Company have you ſeen with him?
Rich. Ours. Why, I ſaw a Lady in a Maſk may ſay a hundred times in a Maſk, looking about: Another time, I ſaw my Lord Duke of Norfolk walking among the Trees in the Park, and this Lady looking out of the Window towards him, in Mr. Germaine's Houſe: This I have ſeen, I ſpeak what I know.

Att. Gen. Jane Wadſworth, come, tell my Lord and the Jury what you know, ſpeak not: Do you know Mr. Germaine?—Wadſworth. Yes.
Att. Gen. Where liſteth he?

Wadſworth. In Park-Street, near the Royal Cook-Pit.
Att. Gen. Have you ever ſeen the Dutcheſs of Norfolk at Germaine's Houſe?—Wadſworth. Yes.

Att. Gen. Upon what Occaſion?
Wadſworth. Living next Door, going in for a Pint Pot, with the Dutcheſs that belonged to the Houſe, and asking her for it, ſhe ſaid, There's never a Pint Pot here; it was above Stairs, and bid me go up and fetch it, and I did; and I ſaw the Dutcheſs at Norfolk there, ſhe had a Night-Gown on, and Flantern-Lace, but in Night-Linens.

Att. Gen. Was ſhe undreſſed?—Wadſworth. Undreſſed, as one may think; ſhe might have a Petticoat on.

L. C. J. What Occaſion had you to go there?
Wadſworth. For a Pint Pot, my Lord, and going up, I ſaw the Dutcheſs of Norfolk going from one Room to another: And, my Lord, another time, I ſaw the Dutcheſs of Norfolk and Mr. Germaine in a Coach together.

Att. Gen. When was that?
Wadſworth. It was in March laſt; and when I ſaw the Coachman, I ſaid him who it was that he ſat down out of the Coach; and he ſaid, an honored Gentleman, that gave him Two Shillings for the carrying him from the Norfolk-Forty.

Att. Gen. Have you ever ſeen Mr. Germaine at the Dutcheſs's Houſe?
Wadſworth. I did diſguiſe myſelf, and followed him to ſee where he would go; and I did ſee him go into the Dutcheſs's Houſe at St. John's.

Att. Gen. When was that?—Wadſworth. In May laſt.
L. C. J. What Time of the Day?

Wadſworth. My Lord, at nine of the Clock at Night.
Sir Tho. Parnell. When you ſay you went for the Pint Pot, did you ever ſay any Thing to any Body of it, that you had ſeen the Dutcheſs of Norfolk?—Wadſworth. Yes, to one Man, that I had ſeen the Dutcheſs of Norfolk. Now, ſaid he, if my Maſter had ſeen you to go up Stairs, he would have killed the Dutcheſsman.

L. C. J. Do you know my Lady Dutcheſs well?
Wadſworth. Yes, my Lord, I know her well; ſhe had Flantern Horſes ſtood in my Stable, when I kept the Beer-ho, and ſhe came often to ſee them; I know her very well.

Serj. Birch. Reverend Ours, do you know Mr. Germaine's Houſe?
Ans. Road. Yes.

Serj. Birch. Where is it?—Ans. Road. By the Cock-Pit.

Serj. Birch. Do you know him?—Ans. Road. Yes.

Serj. Birch. What Company have you ſeen go there?

Ans. Road. In April laſt I ſaw a Chair go by, and ſome Perſons ſaid, That was the Dutcheſs of Norfolk, and ſo I went and ſaw her in the Chair twice.

Serj. Birch. Did you ſee her with her Maſk off?
Ans. Road. I ſaw her with her Maſk off, and ſaw her ſet down at Mr. Germaine's Houſe, and go in a Coach, the Door being immediately opened for her.

L. C. J. Did you know the Dutcheſs before?
Ans. Road. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. Did you ſee her before this Time?—Ans. Road. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. What time of the Day was that?
Ans. Road. Between Two and Three of the Clock.

Att. Gen. You ſay you ſaw her with her Maſk off, and ſet down at Germaine's Houſe, and the Door was immediately opened?

Ans. Road. Yes, my Lord.

Att. Gen. Now we will call another Witneſs, one Thomas Fyler. Do you know the Dutcheſs of Norfolk?—Thomas Fyler. Yes.

Att. Gen. How did you come to know her?

The Fyler. I loved her once in a Coach with Mr. Germaine.

Att. Gen. How long ſince?—The Fyler. About this Time ſome Years.

Att. Gen. Where did you ſit to carry them?

The Fyler. Sometimes into London & Street, ſometimes to one Place, and ſometimes to another; and I looked back, and ſaw them with their Heads laid together.

Att. Gen. Are you ſure it was the Dutcheſs of Norfolk?

The Fyler. Yes, Sir, I knew her before ſhe was married, and I knew her after.

Sir Thomas Parnell. Did you ſee them with their Heads together?

The Fyler. Yes.

Sir Tho. Parnell. When you was on the Coach-box, you ſay you ſaw them?—The Fyler. Yes.

L. C. J. Did you look back to ſee them?

The Fyler. Yes, my Lord, and their Heads were laid together.

Serj. Tremaine. Where do you live now?

The Fyler. With the Duke of Norfolk.

Att. Gen. We will call another Witneſs. Mr. Broad, Pray do you know Mr. Germaine?—Mr. Broad. Yes.

Att. Gen. Do you know the Dutcheſs of Norfolk?—Mr. Broad. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. Have you ſeen her?

Mr. Broad. Yes; I ſaw her come out of Mr. Germaine's Houſe, in a Chair, into St. John's Park.

Att. Gen. Was it the Dutcheſs of Norfolk?—Mr. Broad. Yes.

Att. Gen. Did you know her before?—Mr. Broad. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. Had you full Sight of her?—Mr. Broad. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. What appears was ſhe in?

Mr. Broad. In Man's Apparel, a Blue Coat and Petticoat.

L. C. J. How long have you known the Dutcheſs of Norfolk?

Mr. Broad. Theſe eight or ten Years.

Serj. Tremaine. Do you believe it was the Dutcheſs of Norfolk?

Mr. Broad. I do verily believe it.

Serj. Tremaine. Do you take it upon your Oath?

Mr. Broad. I do verily believe it: The Dutcheſs being; in a Chair, the Maſk came running out of Mr. Germaine's Houſe after her with a Hand-buſket.

Att. Gen. When was this?—Mr. Broad. In April laſt.

L. C. J. Are you ſure it was the Dutcheſs's Hand?

Mr. Broad. She gave in Evidence as ſo in the Houſe of Lords.

Att. Gen. What is her Name?

Mr. Broad. Frances Knight, and ſhe had a Hand-buſket in her Hand.

Att. Gen. What did you ſeeſtore in the Hand-buſket in her Hand?

Mr. Broad. I ſuppoſe there was Clauſes, for I ſaw the Tip of a Coat, or Gown, hang out.

Att. Gen. My Lord, we have brought this down to ſer—

L. C. J. Way, all it is within the Statute, I muſt direct the Jury.

Att. Gen. We have told you when it began. However, we will call another Witneſs.

Serj. Tremaine. Mary Hall, do you know Mr. Germaine?

Mary Hall. Yes, Sir.

Serj. Tremaine. Do you know where he lives?

Mary Hall. Yes, at the Royal Cook-Pit, in Park-Street.

Serj. Tremaine. Did you ever ſee the Dutcheſs of Norfolk in your Lifetime?

Mary Hall. I cannot tell whether I did or not, for I do not know her, ſhe cannot tell when I do for her.

Sir W. Williams. They have called about nineteen Witneſſes; for the fifth five we paſs over them, ſee they did not ſpeak one Word of any Thing ſince 16: And for the other, they have not proved any one Act in the Time of the Declaration between Mr. Germaine and the Dutcheſs of Norfolk: They have not proved any Thing that hath any Tendency to it: They have not given any Manner of Evidence. If there be any Thing that hath any Tendency, it is that which Tobs Wadſworth ſaid: And what is it that ſhe ſaid? Why, ſhe ſaw a Woman that ſaid ſhe had let a Pint Pot to go to Mr. Germaine's Houſe, ſhe went for it, and the Dutcheſsman that lived there, directed her to go up the Stairs for the Pint Pot. She ſometimes, that ſaw the Dutcheſs of Norfolk, and ſhe had a Petticoat on, and then it is the Evidence that the law gives. Sir, do not pretend that Mr. Germaine was in the Houſe, or in Company with the Dutcheſs; and the appearance to be a Stranger in the Houſe, and yet the ſaid run up Stairs. As for her Reputation, ſhe is one of the vileſt of Women. She would ſay ſomething in March or May laſt, but there is no Act proved by her; and ſhe is a ſole and incredible Witneſs, we ſhall call Witneſſes to ſwear it.

Sir Tho. Parnell. My Lord, for this Woman Wadſworth, we will not only call the Perſon ſhe ſpoke to of this, that will contradict her, and ſo what ſhe ſaid, ſay, but go to her Credit and Reputation. So that now, my Lord, I ſuppoſe, upon the whole Matter, we cannot do any Duke of Norfolk more Honour, than to acquit the Defendant; for it will be moſt Honour to the Duke of Norfolk to have the Defendant acquitted, than Satisfaction to him by giving him any Damages whatever.

Sir W. Williams. We will now call our Witneſs, Grace Cook. Do you know Jane Wadſworth?—Grace Cook. Yes, Sir.

Sir W. Williams. Tell my Lord, and the Jury, what Diſcourſe you and Jane Wadſworth have had together.

Grace. I will. She and I had ſome Talk together; and ſhe then ſaid, I could do them no Good, for I was miſtaken.

Sir W. Williams. When did ſhe tell you this? During the Sitting of the Parliament?

Grace. Yes: She came in and ſaid, I can do them no Good; for, ſaid ſhe, I did go into Mr. Germaine's Houſe, and thought I had ſeen the Dutcheſs of Norfolk, but now I ſee I am miſtaken.

Sir W. Williams. You are a new Neighbour to her?—Grace. Yes, Sir.

Sir W. Williams. What is her Reputation?

Grace. I cannot ſay any Thing to her Reputation.

Sir W. Williams. Who was by?

Grace. There was another Woman.

Jane Wadſworth. I had a Sakeſman, and ſo I was going to Mr. Germaine's Houſe, there was one of his Servants, and I had like to have been knocked down: And there was one Edith; What, ſaid he, you are to go to be Witneſs? What, you will ſwear that the Dutcheſs lay with Mr. Germaine? And another ſaid, I delivered to be at Bridewell.

L. C. J. Who was it that told you that you delivered to be at Bridewell?

Jane Wadſworth. Edith, his Footman. My Lord, it was not a Footman ſince I was rebbed: And it is not a Footman ſince there came in Perſons, and threatened me, and ſaid what they would do to me. It is not two Months ſince, that a Perſon or two did hate me, and had like to have knocked me down; and they ran into this Woman's Houſe (Grace Cook's).

Serj. Tremaine. You are aſſerted, if theſe Perſons that had like to have knocked you down, did not run into Mrs. Cook's Houſe?

Jane Wadſworth. Yes.

XLV. *The Proceedings against the Bishop of Rochester * before the Lords of the Privy Council, 1692, & Will. & Mariz, in Relation to a Plot to Restore King James the Second.*

Written by the Bishop himself.

ON Sunday, the seventh of May, of this present Year 1692, in the Evening, as I was walking in the Orchard at Bromley, meditating on something, I designed to preach the next Day, I saw a Coach and four Black Boys at the Gate, out of which two Persons alighted. Immediately I went towards them, believing they were some of my Friends coming to give me a Visit. By that Time I was got to the Gate, they were entered into the Hall, and met me about the Middle of the Court. The Chief of them pressing me to look willy on them, I knew absolutely nothing of them, for, as my Lord, perhaps you do not know me; my name is Dyer, I am Clerk of the Council, and live in one of the King's Mansions, I am sorry I am not on this License, but I am come to dwell in upon such, and such of His Friends.

Now, said I, I suppose you have a Warrant for so doing; I pray let me see it. He showed it me. I read it, and the first Name I lighted on being the Earl of Sandwich's, I said, I believe that is my Lord's Name; I am ever Ready, and I submit. What are your Orders how to dispose of me? My Lord, said I, I must first search your Person, and I shall take the Keys with him about you. My Keys I presently gave him. He searched my Pocket, and found no Papers, but some poor Notice of a Sermon, and a Letter from Mr. B. I saw about ordinary Business.

Now, said I, My Lord, I must require to see the Rooms to which these Keys belong, and all the Places in the House where you have any Papers or Books. I straight conducted him up Stairs into my Study. This, Sir, said I, is the only Chamber where I keep all the Books and Papers I have in the House. They began to search, and with great Readiness turned over every Thing in the Room, and Closet and Preface, flaking every Book by the Case, opening every Part of a Chest of Drawers, where were many Papers, particularly some Bundles of Sermons, which I told them were my paper Tools, and that all that knew me, could vouch for me, it was not my Custom to have any Treason in them. They read several of the Treaties, and left them where they found them. But in one Corner of a Press, which was half open, they met with a great Number of Letters, tied up. Insured them they were only Matters of usual family Correspondence, and most of them were of last Year's Date. My Lord looking on some of them, found them to be so, and said, if he had Time to view them all, he might, perhaps, be Reason to leave them behind, but being expressly commanded to bring all Letters, he must carry them with him. I let him take as he pleased, so they found them all.

Then they went into my Bed-chamber, and the Cooks adjoining, doing as they had done in my Study, feeling about the Bed and Hangings, and knocking the Window in several Places, to see if there were any pins or Holes, or small Conventances.

After that, they came down Stairs, and searched the Parlour and Drawing Room in the Side of the House with the like Exactness. In all these Rooms I beheld them very carefully pressed into every Part of the Chimneys, one of them putting his Hand into every Flower-Pot, which I then perceived to be searched: But here I found he had but too much Reason to do so.

When they had done searching in all these Rooms, and in the Hall, as they were going out, and had taken up with them what Papers they thought fit, they carried me away in the Coach that brought them. By the Way, we met my Servant, Mr. Ash, coming from London. I called out to him, Have you any Letters for me? He gave me three or four, which I delivered to Mr. Dyer to open, who found nothing in them but Matters of private Conversation, or ordinary News. And to between Ten and Eleven at Night we arrived at Whitehall, and I was brought to my Lord Nottingham, whom I found alone in his Office.

My Lord, said I, I am come upon your Warrant, but certainly there must be some great Misdemeanor, or black Villainy in this Business. For I declare, as in the Presence of God, I am absolutely free from any just Accusation relating to the Government. My Lordship said to me, He himself was much surprized when he heard my Name mentioned. I intreated him I might be examined that Night, at any Whitehall could be produced against me. He said, That could not possibly be, because the Lords, who had the Management of such Affairs, were separated, and gone Home. But that I was to appear before them the next Day, and in the mean Time, all the Country should be given me, that could be expected by a Man in my Condition.

My Lord, said I, I hope, it being very late now, you will find me to be in my own House at Whitehall. He replied, You shall do so; but you must have a Guard of Soldiers, and a Messenger with you. A Guard of Soldiers, said I, My Lord, I think it not so necessary to secure one of my Position, I should be better off, that I may have two or more Messengers to keep me, though that may put me to greater Charge. My Lord, said he, I, for my own Part, would be glad if I might take your Parole, but I must do what I may answer to others, and therefore I pray be content.

At this I acquiesced, only a little. My Lord, here are three Papers brought up with me, which upon my Oath, are but of common Importance, yet, because they are sent of them private Talk among Friends, they may be some Expressions, which no Man, if it were known, could be willing to have divulged; and therefore I desire your Lordship will take Care they may not be shown to the Prejudice of any. He answered, You are to do with Men of Honour. And you shall have no Occasion to complain upon that Account.

And to my own conveyance Home as Whitehall by Mr. Dyer and Mr.

Kings, Messengers, in the Coach with me, and a Guard attending on each Side. After we came to the Damer, Mr. Dyer having diligently searched my Lodgings, and the Armour to them, left me about Midnight, with a strict Charge to the Messengers, and to bid them, not to give me any unnecessary Disturbance; but to watch carefully at my Bed-Chamber Door, till further Orders, which they did.

The next Day, being Sunday, the eighth, Mr. Dyer came again to my own House, to acquaint me, that I was to attend the Committee of the Council that Evening by Six of the Clock. And, said he, My Lord, I suppose you have heard of Mr. W. Ansell, a Man whom you keep in ret of your Books and Papers. I told him, I had. Then, said he, I have a Commission to fetch him hence, likewise, in your Chamber. I showed him my Library, and gave him the Keys. He opened all the Preface of Books, and view'd particularly as he said, and examined every Drawer in the Cabinet; but finding nothing, except of a late Date, or that might affect any the least Shadow of a treasonable Correspondence, he went away without removing one Paper at all.

At the Time appointed, I was brought by the Messengers and Guard to Whitehall, where a select Number of the Lords of the Council were assembled at my Lord Nottingham's Lodgings. There were present, viz. I remember) the Earl of Sandwich, Lord Seaward, the Earl of Dorset, Lord Chamberlain, the Earl of Newcastle, Secretary of State, the Earl of Rochester, the Earl of Portland, the Lord Sydney, Lord Lansdowne in Ireland, and Sir Edward Seymour.

When I was entered the Room, and come to the End of the Table, my Lord Nottingham began.

Earl of Nottingham. My Lord, you cannot but think it must be some extraordinary Occasion which has forced us to send for you hither in this Manner.

Bishop of Rochester. Which I submit to the Necessities of State, in such a Time of Jealousy and Danger as this is.

Earl of N. My Lord, I am not at all your form. Questions, to which we desire your plain and true Answer.

Bishop of R. My Lords, I assure you none shall be such, as, I hope, I have been always taken for a Man of Simplicity and Sincerity.

Earl of N. Have you composed a Declaration for the present intended Defense of the late King James our England?

Bishop of R. I call God to Witness, I have not.

Earl of N. Did you ever draw up any Heads, or Maxims for such a Declaration?

Bishop of R. Upon the same solemn Assurance, I never did.

Earl of N. Were you ever solicited, or applied to by any Person, for the undersketching such a Work?

Bishop of R. I never was.

Bishop of R. Do you hold any Correspondencies abroad in France?

Bishop of R. I do not hold any.

Earl of N. Have you ever signed any Association for restoring the late King James?

Bishop of R. I never signed any.

Earl of N. Do you know of any such Association? Or any Person that have fabricated one?

Bishop of R. Upon the Word of a Christian, and a Pious, I know of no such Thing; nor of any Person who has fabricated any Paper of that Nature.

Sir Edward Seymour. My Lord Bishop of Rochester, We have examined the Papers that were seized in your Closet at Bromley. We find nothing in them but Matters of ordinary and innocent Conversation among Friends, only one Letter one Surplus. What there are few or no Letters among them written since last Day last.

Bishop of R. Sir, I suppose there may be some of a Date since that Time in the Bundle. If I had perceived more, they would be a sign of the same Nature with the rest that you have, that is, some mingling common Intelligence, and the Talk of the Town, not any Matters of State, or against the Government in it. I assure, I hold no Correspondencies of that Kind. When I am in the Country, I desire some Friends or others here, to let me know how the World goes, if I may inform myself, and the neighbouring Gentlemen, of the State of the City, and procure the spreading of false News. And afterwards, I take up such Letters, according to their Dates, as you may please. I did think, that at any Time I may have a private Recourse to them to refresh my Memory at any public Transactions.

My Lords, Those are all I thought worth keeping of this Kind these two last Years: And I hope the Clerk of the Council has done me the Justice to acquiesce your Lordship, how I was apprehended, out of my House, and in my naturally I rest, and my Study, and Lodging-Chamber, and other Rooms, were visited. So that it was impossible for me to have suppressed or suppressed any one Writing from you, and really I believe there were not a Nine, out of 10 up of Paper at any Correspondence in my Possession, but they had a View of it.

Earl of Dorset. But, my Lord, it is probable a Man of your Integrity and Acquaintance, must have received more Letters since than are to be found. We see here are many concerning Affairs that passed just before this Time.

Bishop of R. My Lords, A little before the Conclusion of the last Session of Parliament, I received Leave of the House of Lords to return into the Country for the Recovery of my Health. During my Absence there, as long as the Parliament continued, I was incessantly engaged to attend

General, and the Petitioner's Attorney-General, in the Court of King's-Bench, 22nd of the instant Month of January, 1693, at which time the said Petitioner, it is ordered by the Court, should be heard in person, and by his Counsel, and by his Attorney-General, in the Court of King's-Bench, at ten of the Clock in the Afternoon, and that the said Petitioner should be summoned then to attend.

A Debate arising thereupon, in the Court of King's-Bench, relating to the Petitioner's Attorney-General, and the Title of Earl of Salisbury. The Question was put, Whether the Attorney-General shall give this House an Account what Proceedings have been taken in the Court of King's-Bench, since the eleventh of April, 1693, in Relation to the Person who claims the Title of Earl of Salisbury?

It was ordered in the Affirmative. It is ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the Majesty's Attorney-General do give this House an Account on Tuesday the fourth Day of December next, what Proceedings have been taken in the Court of King's-Bench, relating to the Person who claims the Title of Earl of Salisbury, since the eleventh of April, 1693, and that all the Lords be summoned then to attend.

4 Dec. 1694.

After their Majesties Attorney-General had given the House an Account of the Proceedings in the Court of King's-Bench, in Relation to the Person who claims the Title of Earl of Salisbury, and Debate thereupon, The Question was put, Whether the House shall be now adjourned?

It was adjourned to the next Day. Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the proper Officer in the Court of King's-Bench bring before this House, To-morrow at eleven of the Clock, the Record of the Judgment of Charles Kermack, who claimed the Title of Earl of Salisbury, and the Proceedings of the Court thereupon.

It is ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the Debate to Day touching the Proceedings in the Court of King's-Bench, in Relation to the Person who claims the Title of Earl of Salisbury, shall be adjourned till To-morrow Morning, eleven of the Clock at the farthest.

5 Dec. 1694.

The Record of the Court of King's-Bench being this Day brought into the House, (pursuant to the Order Yesterday) relating to the Person who claims the Title of Earl of Salisbury, and a Debate arising thereupon, it is ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the said Debate shall be, and is hereby adjourned until Wednesday next, the twelfth Day of this instant December, at ten of the Clock in the Forenoon.

It is ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the Records of the Court of King's-Bench, brought in this Day, shall be returned to the proper Officers, and that they attend with them again, on Wednesday the twelfth Day of this instant December, at ten of the Clock in the Forenoon.

12 Dec. 1694.

This Day being appeared to refuse the foresaid Debate, concerning the Person who claims the Title of Earl of Salisbury, and for the proper Officers of the Court of King's-Bench, to attend with the Records of that Court relating thereto, it is ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the said Debate shall be, and is hereby adjourned, till Monday the twenty-fourth Day of this instant December, at ten of the Clock in the Forenoon, and that the proper Officers of the Court of King's-Bench do then attend with the Records as was formerly ordered.

26 Jan. 1697.

A Petition to his Majesty being this Day offered on Behalf of the Person who claims the Title of Earl of Salisbury, and his Majesty's Reference thereupon, it is ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the said Petition and Reference shall be considered on Saturday the twenty-ninth Day of January instant, at twelve of the Clock, and that all the Lords be summoned then to attend, and the Clerks then bring the Books wherein the former Proceedings in Relation to this Matter are entered.

30 Jan. 1697.

The Order being read for considering the Petition of the Person who claims the Title of Earl of Salisbury, and his Majesty's Reference thereupon in this Day, was read as follows:

To the KING'S Most Excellent Majesty, The humble Petition of Charles Kermack, Son and Heir of Nicholas, Brother and Heir of Edward, Son and Heir of William, late Viscount Wallingford, and Earl of Salisbury,

Sheweth, That his late most Excellent Majesty King Charles the First, by his Letters Patents, under his Great Seal of England, bearing Date at Cambridge, the sixth Day of August, in the second Year of his Majesty, of his special Grace, certain Knowledge, and mere Motion, did create and create William, then Viscount Wallingford, to the State, Degree, and Honour of Earl of Salisbury, and did give to him the Name, Style, and Deputy thereof, and with the same Name, Degree, and Deputy of Earl, did really invest, and constitute him, to hold the same to him the said William, and the Heirs-males (his Body dying for ever) That by Force of these Letters Patents, the said William became seized to him, and the Heirs-males of his Body, of the said Earldom, and accordingly had and enjoyed Place and Precedency in the House of Peers as an Earl of this Kingdom. That the said William died seized, leaving Edward and Nicholas his Issue. That Edward died under Age, and without Issue, whereas the said Title descended to your Petitioner's said Father Nicholas, and he became thereby rightfully entitled to the said Name, Title, and Dignity, and was accordingly created, seized, and invested an Earl of Salisbury, and as such sat in the House of Lords, in the said House of Peers, upon the Restoration of King Charles II. That your Petitioner, being then a young Man, the Predecessor of the said Nicholas, your Petitioner's said Father, then Duke of York, prevailing upon your Petitioner's said Father, was forced to surrender and resign the said Title and Dignity of Earl of Salisbury, and as such sat in the House of Peers, and as such enjoyed his Legacy and Hereditary, in your Majesty's House of Peers, and exercised the same, as your Petitioner's said Father, and as such a Report accordingly, in answer of his Right, as he then sat in the House of Peers, was fully approved: That by his Majesty's said Title and Dignity descended upon your Petitioner, as he then sat in the House of Peers, and as such enjoyed the said Title and Dignity, and as such performed for killing Philip Lawton, your Petitioner did, for his said Title and Dignity, and as such according to the Laws of this Realm, by the Permission the House of Lords thereupon, whereas your Petitioner's said Title and Dignity, and according to the legal Methods in Case of the Death of a Peer, and as such, to have made his Application to your most Excellent Majesty at the Foundation of all the Honours within this Realm, and as such, the said Title and Dignity was forfeited. And your Petitioner's said Title and Dignity, by the Name of Charles Kermack, and upon his Arrival in this House, your Petitioner did plead the said Title and Dignity, and as such, in Manner aforesaid, and that therefore his Name was put down in the House of Peers, to which your Majesty's Attorney-General, your Petitioner's said Father, the said Petitioner, and after many long Arguments, he came upon the Bench, by the Right Honourable the Lord Chief-Justice, and as such, the Judges then, in Favour of your Petitioner's Name and Title, that your Petitioner should likewise inherit by the Name of Charles, Earl of Salisbury, for the same Office, and that the same was undisturbed, for the Reasons aforesaid. That by Reason of the Premises, your Petitioner did suffer long Imprisonment, and great Expenses, and is still under the same Accusation, by the Name of a Peer, and as such has been taken upon the Roll of Peers, and during your Petitioner's Absence, Writs have issued out of your Majesty's Court of Chancery, for the same Charge as a Peer, which he hath been refused.

Now, therefore, as your Petitioner humbly conceives himself well entitled to the said Title and Dignity, and that your Petitioner may the better be enabled so to do, and manifest his Zeal for your Majesty's Service, as by the Duty of his Allegiance he is obliged,

Your Petitioner humbly prays your Majesty's tender Consideration of the Premises, and that you would be pleased to declare your Royal Pleasure in Favour of your Petitioner's said Right, by restoring him a Writ of Summons to Parliament, or to recommend your Petitioner's Cause to an Examination by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, in order to your Majesty's more certain Information of the Truth of the Premises; or otherwise to do hereto, as your Majesty's great Wisdom shall best direct.

And your Petitioner shall, as in Duty bound, daily pray for your Majesty's, &c.

BANBURY.

William R.

WE are greatly pleased to refer this Petition to the House of Peers, to consider the Petitioner's Claim and Title therein mentioned, and to certify us how the same shall appear to them, with their Opinions thereupon. Given at our Court at Kensington, the 18th Day of January 1697, in the sixth Year of our Reign.

By his Majesty's Command.

JA. VERNON.

After Debate thereupon, These Lords following were appointed to draw up a Representation to be presented to his Majesty, in what Proceedings have been formerly in this House, in relation to this Matter, and report the same to this House.

Dux Bevil, &c.

Dux Bevil, &c.

Their Lordships, or any five of them, to meet on Tuesday next, at eleven of the Clock in the Forenoon, at the Prince's Lodgings, near the House of Peers.—And it is ordered, That this Committee do meet again on Thursday the third Day of February next, at eleven of the Clock, in the same Place, to consider of the Proceedings of the Court of King's-Bench, since the Judgment of this House, 17th of January, 1693, in relation to this Matter, and have Power to send for Persons, Papers, and Records, and report in this House their Opinion thereupon.

3 February, 1697.

The Earl of Salisbury reported to the Committee the Representation drawn by them to be presented to his Majesty, in relation to the Proceedings in this House, upon the Petition of a Person who claims the Title of Earl of Salisbury, which was read, and agreed to as follows, viz.

We the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, having received a Petition to your Majesty, from a Person who claims the said Title of Earl of Salisbury, did a Writ of Summons to sit as a Peer in Parliament, do hereby certify to your Majesty, That about five Years since, the same Person did petition the House of Lords; That being introduced for the Death of Philip Lawton, he might be admitted to his Trial by his Peers; and that if any Question should arise thereupon, that he might be heard by his Counsel at the Bar of the House: Upon which the Lords did order the Petitioner to be heard by his Counsel at the Bar of this House, for the making out this Title to the said Earldom; and also your Majesty's Attorney-General to be heard on your Majesty's Behalf; and upon full Hearing on both Sides, the House came to this Resolution and Judgment,

That

That the Petitioner had no Right to the Title of Earl of Banbury, and ordered his Petition to be dismissed; which Judgment, the Lords have given Reason to believe, was not made known to your Majesty at the Time of making this aforesaid Reference. All which is humbly represented to your Majesty.

Ordered, That the Lords, with which Series, do attend his Majesty with the R. Proclamation of this House, concerning the Person that claims the Title of Earl of Banbury.

7 February, 1667.

The Earl of Rochester having offered to the House what he was ordered to report from the Lords Committee, appointed to consider of the Proceedings, in the Court of King's Bench, since the Judgment of this House, the 17th of January, 1667, in relation to the Person who claimed the Title of Earl of Banbury, it is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That this Matter shall be considered on the 24th next at Eleven of the Clock.

10 February, 1667.

After reading this Day the Reports from the Lords Committee, appointed to consider of the Proceedings in the Court of King's Bench, since the Judgment of this House, the 17th of January, 1667, in relation to the Person who claims the Title of Earl of Banbury, and finding for, and hearing the Lord Chief Justice of that Court, and Mr. Justice Eyre, to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled; It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That this Debate shall be, and is hereby adjourned to Monday next, at Eleven of the Clock in the Forenoon, and that the said Lord Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Eyre, do then attend, and also use other Judge of each Court in Westminster-Hall.

But there was no further Proceeding in this Business.

The Proceedings in the House relating to the Title of the Earl of Banbury, before 22 March, 1667, as follows:

Earl of Banbury. 13 July, 1660.

It was moved, That there being a Petition read now six in this House as a Peer, who, as it comes out, hath no Title to be Peer, so the Earl of Banbury, It is ordered, that this Business shall be heard at the Bar by Council, on Monday come Next Night.

6 June, 1661.

The Lord Great-Chancellor, signified to the House, That the King appointed him to deliver a Paper to their Lordships Consideration, which was presented to His Majesty, and the House commanded the same to be read, which was done, viz.

To the KING's Most Excellent Majesty,
The humble Petition of Nicholas, Earl of Banbury,

THAT your Majesty's Royal Father, King Charles, by his Letters Patent, under the Great Seal of England, bearing Date the eighteenth of April, 1657, for the great and many Services done by your Petitioner's Father, Sir William Knowles, Knight, and Viscount Wallingford, granted to him, and his Heirs Males of his Body issuing, the Name, Title, and Dignity of Earl of Banbury, with all Privileges of State, and Voice in Parliament, as other Peers of the Kingdom hath, so by the said Letters Patent more fully appears.

That the said Earl, after marrying with Elizabeth, Daughter of the Earl of Suffolk, had Issue by her, Edward, his eldest Son, who died without Issue, and your Petitioner was born in January, 1630, about a Year and a Half before the said Earl's Death.

That your Petitioner, as Son and Heir of the said late Earl, sat in last Parliament as Earl of Banbury, as of Right he might, and hath often and had all Privileges as other Earls there, but having no Writ of Summons to this present Parliament from your Majesty, as other the Peers have, hath forborne to sit there, although he hath done nothing to deprive himself of his Title therein, nor to his Knowledge to incur your Majesty's Displeasure.

Your Petitioner therefore humbly prays, That your Majesty will be graciously pleased, that he may have a Writ of Summons to this Parliament, as Earl of Banbury, and enjoy all the Privileges and Privileges thereunto belonging, granted by your Majesty's Royal Father, by his said Letters Patent.

And your Petitioner shall acknowledge your Majesty's Justice therein, with due Gratitude, and with all Alacrity and Fidelity endeavour to serve your Majesty with his Life and Fortune, and ever pray for your Majesty's long and happy Reign.

BANBURY.

It being read, the Lord Chancellor acquainted the House, That His Majesty signified his Pleasure to him, that no Writ should be issued out to summon the Earl of Banbury to this Parliament, upon some Question that was made in this House last Parliament, concerning him.

Wherein it is Ordered, That the said Petition, and Contents thereof, be forthwith referred to the Lords Committee for Privileges, who having heard the Petitioner by his Counsel, or otherwise, and Mr. Attorney-General on the King's Behalf, are afterwards to make Report thereof to this House, and the Lords Committee shall then when they please.

15 June, 1661.

Upon Report of the Committee of Privileges, That the Earl of Banbury desires large Writs may be granted on his Behalf, among whom a Peer of the Court of Banbury, It is Ordered, That the Committee have liberty Power to send for each Witness if they think fit, observing such Decency as the Quality of the Person requires: And further, That Mr. Attorney-General do bind that Committee on Monday next in the Afternoon.

20 June, 1661.

Ordered, That the Report from the Committee of Privileges, concerning the Earl of Banbury, shall be made on Friday the twenty-seventh of this instant June.

1 July, 1661.

Upon the Report this Day made, concerning the Petition of Nicholas Earl of Banbury, formerly brought into this House by a Peer of this Realm from his Majesty, whereby the Petitioner prays a Writ of Summons to this Parliament, as Earl of Banbury, and to enjoy all the Privileges and Privileges thereunto belonging, granted by his Majesty's Letters Patents to the said Earl of Banbury, It is Ordered, That the Cause shall be heard at the Bar on Monday, the eighth Day of this Instant July, by Council, and Witnesses are to attend at the said Hearing; at which Time, Mr. Attorney-General, and others of his Majesty's Council, (having timely Notice given) are likewise to be heard on the King's Behalf.

9 July, 1661.

This Day the Cause of Nicholas Earl of Banbury, upon his Petition, wherein he prays a Writ of Summons to this Parliament, as Earl of Banbury, and to enjoy all the Privileges and Privileges thereunto belonging, granted by His Majesty's Letters Patents to the said Earl of Banbury, was heard by Council on the Earl's Part; and also Mr. Attorney-General, Sergeant Maynard, and Sergeant Glyn, Counsel on the King's Behalf, were heard; and as regard it was now late, It is Ordered, That the Resolution of this Business shall be taken into Consideration To-morrow Morning.

10 July.

Upon Consideration of the Business of the Earl of Banbury, heard at this Bar Yesterday, and after a long Debate thereof, It is Ordered, That the Matter now in Debate, concerning the Earl of Banbury, is referred to the Consideration of the Committee of Privileges; and also the Matter of the Right of Precedency between the said Earl of Banbury, and several Peers of the Realm, and to make Report thereof to this House, the Committee to meet on Monday next, at Three of the Clock in the Afternoon.

19 July.

The Earl of Northampton reported from the Committee of Privileges, that their Lordships have considered of the Earl of Banbury's Business referred unto them, and their Opinion is, That the Earl of Banbury is, in the Eye of the Law, Son of the late William, Earl of Banbury; the House of Peers should therefore advise the King to send him a Writ to come to Parliament.

After their Lordships are of Opinion, that the Earl of Banbury ought to have Place at the House of Peers, according to the Date of his Patent, and not according to the Time of this Petition, which ranks him before other Earls created before William, Earl of Banbury. All which the Committee offer to their Lordships Judgment.

Ordered, That this House will take this Report into Consideration To-morrow Morning.

25 July.

Ordered, That on the second Thursday after the next Meeting of this House, after the Adjournment, this House will take into Consideration the Report of the Earl of Banbury's Business.

18 Nov. 1661.

The House took into Debate the Report concerning the Earl of Banbury formerly made to this House; and the Question being put, Whether to put off the Consideration of this Business to a further petitioned Day? It was resolved in the Affirmative.

9 Dec. 1661.

An Act was read a first Time, declaring Nicholas, Earl of Banbury, to be illegitimate.

26 Dec. 1661.

Upon calling of the House of Peers this Day, the House taking Notice that the Earl of Banbury's Name is not as the List by which the Lords were called, It is Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee of Privileges, to examine why the said Earl of Banbury's Name is left out of the said List, he having formerly sat as a Peer in this House, and to pursue all former Proceedings in this House concerning him, and to make Report thereof to the House.

25 Nov. 1660.

The Earl of Essex reported to the House, that the Committee of Privileges, in pursuance of the Order of this House, have examined their Proceedings concerning the Earl of Banbury, the Order certified of Two Parts, First, Why his Lordship's Name was left out of the List of the Peers, touching which the Lords have spoken with Sir Edward Waller, Principal King of Arms, who delivers in the List, and he produced a Book out of the Herald's Office, where it appears that the said William, Earl of Banbury, died in the Year 1632, and having had two Wives, left no Children.

Likewise he produced a Roll, being a Procedure of the King and the Peers to Parliament in 1640, in which List there is no mention of the Earl of Banbury's Name among the Peers.

Upon these Grounds the said Edward Waller left out the Name of the Earl of Banbury in his List given unto this House.

The second Part of the Order was so presented to the House, as Account of the former Proceedings, in this House, concerning the Earl of Banbury, and the Lords Committee said, That 6 June, 1661, viz. being a Record of the Proceedings before that Day.

21 Feb. 1660.

A Petition was presented to this House from the Earl of Banbury, which was read as follows:

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled,

The humble Petition of Nicholas, Earl of Banbury,

Sheweth, THAT your humble Petitioner hath the Honour to be a Peer of this Realm by Descent, and is legally entitled by Right of Inheritance, to the Dignity and Honour of the Earl of Banbury, and ought therefore to have and enjoy his Voice and Seat in Parliament, and all other Preeminences to such Dignity belonging; and hath always, in all Taxes, and Payments of Poll-Money, and Beneficences, paid such Sums, and as such Proportions, as to the Quality and Degree of an English Earl do appertain.

Nevertheless your Petitioner hath not it had the Honour to receive from his Majesty such a Writ of Summons to Parliament as is usually granted to other Peers of this Realm. Wherefore, since your Petitioner is well assured that no legal Impediment can be objected and proved against him, he most humbly prays this Most Honourable House sheweth that he may receive such a Writ of Summons to the Parliament now sitting, as may enable him to serve His Majesty there, according to the Duty of his Place and Quality.

the Plea which he is to plead, had been bad, it is said to conclude; for in this case, as his Letters Patent of Privilege in his Ancestors, under whom he claims his Honour with a peer's Coat, he hath sufficiently entitled himself to his Privilege by his Patent of Record, he being a complete Noblemen by his Creation, by his Letters Patent, without any other Ceremony, as appears by Peja's and Reddell's Case, Nov. 1560. 46. G. 2. on the 12. Rep. 71. And if he be to be arraigned after such Creation, and before the Parliament sits, he shall be tried by his Peers. And when I come farther to be pleaded and shown to the Court under the Great Seal, the other is to be considered, they not glad Nul tunc Record, Et non in the 4th Report, and need not conclude with a supra per Record, but he may have a Day to bring in the Record which he hath already taken into Court, to be the Defect of Edward's to the Honour, his days without issue, whereby it came to Nobility; and his Death, and the Defect to the Defendant pleaded, after the Letters Patent to his Peers, are all Matters of Fact, triable by the Country, and not by the Record, by Reason that if he could not conclude by Placit, there being no Verdictum in Law to warrant the Court of the King's Council, he must then at least have out of Chancery under the Great Seal, even though it shall declare the Defendant hath pleaded to make out his Patent. His Books tried by them no ways warrant that Opinion; for the Historia by *Hes. VI. 46. No. 3. 1785. and 347. Rep. 287. 294. 46. death not. Nobility is fixed to the Identity of the Person, and Inherent in the blood Nobilitated by the King, and cannot be granted over or taken by him who hath it, as it is said in Joan's Rep. 110. and the 4th 11. 136. and retained in Parliament in his Lord Peja's Case, Shew's Case in Parliament, Page. 1. And if it be as Honour or Inheritance, the Heat of the Peer on whom it descends cannot wave it, or the Privilege of it as to be used by his Peers, and as to be in the Lord Debonair's Case on 11. him, and the Matter determined in a Court of Law, on solemn Hearing at the Bar of the House on both Sides, on Depositions taken in the Cause, against invidious Courts, they voted him an Impediment, which is very far from being a Precedent of their Lordships Original determining Right of Passage, which are all the Precedents which have been cited, and unto which I trust that I have given full Answer, and therefore this Order, here pleaded, being without a Precedent, I am of Opinion, for the Reasons I have given, that the Lords ought to be shewn.

Also, the Chief-Justice, held the Plea good, the Defendant having pleaded the Creation of the Lords his Ancestors, and a plain Denial under them: And for the Earlson, that Rebuttal was agreed to be in Foreign, he fails it was needless, the Creation being under the Great Seal, the Great Seal of England being only peculiar to England, for thereby the King acts as King, and had the Grants been made to or the Conquest of Ireland, without Doubt it had been a good Grant, and the Conquest of Ireland cannot alter the Law of England; besides, it would be a foreign Constitution, to insert Barbony in Ireland, and a Plea that will not be made but by such a Contrivance.

And that the said Arch-graue Banerius in France, under the Great Seal of England, is by to constitute Privileges, and therefore, that he might be Special Warden in the Patent, so drew that in an Irish Letter, and Banerius, as well as Act of Parliament, extend not to France, until the specially named, but by England, they be without any such in France. And he said, That before Edward the Third's Letter, there were but Two Titles of Honour, Duke and Baron, and the latter is created by Writ, by being called to the Parliament; so was also Sir by the Treasurer, and after, in Richard the Second's Time, they came to be created, by Letters Patent, and it was annually in Office of great Dignity, as also of Trust, for the Defence of the Kingdom; and these were called Comites a Sancto regni, or Reges, and being an Order, might be intailed under the Statute of Durham, and they had formerly large Possessions, and for the Rob of an Earl, was 1200*l*. becoming would be with him every Morning and Evening to read the Prayers of the Church, and perform such other Offices as in such Case as his had belong to that Function, which, except one Day in the Week, was duly observed, and sometimes other, for when any Clergy came accidentally to visit him, if they did neglect to offer, he constantly requested them to pray with him. He gave little or no Entertainment to any Hopes of Life, as being sensible that it was rather Malice, than Mercy against him; and that a Curse may be pardoned, but Malice is not to be limited without the Destruction of its Enemy, if he once comes in its Power. He often expressed a great Satisfaction in the Cause for which he suffered, saying, That it signified to him such Comfort and Courage, and that he believed not but that God would support him in the Cause he had undertaken. As to the Ordinary (Mr. South), he indeed, in Point of Conscience, refused to communicate with him, yet mildly and modestly telling him, that he was desirous to give him no Trouble, and requested of him, that he would use any way to concern himself with him, or about him, at which Mr. South fell into such an unbecomingly impetuous Fit of Rage, that he reviled the Prisoner with bitter Words, and very generously damned both him, and all the Ministers that came at him, to sell: But he took it patiently, and returned not the least Word that might seem to offend harshly. As his Wife once laid her Hands on his Fetters, and wept, he intreated her to forbear, saying, He was left then a Man that could not bear that; but that her Tears were more precious to him than his Fetters: Another Time, as he was hanging a Link on the Chair, thereby to raise himself somewhat from the Weight of his Fetters, and perceiving his Wife to look very heavily at it, he said cheerfully to her, My Dear, these are my Arms, alluding to the Arms of their Family, being Sable, two single Black Armes, and one double, Argent.

When Tucker sold him that the Dead Warrent was come, and that he was to die, he gave him Thanks for giving him Notice of it, that he might be sure that had none touching else to do, but to prepare to die; saying further, The Lord's Will be done. He received the Holy Sacrament twice during his Imprisonment, but whether it be customary, or that they had particular Order, the Keepers all (except Walker, who was ill along not only civil, but even compassionate towards the Prisoner), the Evening and Morning before he suffered, became exceeding rugged and harsh, not only to him, but to all that came to him; insomuch that his Mother and Brother coming that Morning to receive the Communion with him, could neither beg, nor buy Admission; and the poor old Woman was forced to depart, without joining in the last Act of Christian Communion with him, or so much as taking her intended last Farewell of him.

Other very unbecoming Actions towards him I must mention, which I shall forbear, being unwilling to set forth that Barbarity which some delight to see. When he was brought down to go to the Place of Execution, he entered into the Sledge, and rode along in it with such calm Behaviour, and decent Courage, as Bruck the Beholders with Remorse and Amazement, and made his Enemies gnash their Teeth with Indignation, to see him triumph over his Malice even in his Death. In his Passage all the Way, the People rather formed themselves, than inclinable to offer any Abuse, except near St. Giles's Church, where a rude Fellow treated him with very impudent Language, to which he made no Return, but lifting up his Eyes to Heaven, said, O Lord! Take these words more highly than I say for me, and for Mankind! And bid not I turn of this patiently to hear the unbecoming Reproaches of this insolent Man?

As he was coming up to the Place of Execution, a Clergyman got up into the Cart to be ready to receive him; as which the Ordinary seemed to be much incensed; for he gave him very ill Words, bidding him get down, and saying, He ought not to be there, nor should he be suffered; the Minister replied little, but stay'd still, till (for now one ill Nature helps another) Major Richardson came up, and with Threatenings, and his Canes lifted up, forced him to come down, who immediately thereupon applied himself to the Sheriff, (for by this Time they were come up) when some ill Person suggested, that he was a Papist, to which the Prisoner presently answered, Mr. Sheriff, upon the Word of a dying Man he is not, but a Minister of the Church of England.

The Ordinary made all the Opposition he could; but the Sheriff granted the Prisoner's Request, bidding the Ordinary hold his Peace, and saying it was a Thing never denied to a dying Man. Being in the Cart, and all the Prisoner's Brother, he used an Office which seemed to be collected out of several Offices in the Common-Prayer Book, with such firm Assertions as might serve to adapt them to the present Occasion; being first asked the Reason, he said that he did it both for the Authority of the Thing, and also to avoid any Casuists that might be made at, or any Senates that might be held for, any of his own Conceptions. But when he came to mention the Creed, he put these particular Questions to the Prisoner: Do you believe these Articles which you are now about to receive with you, as you have said that you do? Do you believe that the Church of Christ, and particularly by the Church of England? And is this the Faith which you do, and wherein you hope for Salvation? The Prisoner making Answer, I do so believe, and am now ready to die in that Faith, and in that Faith hope for Salvation. Then said the Minister, Now, say after me: Then they repeated the Creed, raising their Voices somewhat higher than ordinary; after that, the Minister asked him several Questions concerning his Repentance, his Charity, his Endeavours of Religion for any Wrongs by him done, his forgiving of others any Wrongs done to him, and the like. And then, at the earnest Request of the dying Man, he denounced the Absolution, then proceeding to divers other Prayers, they concluded with that Sentence in the Office for the Burial of the Dead: O holy and merciful Saviour, thou must surely Tuckey attend, forgive me not as my last Hour for any Point of Doubt is full from thee. This being over, the Minister (whether that he could not endure to see the Man die, or that he would not communicate with the Ordinary, or for some other Reason best known to himself), after he had generously embraced Mr. Anderton, fervently recommended his Soul to God, and taking his last Farewell of him, went down out of the Cart. The Sheriff civilly commanded a Way to be made, and were ready, albeit, he passing thro' the Crowd, not only with Ease, but Respect. During the Time the Prisoner was at his private Devotions, an Order came to permit the Quartering of his Body, which being by some thought a Reprieve, it was handed to him, and having read it, and finding it no more, he returned it, saying, I thank you, Mr. Sheriff, the Will of the Lord be done. Having Leave from the Sheriff to speak his Mind, if he had any Thing to say to the People, he began to speak; but being too suddenly interrupted by the Ordinary, and also finding he could say but little, he delivered a Speech he had prepared might be taken out of his Pocket, and given to the Sheriff, to be by them printed, which is as followeth.

To my Countrymen,

Liberty and Property hath for some Years made an hideous Cry in these Kingdoms, and nothing more than the Rights and Privileges of the Subject's in the Presence of our present Deliverers, and doubtless it was for the sake of these that so many of our intemperate and blind Countrymen rebelled against their lawful and injured Masters, whilst Religion (Richardson's Embrace) was made the Cover of the Violence. Designs of those who have now demonstratively shewn, that they sought nothing less than our Ruin. And that their wretchedly Pretence to gain their Ends, the very blind, although they cannot see, yet must certainly feel it. Under the like Pretences do our Deliverers still continue to deliver us even from what they please, that they think will but in the end help to effect what they came for. Under the Notion of the Necessity of a War, they deliver us from our Money, and from our Traffick and Commerce, by carrying it great a Part of the Kingdom is furnished: The Flower of our Kingdom, and directly contrary to Law, transport them; and to face their own Foreigners, put them in the first Order of these Battles, as the Headers did the Christians of old, that their Enemies' Swords might be blunted with killing them, before they came to encounter them: They exhaust all our Stores both for Sea and Land, and carry away all our Artillery, and if any Man seem but to disapprove of their Proceedings, under the Notion of Law they murder him: Nay, if they do but so much as suppose him not to be on their Side, he must be a Traitor, and no Master what the Law says, they say by Bill do.

Can any Thing be more plain to demonstrate this, than my present Case? My supposed Crime was Printing, and all the Witnesses could perfectly lay against me, was, That I was a Man against the Government, and had sought the Prince of Orange Hook-nail, though I protest I never did: not one of them could say, nor did they stir to say, that I ever printed the Books of which they accuse me, or procured them to be printed, or published any of them, or that the Materials were mine, or that I hired the Room where they were found; but I was an ill Man, and that was sufficient: By which 'tis plain, that they were resolved, right or wrong, to have my Life.

That they designed not to try, but to convict me, is as plain; for they refused positively to allow me Counsel to such Masters of Law, as was never refused to any before; and though I caused several Copies to be read, some to prove that there must be two Witnesses at least to the Fact, others, that though there had been two, as there was not one, yet positively declared that it was no Treason: Nay, the very last Session of Parliament was attended, That the Printer of seditious and treasonable Books should for the first Offence be punished no otherwise than not to follow his Trade for three Years; and for the second Offence, never to follow it more, and such farther Punishment as seemed fit to the Court, not extending to Life or Limb. Now though mine [had been proved] had but been the first, yet you see, contrary, and in direct Opposition to the Law, they make it High-Treason: And when the Jury could not agree to find me guilty, and came down to ask the Court, Whether the finding these Things there, and supposing them to be mine, since it could not be proved that I printed these Books, or had made any Use of them, could offend my Life? I say, when the Jury asked this Question, and the Lord-Chief-Justice Pryor told them positively, No, it did not; yet withal he told them, That that now my said Subpoena, they Subpoena was to find me guilty of Printing: And while they lay'd, the Court frowned upon them to that Degree, that the Foreman told them, he was not to be frightened; upon which they publicly served them, calling them, ill Men, ill Subjects, and a Pair of Knaves, and so terrified them into a Compliance. That thus true, those who were near know too well, although the partial Writer of the Trials hath most maliciously published not only an unfair, impertinent, and lame Account, but hath also abused it with downright Untruths, and falsehoods, to set out, whereof made for me; not so much as mentioning the Contradictions of the Witnesses, and when I took hold of them, they denied them; nor hath he, in the last, told the World of the Judge's secret-sailing whatsoever I uttered, without giving any other Answer than that it should be so, though they could have it so; with many other such Things, which the conscientious Auditor can testify to.

And now I pray consider where is this Liberty and Property? Where the Rights and Privileges of the Subject? Nay, where the very Laws themselves? And consequently where is the Security of my Man I Why, even in the Deliverers Pockets, where your Money is; and where also, without all Doubt, if you look not well to yourself, your Estate, or long, will be likewise. What are the Pretences but arbitrary in a superlative Manner; and such as no Reign ever produced before? These were they you were heretofore only afraid of, being jealous without just Cause; but now you see them actually come upon you. I hope you yearnless will put a

Stop

* This Trial here spoken of, is the foregoing one, printed in the Successor-Press of that Time.

That a King may commence a War since he is dispossessed of his Kingdom, and be reputed a Lawful Enemy by the Law of Nations, and consequently all those of his Subjects that continue still with him, without considering their Allegiance to the Possessor, be reputed and treated as Enemies; for it would be absurd to say, That the King may continue in War, where the Subjects cannot.

That King James having no Armour, or Treasury, (in case he be) as has been alleged against the Validity of his Commission, is no more Sene, than it would be to say, That no Prince by the Law of Nations can commence War, but at his own Charge.

That the War between King William and King James continued on, after King James and his Forces left Ireland, and that the Articles upon the Surrender of Limerick, admit it to do, if the permitting so many Thousand Men with Arms, Horses, Guns, and Ammunition to go into France to King James, in Arms as Soldiers, commissioned by him, may be any Proof of such Admission.

That the said Article being signed by Louis XIV. General Giscard, Limerick, and other Places having been surrendered upon the Faith of these Articles, all concerned in them, ought by the Law of Nations to have the full Benefit of them; and that, although they had never afterwards been confirmed.

That King James is still actually in War, and in Confederacy with the King of France, that many Thousand English, Scotch and Irish still aid under Commission from King James, in conjunction with the French Forces: That they have hitherto been discharged and exchanged by the Confederates, (as Prisoners of War) though often fighting against the English that aid under King William's Commission; and if so, Why are King James's Commissions null, and nullities for Sea?

That King James and the King of France being confederated together in War against England, it matters not in the Judgment of the Law of Nations, under which of the Confederates Commission the Subjects of either aid, whether under King James or the King of France's; but the Enemy without Distinction, if either Subject aid under either Commission, ought by the Law of Nations to treat them as Enemies and Prisoners of War.

That where two Kings join in War against one another, after one of them has lost Part of his Dominions, (as King James had, when the King of France lent him Forces into Ireland) and soon after he became wholly dispossessed, would it not be absurd, for any one to say upon this Case, That it was absurd by the Law of Nations for the one King to assist or join with the other, after that he had lost Part of his Dominions? or if he does, that yet notwithstanding the War is wholly at an End as to the latter, and he becomes a private Person, though never for many of his Subjects follow him in Warlike Manner by Captivation from the Enemy, or that these Subjects are disabled by the Law of Nations, to accept any Commission from him, (see his Confederate King by his Consent) or serve him any more as their King: Or, if they do, that they will not execute them from being Pirates and Traitors to the Dispossessed.

That the Law of Nations, to the Judgment of which our Case only belongs, is the Great and Imperial Law of Right and Equity that judges of the Rights of Kings and Nations, with respect to each other, and of the Rights of War, and of the Rights of Peace, and all Nations with respect to this Law are considered as one great Corporation, and each Kingdom or Nation but as a single Member or Part of this Corporation. And therefore this Law, or any Rule of Rights, or Nation of it, cannot be altered, concluded or eluded by any Votes, Ordinances or Statutes, or any particular Nation or Kingdom.

That every Lawful Established King, in the Nation of this Law, has a Right to hold his Kingdom, during his Life, and that in case it be any such King's Misfortune to be dispossessed through any War or Invasion, That he has the Right by Regal Recaptivation, and a Right to the Assistance of any other Prince, who shall think fit to join with him for the Recovery of his Kingdom, as being as much his Legal Remedy, as for any private Person for the diffusing his Freehold by the particular Laws of any particular Kingdom.

That this also a Nation and Rule of this Law, That no Lawful King can lose the Name and Title of King, unless he resigns or abdicates his Kingdom; and that every Abdication or Resignation ought to be the Voluntary and Involuntary Act of such King to do, or else that it is no Abdication or Resignation. That every such Abdication or Resignation by this Law may appear otherwise in the Judgment of this Law, than only by a Vote or Statute, made only by the Prince and Persons in Possession of the Kingdom of such dispossessed Abdicating King; or otherwise these Judges cannot, by the Law of Nations, admit it to be any Case, wherein the Want of Issues of the same Case turns upon such Abdication: Especially, if such King continued to act as a King, and to grant Commissions as such, &c. For if once such a Vote or Statute should be admitted as Evidence in our Law, (would these Judges say) no Prince came out of Possession, however he came to be, could retain any Right in his Kingdom; or the very Name of a Prince, unless his Enemy would please to let him? For it would be no more than for the Enemy to vote that the Prince has Resigned or Abdicated, and there would be an End of the Prince and his Right, as to be (say so prevailing) Enemy would omit to do, if such, as any such Vote, or Law made among themselves, would by the Law of Nations utterly conclude, and unking the dispossessed Prince, and dissolve all Relations between him and his Subjects, as consequently it must do; and that therefore, however the Party making such Vote, and receiving Provision from the Prince in Possession, may be eluded and bound by it by their own Acts and Consents, yet in the Eye of the Law of Nations, (which alters not) he continues in all the Circumstances and Rights of a dispossessed Prince, until he shall appear to have Redigged or Abdicated, according to the Law of Nations.

Lastly, We most humbly beseech, and appeal to your Lordships Considerations, whether the Articles of Limerick, which were produced at our Trial, and are ready to produce to your Lordships, and the very reported Power (in case he had no other) King James has hitherto had, and used, of granting Commissions, and all that have hitherto acted under his Commission having been cited and treated as Soldiers and Strangers aiding under real and valid Commissions, be not sufficient to execute as (who have never been within this Kingdom since the Beginning of the War, till we were brought Prisoners from the Condemnation of France) And whether aiding under the King of France's Commission, being in Arms and League with King James, and by his Consent, can be in so Treason against King William, who never, in any Respect, received his Protection, but adhered all along to King James, as to our King, and fought against King William, as King James's Enemy.

These Considerations are humbly submitted to your Lordships, being, as we conceive, of the greatest Consequence to all the Subjects of England, as the Case may sometimes happen.

However, some of them, if not all, were executed.

XLIX. RESOLUTIONS of the House of Lords on several Books, &c. 1701 and 1702.

13 W. & 1 A.

The Vote or Resolution and Orders made by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, relating to William Fuller, and the Books published by him (a).

Die Lunæ 29 Januarii, 1701.

WHEREAS by Order of the House of Peers, of the Twelfth Instance, William Fuller was Ordered peremptorily to produce before their Lordships this Day Mr. Thomas Jones, and Mr. Fuller attending at the Door, was called in, and asked several Questions relating thereto, and the said Fuller not producing the said Thomas Jones, nor making any satisfactory Excuse to the House for his not producing of him. The House came to the following Resolution, &c.

It is Resolved by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That in the Books published by William Fuller, one entitled, Original Letters of the late King's, and others, in his greatest Friends in England, the others entitled, Twenty-five Discourses of Justice of Quality and Worth, are contained divers false, malicious, and scandalous Matters, reflecting upon several Members of both Houses of Parliament, which are of dangerous Consequence to the Government.

And therefore the following Orders were made:

It is ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That the Directions of this House given to the Warden of the

(a) The same is 29 January, 1701. It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That the Vote or Resolution and Orders made this Day relating to William Fuller, and the Books published by him, shall be forthwith Printed and Published.

(b) 1701. William Fuller, that branded and infamous Impostor, being in an Order of the House of Lords, at the 28th of January, produced for Proof that in a false and malicious Libel, the late original Letters of the late King James, and others, in his greatest Friends in England; the others entitled, Twenty-five Discourses of Justice of Quality and Worth, are contained divers false, malicious, and scandalous Matters, reflecting upon several Members of both Houses of Parliament, which are of dangerous Consequence to the Government.

(c) Die Lunæ 29 Jan. 1701. It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That the Proceedings of this House, in Relation to the Matter, be Printed and Published.

Matt. Jephson, Clerk Parliamentar.

Flour, the Eighth Instant, that he should not confine William Fuller further than he used to be, be fit aside and vacated; and that William Fuller shall be, and he is hereby, committed Prisoner to the Prison of the Fleet.

It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That His Majesty's Attorney-General do forthwith prosecute William Fuller, according to Law, for writing and publishing the said false, malicious, and scandalous Matters; and that his Majesty's said Attorney-General do also forthwith prosecute Mr. Peter Bell and Mrs. ——— Bellows, who Printed and Published William Fuller's said Books (d).

The Proceedings and Resolution of the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, on Saturday the Ninth of May, 1702, upon Part of the Preface to the Book, intitled, The History of the 12th Parliament, begun at Westminster the Tenth Day of February, in the Twelfth Year of the Reign of King William, Anno Domini 1700 (e).

Die Lunæ 4 Maii, 1702.

Complaint being made to the House, of a Passage in the Preface of a Printed Book, intitled, The History of the 12th Parliament, begun at Westminster the Tenth Day of February, in the Twelfth Year of the Reign of King William, Anno Domini 1700.

That the Passage was made to the House, and is as follows, viz.

Matt. Jephson, Clerk Parliamentar.

(d) The same is 29 January, 1701. It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That the Vote or Resolution and Orders made this Day relating to William Fuller, and the Books published by him, shall be forthwith Printed and Published.

(e) Die Lunæ 4 Maii, 1702. It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That the Proceedings of this House, in Relation to the Matter, be Printed and Published.

Matt.

* And perhaps, there are some that Thing in Prospect of deeper Reach than all these; which say, that should it have pleased God, for our Sins, to have search'd from us the King on the field, by Chance of War, or other fatal Accident, during the Tumult of Arms abroad, and the Civil Disorders they had rais'd among us at Home, and a numerous, corrupt, licentious Party throughout the Nation, from which the House of Commons was sometimes not free, they might entertain Hopes from the Advantage of being at the Helm, and the Assistance of their Rabbie, to have put in Practice their own Schemes, and have given us a new Model of Government of their own Projection, and so to have procur'd to themselves a lasting Impunity, and to have mounted their own Beast, the Rabbie, and driven the false Part of the Nation like Cattle before 'em.

* That this is no groundless Conjecture, will readily appear to any considering Persons, from the Treatment Her Royal Highness the Princess of Denmark, the House Apparent to the Crown, met with all along from them and all their Party. They were not contented to show her a constant Neglect and Slight themselves, but their whole Party were studious to treat her not only with Disrespect, but Spight; they were busy to traduce her with wicked and baseless Aspersions; and so far they carried the Affront, as to make her at one Time almost the common Subject of all Title-Tattle of almost every Coffee-House and Drawing-Room, which they promiscuously as much Zool, Application, and Vexation, as if of a Bill of Exclusion had been born on the Anvil, and thence were the introductory Ceremony.

It was thereupon Order'd by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That Francis Gage, Robert Gifford, and Thomas Hedges, for whom the said Book is licens'd to be printed, shall, and they are hereby required to attend this House, on Saturday next at Eleven of the Clock.

Die Mercurii, 6 Martii, 1702.

The House being inform'd, That Doctor Drake own'd himself to be the Author of a Book, intitled, The History of the last Parliament, for passing whereof some Bookellers are Order'd to attend on Saturday next; and that he desired he might be appointed to attend at the same Time: Thereupon it is Order'd by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That Doctor Drake do attend this House, on Saturday next at Eleven of the Clock.

Die Sabbati, 9 Martii, 1702.

After reading the Order made the first Instant, at the Desire of Doctor Drake for his Attendance this Day, the House took into their Consideration the three-mentioned Paragraphs. After the Reading whereof, Doctor Drake was call'd up, and the Order of the Sixth Instant read to him.

The Lord Keeper ask'd him what he had to say concerning the said Book; And the Book and the said Paragraph being shew'd him, he own'd he was the Author, and that Paragraph in particular; and he thought he had full Reason so to write it, he having heard her Highness talk'd of disrespectfully in almost every Coffee-House.

Then he withdrew.

And, after some Debate, was call'd in again, and the Lord Keeper told him, the House was not contented with what he had said, but thought he should, and required him to acquaint the House with the Grounds of his writing that Paragraph.

He answer'd, he found it mentioned in divers anonymous Pamphlets publish'd at that Time, and hoped it was no Hurt to answer their Pamphlets, and desired Time to recollect what those Pamphlets were, and then withdrew.

After some Time he was call'd in again, and asked the following Questions, viz.

If he could charge any Persons or Persons in the Kingdom, with the Matters affect'd by him in that Paragraph?

To which he Answer'd, That he did not know any such Person.

Then he was ask'd, Whether he had heard any other Persons say, That they could charge any Person whatsoever with the Matters contain'd in that Paragraph?

He said, he did not know of any such Person.

Being further ask'd, If he had any other Grounds besides the Pamphlets, and what those Pamphlets were?

He said, He had no other Grounds besides the Pamphlets; and named the several Pamphlets following, as the Ground of writing that Paragraph, viz.

The Two Legion Letters; The Black List; The True Popish Anglican; and Salvator's Reasons for invading upon the Privilege of House.

And being ask'd, If in any one of these Pamphlets there was any thing false about setting aside the present Queen?

He answer'd, he did not remember there was.

Then, he being withdrawn, the said Paragraph was taken into Consideration, and it was propos'd to pass a Censure thereupon.

And after Debate,

This Question was put, That a Censure shall be now put upon the said Paragraph.

It was Resolv'd in the Affirmative.

Then this Question was put, That in the Preface of the Book, intitled, The History of the last Parliament, begun at Westminster the Tenth Day of February, is the Twelfth Year of the Reign of King William, Anno Domini 1700, there are several Expressions, which are Groundless, False, and Scandalous, tending to create Jealousies in Her Majesty of Her People, and to cause great Misunderstandings, Fears, and Disputes amongst the Queen's Subjects, and to disturb the Peace and Quiet of the Kingdom.

It was Resolv'd in the Affirmative.

It is Resolv'd and Declared by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That as the Preface of a Book, intitled, The History of the last Parliament, begun at Westminster the Tenth Day of February, is the Twelfth Year of the Reign of King William, Anno Domini 1700, there are several Expressions, which are Groundless, False, and Scandalous, tending to create Jealousies in Her Majesty of Her People, and to cause great Misunderstandings, Fears, and Disputes amongst the Queen's Subjects, and to disturb the Peace and Quiet of the Kingdom.

It is Order'd by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That Her Majesty's Attorney-General do forthwith officiously prosecute the said Doctor Drake for having writ the said Paragraph.

The Proceedings and Rejection of the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, on Tuesday the Twelfth of May, 1702, upon the Paragraphs contain'd in Page 89 and 90, of the Book, intitled, Tom Double returns'd out of the Country: Or, The True Picture of a Modern Whig, set forth in a Second Dialogue between Mr. Whigmore and Mr. Double, at the Rammer Tavern in Queen-street.

Die Mercurii, 12 Martii, 1702.

THE Order being Read for the Master and Wardens of the Stationers Company, and John Noss, to attend, to give an Account of what they have done in Order to find out the Author and Printers of the Book, intitled, Tom Double returns'd out of the Country: Or, The True Picture of a Modern Whig, set forth in a Second Dialogue between Mr. Whigmore and Mr. Double, at the Rammer Tavern in Queen-street. They were call'd up, and Mr. Noss said, That Mr. Barber, the Printer, gave him the Book to Publish, and they withdrew.

Then the House went into Consideration of the Paragraphs in the 89th and 90th Pages of the said Book, which were read, as followeth, viz.

* Whigmore. I find we have miscarried in one great Design, the Train would not take, we were very far upon it just before the Parliament met, all the Whig Coffee-Houses rung how necessary 'twas to break into the Acts of Settlement, and to exclude—

* Double. Marm, Whigmore, talk no more upon the Subject, I beseech you; fifth Orders are issued out, and sure we are not rising enough to make it go, and that on the contrary it has alarm'd and provok'd all sorts of Men, we are now brook'd to lay, That never any such Thing was intended by us Party, tho' I well know, it was the whole Delicacy of all our Clubs. Under the Reck, this was one of those Embellish'd that spread about in the year of December last; but tho' it is not feasible to bring it in it now, never fear our abandoning a wicked Design, we never quit by side any Mischief; however, since it has already open'd the Eyes of a great many, and weaken'd out honest among several of our own Side, when (with Grief of Mind I speak it) we cannot work up to be guilty of so much Injustice, let us take all Occasions of declaring, That we will not violate their Acts upon any Account whatsoever; which we may the more fully do, because you know 'tis our Principle, not to think that we are bound by any Restrictions we make, either in Private or in Public; and 'tis one of the great Advantages we have over the rest of our Fellow-Subjects, that we can fetter the Conferences of others, while our own are as perfect Liberty.

Then it was propos'd to pass the same Censure on these Passages, as was propos'd on Part of the Preface of Dr. Drake's Book.

After Debate, the Question was put, Whether the House shall be now adjourn'd?

It was resolv'd in the Negative.

Then this Question was propos'd,

That in the Paragraphs which have been read, contain'd in the 89th and 90th Pages of the Book, intitled, Tom Double returns'd out of the Country, &c. there are several Expressions which are Groundless, False, and Scandalous, tending to create Jealousies in Her Majesty of Her People, and to cause great Misunderstandings, Fears, and Disputes amongst the Queen's Subjects, and to disturb the Peace and Quiet of the Kingdom.

Then this Question was put,

Whether the Words, Groundless, False, and Scandalous, shall be left out of the Question?

It was resolv'd in the Negative.

Then the main Question was put,

That in the Paragraphs which have been read, contain'd in the 89th and 90th Pages of the Book, intitled, Tom Double returns'd out of the Country, &c. there are several Expressions which are Groundless, False, and Scandalous, tending to create Jealousies in Her Majesty of Her People, and to cause great Misunderstandings, Fears, and Disputes amongst the Queen's Subjects, and to disturb the Peace and Quiet of the Kingdom.

It was Resolv'd in the Affirmative.

ing very many Reflections on King Charles the First of ever-blessed Memory, and tending to the Subversion of the Monarchy.

It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That the Pamphlet, intitled, Animadversions upon the two last Sermons of January Sermon: One preached before the Honourable House of Commons: The other in the Lower House of Convocation: In a Letter, shall be burnt by the Hands of the Common Hangman, in the Old Palace-Yard, Westminster, on Friday, the 22d Day of this Instant May, between the Hours of One and Two of the Clock in the Afternoon of the said Day.

To the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, and every of them.

THEN the House took into Consideration a Book, intitled, A Sermon preached on January the 30th, 1702-2, in King Henry the Second's Chapel, before the Reverend Clergy of the Lower House of Convocation, by W. Binchey, D. D. a Prelate for the Diocese of Litchfield and Coventry (s). And some Fairs, or Panegyrics, out of the ninth, tenth, and thirteenth Pages of the said Book being read, as followeth, viz.

* And last, As to the near Resemblance between the Parties concerned, as well the Actors as the Sufferers, comparing those in the Text with those of the Day.

* And here, one would imagine, the latter were referred to take St. Paul's Expression in the most literal Sense the Words will bear, and cruelly to scourge the Lord a stripe, and so the next Likeness that could be, put him to an Open Shame. II. with Respect to the Dignity of the Person, to have been born King of the Jews, was what ought to have screened one from Violence, here is also one, not only born to a Crown, but actually possessed of it. He was not only called King by some, and at the same Time, derided by others for being so called, but he was acknowledged by all to be a King; he was not just deified up for an Hour or two in Purple Robes, and Laid with a Hair King; but the usual Ornaments of Majesty were his customary Apparel; his Subjects owned him to be their King, and yet they brought him before a Tribunal; they judged him they condemned him; and that they might not be wanting in any Thing to set him at naught, they put upon him, and treated him with the same Contempt. Our Saviour's declaring that his Kingdom was not of this World, might like look a Sort of Remuneration of his Temporal Sovereignty, for the present deferring only to reign in the Hearts of Men; but here was nothing of this in the Case before us; here was an indisputable, unrenounced Right of Sovereignty, both by the Laws of God and Man; he was the reigning Prince, and the Lord's Anointed; and yet, in despite of all Laws, both Human and Divine, he was by direct Force of Arms, and the most daring Methods of a flagrant Rebellion and Violence, deprived at once of his Imperial Crown and Life.

* The Fact of this Day was such a yring with the first Arch-Rebel, the Apostate Angel, Lucifer; it was such a going beyond the Old Serpent in his own Way of Insultence and Pride, that it is no Wonder he then began to raise his Head, and set up for Dominion in this World, when thus warned and rebuked by a very Zeal in Rome, and Rage in others, to the Degree of Drunkenness, cursing afar, and cursing themselves in Royal Blood, and in which respect only, heated to the Degree of Frenzy and Madness, the Plea in my Text may seem to have some hold of them, Forso, for give them, for they know not what they do.

After Debate thereupon, it being proposed to censure these Panegyrics, the House came to the following Resolution:

It is Resolved and Declared by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That in the Book intitled, A Sermon preached on January the 30th, 1702-2, in King Henry the Second's Chapel, before the Reverend Clergy of the Lower House of Convocation, by W. Binchey, D. D. a Prelate for the Diocese of Litchfield and Coventry, there are several Expressions that give just Scandal and Offence to all Christian People.

Then it being proposed to burn this Sermon, this Question was put, Whether the Sermon shall be burnt?

It was Resolved in the Negative.

It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That the Resolution above recited shall be communicated to the Lord Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry.

Complaint being made to the House, of two Pamphlets in the Pamphlet, intitled, I. Reasons for Addressing his Majesty to invite into England their Highnesses, the Elector of D. and the Electoral Prince of Hannover, and likewise, II. Reasons for Attaining and Abjuring the pretended Prince of Wales, and all others pretending any Claim, Right, or Title from the late King James and Queen Mary. With Arguments for making a vigorous War against France. The Pamphlets were read to the House, and are as followeth, viz.

* It appears from History, that all free People have for a while the Children of Tyrois for Reasons of eternal and universal Force, as inheriting the Principles and Designs of their Parents, bearing an Affection to their Friends, and using a Revenge to their Enemies, as more likely to prevail at a greater Power than even their Parents, the better to secure themselves from those Designs, and being under extraordinary Obligations to those foreign Potentates who protected or relieved them.

XXXI. * In fact, whether the Abjuration be penal or voluntary, (for I cannot doubt of one or the other) I hope Can will be taken that it is intended, as I said before, in all Manner of Persons, not excepting the King's Majesty, or her Royal Highness the Princess of Denmark. For all the Secretaries we give to them, from which I am the fatherly of any Man in the World. But they both of them very well know what Issues and Schemes our Enemies have been actively spreading to smother and annihilate the People; they have whispered horrible Things of blind and circular Bargains; but CÉSAR's Wife ought to be unsuspected as well as innocent.

L. The Evidence given at the Bar of the House of Commons, upon the Complaint of Sir JOHN PAXINGTON, against WILLIAM Lord Bishop of Worcester, and Mr. LLOYD, his Son. Together with the Proceedings of the House of Commons thereupon. 1702. 2 A. (d)

Luna 2 die Novembris, 1702.

A Complaint being made to the House by Sir John Paxington, against the Lord Bishop of Worcester, and Mr. Lloyd his Son, relating to the Rights and Privileges of the House of Commons;

Resolved, That a Day be appointed to take into Consideration the said Complaint. Ordered, That the same be taken into Consideration upon Wednesday the Eighteenth Day of November Instant.

Morarii 18 die Novembris, 1702.

The House (according to the Order of the Day) proceeded to take into Consideration the Complaint made by Sir John Paxington, the second Instance, against the Lord Bishop of Worcester, and Mr. Lloyd, his Son, relating to the Rights and Privileges of the House of Commons. And Sir John Paxington in his First acquainted the House, That he had reduced the Matter of the said Complaint into several Heads, which he read in his Place, and are as follow:

I. THAT from after the last Parliament rose, the Bishop of Worcester took upon him to send to me to do my part in standing in it, called Knight for that Cause, and to recover me, that if I would not do so, he should think himself obliged to speak against me in his Clergy.

II. He first sent Letters himself, and his Secretary first others, in several of his Clergy, with Directions to make what Interest they could against me in their several Parishes, and where they could not prevail with such words would say for me in his last Election, to give a Vote for me or with the other Candidates, they should defend them to day at Home; and in order to this his Lordship sent some Copies of the said of their respective Parishes.

III. He offered me in his Clergy, promising me and my Anguish with several Pious; and at his Conference and Election, called his Clergy to vote against me, representing me as very unfit to serve in Parliament, and threatening them with his Displeasure, if they did not vote against me.

IV. He offered me and my Anguish to several of the Laity, who were his Tenants, and threatened them, that if they would not vote against me, they should never receive my Estate under him, and that he would put his Affairs upon them, that his Successors should not suffer them or their Children to receive my vote.

V. Mr. Lloyd, the Bishop's Son, offered me, and gave scandalous Characters of me to several Freeholders, whom he solicited to vote against me, and told them, I would for bringing us a French Government.

VI. The Bishop's Secretary offered me several Freeholders in the late Election, representing me as unfit to sit in the House, threatening them with the Bishop's Displeasure, and told they might as well vote for the Prince of Wales as for me.

(s) It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That the Resolution and Proceedings above-recited, shall be forthwith Printed and Published.

(s) It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That the Resolution and Proceedings above-recited shall be forthwith Printed and Published.

(s) Morarii 18 die Novembris, 1702. Ordered, That the Evidence given at the Bar of this House, upon the Charge of Sir John Paxington, against William Lord Bishop of Worcester, and Mr. Lloyd his Son, be printed; together with the Proceedings of this House thereupon.

he should run a Sword against him, as offer him that Affront, saying at home should not have his turn. This was such a great Examination would you against Sir John Pakington, he should never renew any thing with him; and he would set such a Mark upon him to show his Successors, that neither this Examination, nor any of his, should ever cease their Effects any more. This Examination answered, My Lord, you have often told me, that I and my Ancestors have told our Estate under the Bishoprick for many Hundred Years, as appears by your Books; and I hope your Lordship will not do to fill a thing as to run me and my Children: His Lordship replied, It is your own Fault, you may thank yourself for it. Being asked, Who he voted for? He said, for Sir John Pakington only.

Mr. Robert Wilson being examined, said, That presently after Mr. Lloyd, the Lord Bishop's Son, came from London, before the last Election, he first for that Examination, he professed him to give his Vote for Mr. Bromley and Mr. Walshe. This Examination told him, that he had promised Sir John Pakington already. Mr. Lloyd told him, he was sorry, but he could not give him his Vote, for he was unfit to be a Parliament Man, for he was a Whoremonger and a Drunkard. He told this Examination then he must engage to stay at home and not vote; and bid him consider of it, and come to him again. Accordingly this Examination went to Mr. Lloyd on Monday, who asked him if he had altered his Resolution of voting for Sir John Pakington. This Examination insisted, that he had given his Promise: Mr. Lloyd told him he was acquitted from that Promise; for Sir John was a very unfit Person. That he inherited his Father's Lust, Gratitude's Vice, and not his Grandfather's Virtues: That he would have him stay at home and protect himself; and then he would have persuaded him to pretend to be sick. But this Examination still insisted that he had given his Promise to Mr. Walshe, to vote for Sir John Pakington. Mr. Lloyd then told this Examination, That Sir John Pakington voted for being in a French Government, and so did Mr. Walshe, and all that Party: And if this Examination did not please the said Mr. Lloyd in his Voting, this Examination must never come near him more.

At the time of the Election Mr. Lloyd came to this Examination, at the Booth where the Election was, and told him, he was better than his Word, for he had not only voted for Sir John Pakington, but made Intereſt for him; and further told this Examination, He would be even with him. And accordingly, when this Examination was Hunting with him after the Election, he sent his Servants and broke open this Examination's Stable Door, and took away his Settop-Dog, and his Gun and Nets, which this Examination had Leave from him to keep in the Lord Bishop's Manor, and the said Mr. Lloyd had often made use of them for his own Diversion: And when he complained to Mr. Lloyd about it, he reproached this Examination for having voted and made Intereſt for Sir John Pakington, and reminded him of his Promise at the Election, That he would be even with him. This Examination further said, That he had been, before the Dog was taken, to wait upon the said Mr. Lloyd, and offered him to put away his Dog, Gun and Nets, of the which any Offence; and that Mr. Lloyd said he need not do that, that those were Trifles, and therefore this Examination thought he would have fined his Dog: Mr. Lloyd replied, If I had told you what I intended, you would have sent your Dog away. This Examination being asked, Whether there was any Warrant for breaking open his Stable, said, That he understood Mr. Lloyd had granted a Warrant to take his Dog and Nets, but that there was no Comable with them when they broke open the Door.

Mr. Richard Grym being examined, said, That Mr. Lloyd, the first Sunday after he came home, asked this Examination whether he had promised his Vote for any one, and for whom? He replied, he had promised Sir John Pakington. Mr. Lloyd told this Examination he did very ill to promise before the Lord Bishop came down; and that he should have his Lord's ill Will if he voted for Sir John Pakington, for he was not a fit Man to sit in Parliament, for he was to bring in a French Government. Four or five Days before the Election, Mr. Lloyd sent to this Examination again, and desired him to vote for Mr. Bromley and Mr. Walshe. This Examination replied, that he ought to be as good as his Word, having promised Sir John Pakington. Mr. Lloyd then told him, he should have the Lord Bishop's ill Will, and would have him stay at home. This Examination then said, he would go, because he had promised. Upon that Mr. Lloyd replied, If you do go, I with you may be lame a Month after it. At another time, Mr. Knave, the Lord Bishop's Secretary, desired this Examination to stay at home, and not appear for Sir John Pakington, for the Bishop would be very angry with him if he should. This Examination answered him, that he had taken in a Piece of Land, and that Mr. Knave told this Examination, that since he would not please my Lord Bishop in voting against Sir John Pakington, he would throw open his Inclosure; and accordingly the said Inclosure was twice thrown open, and his Quick Hedge taken away: And that one Groggins, a Servant of the bishop's, told this Examination that he did it by Mr. Evans's Order.

Mr. Evans being examined, said, That some few Days before the last Election, there was a Meeting of some Neighbours, where Mr. Evans, the Bishop's Secretary, was present. Mr. Evans told the Company, they were all honest Men of one mind, except Mr. Mansard, pointing to this Examination's son, for, says he, he is the only Man that will vote for Sir John Pakington, who is not fit to be a Parliament Man, for he is a Drunkard and a Lover of Women: Which put this Examination into a Passion, and caused him to swear, and the said Mr. Evans pretended to number the Oaths by his Barman. Afterwards the said Mr. Evans sent the Bishop's Keeper in Mr. Evans's Name, to fetch this Examination to him, who told him, he must pay five Pounds for Swearing, but it he would vote for Mr.

Bromley and Mr. Walshe, he would remit it. This Examination told him, he would consider of it. Mr. Evans told him, he had as good vote for the Prince of Wales as for Sir John Pakington. Being asked, who told him he would remit the Five Pounds; he answered, Mr. Evans.

Thomas Tauty, Gent. being examined, said, That the Day before the last Election, being in the College Church at Worcester, just as his Lordship went out of the Church, Mr. Evans the Bishop's Secretary came to this Examination, from his Lordship, and told him, That his Lordship hoped this Examination would not vote for Sir John Pakington, for that Sir John was a very ill Man, and voted ill in the House of Commons. This Examination replied, if he voted at all, he should vote fairly for Sir John Pakington. And this Examination asked Mr. Evans, What was the Reason his Lordship made such Intereſt against Sir John Pakington. He told him, that Sir John Pakington had abused his Lordship; and asked this Examination if he had been the Governor of a Churchwarden, and of a Lay Churchwarden. This Examination asked him, if the Lord Bishop had wrote his Character of a Churchwarden: He said, he could not tell, but that his Lordship had been and approved it; and that his Lordship did not think Sir John Pakington a fit Person to represent the County. And then he was ordered to withdraw.

Sir John Pakington inform'd the House, That he had several other Persons to speak to the last Particulars that the Witnesses had already given their Evidence to: But that having detain'd the House so long already, he would submit what his Witnesses had said to the Judgment of the House, and so withdrew.

Whereupon the House, after mature Consideration, came to the following Resolutions:

Resolved Nemine Contradictore, That Sir John Pakington by his Evidence fully made out the Charge which he Exhibited against the Lord Bishop of Worcester.

Resolved Nemine Contradictore, That Sir John Pakington has by Evidence fully made out the Charge against Mr. Lloyd, the said Lord Bishop's Son.

Resolved, That it appears to this House, That the Proceedings of William Lord Bishop of Worcester, his Son, and his Agents, in order to the undoing of the Election of a Member for the County of Worcester, has been Malicious, Unlawful, and Arbitrary, in high Violation of the Liberties and Privileges of the Commons of England.

Resolved, That a humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, That she will be graciously pleased to remove William Lord Bishop of Worcester from being Lord Almoner to Her Majesty.

Ordered, That the said Resolution and Address be presented to Her Majesty by four Members of this House as are of Her Majesty's most Honourable Privy-Council.

Ordered, That the further Consideration of the Matter relating to the Lord Bishop of Worcester, be adjourned till this Day Sevennight.

Ordered, That Mr. Attorney-General do prosecute Mr. Lloyd, the Lord Bishop of Worcester's Son, for his said Offences, after his Privilege as a Member of the Lower House of Convocation is out.

Parliament doth Novemb. 1702.

Mr. Comptroller reported to the House, That their Resolution and Address to Her Majesty for the removing William Lord Bishop of Worcester, from being Lord Almoner to Her Majesty, had been presented to Her Majesty; and that Her Majesty was pleased to give this most gracious Answer:

I AM very sorry that there is Occasion for this Address against the Bishop of Worcester: I shall order and direct, that he shall no longer continue to supply the Place of Almoner, but I will put another in his Room to perform that Office.

Resolved, That the most humble Thanks of this House be returned to Her Majesty, for Her Majesty's most Gracious Answer to their Address relating to William Lord Bishop of Worcester.

Ordered, That Mr. Comptroller of Her Majesty's Household do return the said most humble Thanks of this House to Her Majesty.

Parliament 25th Novemb. 1702.

The Order of the Day for taking into further Consideration the Matter relating to the Lord Bishop of Worcester, being read.

Ordered, That the Evidence given at the Bar of this House, upon the Charge of Sir John Pakington against William Lord Bishop of Worcester, and Mr. Lloyd his Son, be printed; together with the Proceedings of this House thereupon.

Ordered, That the Clerk's Books in relation to the said Evidence be examined; and that Mr. Speaker do take Care of the Printing the said Evidence and Proceedings.

Ordered, That the further Consideration of the Matter relating to the Lord Bishop of Worcester be adjourned till this Day Sevennight.—The further Consideration of this Affair was twice adjourn'd, and then dropt.

* The Lords, shew'd it to their own Proceedings of the Commons, as well a Member of their Honorable Assembly, and one who was intimately conversant with his Privy, Clergy, and Learning, did on the 19th inst. upon an Address to the Queen, wherein they desired her Majesty to be pleas'd to give leave to the said Examination, to be heard in open Court, and to be heard by other Subjects of England, to have an Opportunity of making his Defence, before he should say any Part of Parliament; and thereupon the House desired Her Majesty, That she would be pleas'd not to give the Lord Bishop of Worcester from the Place of Lord Almoner, nor to give any Mark of her favour towards him, till he be found guilty of some Crime, by that Court of Law. Which being presented to the Queen on the 20th, Her Majesty made the following Answer:

I agree that every Peer and Lord of Parliament, and indeed every one in Person, ought to have an Opportunity of being heard, by any Masters selected amongst themselves, before he is punished. I have not yet received any Complaint of the Bishop of Worcester, but I had upon it no unbounded Right to continue or discontinue any Peer.

The said Peer the Lord Bishop and declared unanimously, that they did not think it their Duty to suffer any Peer of Parliament, by any Proceedings of the House of Commons, otherwise than according to the known and usual Rules and Methods of Parliament. On the other hand, the said Learned Secretary, Comptroller of Her Majesty's Household, having attended the Queen with the Resolutions and Address of the Commons, for the removing the Bishop of Worcester from being Lord Almoner to Her Majesty, she was pleas'd to advise in April. *Annals of Queen Anne, Vol. I. Mr. Speaker, (Mr. Harley, afterwards Earl of Oxford) after the Reports were over, told the House, That he thought it to be his Duty to put them in mind of the great Consequence and Importance of this Matter, and that it behooved them to take very great Caution in their Proceedings, not only that the Grounds and Foundation be good, but also that the Method and Manner of treating it be according to ancient Usage and Custom of Parliament: And to that End he desired the House would give him Leave to shew this Matter, as it appeared to him, and according to what occurred upon the failures to his Memory, that the House might take proper Measures upon this Occasion.

Mr. Speaker then proceeded to give the House an Account of the State of Elections by Custom or Common Law, and that the great Alteration in Point of Elections was in the Beginning of Hen. IV's Time, since whose Reign the Return for Parliament have been made by Indenture. That by the Statute of 7 H. IV. there is a Method prescribed of Election and Return, and the Creation he took to be that: H. IV. came to the Succession of the Crown by the Deposition of R. II. when the Parliament was sitting. That Parliament was continued to H. V's Time: For tho' in the Rolls it was call'd a New Parliament, and Returns were made as by the Sheriffs of the Counties, and also by the Boroughs, as if it was a new Parliament; yet it was the same Parliament, but they were the same Men, and there were two Days between one Parliament and the other, to have a new Election. But Hen. IV. having made such an extraordinary Step, he would not leave it as a Precedent to be found out. Afterwards, when Times were a little more settled, in his fifth Year, and that Practice was necessary to be condemn'd, it was provided, at the great Complaint of the Commons, that it should be done by Indenture, that the time or like Decree should never be put upon the Kingdom afterwards, and one Part was to be kept below. This continued for about four Years, when there was another Complaint of the Proceedings of Sheriffs (he said he need not mention the Regulation of forty Shillings a Year, and some other Things which are not directly to this Case); and upon that there was a Penalty put upon the Sheriffs of a hundred Pounds, which he took to be in the eleventh Year, and it was put under the Inquiry of Judges of Assize, and so it stood all that King's Reign till H. V. And there there was another Law made for Elections and Elections, that they should be all returned. Some of the Law Books give a pretty Confusion of it, that there was such a Law, yet the Custom of Parliament was to be the Rule. But he said he thought it to be a better Confusion, That it being then reckon'd a Service, and a hard Service, none but Residents in the Borough were compellable. Thus it continued till about H. VI's Time, and then if the Sheriffs had made a wrong Return, if indicted or prosecuted at the Assize, there was to be immediate Execution for the Hundred Pounds, without any Traverse. Upon this there was a Statute so allow the Sheriff a Traverse for this Hundred Pounds, and the Sheriff not to be liable to it till he legally convicted, &c. and that was about a Year afterwards, that the Parliament was call'd it necessary to make another Act about H. VI. and then there was great Complaint again of the ill Proceedings of Sheriffs: And the Law was enforced again, and it was declared who should be the Elections, and the Sheriff was made liable to the Penalty of an Hundred Pounds, and Imprisonment without Bail or Mainprize, and it was enforceable by the Judges of Assize. Another Statute was made the 10 H. VI. which enforce the Manner of Elections, so it stood. Then 23 H. VI. there are two Statutes, one relating to the Wages of Knights, Citizens and Burgesses, and how they should be levied; another relating the Statute of H. V. and H. VI. and it says, That there were not sufficient Penalties on Sheriffs, who besides that sometimes they sent no Writs to Boroughs, made insufficient Returns, &c. And the Mayors and Burghs were above the fine; and therefore over and above the first Penalty of a Hundred Pounds, they had another Penalty of an Hundred Pounds more, which was to the Plaintiff, with Costs of Suit, and this was to be tried before the Judges of Assize, and the Courts at Westminster, and at the Sessions; and the Clerk was to be either for a Knight, or Burgh, or any other Person that would bring the same, but within a Time limited, three Months from the Commencement of the Parliament. Then Election stood in Point of Law, till the modern Alteration within every Body's Memory. And he hop'd whatever time Gentlemen took this Matter into Consideration, they would do it as became the House of Commons, and examine all Particulars, as well as the Judgments of Law, and they would do what became a House of Commons, and that nobody would fear the Dignity of the House of Commons impair'd. And however Differences were between them in other Talents, they would be unanimous in preserving the Rights of the Commons, and of doing it in a right and judicious Manner: And offer'd to their Consideration, whether it would not be best to proceed in the old Method, by going into a grand Committee for the Courts of Justice to consider this Matter, and that by taking this Course, they would walk in the Steps of their Predecessors, and avoid many Inconveniences, which were tally to be gotten when they happened, by taking another Course.

But it being moved and seconded, to consider of the said Reports in a Committee of the whole House, the Question was put, and carry'd, That from even the King in like Matters. The tenth of these Instances is above two Hundred Years ago, and neither of them make any thing for a Power in the Lords to determine the Elections of the Commons; but on the contrary, rather for a Power to be delegated by the King, and the Instances are but Two.

Now, I say, Sir, we are, and have been in Possession of this Right for a very great Length of Time, and have it confirmed to us by Act of Parliament; for the late Act of 7 and 8 of King William, hath in effect declared, that the Determination of the Right of the Electors is in the House of Commons; for they say, that the Sheriffs and Officers of all Seats, shall follow the full Determination of the House of Commons, as to Rule and Guide in such Cases. And surely nothing is more absurd than to say, that this House full examine, try, and determine who are elected; and yet Wynbiller-Hall, and the Lords shall examine and determine the Right of the Electors: How can any one examine the Election, but the first Step he takes must be to consider and determine who are the Electors? And the determining the one, is determining the other.

I would trouble you a little with the Reasons they give why this Action should lie. It hath been said, and I think 'tis true, for the Honour of England, and I believe it hardly can be found to fail, That where a Man hath a Right, and a Wrong done him, he is forbidden to have a Remedy; but now here is the Application of this Rule. We shew above, by the same Law that settles the Right, and declares the Wrong, in consequence where the Remedy is to be had. For though you have a Remedy, you mislay that which is the proper Remedy, and the same Law that settles the Right, and declares the Wrong, gives the Remedy, you must then go to the Place where the Law directs you Remedy, not where you think would desire the Remedy. Therefore, says my Lord Coke, in his Preface to his 4th report, and likewise 11 and 15. We have several Jurisdictions, some Ecclesiastical, some Temporal, &c. some governed by one Law, and some by another; and all must have their Rules and Bounds, which must be observed. If your Right be Ecclesiastical, as for Instance, before the Statute of Tithes, could you in Wynbiller-Hall have brought your Action? Or if this had been joined as such an Action, and the Parties had gone to Trial, will any body say, but that the Judges must have reversed Judgment, and said that 'twas out of their Jurisdiction? If a Lord of a Manor should refuse to admit a Man, so when a Surrender is made of a Copyhold Estate, the Lord has done him Wrong, and Damage too; but yet he cannot bring his Action at Law for it, for it is an equitable Right, and he must go to a Court of Equity for his Remedy, and so I could put a thousand Instances, but I will not spend your Time. So that I say, 'tis not enough to say you have a Right, and must have a Remedy, and therefore you may bring your Action at the Common Law; but you must seek it in a proper Place, though perhaps Costs and Damages, and a Trial by a Jury, may become defensible by the Party.

Now, Sir, I would know, Whether that is not a Matter of Parliamentary Jurisdiction, and also a Parliamentary Right? Is any Thing more plain? He that hath a Right to vote, hath a Right to send a Person to represent him, and sit in Parliament; therefore 'tis a Parliamentary Right: Where then shall he find his Remedy? In the House of Commons, where you have a Right to send a Person to sit and represent you; there you may complain, I was denied my Vote, or misused upon the Election. This, by the Law of Parliament, shall be examined here, and for this Purpose you constantly appoint a Standing Committee of Electors.

Indeed I cannot but wonder at the bringing of this new-invented Action, for if there be any thing certain in the Common Law, 'tis this, That where you claim a Right to any thing, it must be founded upon common Usage in that Cafe, or in some Cafe that carries the same Reason, and is just like it; for the Common Law, generally speaking, is nothing else but Common Usage. Now let us see for the Usage in this Cafe, and whether there has been any thing like this Action before. Say they, How do you know but such Actions have been brought before? I do not for that there can be a stronger Negative Proof in any other Cafe than in this; for we have had Parliaments, as appears by our Statutes in Print, for five hundred Years, and we have had Parliaments in every Reign since, and in several Reigns a great many Parliaments: And let us consider, whether this Cafe would not have happened frequently in five hundred Years, in so many Elections in Counties, Boroughs, and Cities, where there are such infinite Numbers of Electors. And therefore this Cafe must frequently have happened if such an Action lay at Law. If it be asked, How do I know that such an Action hath not been brought before? I answer, 'Tis wonderfully plain there never was such an Action brought before; for as we have our Acts of Parliament in Print, so we have faithful Reports of all our Law-Cases, which we call the Year-Books, and which are Memorials of all Cases so long back as from E. II's Time, that is, 400 Years, followed by a Series of Reports till this Time, and are now grown so numerous, that they become a Burthen. And I will desire any Gentleman of the Law here, or in England, to shew me the Footstep of any such Action as this, or of this Kind till now, ever brought before. We have always said, Our Parliaments were never Alters, and greater than our own; and so they were: But such an Action as this never came into their Thoughts.

But it may be said, How does it appear that there was Occasion for these kind of Actions formerly, for Men heretofore were unwilling to sit in Parliament, they were hired, and almost forced to it, and it was hard to get Men to come up? I answer, It was so for otherwise for many Years past, that so early as H. IV.'s Time, there were great Complaints about Elections, and the Sheriffs in these Days were apt to do wrong, as appears by 7 H. IV. cap. 15. And therefore 21 H. IV. cap. 1. there was appointed One Hundred Pounds Penalty to the King, on the Sheriff that did not do his Duty, according as the Statute does direct. So that it does appear there was Occasion for these Actions, if they had lain by Law; and yet you will find that never till 23 H. VI. did it enter into the Thoughts of any Man, that an Action at Common Law could be brought for an Injury as an Election; and therefore that Act recites, that there was not before that Time a sufficient Remedy for the Party grieved, and therefore gives a Hundred Pounds to the Party, as well for a Knight, and Forty Pounds for a Clerk or Burgess, and that by a Law made on purpose to help the Party to an Action where there was no such Remedy before. That it recited all the former Cafe between Neill and Stride, in a Sidley, 11 168. (in that Times they first five Knights of the Shire out of Berkshire) Mr. Neill brought his Action against Stride the Sheriff; and he alleged, that he being One of the Five chosen for that Cause, Stride had maliciously and fully refused to return him, &c. and the Jury gave him Fifteen Hundred Pounds Damages. This Action made a great Noise, and the Judges looked upon it as a great Novelty, and thought fit to consult the Parliament in it; (in former Days in Matters relating to the Parliament, they used to consult the Parliament) and the Judges heretofore when they were asked their Opinions in difficult Matters relating to the Privileges, or Law of Parliament, would say, This was above us, and therefore to be decided by Parliament. And this Cafe being referred to the Parliament, they looked upon it as so extraordinary an Attempt, that though Mr. Neill had a Verdict for fifteen hundred Pounds Damages, yet he never got a Farthing of the Money, or any Benefit by the Verdict: Sed de domo.

After this, came the great Cafe that hath been mentioned of Stuart and Barnardiston; and methinks that deserves very much our Consideration, and how far the Determination of the House of Peers ought to be a Rule in this very Cafe. This Cause fell forth with great Prospect of Success: Sir Samuel Barnardiston in this Cafe, did not fight the Determination of the House of Commons, but felt petitioned this House as the proper Place to determine his Rights, and had it decided for him. That it was the Petition did, indeed, and the other Return was taken off the 11th, and then he brought his Action at Common Law, and laid forth this whole Matter, and that the Sheriff fully and maliciously returned another writ him, whereby he was kept out of his Right, &c. a long Time, and put to very great Expence and Costs. This Case to be tried at the Bar of the King's Bench, and there was a Verdict given for Sir Samuel Barnardiston for eight hundred Pounds. This was looked upon as a great Cafe, and my Lord Chief-Justice Hale bid all Persons about him take Notice, that they did not determine the Right of the Electors, for the Judgment in this Cafe belonged to the Parliament; but, first, since the House of Commons had determined the Right, he thought they might follow their Judgment, insofar as in Damages, and to give Judgment for the Damages the Jury had given the Plaintiff.

This Cafe was looked upon to improper for the Common Law, that upon a Writ of Error brought in the Exchequer-Chamber, that Judgment was reversed, because the Common Law could not any way accommodate with Elections to Parliament, further than was directed by Acts of Parliament. It might have been said, and I know 'twas said, that the Reversal of this Judgment was by an extraordinary high Hand: And therefore, upon the Revolution, as the very beginning of King William's Reign, Sir Samuel Barnardiston brought a Writ of Error in Parliament, complaining, that in the Exchequer-Chamber they had reversed this Judgment unjustly, and against what their Reasons, as may be observed from the Journal of the House of Lords, which were the Reasons of some very low proceeding Lords.

First, Because it was a denying Sir Samuel Barnardiston the Benefit of the Law, which gives Relief as to all Writs and Injuries, and here is a very great Damage to the Plaintiff, and therefore he ought to be repaired.

Secondly, Say they, if it should be allowed that Suffragan, and Ballivus may make false Returns, and no Remedy but a Hundred Pounds Fortnight, it would be of dangerous Consequence, and might lead to the packing of a House of Commons, which may overturn the whole Constitution. But the Peers then did not think these Reasons sufficient for this new Action at Common Law, and accordingly the House of Peers affirmed the Judgment of Reversal in the Exchequer-Chamber, and said, that the Judgment was well reversed; for that no such Action did lie at the Common Law, though the Injury done did tend to the Plaintiff's Damage; and all the other Matters which are now suggested, were insisted upon; and thus it stands to this Day. And yet now 'tis bid upon the same Reasons, the Action does lie for this Person, though he be only an Elector, and must receive much less Damage, than the Person elected; and there is no one Reason for the Elector, but holds more strongly for the Elector. The Elector cannot maintain an Action, and yet now 'tis said that one of the Electors may, though he can have no substantial Damage, for if a Man comes and gives his Vote (as here in this Cafe), 'tis not in the Power of the Officer to hinder him of the Benefit of it; his Vote will be as well given, as if the Officer had put it down, and thus with Respect both to the Person who gave the Vote, and him for whom he voted, and is really 'tis no substantial Damage to either Man.

The next Thing I shall mention to you is another Cafe of Mr. Oxley: He brought his Action against the Sheriff of Surrey for making such a Return upon him (I believe I have the Glasseman in my Eye who brought that Action) he declared in the same Manner that it was done fully and maliciously, and had a Trial and a

* Sir Joseph Boscawen in his Publication of the Fundamental Rights of the Commons of England, Page 30, 31th. In the Cafe of Stride and Neill, An. 1681, in an Action as the Case, against the Sheriff for a false Return, to the Damage of Neill, after Verdict for the Plaintiff, and 1000. Damages, the Court observed, that Neill obtained the Cafe into Parliament, proper distinction, Whether the Action did lie or not? Where it is to be observed, that it was so adjudged into the House of Peers, but into the House of Commons, as the only proper Judges, in all Cases of this Nature concerning Elections: To be careful were they of the Rights of the Commons.

And let not the Inquiry of those Times of Rebellion be objected to this Instance; the Arguments from thence extremely confirm the Right of the Commons: for it is confessed that Cromwell had this created a new House of Lords, and a great retrenching of a House of Commons to electors; but afterwards that in 1659 he had formed a new Model of an House of Commons, and overturned the Method of Election; in depriving all the Members of the County; yet the Name of a House of Commons remained; and even that was to be recovered in those Days, that none would attempt to deprive them of their electoral Privileges, of judging of Elections: No Instance could but the Judges; they thought it to be necessary, that they would not produce to intermeddle in it.

they called the Confederates of the Peace, Officers that were the first with our new Jubilee of the Peace, with the Difference only, while the Confederates made, these the Crown made. The Confederates had a great Power when they were to elect their Captains that I was in out to War, which hereafter they did, and had a Right to do so, till it was taken away from them by the Act, that sent to the Militia, then it was a very extraordinary Years before. The making of Sheriff, was given to the Crown; we have nothing left now but Names of Fines in the Court, and even that is to be empty, that the Jury is returned by an Officer that the Court puts upon the Country.

But yet I am not for carrying the Things further than we have a Right to do; I am for leaving what we have, and as the Reason I mention I mentioned upon the allowed Jurisdiction of the House of Commons, we have always allowed them a Right to take it out of the Writ of Error. The Parliament, in what I have said, did declare the Right of Justice to be one of the Rights of Peers, and I never found any Instance to the contrary, if the Party happens to be Masters of Law, and left the Fines to be tried by the Commons, nor did I ever know that Right of the Lords questioned till now.

A great deal hath been said for and against the Right of bringing this Action; I do not think that that is now at Question. The Question is, Whether a Judgment being given in the King's Bench, a Writ of Error does lie in the House of Lords? But whether a Writ of Error does lie in the House of Lords, then have we seen in the Cafe before you, that is another Thing. I speak in the Right of nothing but of this particular Writ of Error, nobody has denied, but that they have a Right to the Writ of Error of Error in general upon a Judgment given in the King's Bench, but by this, the Lords ought to see how to do it in this particular Cafe; and several Reasons have been given for it.

First, here is the Privilege of the House of Commons in question in the Cafe; That hath been argued and settled on; but I confess, that Argument does not influence me. The Lords have held Pleas of a Writ of Error, in which the Privilege of the Commons hath been in Question, and the Lords have done Rights to the Commons in it, particularly in that Matter of the Parliament of 1649, when they were supposed to have done irregular Things in the House of Commons, and were punished for it by the Commons in the King's Bench, and were sent in King Charles II. I am, whereupon a Writ of Error was brought in the House of Lords, and that Judgment reversed in the Time of King Charles II. But in the Lords did Right to the Commons in the Matter of Privilege of the Commons, for it was for trying Heals in the House of Commons, and I think every body has considered, when such an Argument is made by the House of Lords, and nobody ever said that they had a Right to do so. Some Things are to be seen, at opening, that by a Writ of Error in the House of Lords; and I believe, if you look a little back, there have been Judgments given in the House of Lords, not only in Matters of Law, but against the Privilege of the Commons, and the Judgments stand unreversed, though I think they are to be reversed, and I know to other Means to do so, but by Way of Error in the House of Lords. I think there is one Judgment given in the House of Commons, in the Year 1649, for Leasing Papers to be printed, which he did not do, and so on.

But is another said, that a Person hath no Cause by Order of this House, it was the Order of the House, and the House of Commons, the Party brought his Action, the Court gave him his Warrant, that it was done by Order of the House of Commons, and no Judgment was given against him, and this Judgment stands unreversed.

Now what Method have you to reverse these Judgments, but by Writ of Error? If you think to do it by a Bill in this House, that must likewise pass the House of Lords, and so will be the same Thing as a Writ of Error.

Another Thing is said, that this Person was not damaged, or if he was, there are such a Number of Persons who were then likewise damaged, that may bring their Actions, that nobody will exercise such an Office. I think that Argument ought not to prevail, for at that Rate you will allow the Officer not to be a Judge, but the supreme Judge, and the Parties damaged shall be without Relief, he may do what he pleases, and he shall never be questioned afterwards, save in this House, which I will consider by-and-by. This you say you punish as if they that misbehave himself in Matters of Elections, and that is punished now very much; but at the same Time you punish the Officer, the Person damaged hath no Satisfaction, though our Law allows Satisfaction in Cases where he himself the Wrong shall not be punished, and allows Satisfaction in all Cases where a Person is punishable, if another hath received a particular Damage.

A Third is said to be fixed to the King or Queen, that is a Privilege, but if he pays for much to the Party damaged, that is Satisfaction. If a Man's House be burnt into ashes, he shall not be punished, but the Person damaged shall have Satisfaction: But in this Cafe you allow the Officer shall be punished, but you will not allow the Man injured any Satisfaction for the Damage he has received, which cannot be supported by Reason, or by the Authority of any particular Case.

In all Cases I take it to be true, where a Man is punished for doing another Damage, the Person damaged shall have Satisfaction. But that Rule is to be held in the same Case.

I do not think there is any ground for our concern, and if you give every one an Action, it will be so bad of this Action, and therefore none shall have an Action. This is a strong Argument; if a Man injures one or two Persons, and shall have an Action for their respective Damages, but if he injures no more, more of them shall have an Action, as if when a Man is moderately angry, he shall make Satisfaction; but if he is excessively outrageous, he shall be satisfied, and make Satisfaction to none. This shall be made good either by Reason or Authority, which heretofore have been given. The Cafe cited, I own, is true, but you must take it in this full Sense, if any Thing is done which might have been of Damage to a hundred People, but was of Damage to none, none shall have their Action, though the Criminal shall be punished; but where there is particular Damage done to any Person, an Action will lie for the Damification of that Person. If a Man digs a Pit, any Man may fall into it, and no Person shall bring an Action for that; but if any Person do it so, and it hath particular Damage by it, he shall bring an Action, and have Satisfaction. And, with Submission, that Argument will not hold, that because a Person may be injured he shall be obliged to make Satisfaction for the Wrong he has done, therefore, he shall not make Satisfaction to any person at all, unless he hath damaged.

It hath been said, admitting it to be so, that the Party ought to have Satisfaction, yet he ought to take his Remedy as a proper Court, as if a Legacy was given, an Action would not lie in the Queen's Bench for it, which is true. But it would have been well if that Gentleman had told as which was the proper Court to which he had an Action the Wrong suggested to be in the Cafe. If the Sheriff's Bench be not the proper Court, what Court is? This is the House of Commons is a Court, I was always of Opinion was not the Court of Judicature, my Lord of Gough, and a Court of Record. I wonder, when all this is allowed, it should be in this Court hath not a Power to administer an Oath to a Witness; I think that will seem strange to any other Court whatsoever. Every Court or Record hath Power to administer an Oath, so much that this be a Court or Record, this is a Court, it is a Court. It would have been very odd if that which was against an Action, should have been that this is a Court that can give Satisfaction, but the Law is not so, but cannot give Satisfaction, whereas I think the Court of the House was never given in this that I know of. Was it ever, or should it be had here? In such a Case, in fact, this House hath power to do, and by such Proceedings compelled the Delinquent to make Satisfaction to a Person by the breaking of a certain Seal, but that is not the Cafe before us.

It hath been said, there has been no Influence of this Kind of Action brought, and that the Court of the Queen's Bench have declared they have nothing to do with the Affairs of Elections, for that the Right of Elections ought to be determined here; and for that Purpose the Declaration of the Lord-Chief Justice Hale, in the Cafe of the Berghs and the Berghs, has been cited. I will confess I cannot but wonder at that Cafe: We did not think that the Judgment given in the King's Bench in that Cafe was finally given; and afterwards, when it was reversed, People were allowed it the Reason of it, and more, when that Judgment of the House was not reversed, but it was affirmed in the House of Lords. Nobody hath ever said that Judgment was reversed, I do not see but on the Reason several Judgments within these five Years, my Lord, even in this House, may be reversed likewise. For the Court of the King's Bench in that Cafe did not intend to a Judgment of determining the Right of Elections, for 't was after in that Case had been determined both in the House; but they only gave Damages for it. Wrong affirmed, that was all the Court did in this Cafe, and yet that Judgment was reversed. I believe there has been some Judgment given by this House within these Twelve Months, that where the House hath determined the Right of Elections, the Party grieved that he shall be allowed to maintain an Action at Law for his Damification.

But take it that there is a Difference between the Cafe of the Berghs and the Berghs, and the present Cafe. I am not where it was debated, where a Judgment was given, and the Officer was to return him, whether the better there was to be affirmed or not. I am very sure a Person before Persons were not to admit of sitting in this House, as now they are, and were Persons purchased Charters of Exemption, to be excused sitting in this House. And so it had been provided in the House of Lords. The Act that has been mentioned before expressly commands, that the Person chosen shall come, and be present in Parliament. And afterwards that was a Penalty put upon such men were chosen, if they did not appear here, to which another Penalty was added, which was, that the Person elected, if he did not come hither, he should lose his Wages. It was not intended a Damage that any Person was not allowed to sit here, but a Kindness; but that did not hold in the Cafe of an Election. Every body agrees, as the Election had a Right to choose, so there was no Statute to compel them to do so; but they looked upon it not only at their Right, but their Interest, to be present at the Election: And now can say, but in a Man's Interest to make Choice of such a Person to sit in Parliament, who hath the Power over his Estate, and Life too for aught I know, as he could trust. Nobody ever doubted that a Person who had a Right to vote had an Interest, and might be damaged if he was absent here. So that none of the Cases that have been put of the Right of the Person elected to sit in Parliament, as Knight of the Shire, or as Burgess, come up in the Cafe in Question.

I would say one thing as to the Damification of the Persons elected, there is a fine Act that gives double Damages where the Reason is contrary to the last Determination. Now I do take it, that Act supposes that a Man might have been damaged before, and if he was damaged before, he was to be the Common Law, for no Statute Law gives him any Damages. 'Tis true, that Statute gives double Damages, but still that Statute supposes there was a Damage before, as a double upon that Foundation; so that, with Submission, that very Statute runs against all the Cases that have been put as to the Persons elected.

To find, at this Rate, the Lords may come to vote in Elections. I am of Opinion the Lords have an Right to vote in Elections for a Knight of a Shire, or a Burgess, and the Reason I go upon is this, every Person who had a Right to vote ought to have been considered the Expenses of him that was elected. If he was a Freeholder, he was an Elector for the County; if a Burgess, for the Borough, and the Expenses of the Knight of the Shire were to be borne of all the Freeholders, and the Expenses of the Burgess upon all that were elect in the Borough. But the Lords were excused of that Charge, they were not to be Contributors to the Expenses of a Knight of the Shire, or Burgess, because they were of another House. There was a Law made, which says, that for Lands purchased by any Lords, such Lands should continue chargeable to the Expenses of Knights of the Shire, as they they were before such Purchase: so that 'tis plain before that A.B. the Lords the Lords were forced to, or purchased, were coerced of that Charge.

But, Sir, I think this Matter is not to the Case in Question: This is nothing but a Collateral Action for a Detention, whereas the Continuance is not much, not above five Months; though I acknowledge the Continuance of the Suit does not influence this Case. Nor is the Question, Whether the Lords have done right, or not, in reversing the Judgments given in the Queen's Bench Hearings of error. If they have a Justification, we can't justly complain; though I am of Opinion they have done right, I think the Plaintiff in this Case was damned, and I think the Court of Queen's Bench ought to have given Judgment against those who did him the Injury for the Damage he sustained; and I think the Lords have done right in reversing that Judgment, and in giving such Judgment as the Court of Queen's Bench ought to have given.

Sir Edward Seymour. 'Tis enough for me that we have the Law on our Side, and we are very much obliged to the Points and Understanding of those learned Gentlemen that opened this Debate, in presenting us with a true State of our Debate. It only remains now for your Prudence to apply a Remedy. And I cannot but take Notice, that this is an Adversus without any Precedent to warrant this Proceeding; and I believe it might have remained in Bill (for I don't think there was Virtue enough in the Cobler of Whigton, nor had he Purse enough), if a Lord had not added that Part.

For my Part, Sir, I do not think this to be the single Influence of the House of Lords we have Reason to complain of: I think is a great Measure, by their Proceedings, they seem to hold forth, That the Law is laid to rest, and that they have a Justice of the House of Commons, and endeavour to get rid of them. I shall not influence in Particulars, but I hope there is not you will not let go, without applying some Remedy to, and that is, that noble Representation in which they have united you to the highest Degree, and lay all the Mischief of the last Reign, and this, as your Door. I could show you, there is nothing in it but Stull, Popish Juries; and we for the Consequence of it, and what Pains and Endeavours they have taken to disperse it all over the World, to make Impression upon the People. But that which I would have some Relief to, is this, That these worthy Persons that have spoke before, though they have truly represented the State of our Condition, yet they have been very tender of applying a Remedy.

It does, I think, consist of two Parts; one is what relates to the inferior Courts, the other to the Judgment of the House of Lords upon this Writ of Error. Now that there is a Right to bring a Writ of Error, the learned said, but I would take away the Foundation, and make this Declaration:

That no inferior Court below should presume to intermeddle with the Elections of the House of Commons; and I am sure then there will be no Foundation for a Writ of Error. In the next Step, with relation to the Judgment given in the House of Lords, 'tis true, the Lords make a great Complaint, That in Matters of Parliament we have addressed, without advising and consulting with them. I will not say far too 'tis justified by their Proceedings; I need not remind you of the Address they made without you, when you addressed against my Lord of Whigton; before you had presented your Address, they presented a Counter-Address to yours. But I take the Declaration to be here, 'tis one Thing in Matters of State, and another Thing when the Matter depends between the two Houses: Where it is a Matter of State, with relation to the Queen's Privilege being violated and invaded, as you are her great Council, you are to advise the Queen in that Matter, and not let any Thing of that Kind pass upon her.

But howsoever I would go the regular Way, by condemning this Judgment, in relation to the House of Lords; and after you have made that 'Condemnation, I would apply to the House of Lords, to see if they would recede from this Judgment of theirs. But I am afraid Arguments at Debates will help your Cause but little, you must have Recourse to Remedies that are in your own Power. We see what they did upon the last Occasion, when they thought their Privileges were concerned; they adjourned, and all to prepare the Way to make the World believe they were injured, and prepare the way for their Proceedings afterwards.

And I say, this is not a Thing that falls out by Chance, but carried on by all their Power, to represent you as inconsiderable, and to make you useful for nothing but giving Money, and then to send you Home into the Country. But if you do not keep the Power in your own Hands, you will be without Remedy. I conclude with what I mentioned in relation to the Courts below, to declare, that they have no Power to intermeddle in Matters of our Election.

Marquis of Hartington (afterwards Duke of Devonshire). I shall not pretend to follow that honorable Gentleman near the Bar, in all the Steps he has made, though I think I may be as regular as he. I think he has only showed, That there is not so much Reason in this Case to find Fault with the Lords, but it is necessary to find Fault with them one Way or another.

I think this is a Matter of great Consequence, and as long as I live here, and as long as I live, I shall be as tender of the Privileges of this House as any Body. I think 'tis upon the due Balance of both Houses that the Safety of the whole does consist; and I must confess, I think the Liberty of a Collier ought to be as much regarded as of any Body else, that is the Happiness of our Constitution.

I think it was very well observed by an experienced Member, That this Writ came very regularly before the Lords: If so, then I think the Question is between us, and the Persons that elected us; and I think, though Gentlemen would not formerly allow of any Distinction between the Privileges of the House, and those of the People of England, yet they must allow it now, or they can't complain that this Action is any Prejudice to this House. For when a Person offers his Vote as an Election, and is not admitted to give it, and upon such Refusal brings his Action in the Courts in Whigton-Hall, (which I take to be the present Case) if giving Judgment upon it be contrary to the Privileges of this House, then 'tis pretty plain, that our Privileges do interfere with the Rights of the People that elected us.

I shall plainly give you my Opinion in this Case: I can't think this Action to be a Breach of the Privileges of this House; for, Sir, the Party grieved, can be no way relieved, but by applying to the Law, and I think the learned Gentleman below, is out in all his Influences; for he hath given an Account of People injured by you, but they were Candidates, and actually that was their proper Remedy; but in the Case of an Election, I don't see how we can have Satisfaction by applying to you.

Gentlemen talk of the Law of Parliament; I can't see how that can give any Interruption to the Law of the Land, that it shall not do Right to the Party grieved: How shall a Man, injured as the Matter I have mentioned, receive Satisfaction by applying to the Parliament? 'Tis true, the Officer offending may be punished, but the Party injured can't receive that Satisfaction he would in the Courts below, by giving him his Damages.

I think this is a Matter of great Consideration, and it is necessary to consider well of it, and not to determine hastily. I think it may be of Use to us, since there are Judges who have been of Opinion, That the Subject ought not to have his Remedy in this Case. A Judge that will cut off Fear, or any Regard to one House, do contrary to his Oath, I believe standeth Time will be influenced by the other. I think 'tis the Duty of a Judge to act according to Law, and not be afraid of either.

Mr. Levett. Sir, There is no Doubt but all the Judges (as hath been said) and every Body else, are obliged to behave themselves according to the Law of the Land: But the Question is, What is the Law of England in this Case? If the House of Commons has an original Right to determine all Matters concerning Elections of their own Members (as is hath been always understood to be), and if we have a Power as parish Officers for making safe Returns, or any other Modifications committed by the returning Officers; then it will not be necessary that the Judges in Whigton-Hall should have any Jurisdiction at all in the Matter now in Question; and if they have none, then by consequence the Lords will have as little by Writ of Error.

I do confess, Sir, when I first heard of this Case, it gave me some Apprehension that it might be of fatal Consequence (by Reason of the Novelty of it) to your Privileges, which are indeed the Privileges of the Commonalty of England which we represent: But since I have thought of it from Time to Time, and it hath been better opened by the learned Gentlemen that have spoke in this Debate, I conceive our coming to some Resolution, declaratory of our Right in this Affair, may preserve the Liberties of the House, and of the Commons of England, who have been entrusted with the Preservation of their Rights.

I think the learned Gentleman over-the-way took his Ground too narrow: I might yield him this Point, That what there is a Writ of Error brought from a Judgment in Whigton-Hall, is Cases where a Writ of Error lies, and where that Court and the House of Lords have a Jurisdiction, then the House of Lords are at Liberty to give what Judgment they please. But I have read, the House of Lords is not an unlimited Jurisdiction, but is bounded, as well as the Courts of Whigton-Hall, by the Law of England. I speak it with the greatest Reverence, that the Royal Power (which is the most Supreme in England) is obliged to the Observation of the Law; and it would be absurd at the same time to say, That any Part of the Parliamentary Constitution is not limited by the known Laws of the Land, or the Law and Customs of Parliament; and I doubt not but it will appear, a Writ of Error does not lie, and did it lie before the Lords in such a Case: And so it comes at last to this Point, What is the Law of England in this Case? And I will tell you my Thoughts of it.

I have read, and learned, and believe 'tis true, That Matters of Parliament are to be determined by the Laws and Customs of Parliament; and I believe there is as good Authority for it, as there is for Writs of Error, or any thing else; and that this Law and Customs of Parliament is a principal Part of the Law of England, and to be learned by Experience and Precedents, and I reckon that we must come to them at last. Now, Sir, let us see what Experience at Precedents we have to found this Jurisdiction of the House of Commons upon, for examining and determining Matters concerning their own Elections. 'Tis true, we have no Journals extant before E. VI.'s Time: And there is a Book they call Synners. I think 'tis a Book of no great Authority, and if it be, there is but a small Matter in it. I have read it over carefully my self more than once, and find only Titles of Bills depending, and when they were read; and all I learned from it was, that sometimes Bills in those Days were read four Times. And, Sir, there is as little concerning Elections in Queen Mary's Reign; but in the Beginning of Queen Elizabeth, you have the Matters of Elections plainly set down, and so they have been ever since. And from that Time to this, it hath been a standing Rule in the House of Commons, in the Beginning of every Parliament, and (as I take it) of every Session, to appoint a Committee to examine all Matters concerning Elections. Now, if the Right of Election is not a Matter concerning the Election, then I own myself under a Mistake. But if this be a material Part, and comprehended within the general Words, and if these Committees have from Time to Time proceeded to examine the Right of Election, and this House hath proceeded from Time to Time to give Judgment in such Cases, sometimes according to general Qualifications settled and adjusted in the House, and very frequently upon examining and considering the Rights of particular Voters, then I think we have as good Authority for the Jurisdiction of this House in the Matter of their Elections, as can be had for any Thing whatsoever.

I do sit in this Case, we ought to take our Ground and Foundation upon the Rights which the Commons of England have, and ever had, by the Law and Customs of Parliament to be exercised by the Representatives of their own choosing; for which Right is grounded upon reasonable Privileges and constant Usage. For if we have a Power to hear and determine the Right of the Electors, and to punish Officers for abusing them in their Right, and give Satisfaction to the Party, all which most evidently appears, not only in your Journals, but by a continued and uninterrupted Practice, Time out of Mind; then I think we need look no farther.

Side comes and moves in Arrest of Judgment, and the Court gives Sentence. But I with the Defendant had demurr'd, and then that would have put it as a Point of Law to the Judges, and if they had determin'd it judicially for you, I believe it would have gone no farther. For it is not Thing to determine it upon Demurrer, and so not but Thing, when the Cause has been try'd, and Damages given, so have the Court's Opinion or pro factis.

The Judges determin'd, the Action does not lie, but as Matters stand now, perhaps, in the like Cases, they will be brought a Writ of Error before the Lords, and they will give such a Judgment as they have given now, for ought I know. I should not think it proper to come to any Question now, by which you shall determine your Rights, if you are not fully satisfied about it, but it ought to be considered farther. The Law and Custom of Parliament is to be found out by Experience and Precedents: But if you are satisfied, then I thank the proper Questioners, "That by the Law and Custom of Parliament, the hearing, examining, and determining all Matters concerning Elections of Members to sit in the House of Commons, is to be by the same House." I think that it is to be your Question, or to that Effect.

The Consequence will be, if this be Part of the Law of England, as it plainly is, you may as well stand upon that Declaration, as upon any new Law to be made by Parliament, if you could get it: But I believe you have no great Reason to expect a new Law in the Case to pass in the House of Lords. Then what would you do? If you should try to get a new Law, and fail, it will be confirmed, that you had put this Power before, but endeavour'd to get it, and the House of Lords denied it you.

But 'tis plain and clear you have this Power already, and a sufficient Ground to stand upon; and I doubt not, but Wyndesore-Hall will take Notice of it, and the House of Lords too: If they do not, (see Sir Lordes use interrupted by a Noise made by some few of the Members, who said, What then? Sir Wyndesore-Hall, I say, if they do not, it will be Time enough to confer with them afterwards. And give me Leave, I am not afraid to say, of a private Man, much more the House of Commons, have the Law of England on their Side, let them be undisturb'd ever so much, one Way or other, they will obtain their Right sooner or later. The Rights of the People of England are safe in the Hands of their Representatives than any other: If they do not like them, they cast them them out, and choose new ones; but they can't do it in the Case of the Lords.

I beg Pardon for my great Velocity, I take it to be of Importance, to avoid all Contests with the House of Lords, and with Wyndesore-Hall, and I think you may do it by proposing and assenting a plain Declaration of your Right by the Law and Custom of Parliament.

Mr. Solicitor-General Sir Isaac Hearn, afterwards Lord Hearn, and Lord Chancellor. After what hath been said at large concerning the Law in this Case, especially since it hath received no Contradiction in any Instance whatsoever, I will avoid the Repetition of what has been already said, and endeavour to shorten your Debate, by bringing it something towards a Point.

It hath been said, That the Question now before you is, Whether Judgment being given in the Court of Queen's Bench, a Writ of Error does not lie in the House of Lords, to reverse that Judgment? I cannot, by any Means, agree that to be the Question.

But that which I take to be the proper Question before you is, Whether or no it be the sole Right of the Commons of England to determine their own Elections? If you are of that Opinion, never let your Debate grow to such a Head as to put you upon the Necessity of complaining of a Judgment of the Lords, but rather check it in its Infancy.

It may perhaps seem kind, that a Man shall not be admitted to make Use, and to have the Benefit of the Law; yet when that Thought is thoroughly digested, I believe no Gentleman in this House but will agree, 'Tis that there may be many such Instances, where you will not condone any Suit at Law. I can't give you any better Instances, than what have been mention'd to you by a learned Gentleman on the other Side, who approves of this Proceeding by Writ of Error, the Proclamation against Sir John Williams for publishing a Libel (as it was call'd) by Direction of this House, and an Action against the Sergeant for obeying your Commands. If such an Action should be brought against the Speaker or Serjeant, should we sit still here to see what they would do in the Courts below, and afterwards wait for the Event in the House of Lords by Writ of Error?

'Tis very true, that Judgments that are question'd by that Gentleman continue still unrevok'd. As to that given against the Speaker, he mention'd it as a Precedent not to be follow'd; indeed, 'tis a Reproach to the House to mention it, since no Parliament hath reversed it. As to the other Action against the Sergeant, he says, Judgment was given against him, and that stands in full Force, as I remember that Case, it went off upon the Premises of Pleading.

But nothing of this kind being the Question now, I beg Leave to fire what the Action is that is now before us. For Gentlemen in the Country, who have frequently met with Actions, prosecuted without Consent for Matters relating to Elections, may, perhaps, be surpris'd, 'till they come to consider what the Point is. This is not an Action grounded upon any Statute whatsoever. 'Tis agreed an Action may be maintain'd where a Statute gives a particular Remedy, but this is an Action founded upon the Common Law. We waive your Privileges, as, if you will consent to an Act of Parliament to make other Persons Judges of those Privileges, so far as you consent, if they pursue the Power given them by Act of Parliament, there is no Wrong done to you: But an Action brought at Common Law is that which I think, imports with the inherent Right of this House.

We have, I think, arriv'd to one Piece of Knowledge upon this Debate, that that was the Will of the House that was ever brought to this Kind; and Gentlemen will not much wonder why this is brought now, when they consider what Endeavours have been used to make this House contemptible. I believe this may be thought the most probable Method to attain that End.

I would not repeat the Precedents that have been quoted, yet I can't but take Notice of that of Hamersley and Sower: Their Arguments that were made use of for this Judgment in that Case were oppos'd, and the Judgment of the Lords was then contrary. I should be very glad to hear how the Lords Judgment of Reverend in that Case, and of others, are reconcilable. The Commons, at that Time, would scarce have look'd upon an Attempt upon their Privileges, and I hope we shall be as careful and as jealous to preserve ours: We have as much Power as our Predecessors, we shall never suffer for want of Power, if we do not suffer for want of Will to exert it.

I expect to hear of the great Authority of one learned Judge, that differ'd from the rest, I have the usual Reason for his dissent, but am sorry to hear any Information, that those Judges who have given their Opinion otherwise, are guilty of a Dishonour of their Orders. If such been touch'd upon, That whenever any Question is mov'd the Judges concerning the Privileges of the Lords, in the Power of the Commons, their Answer is extended for the Information of all our Representatives, and to the Honour of both Houses. I believe, That was a Matter above their Knowledge: The Law of Parliament is above the Judges of the Common Law, and is not to be subject to their Judgment, (as said first).

And, Sir, as I have been inform'd, this was the Answer given in the House of Lords by one of the said Judges, and by a second I have heard, it was still to escape their Censure, they use a safe Reply to this House in very great Offices.

I beg Gentlemen to consider, (I shall not enter into Particulars that have been discuss'd) Which is any thing of this kind would not make you dissatisfied, to the lowest Degree in the World, and would incline you to such Measures that more could ensue? Upon every Motion that comes before you, 'tis impossible to judge the Right of Elections, but by the Right of the Elections. If you will endure any Person, after you have said he has no Right, to go into Wyndesore-Hall, and bring in Actions in the Courts there, a Jury may find a Verdict, in the House of Commons are mistaken, and that this Person has a Right, and Judgment shall be given accordingly. Will not that Proceeding, this very Moment, submit your Resolutions to the Examination and Censure of the inferior Courts? May not they say, They Vote for one another, we have deserv'd them all. That they are a Parcel of People pack'd together, and not one of them elected as they should be.

What Condition the Magistrate will be in, hath been mention'd already, when a Member hath a Right, and every body may bring his Action. Can any Magistrate (as a Constable, as in this Case) bear the Expenses of a hundred or a thousand Actions at Law? There will not be wanting Cause to prosecute a Magistrate with all the Violence possible.

That I can by no Means agree, That the Matter is to be determin'd according to the common Rules and Methods of Law, but according to the Course of Parliament; yet I shall compare it with some other Cases in the Law.

That which makes these Persons Hardships the greater is, These Magistrates are not People that officiously interpret to take a Poll at Elections, and make a Return; but those are Men, who by the Duty of their Office, are oblig'd to do it, and if they do not execute their Office, you punish them, and if they do execute their Office, and give true Informations, yet if you let them be examin'd at another Place, after you have said they have done well, they may be punish'd for doing so. I will compare this with one, or two common Cases that we have mention'd. Suppose a Person should exhibit an Indictment against a Justice of the Peace maliciously, he doeth it lawfully, and it is a well-consider'd thing, but if a Grand Jury-man find a Bill against a Justice, and the Justice will not admit an Assessor to do it. So it is in the Case of a Writ, because he is brought in by the Process of the Court. So it is in the Case of the Poll, and it is not equally the Duty of a Magistrate to interfere upon the Poll, and afterwards to make a Return: 'Tis not nearly so criminal, before you?

A great deal might be said further upon this, but I hope 'tis pretty unnecessary. And that nobody can have any doubt but that our Privileges are very much concern'd in this Question, and that the Consequences would be; therefore I would briefly propose for the Question what another Gentleman hath hinted at, which may reduce this Debate to a particular Point.

We certainly have such a thing as the Law and Custom of Parliament, and that is very well known; and upon that Point I desire you would put a Question to this Effect:

"That the sole Right of examining and determining all Matters relating to the Elections of Members to sit in Parliament, except in such Cases as are otherwise provided for by Act of Parliament, is in the House of Commons; and that neither the Qualifications of the Electors, nor the Right of the Persons elected, is otherwise cognizable, or determinable."

Members. The Question, the Question.

Mr. Smith. Sir, I speak only to your Order, That Gentlemen would not interrupt one another by calling for the Question, but give diligent Attention to the Debate, for this is a Matter of great Consequence.

Then Mr. Frowen (in the Chair) read a Question on his Paper to the Effect propos'd by Mr. Smith, and read the same to the Committee.

Sir Christopher Mordaunt. I am very willing to hear any Gentleman that will stand up and speak, and you have had a very good Hint given you by an honourable Person, that this is a Business of great Moment, and I hope we shall continue so do as we have done, that is, Sir, Gentlemen patiently, and that we may not be guilty of any Dilatation, I move you for Candies to be brought in.

Then the Question was put, and carried for Candies.

And they were brought in accordingly.

Mr. Dorrer (afterwards a Judge) Mr. Frowen, you have now a Question upon your Paper, but that which I take to be the Question, is,

"Whether a Freeholder, or a Freeman, who hath a Right to give his Vote for his Representatives in Parliament, may voluntarily and is himself deprived of that Privilege, without any Redress in any Court whatsoever?"

Thus I take to be the Case before you; his said to be of great Consequence, and I do take it to be of great Consequence to any Thing that ever came before either House; and I don't look upon it only to concern the Justification of the Lords and Commons, but to affect every Part of the Constitution, and the Queen, the Head Church, in the highest Degree. For in coming to this, if the Lords have not a Right to determine in this Matter, which by Writ of Habeas is regularly brought before them, we shall be turned into a Service of Villagers, and the People will be deprived of choosing their own Representatives without Relief, and shall not have Relief by her Majesty in the Court of Queen's Bench, nor before her in the Court of Parliament, where, in Configuration of Law, she is always present, and here by our Law is the last Appeal; and there will be a Violation and an Interruption of Justice, and our Constitution is so related to ourselves, will be trifled with, that 'twill be impossible there should be any right Representation of the People. For 'twill not be the People then that will elect, but the Officer may arbitrarily refuse and return whom he thinks fit, and the particular Person will be without Remedy. For whatever Council you apprehend, if the Right of Return be not preserved, which we call our great old Man bring his Case before you? And whosoever should be his, it is not by Act of Parliament, but by the Law; (but I will turn the Argument, and put it upon them to show how I still believe that there was any particular Application to the Committee of Privileges, where the Injury has been done to a particular Man, which is the preface Case; And this Matter is found by a Jury to be true, and not one Man of the Jury but of Quakers, and approved on both Sides.) And I think, though it never came before the Parliament, nor the Committee of Privileges, they might consider of a particular Injury.

As I say for the Nation that both been taken up, That where the House of Commons have a Jurisdiction, there the Party is in all God's without Remedy, in any other Court. Now that is not according to Truth, for in the Case of a false Return, there is a public Injury, and that does not hinder the Party from obtaining Satisfaction in his particular Injury, and if no Action lies, there is no Satisfaction; for this House hath not awarded Damages in any Case, notwithstanding the Case could, for that would only Curb for the Man's Trouble in coming up to be examined before this House. And if this House awarded Damages, there is no Way of bringing that Damages. What Way can we offer out? And if that Person is not at Liberty at Law, he shall be done without any Redress whatsoever.

There may be a third Case of Cases where the House hath a Jurisdiction as far as concerns the Publick and themselves, and the Party shall have his Remedy.

If I receive a Blow in this House, 'tis a Violation of the Privilege of this House, and this House can take Just Allowance of it, and restore the Peace to that House; the Injury, but will any Man say, That an Action of Battery will not lie, the Common Law in that Case?

That was the Case of Sir Thomas Clarke. At the Time of his Election there was one Row upon Words to his Jurisdiction; he might certainly have complained to the House of it (yet had an Influence, I think, last Session, of one that could not be so honest but Injury against the Lord Bishop of Worcester, and the House sent into Committee, which Sir Thomas Clarke was to leave done, but he brought his Action, and to consider of several Damages, and afterwards a Writ of Habeas was brought in the King's Bench, and Judgment was affirmed.

There is a Case not without great Prejudice of your Law, and that is, where a Member returns, and he delivered this to a private Messenger to bring up to the Crown Office. The Messenger, by the Way, though he is to deliver the Return, and make another Return than what he received from the Sheriff. For this Action was brought, and he recovered at Law as much the Messenger for the private Damage he had done him. Certainly otherwise the Law would be defective.

In another Case, the Sheriff returned, as prejudicial to a Constitution, so a Corn Field, an Ashbur was brought against this Sheriff at Law for the Damages he had done the Constitution, and was maintained; and I don't say more Cases may be put: Which shews that you have a Jurisdiction as to what concerns the Publick, does not exclude the Party, but he may have his Action for his private Injury.

As yet in any Persons I have heard, which I do not to be true, particularly in you, That there is no Remedy at Law, but in Cases presented by the House only. That is not fit, that Statutes imply the contrary. The third Case, Whereas there was not a sufficient Remedy, therefore that gives a more complete Remedy, and to the Judges declared in the Case of Barnes v. Ashby and Stone.

So, they have told us of the Case of Barnes v. Ashby and Stone, and of Newell and Stone, with humble Submission to your Grace, I take as far as to power the Justification of the Lords, and the House of Commons, that in the Case of Barnes v. Ashby and Stone, was an Action tried before the Court of King's Bench, and a sort of a feared Judges never were before, or since, and three of them were of Opinion for the Action, and my Lord Chief Justice Hale was one of them, who, the Time before he surrendered his Character, did this express himself: "He says 'Tis due to God that he had not a better to this Time, that he was able to keep his Cuff and his Angles in that Place." But afterwards it had its Part, a Writ of Error was brought in the Exchequer, and Mr. Justice Leake, that reports it, says it appears, That that was argued against the Judgment in the Kings Bench was made fully, and they themselves afterwards determined the Case. And that was a Case how valuable it was at that Time, to have the Privilege of the House of Commons, and as English Parliament. Three Judges were in the majority, and as I think two in the Common Place. Any who it came into the House of Lords, and there the Reverend in the Exchequer was affirmed, for Reason different to what was argued now, and I believe for several good Reasons. The Sheriff in that Case did make a double Return, and the Sheriff might do it for his own Indemnity, for it was no more than taking a special Verdikt; and therefore the Saying, sed et malitiam, being put to a Thing that was in itself right, would not alter the Nature of the Thing. Another Reason they went upon was, they said this double Return was a writ Return, and for that Reason the Action did not lie; and upon those Reasons depended that Judgment. That Gentleman who said that only four or five Lord Judges, and under a great Majority four or five Lords only believe entered their Dissent, but there was a great Number, and near an Equality, gave their Judgment, and I don't see Lords now in that House were against that Judgment, that did not enter their Dissent.

Then, Sir, there is the Case of Newell and Stone; and that was first a Judgment in the Common Place, and when it had taken its Progress in Windsor-Hall, it came before the House of Lords, and the Lord returned it back again to Windsor-Hall, and entered all the Judges of England to give their Opinion in it. That was found it upon an Ordinance of those Times, Resolves was to send one Rayner, and Newell was one of them that were elected, but not in turn: I take this fact, in that Case that Ordinance was entirely neglected, that Case did not proceed itself by the known Laws of the Land, and for that Reason it would not give Judge any, for Vices could not be taken before than King's Bench, and when afterwards they were to give Judgment, the Court of Common Pleas had recourse to itself.

Now, as to the Lords Right to receive a Writ of Error in this Case. You have added to them that they would receive a Writ of Error at a Time when your Privileges were invaded. That would Cut off my Lord Hale, who with others was obtained against, 5 Cor. in King's Bench Words in this House that did affect the Government, and he added to the Justification of the Court (I have not such Thing here). No, they have submitted to it), and the Court over-ruled their Petition to the Justification, and that Judgment continued in Force for many years which have been since done, which it were well if they were not, and the House took Notice of it, and in 1687, they desired a Conference with the House of Lords. The Chairman was my Lord Chief Justice Popham, and the House there complained how they were grieved by that Judgment, and after several resolutions, both Houses did consent to this Expedient, that my Lord Hale bring the other Scrivener, he did be desired to bring a Writ in Error in the House of Lords, and I had to do, and the Lords in that Case did give Judgment, and reversed the Judgment.

As to your saying this Year, when will I send, I cannot tell. That signifies a Vote you shall better about the Year Eight, That the putting the Laws in Execution against Persons at Disobedience, was an Injury to the Publick, and I do believe in the Government, and that those that put them in Execution it should be looked upon as Enemies to the King and Kingdom. The Government says, That all the Laws against Papers were put in Execution against Presidents, since then they were in force. The Judges in Windsor-Hall said, This Vote had not passed since a Law, and they could not take Notice of it. I hope we shall do nothing that will offend ourselves, nor say I think but what will be beneficial for the Ends for which 'tis provided.

So, Jacob Young (parliamentary Member of the Reel), Mr. Freeman, I consider you have to be a long Time in the Debate, and a great deal of business in you, either as a Member or as a Judge, so that you are before you, as a Judge, I do think that the House of Commons, and that those that put them in Execution it should be looked upon as Enemies to the King and Kingdom.

The Chairman hath a Copy of the Proceedings of this Action referred to the House, and he hath read it, and an affirmation in it, but, and had been answered by my Lord, and they would have had the Lords, in the Judgment they gave, did any Thing as Opposition to your Judgment, or in Denial of your Privileges.

Before the Action was brought, there was a Resolution of the House of Commons, That the Right of Election for the Borough of Spalding, was in the Inhabitants not exceeding Alms. 'Tis true that Resolution to the Plaintiff hath taken his Part, and has brought his Action, for by this Declaration he makes his Case to be, that he was an Inhabitant of that Borough, not exceeding Alms; and that the Constables fairly and lawfully abstracted and hindered him from giving his Vote at the Election there. The Constables plead, Not Guilty, and the Matter goes to a Jury, and they find for the Plaintiff, and give him five Pounds Damages. Which is in effect a finding that the Plaintiff was an Inhabitant, not exceeding Alms, and that he was abstracted and hindered from Voting by these Constables, and that was done sed et in re ipsa, and to his Damage. And this was so to demonstrate, that the Proceeding at Law has not been in Opposition, but in Conformity to your Judgment.

Now I am to consider, whether the bringing of this Action is a Violation of your Privileges? Against many things have been said not proper for us to deliberate upon, one, that this will encourage a Multitude of Suits; another, that this Action was never brought before; and several other Matters which you are to Question, whether this Action will lie. Now that is not the Question here, but the true and only Question before you is, Whether this Action was brought in violation of your Privileges? And there be no Breach of Privilege in it, I know of no Authority we have to stop the Course of legal Proceedings.

And as to that, but one thing (as I conceive) has been said materially, which is this, That this is a Parliamentary Case, and appertains to your Jurisdiction, and the Judges of the Common Law are not Judges of the Law of Parliament, and therefore they ought not to have given the Plaintiff his Judgment (and it must be admitted the Lords ought not to have given any Judgment but what the Judges ought to have given). To maintain this, it hath been said, and understood it is true, that this House hath a Right to judge of Elections; and it is as true, that in order to cause no such Determination, it is necessarily that the House do judge of the Right of Election, and it has been so, (but that I deny) that the Right of the Electors is by the Law of Parliament.

I take the Right of every Elector in England to accrue to him by the Common Law, for he is under use of other of these Qualifications: Editor

Either he is a Freeholder, and then he has a Right to vote for Knights of the Shire; or he has a Right by Charter, or a Right by Prescription, which both have Right in the Right of voting in all Cases and Boroughs. Now I would be glad to know, whether the Right of a Freeholder is distinct by the Common Law? Is it not an Estate, with all its Privileges and Services, created by the Law? Whether a Right by Charter is not by the Common Law? Is it not that Law that enables the Crown to grant Charters, and qualifies that Power? Whether a Right by Prescription is not by the Common Law? Is not Prescription, Common Law? And is the Common Law any Thing but Common Usage? So that the Right of every Member being by the Common Law, the Judgment is that Right is primarily and originally in the Courts of Law. The President's Right of voting, is of the Essence of his Freehold; and you may as well take away his Freehold, as take away his Right to vote, which he has by Virtue of that Freehold, and then tell him he must come to the House of Commons to recover it. And the same may be said of these several Injuries which give a Right of voting in Cities and Boroughs. And thus I hope I have made it out, that a Right of voting is not a Parliamentary Right, but an ordinary legal one, and the Common Law. Judges have the Judgment of it originally; and it is incidentally only that the House has a Power of judging of it, and that too according to the Rules of the Common Law; which is a further Demonstration that it is a Common-Law Right, for it would be absurd to say, a Man has a Right by our Law, which is to be judged by the Rules of another.

Then what Course has the Plaintiff taken? He has a Right by the Common Law to chafe Burdett for Arbitrary: That Right has been invaded, and he has gone to the Common Law for Redress, and from no other Power could he have it, for this House, or the Committee of Elections, cannot give a Remedy in this Case, that is, cannot make the Person injured Reparation for the Damages done him, by abridging him in the Exercise of his Privilege: And that is the Thing the learned Gentlemen, who have spoke in this Debate, have said by; and these are the material Points, that this is a Right at Common Law, and this House cannot apply a Remedy.

But it has been said, that the House will examine, not only on Behalf of the whole Nation, but of the Electors. This is true, but in order to what? To see whether you have a right Member here, and for no other End, for to challenge any Gentleman to these two are Instances of a single Man who came before and complained. That he had a Right to vote, and was hindered from voting, and made that Injury to be the Office of the Officer. Did the House, or would the House ever receive such a Complaint? And yet he may go with that Complaint to the Law, for whether the Person he would vote for be returned or not, the Injury is the hindering him from enjoying his Privilege: And it cannot be made an Injury, or not an Injury by Matter or fact, that is, by the Officer's returning, or not returning the Candidate. And tho' the Officer should repeat him, and not carry his Injustice so far as to make a false Return, yet it is of Use, that the Law will redress the Wrong done to the Voter, and thereby, perhaps, stop the first Steps or Approaches towards a false Return.

But if I should object the House would receive the single Petition of a Voter, who was refused, and when the Person he would have voted for was returned, yet the House cannot make him Reparation; all we can do, is to censure the Officer, but we cannot make the Person complaining whole, in Point of Damages. Indeed it has been said, the House can give Damages, and there was an Instance given of Mr. Vanebo, who complained against a Clergyman, and the House ordered Mr. Trenchard to pay him Costs: So was Sir George Megeat ordered to pay Costs to the Member he maliciously persecuted against*, and the case is presented for at the beginning of every Session. But with these Instances of any Person injured in Damages by this House? No, these are Instances against Petitioners, not in Favour of them; nor are Damages given in these Cases, but Costs; all that is provided for is, that Persons frivolously complained against shall not be out of Pocket. And by a Means you have a Jurisdiction in Point of Expenses, but not in Point of Damages, for you may order the Wrong-doer into Custody, and make his Payment of Costs to the injured Person the Price of his Liberty, but there is no direct Remedy even for Costs.

But it is apprehended, here may be a challenge of Jurisdiction, and if the Party should be allowed to go on, the Court of Law may be of any Opinion, and this House of necessity must follow the Court of Law does not allow of, and that is to suppose Cases of Justice will not do Right. It will be allowed to me your Determination will always be just, and other Courts the Law yourself will do right too, and then they will determine as you do; and your Determination, and that of the Law, as I said before, has been the same in this Case. But then, as the Supposition of Law is, that all Courts will do right, to human Frailty supposes there may be an Error in Judgment. And yet Courts must have Jurisdiction, or else there can be no Administration of Justice among Men, since there is no Jurisdiction but of another World that can proceed to an unerring Judgment.

And now I will show you where several Courts have different Jurisdictions of the same Fact, and the Law allows them notwithstanding there may be Diversity of Judgments. The Court of Common-Pleas may punish a Person for assaulting an Officer in the Execution of their Process, as a Contempt to that Court; but at the same Time, for the same Matter, the Offender may be punished in the King's Bench, as it is a Breach of the Public Peace; and the Officer may, if he please, bring his Action in the Court of Exchequer for the Damages done him.

I would observe a little upon the Cases of this kind, and then it is possible. The first is that of Neale and Smith, I have I voted into the Journal of 1699, and the only Book of our Law where this Case is reported, and it is Stargis's second Report; and that was upon Writs issued out by Crawford, whereby he appointed Countess Stargis a Member of the Long Parliament, first for one of the five Knights for the County of Berk; they chose him, but he was not returned, and therefore he brought his Action in the Common-Pleas. That Action depended three years Time, and thereupon the Judges, since the Rise of this House for Difficulty, and defend the House was to come to a Determination in it, laid by the Way there was no House of Lords to bring it to the Trial, for it was in the Time of the Long Parliament, who had shared the whole Legislature, as well as the Law itself (Power) and so under the Judges comprehended upon with the Determination of this Question, since they were then Co-Judges, and had their Law notions from them. Well, but the Record being brought in, the Court, appointed a Day to consider of the Matter, and when they saw the Record had proceeded according to the known Methods of Law, they gave no Judgment upon it, but sent it back to Wyndham-Hall, and there it was again argued, but never adjudged. And that there was no Judgment given, is easy to account for, if the Judges thought such an Action would lie; for, at that Time, the Long Parliament was upon the point of bringing in the Bill, and restoring the Lords: And if they had given a Judgment for the Plaintiff, they had given a Sanction to the highest Usurpation of the Protection, and all his wild Fancies of changing the Constitution at his Will and Pleasure. And indeed the Plaintiff had disowned the Authority of the Long Parliament, which he had with great Zeal affirmed, and of which he was himself a Member. But if the Judges had thought such an Action would not lie, they might, who any Scruple, have given Judgment for the Defendant. And this seems to me a strong Authority that Wyndham-Hall thought such an Action would lie: And it is very remarkable, that when that House of Commons (as they called themselves) had assumed the exorbitant Power I mentioned before, they did not proceed to assume the Jurisdiction of the Common Law.

The next Case is that of Saunders and Barnardine, in which the Commons divided. My Lord Chief-Justice was of one Opinion, and my Lord Chief-Justice of another, and there were Six and Six of a Side, and the Matter came by Writ of Error into the House of Lords, and a Gentleman said, Good was worth considering for. But I am apt to think Sir Saunders Barnardine did not hope to recover one Farthing of the Money, for Saunders was dead, and I believe without Affairs: For, in all the Proceedings in the House of Lords, none appeared on the Behalf of Sir Widow, he had no Counsel there; but it was agreed against Sir Saunders Barnardine, by Mr. Attorney, the late Lord Chief-Justice, so vindicate the Proceedings of the Exchequer-Chamber, and Judgment was given, as hath been said, in the House of Lords.

But what I have supposed next? The Commons were so unsafe under that Jurisdiction, and the Injury which might be done to the People from whom they derived their Authority, by double, or false Returns, that the next Thing was the Interposition of the Legislature to apply a Remedy, and the Lords came into it, though it was a great Discrepancy to the Reverential of that Judgment; for the Act of the year of the late King, declares false Returns to be against Law, and provides an Action shall lie where an Officer makes a Return false and maliciously; yet never thought that an infamous Thing, but knew Malice might be tried in that, as well as in many other Cases: And I wonder to hear just to Wyndham should be so much the Rule of Courts. Men are tried for their Lives every Day, when Malice is the main Point in Issue. If a Man dies without any Prosecution all another, the Law intends, that he is to die to Murder. So here, if an Officer is such the Vote of one, who hath a clear and indisputable Right, the Law presumes it done maliciously; and if the Officer refuse a Man's Vote, and there is any probable Cause or Colour to do it, or his Right of voting is doubtful, the Judge will tell the Jury they ought to find for the Defendant; and therefore it is only in a plain and plain Case that a Man can prevail in such an Action. And thus, by the way, is an Answer to that Objection, that such Actions as these will bring all your Elections to be determined by the Lords. Since an Officer can never be forced guilty by a Jury upon such Actions, where there is a Controversy or Dispute, much less can the Lords try or determine any thing of the Right.

There is another Case, and that is the Case of Mr. Ogborne against the Bailiff of Hatcham, that Judgment was against the Action, and was given by my Lord Chief-Justice North, and the rest of the Judges of the Common-Pleas, upon the Authority of the Judgment in the Case of Saunders and Barnardine in the Exchequer-Chamber; and no wonder they would not give a Judgment contrary to what some of themselves had given in another Place.

Sir, this Question hath been before this House but long since. Whether a Candidate should be hindered from proceeding upon an Action at Law before he had come to this House (in these Determinations, when should he be chosen or no? And this House, upon a solemn Debate, adjudged, that he might go to Law before he had come hither; and I desire your Clerk may read a Word or two in your Journal, viz. Monday, March 13, 68.

Clark reads. "The House being acquainted, that John Baker, Esq.

who was Candidate at the Election for Chief of Members to serve as the present Parliament for the Borough of Leicestershire in the County of Leicestershire, hath brought an Action upon the Statute made in the year of our Majesty's reign, against Mr. Richard R. in the Mayor of the said Borough, for the sum of 500*l*. for making a false Return of William Bridges, Esq. although the said Mr. Bridges never petitioned against, or questioned the said Return in this House, and a Declaration arising thereupon, relating, That the Debate be adjourned till Wednesday Morning next.

Sir Joseph Jekyll. Now I desire you to look upon Wednesday the 13th Day of March, when this Debate was refused.

Clark read. This was the 13th of March. The House refused the adjourn'd Debate relating to Mr. Bridges; and after a long Debate, the same fell, without any thing done thereupon.

Members. Well, what then?

Sir Joseph Jekyll. I take this to be a plain Authority, that will govern the Cafe before you; for if it was not reasonable to refuse a Mass from proceeding at Law upon the Statute, before he had come hither for a Determination, when it was to be continued to the next Election, which was undoubtedly proper for the Jurisdiction of the House, much less will it be reasonable to refuse a Proceeding at Law which is not to concern the Election, and upon a Cafe not proper to the Jurisdiction of the House; and the House doing nothing upon that Complaint, is a Declaration, that the House could not justly do any thing upon it: For if a Man makes a Motion in any other Court, and the Court declares they will do nothing upon it, I desire to know whether that be not a Declaration of that Court, that the Motion is unreasonable, and it is all the Judgment the Court gives in such a Cafe. And I had the Honour to sit in Parliament when that Motion was made, and very much surprised; and some that have spoke in this Debate were men of an Opinion contrary to what they are now, and were not for stopping the Course of Law.

Sir. I apprehend the Action is well founded on the Cafe; this Man had a Right to vote, he had an Injury done him in respect to that Right, he hath sought to be repair'd in a proper Way, and he could not be repair'd in any other: I am for doing nothing to his Prejudice, and therefore an answer your Question.

Mr. Horley (speaks). Sir, I shall trouble you but with a few Words after this long Debate: And rather to understand the Terms you are debating on, than to think any Thing I can offer to be of any great Service. But since the Question is not to be as some have represented it, but to be simply this in general, Whether an Action does lie as Common Law in the Cafe before you?

There is no need to mention the particular Circumstances of Ashby Election, for if that was the single Cafe, you might have taken another Method. I will not insist, that in this very Election a great Number of those Inhabitants petitioned this House upon this Point, That their Votes were deny'd: And after this Petition had lain in the House some Time, it was withdrawn by their own Consent: I do not trouble myself whether that particular Mass was enough then, nor will I trouble you with what may reasonably be urged from this, but leave that to other Gentlemen.

But I desire we may understand the Terms upon which we are debating, we have had Maxims of the Common Law, and the Rights of Parliament mention'd. The Common Law is the Common Usage of the Realm; I take the Laws of Parliament to be the Common Usage of the Lords, and the Usage of Parliament to be the Law of Parliament; and the Law of Parliament is to be known by Usage, as the Common Law is.

Then how shall we know whether this belongs to the Common Law? If there be any other Way, I should be glad to be inform'd; but I think there is no other Way of knowing whether an Action will lie as Common Law, but by Reason or Usage, and Precedents. Now, if by Reason, it is to be made out by what necessarily attends the Cafe, or some other Cafe like it. And just what do they offer, that lie at Common Law? Do they give you any Precedent? What Reason do they offer? I suppose that which was read last is no Precedent in this Cafe, for that was an Action upon the Statute; or that the Courts below take upon that a Legislative assent of a Judge, which must be, if there be no Rule for them to go by. I take the Question you have read to consist of Two Parts, one asserting your own Right; the other is negative, That no other Courts have any Right, but in Cases particularly directed by the Statute.

I cannot think this of Election and Election a Privilege; I take it to be a Service both in the Election and Election, and so formerly was reckon'd an hard Service; I leave not how they find it now. 'Tis a Privilege, I take it, because all who are Electors are liable to pay the whole of the Cafe like it. And just what do they offer, that lie at Common Law? Do they give you any Precedent? What Reason do they offer? I suppose that which was read last is no Precedent in this Cafe, for that was an Action upon the Statute; or that the Courts below take upon that a Legislative assent of a Judge, which must be, if there be no Rule for them to go by. I take the Question you have read to consist of Two Parts, one asserting your own Right; the other is negative, That no other Courts have any Right, but in Cases particularly directed by the Statute.

Then consider, this House is in Possession of this Power, as of Right; and I do not find the Common Law in Possession of any such Right. Then what do they offer to bring it in, but that there would be some Failure of Justice? Now I took it, That the Judges are pro domo, and not pro domo: If any thing was a Provision to be made for it, it must be done by the Legislative Power, and if the Election was not, Provision must be made for them, that they shall have an Action, and those Gentlemen who think that necessary, may bring in a Bill to that Purpose, and take the Sense of the Legislature upon it in a regular Way.

The Question before you now is, Whether the Examination, Hearing, and Determination of all Matters relating to Elections, where some Statute have not particularly directed otherwise, does not belong to this House? There was a famous Cafe of Gower, that was a Cafe contested by the Crown, and the Crown pretended to find out another Writ. And there they say, That as to Members of Parliament, their Attendance, &c. they are the sole Judge. And this they say before Vos. VIII.

King James in the first Year of his Reign, and claim it as their sole Right, and the King's second Writ was determin'd to be void.

But a Gentleman makes an Argument, if one should fight another in the House, what Remedy? Why there is an Act made for that Cafe in Henry VI's Time.

I think now the Matter will turn upon this: Say they, 'tis true you can try Elections, and who are the Electors; but there is one Thing remaining, that is, to give Satisfaction. Have they any Precedents for this? I believe the Precedents are without; they have a Power for what is necessary, nothing less than a Law can give the other.

Gentlemen say, there may be a Difference in Judgement in Courts below, but that an arbitrator, and three lies an Appeal: But in this Cafe, all Courts will be co-ordinate with you; and therefore, if that be a Grievance, it is a Grievance in Government, prevent it now.

'Tis said, Will you will your Vote do? That is pretty odd: If they would have an Act of Parliament, your Vote must be the Ground of it.

You are Judges of the whole; but far more, you can't give the present Satisfaction. Well, suppose so; but you can refuse all the present Satisfaction. But let me say, if you would not let up a co-ordinate Power with you in Matters of Election, and which will be a hard for you at all, I hope it will be a Warning to you, to take more Care in the judging of your Elections for the time to come.

If the Judgment belongs to you, and you are possess'd of it for so long a Term of Time, that nobody can offer any Thing against it since H. IV's Time; 'till Gentlemen show me some Reason, why the Common Law should lay hold of it, I must be of Opinion that it does belong to you, and so Court can take Cognizance of it but you, except where 'tis otherwise provided for by Statute.

Sir Thomas Alder. Sir, I shall not enter into a Dispute, and repeat what I remember of former Times; I will say but this, let others answer it better if they can: As to the Words scilicet et maindre, it seems one Chief-Justice said, They were Words of Importance, and must be prov'd: Another Chief-Justice said, They were only Words of Course, that is, like Pepper and Vinegar to a Slice of roast Beef; for there is one Chief-Justice, that spoke last but one, against another.

As to making Satisfaction, I confess, I live very well what that Gentlemen said on the right hand. If there was any Precedent for it, I agree it would do very well, that this House could give Damages, and we will make the best of it; but most of these Things have Spoke in them, and these Actions are brought with Spite. Now this we can do, we can punish the Offender, and there is Revenge in that, and that is a sweet Bit, and some Satisfaction. What further occurs to me has been spoken by other Gentlemen, better than I can do it; and I shall not repeat it, being to late in the Night.

Mr. Cooper (afterwards Earl of Cooper). I perfectly agree with that honorable and learned Gentleman that spoke last but one in this Debate, in what he had said as an undoubted Maxom, or Ground-work, for the Opinion he deliver'd, That the Law and Customs of Parliament are Part of the Law of the Land, and as such, ought to be taken Notice of by all Persons. And I think 'tis the exact Standard by which we ought to walk; and the Decision my poor Judgement is apt to make from that Principle, is this, that we ought not, out of Zeal to our own Justification, to go one Step further than that known Law and Customs of Parliament will warrant us to do.

Now I take it upon this Debate, that this Law and Customs of Parliament doth not give the Subject, who is injur'd by his Vote being deny'd him, any Satisfaction or Recompense for that Damage: And on the other confirm'd in that Opinion, because that very learned and honorable Gentleman, who is particularly knowing in the Laws and Precedents of Parliament, has not pleas'd to refer to you any one Precedent, where the Subject is injur'd by such complaint to the Parliament, and had Redress in that Particular; but all Persons have been either from the Causes, or Elections, complaining of an undue Return. So that as to that Part, that it hath been by Law and Customs of Parliament to give that Remedy or Relief in Parliament, which is the Subject's Money, or End of Action now in question.

I go likewise along with him, and every Gentleman that hath spoke in this Debate, That by the Law and Customs of Parliament, none but yourselves can determine who are rightly elected, in order to displace, or place them here; and incident to that End, you have the sole Right of considering the Right of the Electors; I say so far forth, as it is necessarily incident to determine who shall, and who shall not sit here; and so other Court can consider the Right of the Electors, in order to determine the Right of any to sit in this Place, further than you by force of Act of Parliament have given them Leave. But this Matter has now long been disputed a great while, you have had it fully represented to you, how they come to hold the Scales in this Action in Wentworth's Case, it is as in a Cafe where the Right of Election, or the Privilege of this House was a Subject-matter of the Question; the Action was brought there only to maintain the injur'd Subject to Damages. And this Matter ought to be consider'd, as it relates to different Ends and Purposes, and upon that it turn'd in the Cafe of Strom and Shewalden. They who thought that Action lay, thought the Courts below might try the Issues of an Election to repair in Damages, not to determine who should be admitted to sit in Parliament.

And I will venture to say, That the Judgment of the House of Lords that confirm'd that Reverend, was in no wise at that Time satisfactory to the Commons of England.

But the Act of Parliament that hath been mention'd, was built upon this, that the Reverend of the Judgement between Barnardiston and Strom was not right, and so that Act was pass'd to set up the Right of the Commons of England, that was thought to be invaded by that Reverend, or Judgment, that the Action upon the Cafe did not lie.

I will go a Step further, That as you have the sole Power to try the Right of Election, and consider the Right of the Electors, to the End I mention'd, to determine who shall be admitted here; I agree it hath been the Law and Customs of Parliaments (how ancient I will not enquire) to punish the Offenders, particularly the Officers and Managers presiding at the Election, for doing any Wrong or Injury to his

Office

Office on that Occasion, in order to make him an Example, or as an Offender against the Publick, and the Constitution of Parliament: So far I grant you have a full Right to go, and nobody ought to interfere with you.

But now were carrying the Matter yet further: The Question now is not, Whether we have the full Right to punish the Officer as a publick Offender? This Action is not brought to that End, nor is there a Word in the Declaration, who was, or was not duly elected, or that the Constitution or Privilege of Parliament was violated: But the Plaintiff only says, he had a Right to vote, and that he was injuredly denied it, (whether the right or wrong Member was refused, he decides not with us) and he submits it to the Court and the Law. Whether he ought not to have Damages for that Wrong? And the Question now is, Whether that Demand of Damages was not well founded? Or, Whether there is any thing in this contrary to the Law and Constitution of Parliament? Law depending on Custom, certainly consists not in, and is not to be made out by one Act, but by often reiterated Acts: And that must be very far from being the Law and Custom of Parliament, which is so far from being a frequent Repetition of Acts, or Precedents, that in this Case, there is no Influence where an Elector hath brought his Petition, without regard to the Return made, and defired his particular Right to vote might be used and asserted, he having been obstructed and injured in giving his Vote: nor was any such Elector repaid his Damages here, nor ever had his particular Right to vote restored, or altered by any Judgment, or Declaration of this House.

The largest and honorable Person, upon whose Reasoning I am hereby offering my Thoughts, with great Defence, was pleased to insinuate in the Case of five Persons in the Town of Aylesbury, who exhibited a Petition, and complain'd of an Injury done them at an Election for that Town, at which their Votes were refus'd. And if they complain'd of nothing further, and did not conclude to the Right of the Return, and complain that they were unduly represented, I admit it had been so far an Inducement to his Purpose. But if they had in complain'd only of the Injury done the Petitioners in denying their Votes; yet he is pleas'd to tell you, this Petition was withdrawn, and by the Consent of the Persons who presented it, and to come to nothing. I suppose this is the single Precedent to prove the Law and Custom of Parliament, because there is no other Influence given. It does not appear upon what Ground or Reasons it was withdrawn, and I having no particular Memory of that Passage, you will pardon me, if I am mistaken in my Conjecture. I believe so Man, that seeks a Remedy would desist, if he expected to succeed; so I take the most probable Reason (till another appear) to be, that they were hopeless of doing any good with it: And one Petition not prosecuted, will hardly shew, that Parliaments used to give Redress in such Cases. Now if that Precedent had been successful, if the Petition had been referred to a Committee, if Damages had been given upon the Complaint, and a declarative Voice had call'd to assert the Petitioner's Right, (but I did not observe there were any such Proceedings) then, indeed, I would admit, that it was one Precedent on Power, and a very material one, and it would have proved, that we had once held Plea of this Matter, and by consequence, if we had often done so, that nobody else had to do with it. But if that Precedent be defective, and none can shew that ever any Petition was exhibited by any Elector for a personal Injury done him in rejecting his Vote, tho' the Person he would have voted for was return'd, this Action may lie for such an Injury done to an Elector, without interfering with any Law, or Usage of Parliament, that hath yet been made evident; and that brings me to another Matter of this respectable Person's Discourse, and I acknowledge he enter'd into it with a great deal of Candour and Justice.

He was pleas'd to say, He thought it was admitted in this Debate, That the like Action is not to be found in all the Reports, or Books of Law. I would allow his Objections its due Weight, and admit what I take his Meaning to be, That this Action, in the particular Species of it, may be new, tho' 'tis old in its Genus, or the principal Materials on which it is built; and I take it, if by the general Rule, or Reason of Law for such an Action it be warranted, this Action (as a Thousand other Actions on the Case may) will lie, tho' in all the Parts 'tis not to be exactly parallel'd; for it is the very Nature of, and imply'd in the Name of an Action upon the Case, that every Man may maintain it on his particular Case, provided it carry in it the general Reason, or Inequity required by Law to support such an Action, tho' in many Circumstances it may be perfectly new. I for that honorable Person understands clearly the necessary Incidents of such an Action; and there, there are to be observ'd 'tis injury, which I take to mean a Damage to the Subject, not arising from a lawful, but which is the Consequence of an unlawful Act. Now, says he, first, here is no Damage, because anently the Attendance was thought a Service and a Burden, and the Right of Election was a Service too, and in being deprived of a Service, there can be no Damage; and therefore one of the main Ingredients of an Action of the Case is wanting. This is clear Reasoning, and either to be allow'd or submitted to.

It is said, The Right of Election was a Service; how true, I doubt upon the Reason of the Thing: A Service was often part of the Tenure, by which a Man held his Land 'till it came up to the Crown; and the Service was originally created by Grant and Reservation. Now, can any one imagine, that where one holds a small Freehold, any such Tenure was created between him and his immediate Lord originally by Reservation, as that he should owe to send Members to Parliament?

But if it might be consider'd as a Service for created, it will not do the Business of the Argument, unless you consider it also as a Service of Burden, without Advantage or Privilege; for if it be a Privilege too, (tho' 'tis an Creation it might be a Service) then the depriving a Man of it is an Injury. Now nobody can think but that the Right to elect a Parliament-Man, which is a distinguishing Character from the Vulgar, and hath its Weight in the Legislature, is a Privilege; and therefore to be deprived of it, is to be deprived not only of a Service and Burden, but of a very valuable Privilege: And I believe any Englishman would think we dealt hardly by him, to deprive him of it, tho' we should tell him, at the same Time, we depriv'd him only of a Service or Burden, and not of a valuable Privilege.

There is another Thing that occurs on this Head: We have been so far from thinking the being elected a Service or Burden only, that in the Nature of a Repeal of those Judgments of Senior and Barnardiston, by a positive Law we have given the Elected double Damages if he be deprived of that Service. Therefore by our own Notion, and in our own Case, 'tis a Privilege that ought to be recompens'd even with double Damages, that is so far, when it concerns ourselves. And shall we declare it a mere Service in the Case of our Electors, not to be recompens'd even by single Damages, and that after the unaltered Methods of the Common Law have adjudg'd in their Due? For I do not find any body doubts, whether this Man has proceeded in the legal Method throughout, even in the last Report. The Lords have not judg'd the Fact, they are bound as to the Fact by the Verdict, and they are unquestionably the Judges of the Law on a Writ of Error. And therefore, as to what hath been said, That any Fault of an Election might come to be determined before the Lords, it is a great Mistake, for they judge purely of the Law on Writs of Error, as every one knows, that knows any thing of our Constitution. Give me Leave to say, We upon this Occasion, judge of this Matter only as a Matter of Law, which may affect our Privileges; and 'tis we have Authority to consider what it is Law, as it relates to, or may interfere upon our Privileges; nobody that sits here can think that there lies an Appeal in this Place, or a second Consideration of this Matter after the Lords Judgment, as 'tis a Point of Law only, and as it regards the Right of the Subject: but that an Objection in Point of Law here to the Judgment of the Lords, will not hold otherwise than as it relates to our own Privileges; for nobody will say, That we are the dernier Resort in any other Respect. And tho' that is the only Point that brings it properly under our Consideration, yet I fear we are asking from the Subject, in Effect, what the Law hath adjudg'd his Right, and treating a legal Judgment given in the Subject's Favour. There are other Arguments along in, to make up the Weight only, as that which concerns the person in the Case of a Deceit, in which Case, in regard of the Multitude of Actions that would follow, an Action will not be every one that is injured by the ending of it. It is true, where a Multitude are injured by one and the same Fact, it shall not be punish'd by a Multitude of Actions, but the Public is to take Care of it, because the Injury is of a publick Nature. But by the same Standard and known Laws of England, if one Man is so calld as to commit a Multitude of Injuries, which severally affect several Persons, it was never said, that he became punishable by the Multitude of his Offences, but every one injured has his Action against him. I have heard it said, despite Numbers; but that is spoken as to the Number of Offences, not the Number of Offences committed by the same Man. And this Injury which could in denying the Subject to vote, when of Right he ought, will not be multiply'd (as is objected) by letting the Subject know, that as they may come into Parliament to punish the Officer as a publick Offender against the Constitution; for the particular Person injur'd, by being deny'd his Vote, may also have an Action for the private and particular Injury done to him only.

I would mention one Thing more: They who have spoke for the other Opinion, seem to take it for granted, (which I do not take to be a true Way of Reasoning) that because in determining who have a Right to sit here, we do incidentally, and only as, in order to that End, determine who have a Right to vote, therefore no other Judicator can try the same Matter or Right to vote, tho' it be to different Ends and Purposes.

Now if you will consider the different Jurisdictions in the Constitution of this Kingdom, there is nothing more common, and many Influences may be given of it. There are Variety of Jurisdictions that try the same Fact, and yet each hath a sole and separate Jurisdiction in that Matter, to different Ends; and these Jurisdictions are not, in that Respect, subordinate to one another: Takes the Spiritual and Temporal; the Spiritual is not subordinate, but only refrainable by the Temporal, where they interpose upon the Temporal; as in the common Instance of Marriage, which directly and abstracted from other Purposes, is triable in the Spiritual Court, and no where else: But yet if that comes to be a Question of Fact in relation to a Title at Law, or to make out a Defect, why the Temporal Courts every Day try it, though per se, and taken by itself, it belongs to the Jurisdiction of the Spiritual Court; and yet their Courts are not that respect subordinate one to another.

So in the Case touch'd upon of a Battery, 'tis not triable in the Common Pleas, as 'tis an Offence against the publick Peace, by Indictment, in order to a Fine, but triable in those Courts only that have a Criminal Jurisdiction; but as 'tis a private Injury, and in order to recompense the injury'd in Damages, that is triable in the Court of Common Pleas, and other Places, which have Cognizance of Civil Actions only: And this is not in respect that one Court is subordinate to the other, but one holds Plea of the same Fact, in order to one End; and the other in order to another End: And there is no eliding of Jurisdictions in such Cases.

Another which hath been objected, That this may create Variety of Judgments concerning the same Right: This does not weigh, it forms in our own Cases, for we may bring our Actions for double Damages for a false Return, and yet that may produce the same Variety of Judgments. So was the Opinion of the House in the Case behind me cited; and the Law is plain, That though the last Determination of this House, where there hath been any, shall determine the Right of Election, and there the Judges and Jury shall be bound by the last Determination, and to act by the same Rule; yet in Towns where there has been no Dispute of the Right sentle here one Way or other, the Candidate may notwithstanding bring his Action, and lie, or the People of the Place, may also petition the House of Commons. And then there is the same Objection, for there may be Variety of Judgments touching the Right of Election, one in the House of Commons, and another another in the Courts below. And upon the Trial, in order to obtain Damages, a Jury, in such Cases, where the Right had never been settled in Parliament before the Election in Question, are not directed by the Judgment of your House on the same disputed Election, nor is any Jury bound to follow such Judgment. And if you will give up a Supposition, that a Judge and Jury may go contrary to Law and Right, or the Determinations of this House in the Cafe before you, 'tis an Objection which you have overlooked in your own Cases; and therefore why should it be an Objection to hinder the Person whom you represent, of his Remedy for the Injury done him?

Upon the Whole, I am for so much of your Question as serves only to declare, That you have the sole Power of determining the Right of all Elections, and even the Election Right to vote, so the End to try who is your Member, or to punish the Officer, as an Offender against the Constitution: as far as is agreeable to the constant Law and Practice of Parliament. But for that Part of the Question which relates to the returning the Election from bringing their Actions for the persons, or private Damage done to them, I think it is not agreeable to the Law or Constitution of Parliament.

Sir Humphrey Boscawen, Mr. Freeman, we are much obliged to the Gentlemen that have acted on both Sides, who have brought the Matter of this Debate into a narrow Compass: The Question is then, "Whether an Elector be intitled to an Action at Common Law against the Officer for Recovery of Damages, in case his Vote, which he offered, be not taken down in Writing, and entered on the Poll?" or, Whether the House of Commons have the sole Privilege of examining and determining the Right, or Qualification of every Elector to give his Vote, and in judging of the Behaviour of every Sheriff, and other Officers, in taking the Poll on the Elections of Members to serve in Parliament?"

I am of Opinion, with great Submission to better Judgments, that the House of Commons have a sole Right of Jurisdiction in these Cases, and that the Elector is not intitled to an Action at Common Law. I shall endeavour to support this Opinion, by answering the Arguments that have been made use of to prove the contrary: And first, I crave Leave to observe, That the Gentlemen who have argued on the other Side, have not taken Notice of a Distinction which forms to be very material in this Cafe, and that is, between an actual Force, or Violence done by the Officer, and a bare Omission in Point of Duty.

In case the Officer does by Force or Violence, abstract or bare, as an Elector from offering, or pronouncing his Vote at an Election for which the Candidates he pleases, the Elector will be intitled to an Action at Common Law for Recovery of Damages, for that is a Personal Wrong, and does not concern the Right or Qualification of an Elector to vote in Elections: But in case the Officer does permit the Elector quietly to offer, or pronounce his Vote, (as he did in the Cafe of Ashby, who pronounced his Vote for Sir Thomas Lee and Simon Mordaunt, Esq.) but does not think fit to enter his Vote upon the Poll, the Elector in this Cafe is not intitled to an Action at Common Law for Recovery of Damages, because he has neither suffered any Force or Violence, nor is by such Omission deprived of his Vote. For a Vote being once pronounced, the Law takes it for the Benefit of the Publick, tho' the Officer be wanting in his Duty, and none have Power to determine, whether the Elector had a legal Vote, and whether the Officer had sufficient Reason to refuse to enter the said Vote on the Poll, but the House of Commons. If any others should have Authority in this Cafe, they will be able to destroy the Freedom of Elections, and the Constitution of Parliament.

It is insisted by some Gentlemen, that the Electors have no proper Remedy in this Cafe in the House of Commons, and therefore they must have their Remedy at Common Law: But with great Deference to their Judgments, the Electors have a very proper Remedy in this House in every respect; for here their Votes will be allowed, the legal Representatives returned, and the Officer will be punished for any wilful Default in the Execution of his Office. This is a Remedy that infers the End for which every Elector is intitled to give his Vote, which is not for a private Advantage to himself, but for the general Advantage of the whole Kingdom. But the Action at Law is no proper Remedy in any respect: For since a Vote that is offered and refused, is as good by the Law of Parliament as a Vote that is offered and received, and is so adjudged on the Trial of every Election in the House of Commons, or else they could not all their House with legal Representatives; it is not proper or reasonable that an Officer should pay Damages to an Elector that has not suffered any, nor that a publick Offence should be punished by a private Satisfaction; which is not likely to prevent the Evil, preserve the Vote, nor reduce the Representation; nor is the same consistent with the Constitution, or the publick Safety.

The Qualification of Electors, and the Behaviour of Officers in all Elections, are Matters of Parliament, and such Matters are not cognizable elsewhere, as hath been often declared by all the Judges of England: A Parliamentary Cause requires a Parliamentary Remedy. And since Votes have been refused in all Elections; if Electors, in this Cafe, had been intitled to an Action at Law, it must be presumed, that some Time or other, such an Action would have been brought, which yet was never once attempted in any former Reign; and all those Acts of Parliament that were made to give Damages in Cases relating to Elections, do demonstrate that no such Damages could be recovered at Common Law, for if they could, there had been no Occasion for making any of those Statutes.

It is insisted, That every Right must have a Remedy; but then the Subject must be first deprived of that Right, which in this Cafe he was not; and even when he is, he must have his Remedy in a proper Manner, and in a proper Court. There are several Sorts of Rights, and several Sorts of Laws in England, and there are several Courts of Justice, for the Administration of those Laws: A Man that has a Right to a Legacy, cannot bring an Action at Common Law, but he has a proper Remedy in the Spiritual Court. The like may be observed of Cases that belong to the Courts of Chancery, Admiralty, Star-chamber, and of the Feoff-laws. The Subject cannot bring Actions at Common Law, in Cases that belong to the Jurisdiction of other Courts. And when my Lord Chief Justice Coke enumerates the several Laws in this Kingdom, he gives the Precedence to the Law and Custom of Parliament, which, he tells us, is superior to the Common Law in Wigmore's Hall. And as every Court, or Law has its Customs and Privileges peculiar to itself, and is the Judge of them, so also the High Court of Parliament, per propriam legem is constituted, and hath its own proper Laws and Customs, and is the Judge thereof. And if an Action at Common Law will not lie for a Legacy, where the Spiritual Court has a Jurisdiction, tho' the Temporal Courts have, in many Respects, a superior Authority; such an Action will much less lie in a Cafe concerning the Privilege, which is the highest Court of the Kingdom, and who are the Judges of all Cases relating to themselves. But come carry this farther, and say, that every Right must have a Remedy with Damages. This may be true in most Cases, where a Man is deprived of Rights of Property and Possession; but there are many Instances to be given, where a Right of Franchise or Privilege is not intitled to any Damage; as a Person elected Mayor of a Corporation, if the proper Officer refuses to swear him, has no Action at Law for Damages, but his Remedy is by a Mandamus out of the Queen's Bench: There is a Remedy by Writ out of the King's Bench for the Recovery of Rights. In a Writ of Right, you shall recover the Land, but no Damages: so in this Cafe, the proper Remedy is to have the Vote allowed, which can only be done by the House of Commons. Some Gentlemen have found out a new Distinction, which I never heard before, that the House of Commons have the sole Privilege to judge of the Rights of Electors, and of the Behaviour of Officers, to one Intert, but not to another, that is, in order to determine who are the legal Representatives, but not to give Damages to the Party injured. But, with great Submission, there is no Weight at all in this Distinction. For, as it is plain, that the Elector is not, in this Cafe, deprived of his Vote, and therefore suffers no Damage; so it is also evident, that the Judgment of the House of Commons, in matters properly cognizable before them, cannot be contradicted by any other Judicary; and therefore their Judgment of the Qualification of the Elector, and of the Behaviour of the Officer, must be conclusive to all Intents and Purposes whatsoever. It is contrary to the Reason of all Laws, that the Behaviour of an Officer should be subject to the Determination of two independent Jurisdictions: Or that he should be answerable by the Judgment of a superior Court, and guilty by the Judgment of an inferior: Or that he should be tried for the same Offence. No Man can serve two Masters: The Officer, at this Rate, will be every way enfeebled, and made liable to Punishment, whether he does his Duty or not: If he accepts illegal Votes on the Poll, he will forfeit goods by the Statute, for a false Return; if he refuses them, he may be ruined by a Maintenance of Actions: for if one may bring an Action, there may five Hundred; since every Man, at this Rate, may offer a Vote, and bring an Action for not entering it upon the Poll. How is this consistent with the Freedom of Elections, in which these ought to be no Terror, neither on the Electors, nor on the Officers? But as the Electors should be free to offer their Votes, so the Officers should be free to judge whether they ought to be entered on the Poll, or not; and they ought not to be accountable to any, but the House of Commons, whose interests they are, in all Matters relating to Elections, and who are entrusted with the Determination of all Matters and Cases relating thereto; and they may as well punish them for taking illegal Votes on the Poll, as for not taking those that are legal. In neither of which Cases have the Judges of the Common Law any Jurisdiction, tho' there is the same Reason in both, to take Care that every the meanest Subject may have Relief for any Injury done him; but we are not to take more Care of the meanest Subject than of the whole House of Commons. The person Subject in England ought to have no Relief but what is consistent with our Law of Parliament, and the Safety of the Constitution. If an Action lies, and upon a Judgment on that Action a Writ of Error lies in the House of Peers, the Lords will be the sole Judges at last, who have Votes to elect a House of Commons; which is directly contrary to the fundamental Maxim of the Law and Custom of Parliament, that the two Houses are mutual Checks to each other, and sole Judges of their own Privileges.

This is an excellent Constitution, and admirably well contrived for the common Safety: But how can this Constitution be preserved, if the Lords can punish our Officers, and govern our Electors? This will be the Way to destroy all Checks, and to make the House of Commons dependent on the Lords; and then I cannot see upon what Foundation you can be said to fit them to be the sole Justice for your Country.

Others insist, That this is a Right that is incident to the Freedom and Privilege of Electors; therefore, as their Freedoms are cognizable at Common Law, so is every Incident belonging to it. This Argument is plausible at first Sight; but, in Reality, there is nothing in it: For tho' the Commons of England have furnished their private Differences to Arbitrators, or Judges, indifferently chosen and appointed by the Prince, the common Peace of the People; yet they have never furnished their fundamental Rights and Privileges, which they hold as their publick and political Capacities, as a free Branch of the High Court of Parliament, to any other but their own Representatives, who are chosen and appointed by themselves. This is not a Case, properly speaking, between Party and Party, but between the Lords and Commons, because the Determination of this Cafe brings the whole Right in Question. Who hath a Privilege to judge of the Qualification of Electors to give their Votes in Election of Members to serve in Parliament, Whether the Lords or the Commons? It is not now the Question, Who hath the best Right to a Freehold, or Freedom, or to any thing that is incident to it? But, Whether the Commons of England shall have any Freeholds, or Freedoms at all? Or, whether in the same Thing in effect, Whether they shall have any Security for those Rights or not? For if the Lords are Judges of your Privileges, you can hold no Right but during their Pleasure.

The

The Lords seem to contest for the Right of the Subject, but I with it not for a Power to enable themselves to judge and determine as they think fit of all our Rights and Liberties; for this is the necessary Consequence of allowing an Election to have a Remedy in any other Place but within their Walls.

This is my humble Opinion; and if I am mistaken, other Gentlemen will set me right. This is certainly a Matter of the highest Importance to the Welfare of the Subject, and I doubt not but they will very well consider it, before they give way to the establishing a Precedent that tends to destroy the Privileges of this House, or the Liberties of this Country.

A great Testimony is express'd for this poor Man, whose Vote has been refus'd, who whether he had a Right to give his Vote, is very much questioned, and never yet determined by this House, which has the power of Judicature thereof. But admitting he had a Vote, Whether ought to be refus'd a private Intrest, or the publick Safety? Whether will be mov'd for the Honour of this House, and the Interest of our Election, The Care of a private Person by new-invented Adion, neither warranted by Reason, Precedent, or any establish'd Law; or the Care of the Parliament, and the Constitution, on which depend the Rights and Liberties of all the Commons of England?

But, I beg Pardon for taking up so much of your Time, but I must confess it seems to me, that our Adion depends upon a right Determination of this Matter, for I cannot for any other Reason say this new Device is supported by the Lords, but only to render you precocious and useful.

Sir Gilbert Dailen (afterwards a Judge in Ireland). Mr. Freeman, I shall not be able to say very long at this time of Day. I think the Point in Debate has been truly stated by the Gentlemen who have insisted on this Question. "Whether an Adion will lie for an Election, for having been refus'd his Vote at the Election of a Member to serve in Parliament?" A learned Gentleman would have the Question to be, not "Whether an Adion will lie; but, Whether this House has the sole Right of determining that Matter, and of giving Remedy in it?" I confess I think it is more properly stated the other way. But the thing is scarce worth a Dispute, since which way you turn the Tables, it comes to the same Point, and one of the Questions will in consequence be refus'd by the Resolution of the other: For if that Question be put which is propos'd by the Gentlemen, and carried in the Affirmative, that this House has the sole Right of determining this, and all other Matters whatsoever that concern the Right of Election; then it must follow, that whoever is wrong'd in any such respect, cannot be redress'd by Adion, since the Right of determining in Cases of this Nature, is not in the Courts below, but solely in this House.

I shall not offer you any Arguments to prove this sole Right, many having been us'd by others; but I will consider some things (without taking up much of your Time) that have been offer'd as Objections to it. Some Gentlemen have made a Distinction in this Case, between the Right of the Electors, and of the Electee; and they will have it, That the Courts below may decide the first, but not the last: Whereas, in my poor Opinion, the Decision of the Electors Right must necessarily in many Cases decide who has Right to be electee. For suppose a common Case, That one of the Candidates insists upon an Election by a secret Number, and the other upon a popular Election: If in this Case one of the People be refus'd his Vote, upon a Promise that he is one of the select Number, whereupon he brings his Adion against the Officer; will not the Event of that Trial determine (in consequence) the Right of the Candidates? Surely it must; since, if it go for the Plaintiff, he for whom the Plaintiff offers to vote, and who had the popular Interest, will appear to have had the Right of Election; and so will the other Candidate, if it go for the Defendant. Several other Cases to the same Purpose might be put: So that if an Adion of this Nature should lie, it must (as I apprehend) unavoidably follow, That Wynne-Hall by original Adion, and by Writ of Error the House of Lords, will have Power to determine, (at least consequentially) who has Right to sit in this House, and who not. And how consistent such a Determination will be with your undeniable Right (acknowledg'd on all Sides) of determining the Elections of your Members, exclusive of all other Jurisdictions, I leave to Gentlemen to consider.

A learned Person was pleas'd to object, That Right is founded upon Usage; and if this House had the sole Right of judging in a Case of this Nature, where a single Elector is wrong'd, doubtless there would be some Precedent of Relief given to such an injur'd Person. But (says the Gentleman) there is no such Precedent, and therefore it must follow, That this House has not the sole Right of relieving in that Case. I think I may safely deny his last Proposition, as he applies it to the Rights of this House, which (generally speaking) are not founded upon Usage. Sir, the Rights of Parliament are chiefly founded upon the Nature and Constitution of Parliaments. Usage is indeed a Corroboration, and an Evidence of these Rights; but the Foundation of them is our being a Part of the Legislature, whereby we necessarily become invested with all Rights and Privileges as essential to us, and to discharge our Duty in that great Capacity: So that it is not so much what has been us'd, as what is necessary to the Support of our Constitution, that must be the Rule and Measure in determining the Rights of the House of Commons.

But neither has Usage been wanting in this Case: For whereas the Gentleman asserts, That there is no Precedent where this House has given Relief to a wrong'd elector, (with Submission) several such Precedents appear upon your Books, particularly in the Case of Bensley, where four or five of the Inhabitants complain'd, and the House gave a Remedy. And I cannot see why, if it has been given to four, it may not be given to one, nay, I should think, if more than one have been refus'd, a feint one should be relievable.

But it seems to me, that the Argument drawn from Usage, goes much further than the learned Gentleman intended it should, for if all Rights be founded upon Usage, all Right of Adion must be so founded; and then what becomes of this Adion, which the Gentlemen has insisted to support? If Usage be nothing else but the Reputation of the like Acts, then this Adion (according to the Gentleman's Rule, that Usage is the Foundation of Rights) cannot be right, which there hath been a Reputation of the like Adion.

Nor can it be said, that this is the first Time any such Cause of Adion has arisen, and that therefore it could not have been brought before; for there has scarce been a Parliament call'd in any Reign, but some or other has, without doubt, been wrongfully refus'd his Vote: So that the Cause having been frequent, it must have had the like Effect ere now, in Case such a Wrong could have been redress'd by bringing such an Adion.

But no Gentleman has pretend'd to say, That any Adion of this Nature was ever brought before, and therefore we may infer from the learned Gentleman's own Position, as likewise from the Authority of Lindley's Text, That since none has been brought, none can be brought, and this has been the constant Opinion of the Courts in Wynne-Hall, the Judges having, upon every Occasion, where the Rights of Parliament have fallen under their Consideration, in all Times declared, That nothing of that Kind is within their Jurisdiction: Nor can they judge of any such Matter, farther than as they are impos'd by particular Statutes.

And this was the Reason why the Judgment in Barnardiston's Case, given in the King's-Bench, was revers'd in the Exchequer-Chamber, because it was a Third part of Parliament's Cognation, the House of Commons having the sole Power of determining all Matters relating to Elections and Returns, except in Statute-Cases. Nay, the Court of King's-Bench had declared, They would not have proceeded in this Adion of Barnardiston, had it not been grounded upon a precedent Judgment given in the House of Commons. But the Judges in the Exchequer-Chamber thought, that even the Determination of the House was not a sufficient Authority to the Courts below, to hold Plea in an Adion relating to the Rights of Parliament, tho' the Adion was ground'd upon that Determination; and therefore they revers'd the Judgment given in that Adion: And (which is a mighty strong Circumstance in the Case) that Reversal was unanimously in the House of Lords. So that it is plain, even the Lords themselves were, at that Time, of the same Opinion with the Judges, That nothing which concern'd Elections was cognizable in Wynne-Hall: For otherwise they could not have affirm'd the Judgment given in the Exchequer-Chamber, which was ground'd entirely upon that Maxim.

This appears farther, by what their Lordships did in the Case of Holly and Elton, against whom Judgment had been given in the King's-Bench for what they had said and done in this House. In the Year 1669, the House of Commons voted, That the Judgment given in the King's-Bench against those Persons was illegal, as being against the Privilege of Parliament. And this Vote was (as I remember) deliver'd as the Lords at a Conference, with a Desire of their Concurrence to it: Accordingly, the Lords sent a Message, That they did consent. Nay, they were so desirous as to defer the Lord Holly in bringing a Writ of Error upon that Judgment, which was done, and the Judgment was revers'd. From whence it must be infer'd, that their Lordships were then of opinion, whatever Judgment is against the Privilege of Parliament (that is, of either House of Parliament) is an illegal Judgment.

Now to lay their two Opinions of the Lords together: If the House of Commons has the sole Privilege of judging all Matters relating to Elections (upon which Ground their Lordships affirm'd the Reversal of the Judgment in Barnardiston's Case), and if every Judgment given against the Privilege of Parliament be illegal (as their Lordships both affirm'd and judg'd in the Case of Holly and Elton), how comes it to pass, that the Lords have lately thought fit to reverse the Judgment given in this Case of Abbey and White, which was ground'd upon that very Opinion, establish'd by their Lordships in the Case of Barnardiston? That all Matters concerning Elections are determinable only in the House of Commons! And consequently, how can we avoid saying, (pursuant to the other Opinion, and to the Judgment they gave in the Case of Holly) That their Lordships Judgment of Reversal given upon the Writ of Error in Abbey's Case, being against what themselves have own'd to be the Privilege of the House of Commons, is an enormous (not to say an illegal) judgment?

I confess I cannot much wonder at its being so, when I consider, that the Steps their Lordships made in proceeding to this Judgment of Reversal, were so very hasty, as not to afford them sufficient Time to weigh and to deliberate upon a Matter of such Importance. This Cause had depended near a Twelvemonth in the King's-Bench, it had been argued several Times at the Bar, and at length serio by the Judges, Three of whom, upon the Reason of former Resolutions, gave Judgment against the Plaintiff, that the Adion does not lie: And yet, no sooner was this Writ of Error brought, but the Errors are immediately argu'd; and upon the first Argument, the Opinions of the Judges are required, and notwithstanding they deferr'd Time but till the next Day to consider of the Case, the Lords (as I am very well assur'd) would not allow them an Hour, but oblig'd them to deliver their present Thoughts, which tho' several of them express'd very doubtfully, and several others were for affirming the Judgment, yet their Lordships were so very clear, and so determinate in the Point, that, without any farther Considerations, the Judgment was revers'd.

And now I desire Gentlemen to judge, whether in this Instance the Lords have shewn that Regard either to the Privileges, or to the Dignity of this House, which their Ancestors, and themselves, had formerly express'd upon the Occasions before mention'd.

I will take Notice but of one Thing more, which fell from a learned Gentleman, who insist'd, that the Election to Parliament is not a Service, but a Privilege, because double Damages are given by the late Act concerning Returns. I have call'd my Eye upon that Act, and I think, if the Premise be real, it will appear, that Gentlemen was somewhat unfortunate in appealing to it, for the Statute calls the Election to Parliament a Service, in express Terms, and certainly with good Reason. If the House will give me Leave, I'll read it.

W^hereas

- "Whereas false and double Returns of Members to serve in Parliament are an Abuse of Trust in a Matter of the greatest Consequence to the Kingdom, and not only an Injury to the Persons daily chosen, by keeping them from their Service in the House of Commons, and putting them to great Expence to make their Elections appear, but also to the Counties, Cities, Boroughs, and Cinque-Ports by which they are chosen, and the Balance of Parliament disturbed and delayed thereby, It is therefore enacted—

Sir, not to trouble you any longer, I am entirely for the Question, as it is posed.

Mr. King (afterwards Lord King, and Lord Chancellor). That which calls me up, on the first Place, is what that honourable Gentleman just against me, was pleas'd to intimate, as if the Right of Election was only a Service, and not a Liberty, or Privilege; and I find a worthy Member, that spoke last, is of the same Opinion. Truly, I am loth to tell you my own, without defining the Act 25 Car. II. cap. 9. may be read—

Members. No, no.

Mr. King. 'Tis as A to enable the County Palatine of Durham to send Members to Parliament; and it recites, That they had not, before that Time, had the Liberty and Privilege of electing and sending any Members to Parliament. Whereas you say the Legislature call it a Liberty and Privilege; and of the Legislature call it so, I think I may venture so call it so too. And as it be a Liberty and Privilege, then the Question will be, Whether it does not stand on the same footing with our Liberties and Privileges? In Case of any other Franchise or Liberty, an Action lies as Common Law for the Breach thereof, and why an Action should not lie as Common Law for the Breach of the Franchise, as well as for the Breach of every other Franchise, is, to me, very strange. Gentlemen take it for granted, that is purely an Action at Common Law, and no Statute has any Influence on it. Now there is a Statute which hath not been mention'd, (only I must first permit that which, I think, no body will deny, viz. That whether an Act at Parliament does forbid any Thing, if any body be injured by the doing of the Thing prohibited by that Act, in consequence of Law, the Person injur'd hath an Action.) I say, there is a Statute that forbids Disturbances or Hindrances in Matters of Elections; and by consequence of Law, that Statute gives an Action to the Person injur'd, against the Person disturbing or hindering him in his Election. The Statute I mean, is the 3 & 4 E. 6. cap. 13. that is a positive Law whereby all Disturbances in Elections are forbid. Every Man is forbid to hinder or disturb by Force of Arms, by Malice, or menacing any Man, to make a free Election.

I shall only influence in one parallel Case, tho' I could in many more: The Statute in Ash. His Time, do Sanctio Magna, only forbids the giving Ball of great Men; there is not one Word of an Action, yet, by Operation of Law, it was always held, that an Action would lie upon that Statute for a Scandal of a great Man, because it was prohibited by that Statute. So here, the Statute forbids the disturbing of any Man by Force or Malice to make free Election; the Jury have found, that the Defendants, in this Cause, maliciously disturb and hinder the Plaintiffs from voting at the Election; and by a like Consequence and Operation of Law, this Action is maintainable.

Gentlemen say, this is a new Action never heard of before. It is true, this particular Action was never brought before, but Actions of the same Kind and Nature, and grounded on the same Principles and Reasons of Law, have been brought before. As all actiones ex rebus may. I could give many instances of this Kind. We a common law, tell the same with Car. II. that an Action lies against an Officer for denying a Bail to one who stood Candidate for a bridge-walk. The Mayor denied the Bail, and said, he was Judge of the Election: And upon this, the Person injured brought his Action, and recover'd. At the same Time it was said, there was no such Action ever heard of before, 'tis true, not that Species, but the Cause was heard of. Another Action was brought 30 Car. II. (which was never heard of before) against a Mayor, for refusing the Plaintiff's Vote for a succeeding Mayor.

I believe every body knows, that all the Law-Books for 400 Years, say, That the King's Bench had Liberty to go into an Estate of a Tenant for Life, to see if he commit Waste. And no Action was ever brought till 16 Ja. I. by a Reversioner against a Tenant for Life, for refusing to let him in to see whether Waste was committed. No Action was ever brought against a Master of a Ship for the negligent Keeping and Loss of Goods on board his Ship, till about the 24 Car. II. and yet the Action lay.

There was another Action in K. Car. II's Time, brought for a false and malicious Prosecution of an Indictment of a Man for Treason. There was the same Objection; and it was said, That this would deter People from prosecuting. And nobody ever dream'd of it before, 'tis true, but it stood upon the general Reason of the Law; if you do me a Wrong, I must have a Remedy. And as to what a worthy Gentleman hath said, That there are instances at Common Law, where a Man shall recover and yet have no Damages; 'tis true in real Actions, but let him give me an instance of that in an Action of this Cafe. His members consider then; if he does not recover Damages in real Actions, he recovers the Land itself.

Members. The Question, the Question.

Mr. King. I find Gentlemen are very uneasy, I will trouble you no farther.

Members. Go on, go on.

Mr. King. I agree, the determining the Right of Election belongs to the House of Commons; and they ought to apply to the House of Commons in that Cafe. And I shall not depart from that, I think I can't, without running the Constitution; but that which I say is, That this Action is brought by a Man that hath an undoubted Right of voting, against an Officer for maliciously refusing his Vote. Put the Case that had happen'd in a County, (for the Law would have been the same) that a Freeholder, who had a Right to vote, had tender'd his Vote to the Sheriff, and tho' he knew he was a Freeholder, yet the Sheriff should maliciously refuse his Vote: Hath the Sheriff done that Man an Injury or no? This Man does not bring his Action, because the Person he would have voted for is not return'd, but 'tis because there is an Injury done to his Franchise. If I thought the Right of Election was concern'd in this Cafe, I would go as far as any, for I think that does belong to the House; but I don't think this is concern'd in the present Cafe.

Sir Thomas Littleton. I shall be better than I can imagine. It has been discourag'd, Whether this be a Privilege, or a Burden, &c. Let them think it a Burden that call it so: If it be a Burden, 'tis such a Burden as some Men spend a great Part of their Estates in, as if it was a Privilege. I think this Resolution which is propos'd, tends to the recovering one Man to injure another Man's Franchise with out any Reparation, which I believe is not very consistent with Law, or Reason. You have, no doubt, a Power of punishing the Offenders, but you can't give Damages. I think this is a plain Case; here was a Man who had a Right to vote, and was not admitted.

Members. No, no.

Sir Thomas Littleton. That is admitted upon the Judgment. For this Cafe is made upon the Right; and if he had not prov'd his Right, he could not have recover'd. Then if he was denied his Right, nobody will say, We can give him Damages. What would you have a poor Man do, come with a Petition, and for Counsel, and attend the Parliament for a Month together? The Man it seems thought it better to go this way. I think, if he had complain'd, we might have punish'd the Officer; but for Damages, he could have them no way but this.

Suppose the Judges in Wykehouse Hall had been of Opinion, That this Action did lie, and the Constables had brought a Writ of Error: What would you have said in a Case where a Man had been denied his Privilege of Voting, and the Law had given Damages, if the Lords had said No, there shall be no Action? I think the Lords have done what is right, I think they have resolv'd the Point injur'd according to Justice; and it does not interfere with your Rights, for he founds his Action upon your Determination.

Members. No, no.

Mr. Waple. Mr. Fennes, I desire to have the Question read. Accordingly Mr. Fennes in the Chair read the Question again.

Mr. Serj. Hanger. A Gentleman that spoke last but one, was pleas'd to say, That if he thought the Right of electing Members was any ways concern'd in this Question, he would come heartily into it. I know not what that Gentleman means by it, but believe all future Elections will depend much upon the Determination you make now. If you give the Lords this Jurisdiction to take Cognizance of Matters relating to Elections, we must come to them to know whether we have a Right to sit here. One Gentleman said, he could not tell whether the sitting here was a Burden, or a Privilege. I think it is a Privilege to some, who by sitting here obtain a good Place; but I think as to others, it may be look'd upon as a great Burden, for to come up and spend a great deal of Money for the Publick Service; and all the Privilege that I know they have is, to protect their Estates, and serve their Country.

I have no extravagant Thing but may be brought into the House of Lords, if you countenance them in the Jurisdiction they have now taken upon them. Any Action whatsoever, let it belong to any Temporal Jurisdiction, may be there determin'd. I will tell you, notwithstanding what is objected against the Judges, they will do their Duty, but I might say, I had now no Barrier, for whatever is there determin'd, may be brought by Writ of Error to the House of Lords, and they will determine as they think fit. In the Case of Stanes and Mansel, the Law was taken to be, that Wykehouse Hall had not a Right to intermeddle in these Matters. What then hath since altered the Law, unless the Lords have the Legislative Power in them? And that I dare say they will have, if you allow them this.

This I must take Notice of from the Report now before you, that here is a Step made, which if it had been made in another Jurisdiction, I should have given a hard Name to it.

I think, in the first Place, the Party should be brought in by the Queen's Process. When Errors are to be assign'd, there ought to go out a Sub Poena, which is the Queen's Writ; but here is only an Order made, and for what? That the Party shall join Issue upon the Writ of Error. Suppose there had been a Release of Errors, would or have join'd Issue upon the Errors? And yet it is what is ordered before the Party is bound. I say, if they have a Jurisdiction, the Party ought to be called in by Sub Poena: And no Judge, or Justiciary can grant Execution, or Process, but it must be in the Queen's Name. As for your Question, I come heartily into it.

Sir William Stoddard. Mr. Fennes, I think this Quest depends upon two Points, and I believe the last way to divide 'em no Question. One Part of it concerns the Rights and Liberties of this House, and I think every body will come up to it. And as I would not tell the Privileges that belong to the House of Commons, in I would not tell the Privileges of the Commons of England, which we here represent. As one is the Privileges of this House, so the other concerns the Liberties of the People of England, who cannot otherwise come to a Remedy when they are abused in this Manner. The Gentleman that call'd it a hard business, if he would tell his Country, I believe he might be excus'd, and they would find another in his Room.

Mr. Waple (afterwards Sir Robert, and Chancellor of the Exchequer, and afterwards Earl of Oxford). I will trouble you very little at this Time; I think the Point of Learning and Law has been to well spoken to by those learned Gentlemen that have been against the Question, that if I was said, I should say nothing more to that. But I think the Question, as 'tis going to be put, says right; for as the Question stands, the I cannot give my Negative to one Part, I think 'tis impossible to give my Affirmative to the other. The Matter before you comes to this single Question, Whether you will encourage, and give a Power to an Officer, be he whom he will, to shut arbitrarily, or rather abuse, in such a Cafe, to do something in Favour of the Electors? I am sure, if I desire to be elected, be that that had the Right, I would never give the Officer an Authority so the Procurator of the Electors. When you come to say, that the sole judging of the Qualification of the Electors belongs to the House of Commons only, those, I apprehend, are Words of too large Extent and all Consequence. Suppose there was an Adieu brought upon the last Act of Parliament, for a full or double Return.

Mr. Freeman. There is an Exception in the Question as to that. Mr. Wolke. I know there is, but suppose an Adieu brought upon that Statute, the Officer may have proceeded with the greatest Impartiality, may have taken the Poll with the greatest Exactness and Justice, and there may appear to be an equal Number of Votes for each Candidate, whereupon he makes a double Return, and this brings it to be determined by the Committee of Elections, and they vote one of them duly elected. This Gentleman that had the Favour of the Committee, (though afterwards possibly it might be made appear, that by Bribery or Corruption, and at a great Expence, he procured himself to be elected) after you have voted him duly elected, he hath nothing to do but to say his Adieu, and for if he can make his double Damage amount to his Expenses. The first Thing he is to do, is to produce the Vote of the House of Commons that declare him duly elected, contrary, perhaps, to the last Determination in Parliament, which, in every Place, is to be the Guide to the Returning Officer. But shall these then be given in Evidence no Qualification of the Electors? Nothing to prove, that the Persons admitted to vote were qualified according to such last Determination? Or shall that Vote of the House of Commons, that was intended only to bring him into this House, recover him 5 or 600 l. Damages? I take it to be so, as the Law stands. Now it ought to be seen who hath the greater Number of legal Votes, and whether duly qualified; and in that Case you must suffer the Matter again to be tried by the Court, and you do, in some Measures, make them Judges of the Qualifications of the Electors; if it were otherwise, they could not enquire into the Majority of legal Votes.

What happens in the Case of a Mayor, may be in the Case of a Sheriff: If a Mayor or a Constable try deny a Man his Vote that hath an uncontroverted Right in a Corporation, a Sheriff may refuse a Freeholder, and strike off enough to make a Majority for whom he pleases. You had once the Case before you, Whether a Sheriff could refuse a Sheriff, and one or two Gentlemen were given that Power to a Sheriff, but a learned Gentleman thought it a dangerous Question, and he desired to come to the Merits of the Election; and that was determined, and you voted the worthy Member duly elected, and that was it a dangerous Thing to determine, Whether the Officer had that Power one Way or another? I think that Part of the Question, which concerns the Qualification of the Electors, ought to be left out.

Mr. Freeman. I will read the Question. (Which he did.)
Marquis of Horwington. Sir, I think it is a constant Rule, where a Question is complicated, for the Right of every Member, if he define it, to have the Question divided, and I think it regular to do it by an Amendment; and therefore I second that worthy Gentleman, that you would leave out those Words that relate to the Qualification of the Electors.

Mr. St. John. My Lord is undoubtedly right in what he desires; That if there be any Words in the Question to which Gentlemen have a Difference, that Question is not to be put; but only, Whether these Words shall stand Part of the Question? Therefore if those Words of the Qualification of the Electors do give Offence, it must be put, Whether they shall stand Part of the Question? But I hope at the same time Gentlemen will append, that leaving out those Words, leaves out all that you have debated on.

Sir Christopher Mordaunt. No doubt if any Question is complicated, Gentlemen do not know how to give an Affirmative or a Negative, and you must divide it: But I hope Gentlemen will consider the latter Part of the Question is the main Thing whereon you have debated; for if you do not assert that you have the Power of determining the Qualifications of the Electors, you give up the Right of the Commons of England: I do agree that the Question may be divided.

Mr. Freeman. But which is debated now, is, Whether those Words shall stand Part of the Question?

Sir James Mackay. So, I think the Question ought to be divided.

Mr. Freeman. The Question, as I have it upon my Paper, is this: "That according to the known Law and Usage of Parliament, neither the Qualification of any Elector, or the Right of any Person elected, is cognizable or determinable elsewhere than before the Commons of England in Parliament assembled, except in such Cases as are specially provided for by Act of Parliament."

But some Gentlemen are for leaving out those Words, ("Neither the Qualification of any Elector, or") So that I must put a Question, Whether these Words shall stand Part of the Question?

Members. Aye, aye.

Then Mr. Freeman put the Question, and the Committee divided.

Teller for the Ayes, Mr. Goslin, 215

Teller for the Nays, Mr. Wolke, 97

So it was carried, that these Words should stand Part of the Question.

And the main Question being put,

Resolved,

That according to the known Law and Usage of Parliament, neither the Qualification of any Elector, or the Right of any Person elected, is cognizable or determinable elsewhere than before the Commons of England in Parliament assembled, except in such Cases as are specially provided for by Act of Parliament.

Resolved,

That the examining and determining the Qualification or Right of any Elector, or any Person elected to serve in Parliament, in any Court of Law, or elsewhere than before the Commons of England in Parliament assembled, except in such Cases as are specially provided for by Act of Parliament, will engage all Mayors, Bailiffs, and other Officers, who are obliged to take the Poll, and make a Return thereupon, to Multiplicity of *Adieu*s, vexatious Suits, and unprofitable Expenses, and will subject them to different and undependent Jurisdiction, and inconsistent Determinations in the same Case, without Relief.

Resolved,

That Thomas Adley having, in Contempt of the Jurisdiction of this House, committed and perpetrated an Adieu at Common Law against William White, and others, the Constables of St. Andrew, for not receiving his Vote at an Election of Burgesses to serve in Parliament for the said Borough of St. Andrew, is guilty of a Breach of the Privilege of this House.

Resolved,

That whoever shall presume to commence or prosecute any Adieu, Indictment, or Information at Common Law, which shall bring in the Right of Electors, or Persons elected to serve in Parliament, to the Determination of any other Jurisdiction than that of the House of Commons, except in Cases specially provided for by Act of Parliament, or in Person and Person, and all Attorneys, Solicitors, Counsellors, Sergeants at Law, collecting, prosecuting, or pleading in any such Case, are guilty of a high Breach of the Privilege of this House.

Ordered,

That the said Resolutions be fixed up on Wyndham-Hall Gate, signed by the Clerk.

These Resolutions, with this (to wit,

Resolved,

That according to the known Law and Usage of Parliament, it is the sole Right of the Commons of England in Parliament assembled, except in Cases otherwise provided for by Act of Parliament, to examine and determine all Matters relating to the Right of Elections of their own Members.)

Before passed in the Committee, were reported to the House.

Monday, 26 January, 1703.

Mr. Freeman reported the five Resolutions agreed to by the Committee; the first Resolution was not opposed, but after the second Resolution (was).

That according to the known Law and Usage of Parliament, neither the Qualification of any Elector, or the Right of any Person elected, is cognizable or determinable elsewhere than before the Commons of England in Parliament assembled, except in such Cases as are specially provided for by Act of Parliament.

As for read the second time by the Clerk, the Question (according to Order) being proposed to agree with the Committee in that Resolution, the Marquis of Horwington stood up in his Place, and spoke to this Effect:

Marquis of Horwington. I do not expect the House will be of a different Opinion from the Committee; but I think it is my Duty, when I apprehend what you are doing will be of all Consequence to the Constitution, to give my Difficult in every Step. I think it will be dangerous to the very Being of this House: If this Motion had been allowed formerly, I think there would have been no Need of taking away of Charters, and of St. John Worship's, by the Influence of Officers they might have filled this House with what Members they had pleased, and then they could have voted themselves duly elected.

Sir William Stirling. Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree to this Resolution; I think it deprives the People of England of their Birth-right. For they who have Freeholds in any of your Counties, or Freeholds in any Corporation, have as much Right to vote in Elections to Parliament, as they have to their Estates. And if any Gentleman would subject them to such arbitrary Proceedings, that a Sheriff, or any other Officer, may deny them this Privilege, give me Liberty to say, I must be always against any such Thing, for though you can punish the Officer, you cannot give any satisfaction to him that receives the Injury.

Mr. St. John. Sir, I do not rise up to trouble you long, but to speak to one Point that was mentioned by a Noble Lord on the Way. I shall be as tender as any Man alive of doing any thing against the Liberty of the People; but I am for this, because I take it to be the greatest Security for their Liberty. The Noble Lord was pleased to take Notice, that in the Consequence the Crown would have a great Influence on those that are to return the Members of the House of Commons; and when they were in, they might vote for one another. I cannot think that the Liberties of the People of England are safer in any Hands below, or that the Influence of the Crown will be stronger here than in other Courts.

Marquis of Horwington. I think this Gentleman hath not answered what I said. I shall never have any Suspicion of any that sit in this House now; but when those that have no Right are returned, and make a Majority, I think it will not be safe.

Mr. Wolke. I do not apprehend that Consequence from this Resolution. I think if it was so, this should have been offered before the last Resolution was passed, which hath passed in the House and Committee, Non est contrarium; for you cannot determine the Right of any Members sitting here, without determining the Right of the Electors.

Mr. Lawson. I cannot but think it will be harder to influence this House to get an ill Vote, than it will be in another Place: However, I am a Freeholder, and have a Right to vote in a County, or a Freeman, and have a Right to vote in a Borough, by admitting Persons to vote that have no Right, it may be as much Prejudice to me, for that may make my Vote signify nothing: And there is as much Injury one Way as the other. If all the People of England, who have a Vote, should go together by the Ears in Wyndham-Hall, and dispute there who has a Right to vote, and who not, I believe the Judges of the Common Law, and Noble Peers of the other House, would be glad, in a little time, to reverse the Right where it is, it would breed so much Confusion. If Gentlemen are not satisfied already, they may easily be so. There is no Defect of Power in this House, but they have a Power to do Justice in all Cases of Elections; and I hope every Body will take Care, not only to maintain the Rights of the People that sit there, but that the Truth lodged in them, which they cannot depart from by the Rules of Justice.

Then the second, with the other three Resolutions passed in the Committee, was agreed to by the House without a Division, with this Amendment only, of leaving out [at Common Law] in the fifth Resolution.

But the House, though they voted Adley guilty of a Breach of Privilege, in commencing and prosecuting the said Adieu, yet there having been no Declaration of the House in that Case before, they made no Order for taking him into Custody, as usual in Cases of Breach of Privilege.

Upon

man of Law for his own Wines, in which the Corporation of the City hath no Interest.

But there is no such Nocton in the Law of England as a Right without a Remedy.

The first Thing appears by the Case of Waller and Symonds, 1 Sess. 347. and by the Case of Judith and Waller. These Instances make it sufficiently appear, that though the Inhabitants of this Franchise be in the Body Corporate, yet it is for the Benefit of the particular Members thereof. And it is certainly a great Advantage for the Men or Inhabitants of a Place to chuse Persons to represent them in Parliament, who thereby will have an Opportunity, and be under an Obligation, to represent their Grievances, and advance their Profit.

Of this Opinion have two Parliaments been, as appears by two several Acts, the one 31 & 32 H. VIII. cap. 13. the other 35 Car. II. cap. 9. The first is an Act for making Knights and Burgesses within the County and City of Chichester, which begins in this Manner, It humble self shewes to your Majesty, the Inhabitants of your Grace's County Palatine of Chichester, That they have been and are separated from your High Courts of Parliament to have any Burgesses within the said County, by Reason whereof, the Inhabitants have lost their ancient manifold Liberties and Privileges, as well as their Lands and Goods and Estates; therefore it was enacted, That they should have Knights for the County, and Citizens for the City of Chichester. The other Act, which continues Knights and Burgesses for the County Palatine and City of Durham, recites, That the Inhabitants thereof have been and are without Liberty and Privilege of electing and sending Knights and Burgesses to the High Court of Parliament.

The Application of these Two Acts is very plain; the first faith, To be excluded from sending Knights and Burgesses to Parliament, is a Damage to Lands, Goods, and Body: the other faith, That it is a Liberty and Privilege to send them.

Thus the Right of Election is explained, and shewes to be a legal Right.

That of electing Knights of Shires belonging to and inhering in the Freehold.

The order of electing Burgesses is belonging in some Cities and Towns to the real Estates of the Inhabitants; and in others, is vested in the Corporation, for the Benefit of the particular Members, who are the Electors; the having of which is a great Benefit and Advantage to the People thereof, and will prevent great Loss and Damage that otherwise would ensue.

It is followeth, That in consequence of this Right or Privilege, the Petitioners thereof must have a legal Remedy to assert and maintain it.

It was said, That there are many Rights for which a Man has no Remedy by the Common Law, as in Case of a Legacy given, if it be not paid, the Party cannot bring an Action for it. This is very true, but not applicable to the present Purpose; for the Constitution of the English Government has wisely distributed to several Courts the Determination of private Causes, but has left no Subject in any Case where he is injured, without his adequate Remedy, if he will go to the right Place for it. If a Man will seek for a Remedy at Common Law, for a Legacy, which by our Constitution is to be recovered in the Ecclesiastical Court, it is his own Fault if he do not recover, as it would be if he should begin a Suit for Land in the Court of Admiralty, or go for Equity to the Common Pleas.

He who suffers quits his Remedy when he is injured if a Man has a Remedy for Payment of one Thousand Pounds, he has no Remedy to recover this Money but by Action; therefore, if it be due to him, he is obliged to recover it, or he is to be content. But, if he has any way the Means to recover it, Choke's Right Rep. 129. Burdett's Case. If a Man purchases an Advowson, and at the next Avoidance suffers an Usurpation, and brings an Action, and at the same Time, he hath lost all manner of Remedy, and in consequence his Right, to which neither he nor his Heirs can ever be restored.

Would it not look very strange in a Constitution so formed, that the Commons of England have an undoubted Share in the Legislative Authority, which is to be executed by their Representatives chosen by themselves, in which every Freeholder, of Forty Shillings per Acre, hath a Right to vote for the County, every Common for a City, and every Burgess for a Borough; that if the Sheriff, or other Officer, who is to cause the Election to be duly made, shall hinder or deprive any of these Electors of his Right, the Person injured shall have no Remedy, though the Injury be done to such a Right, upon the Security whereof the Lives, Liberty and Property of all the People of England so much depend.

That the Defendants, in this Case, by hindering the Plaintiff from voting, have done ill, cannot be denied; because they have excluded one who has a Right to sit in his Vote. Then, if the Law doth not allow an Action to the Party injured, it tolerates the Injury, which is absurd to say is tolerable in any Government.

That some Weight had upon the Case of Ford and Hylkin, 2 Cr. 388. M. 842. which is, that where, by the Custom of the Manor, every Tenant for Life might name his Successor for his Life, whose the Lord is to admit; if one be named, and the Lord refuses to admit him, it was held, an Action on the Case would not lie, because the Nemo had no Right without being admitted. But the Reason given for that Opinion shews it had no Relation to this Case. The Plaintiff's Right of voting is vested in him without any previous Admittance; therefore, though it should be a Law that no Action will lie for not giving a Right, yet certainly an Action must lie for defending and injuring a Man to enjoy a Right that he hath.

Where any Statute requires an Act to be done for the Benefit of another, as to barrow the doing of an Act, which may be to his Injury, though an Action be given in express Terms by that Statute, for the Commission or Commission, the general Rule of Law in all such Cases is, That the Party injured shall have an Action, 4 Co. 10. Rep. 75. The Case of the Marbushes, 12 Rep. 106. See Adm. Cas. 118. This is a Maxim allowed and approved of in all Ages.

There is the same Reason where the Common Law gives a Right, or prohibits do as a Wrong; But in such Cases, an Act of Parliament is not wanting, for the Statute of Wylt. 1. cap. 5. enacts, That Elections shall be free, if he who hath a Right to vote be hindered by him who is to make his Vote, or to manage the Election, that Election is not free, such an Impediment is a manifest Violation of that Statute, as well as an Injury to the Party whose Vote is refused. This Statute of Wylt. 1. shews what Opinion the King and Parliament had of the great Consequence it was to the whole Realm, That People should have their Freedom in Chances; and though the Common Law was the first before, as appears even by the Statute itself, the Words whereof are, Electio, quæ sit de Free, yet it was judged necessary to add the Statute of an Act of Parliament thereunto; The King commands upon great Petitions, That no Great Alder, or other, by Force of Arms, or by Advice or Misadvice, shall disturb or make Free Election. The Defendants did not, by Force of Arms, drive the Plaintiff away from the Election, nor by Menaces deter him, but they did maliciously hinder him (for it is charged by the Plaintiff in the Declaration, and it is found by the Jury to be done by Fraud and Malice), and so the Defendants are Offenders within the very Words of the Statute of Wylt. 1. Where the Law is so clear as to the Right, and the Duty to be strictly enforced by Act of Parliament to be observed, it seems a great Presumption to make it but a light Thing.

It being apparent that the Plaintiff had a Right, and that the Defendants have done him Wrong, and that by Consequence of Law he must have some Remedy to vindicate his Right, and to repair the Wrong.

III. The third thing to be shewn is, That the Remedy the Plaintiff pursued by bringing this Action is the proper Remedy allowed by the ancient Law of England.

This Action is that which is called in the Law an Action upon the Case; that is, founded upon the particular Case of the Party injured.

The Law in all Cases of Wrong and Injury hath provided proper and adequate Remedies.

1. When a Man is injured in his Person, by being beaten or wounded, the Law gives him an Action of Trepsass, Assault and Battery, if by being imprisoned, an Action of false Imprisonment.

2. If his Goods be taken away, or Treasures done upon his House or Land, an Action of Trepsass lies to repair him in Damages.

3. If a Man hath a Franchise, and is hindered in the Enjoyment thereof, the proper Remedy is by an Action upon the Case.

The Plaintiff in this Case hath a Privilege and a Franchise, and the Defendants have disturbed him in the Enjoyment thereof, in the most offensive Part, which is his Right of voting.

4. Where any Officer or Minister of Justice, interposed with the Execution of the Process of Law, does an Injury, an Action of the Case lies against him. If the Sheriff will not execute a Writ by arresting the Party-Defendant, or taking his Goods, the Party shall have his Action upon the Case, because he refused to do his Duty, to the Plaintiff's Damage.

The Precept which the Defendants received from the Sheriff in this Case was founded upon the King's Writ, and the Defendants are commanded to cause two Burgesses to be elected for the Borough of Alisbury, of which there are to give Notice, and to admit every one who hath a Vote to make use of it, if they refuse any Man to vote who hath a Right, they act contrary to the Duty of their Office.

It was objected, That it did not appear that the Persons for whom the Plaintiff voted were elected, nor that they would have been elected, if his Vote had been admitted.

The Answer is, That it is not material whether the Person for whom the Plaintiff voted was chosen, or would have been chosen, if his Vote had been taken; for Rights and Privileges are to give him Suffrage, as to be a Party in the Election, or to be excluded from it, he is wronged, though the Persons for whom he would have given his Vote were elected.

The Right of Action must accrue upon the Refusal of the Vote, and is never to be made better or worse by the Return, which is a Matter of fact facts.

It was said in the signing the Case, That the Plaintiff had no Damages; or at least, that there was no such Injury or Damage done to him as would support an Action.

The Answer to that is, That the Law will never imagine any such thing as Injuria sine Damno. Every Injury imports Damage in the Nature of it. If a Man pick a Lock, and come into an House without the Consent of the Owner, perhaps there is no pecuniary Damage done to the Value of a Farthing, yet the Owner shall have an Action against him, and recover Damages for the Invasion of his Possession and Property.

There are many Cases of the same Nature, which have been determined upon this Ground. In the Case between Stearns and Winer, 24 Car. II. in Com. Bux. (see Feast's full Part. p. 260.) and afterwards in Bar. Reg. The Plaintiff Yewer, amongst others, bid to be one of the Bridge-Masters of London-Bridge, which Office was to be elected by a Common-Hall of the City of London; The Question was, Who had the greatest Number of Votes? The Plaintiff demanded the Poll, and the defendant, being then Lord Mayor of London, refused it. It was adjudged, That the Action was maintainable for refusing the Poll, because every Candidate has a Right to have it, and though perhaps if the Poll had been granted to the Plaintiff in that Action, it might have been against him, yet the Demand of that Right was a good Good of Action.

Upon the same Reason, the Case in 11. 118. was determined; and also the Case of Hart and Denman, 2 Cr. 478. 2 Roll. 11.

It is apparent by what has been said, That no Person in this present Case hath been injured, in being denied his Right, and no good Reason can be assigned that he suffers this Case, as to make it differ from other Cases; though to that Purpose several Reasons were urged and insisted upon. As first, that this would be the Destruction of many Actions.

If that be so, there is the greater Reason to support this Action, to punish the many Writings that have been sent, which will prevent any more of the like Nature. If Officers of Boroughs against them ought to be advanced. If other Officers of Boroughs have here, or shall be guilty of such like Misconducts as these Defendants have been, it is fit they should be liable, as their Defendants are, to make Satisfaction. If one Man be beat and imprisoned, it is any Objection Objection against his having an Action, because all others who shall be so evilly treated as he hath been, shall have the like Remedies? The only Means to hinder Complainants that will soon become frequent and that these Officers of Burroughs and Corporations, who so oft make Cause that they are obnoxious to the Law, and that their Parties must make Satisfaction to all whom they shall injure in this Manner. It is true, if one Adversary tends to the Injury of many Persons be committed, on one Person injured shall be allowed to have an Action, because the redress will have the same. Gr. 3. Rep. 2. Wilkins's Case, 1 Cr. 665. Plowd. 701. Herlesley, 1 Cr. 11. In the Cafe of not making Divine Service in a Chapel of a Manor to the Lord and Tenant, or the Hoppling of a Lane or Common-way, because the Defendant for one Adversary would have a Multitude of Suits against him, the Injury being against a Multitude: But the Redress of every Vote is a distinct Adversary. The Party grieved, whose Vote was denied, can only bring an Action for the Refusal, the others, whose Votes were admitted, are not concerned. And if an Officer abuses an hundred, who have a Right, there are a hundred several Writs, for which he ought to be liable to as many several Actions. As if a Man will make a his Bailiffs to drag Strangers, and to sell him a hundred French Men, he must make Satisfaction to them all. But though this is so far from being an Objection, that it is a Blessing, it is still more to support the Action: For if the Mayor or Bailiff of a Burroughs refuse to give a Man to reside Men who have Vows, he can easily make a Majority to vote on his side; and thus, What will become of the Officers? The Officer will return him that is elected by a Majority of his own making, by excluding the Votes of others that have Right.

This would encourage Officers to be partial and corrupt, and to return divers Persons to be elected in that Manner, who at least must have Possession of Seats in the House of Commons for some time, and give Votes in the making of Laws, and imposing of Taxes, until the Right of Election be done out.

And though upon hearing the Cause in the House of Commons, this Matter may be set right at last, yet, what can compensate for the Mischief that may be done to the Kingdom in the mean time, by the Votes of them, who shall be partially returned, and are not the Representatives of the People of the Place who are so chafed?

Besides, the aforementioned Rule against multiplying Actions is confined to such Acts where there is another Remedy to be had; but where there is no other Remedy but an Action, the Wrong-doer must answer to as many several Actions as there are Persons injured. Suppose a Man will plough up the Ground in which a hundred Persons have a Common, he must answer all their Actions. If the Inhabitants of a Town have a common Watering-place, and a Stranger stops the Current, whereby the Water is diverted, every Inhabitant shall have his Action, because there is no other Remedy.

The several Plaintiff in this Cause has no other Remedy besides this Action, no Indemnity here, because it is a personal Wrong to the Party, and so Wrong to the Publick, but only in the Consequence of it, as an evil Example, which tends to the Encouragement of other such Officers to commit the like Transgressions. Nor is there any Danger to an honest Officer, that means to do his Duty, for where there is a real Doubt touching the Parties Right of Voting, and the Officer makes use of the best Means to be informed, and it is plain his Malice arose from the Difficulty of the Cafe, and not from any malicious or partial Design, so the Jury will find an Officer guilty in such a Cafe, who can say he did not think them to do it, for it is the Word and the Malice that induces the Party to the Action: In this Cafe, the Defendants knew the Plaintiff to be a Burroughs, and yet transgressed and maliciously hindered him from his Right of voting; and Justice may require that such an obstinate and unjust malicious Officer should not escape with Impunity.

That the Officer is only mischievous in this Cafe, and not a Judge, nor acting in a Judicial Capacity, is most plain; his Business is only to execute the Precept, to assemble the Electors to make the Election, by receiving their Votes, computing their Numbers, declaring the Election, and returning the Persons elected: The Sheriff, or other Officer of a Burroughs, is put to as much Difficulty in this Cafe, but what is absolutely necessary in all Cases. If an Election be against a Man's Goods, the Sheriff must, at his Peril, take Notice what Goods a Man has.

Another Objection was made in respect to the Novelty of the Action; it was said, Never any such Action was brought.

In Answer to this Objection, it may be said, That probably there have not been many Occasions given for bringing such Suits. It is to be hoped, that very few have ever been so imprudent, as to dare to make an obstinate and malicious Refusal of an undoubted Vote. If the Cafe has happened before, perhaps the Party, out of Consideration that only small Damages were to be expected, might be discouraged, and think it better to acquiesce. And it is probable, the ill-governed Officer would be at least so cautious as to refuse the Votes of such Persons only as he thought, by reason of the Meanness of their Circumstances, were unable to moderate their Right.

It is not every one that has such a true English Spirit as the Plaintiff, who could not sit down meekly under a Wrong done to him in one of the most valuable Privileges of an Englishman. It is not the Novelty of the Action that can be urged against it, if it can be supported by the old Grounds and Principles of Law: The Ground of Law is plain, certain, and indeed universal, that where any Man is injured in his Right, by being either hindered in, or deprived of, the Enjoyment thereof, the Law gives him an Action to recover himself.

The Cafe of Hunt and Dunscombe, which was, 14 Jac. 1. See Den. 1618. of an Action by the Landlord against the Tenant, for hindering him from searching his House to see whether it was in Repair, was never brought before that time; and that of Turner and Starling was not brought till 23 Car. II.

The Law of England is not confined to particular Precedents and Cases, but extends in the Reason of them; which is much more extensive than the Circumstance of this or that Cafe. Ratio Legis est Aequitas Legis; & ubi aequitas Ratio, ibi idem Jus, are known Maxims. Vol. VII.

An Action against the Master of a Ship, for that the Ship, lying in the River of Thames, was robbed, was maintained upon the same Reason as against a common Carrier; yet such an Action was never known until 23 Car. II. in the Cafe of Ashby and Star. 1 Cr. 15. June 23. de re 323. Star and Gr. 120. an Action of the Cafe was brought for maliciously, and without any probable Cause, hindering the Plaintiff of High-Treason: This was the first Action that was ever brought in such a Cafe; and yet it was adjudged maintainable upon the same Reason as upon a malicious Indictment of Felony. 2 See 23. Henry and Bull. an Action of the Cafe was brought against the Mayor of a Town, for refusing the Plaintiff to give his Vote at the Choice of a new Mayor, and there was one very Scriptural maxim, but that the Action did not lie, though that was the full Proceeding.

It is granted, That a Freeman who hath a Right to give his Vote for the Choice of a Mayor be denied his Vote, he may maintain an Action upon the Cafe.

There can be no difference between that Cafe and this, unless it can be supposed that the Right to vote at the Election of a Mayor is of higher Privilege in the Eye of the Law, than a Right to elect Members to serve in the House of Commons.

This Action is not only founded upon the Reason of the Common Law, but it hath the Sanction of an Act of Parliament, viz. the Statute of 12 Will. 3. cap. 24. which says, That whosoever from thenceforth shall refuse to choose, that is to say, a Cafe of this kind, and in a Cafe of this kind, and refusing his Remedy, more is found, the Clerk of the Common Hall shall in making a Return, and by Consent of Men learned in the Law, a Writ shall be made, by which it should appear that the King's Court might find a remedy for such a Complaint.

The Objection now insisted on was, That this is a Matter relating to Parliaments, and ought to be determined by the Law and Custom of Parliaments; and for that Reason it was cognizable in the Queen's Courts.

In Answer to this Objection, it was shewed, first, That this Cafe is proper in the Nature of it, to be determined in the Queen's Courts.

2. There is no other Provision made for the Plaintiff, who is highly injured in his Right, but by bringing his Action in the Courts of Law, that have Power to determine of Men's Lives, Liberties and Properties.

First, The Cafe in the Nature of it is proper for the Queen's Courts. This will be apparent, if the several Rights of electing Members to serve in the House of Commons be considered.

The Right of choosing Knights of the Shire is founded upon the Electors of the Freehold, Matters of Freehold are determinable originally and primarily in the Queen's Court, by the Rules and Methods of the Common Law, by a Jury sworn and by the Evidence of Witnesses upon Oath: And as the Right of the Freehold is determinable there, so are all Branches, Rights and Advantages depending thereupon, or belonging thereto.

If a Freeholder's Voice be refused by a Sheriff, what is it that should hinder the Queen's Court from trying and determining this Matter, like all other Questions of Freehold, by a Jury, upon the Oaths of Witnesses, or Evidence in Writing, whether the Plaintiff that supposes himself wronged was a Freeholder, or no?

The Right of choosing Citizens and Burgesses depends either upon Precedents or Customs, or upon Letters Patents; these are also primarily and originally cognizable by the Queen's Courts; Customs and Precedents are triable by the Country, that is, by a Jury of Twelve Men of the County where the Custom is alleged to be. This is known Law in all Cases without Exception.

And as to Letters Patents, if pleaded specially, the Court must judge of them; and if either Party conceives the Court both judged against, he hath his Remedy by Writ of Error, till at last it comes what it will receive a final Judgment. So that every Right which an Elector can have in proper for the Determination of the Queen's Courts. There are various Ways of Election at different Boroughs, but they all depend upon Customs or Customs; and therefore are not more difficult to determine than other Privileges or Liberties, which depend upon the same Foundation.

And whereas it was said, That by a late Act of Parliament in the 12 of 2 W. III. the last Determination of the House of Commons concerning the Right of Elections is to be pursued, it amounts to no more than this, That the Officer who is to make the Return, is to take Care to return him to be elected, who is chosen by a Majority of Electors qualified according to the last Determination of the House of Commons; if he does so, he incurs no Danger, he is not liable to an Action; but the House of Commons itself is not bound by that Rule. Now suppose the Officer will deny a Man a Vote, who, according to the last Determination there, ought to have one, and thus the Officer did well know, what it is that hinders him that had Right according to that Determination, from bringing his Action against the Officer as he hath injured him? It cannot be that the Act of Parliament, for the Queen's Courts are by Law the first and original Examiners of the Statutes of this Realm.

But secondly, There is no other Court of Jurisdiction appointed by the Law of England for determining the Right, and repairing the Injury, but the Courts of Westminster.

It is a general Rule, that whoever impeaches the Jurisdiction of one Court, must insinuate some other Court to have a Jurisdiction of that Cause; but that is impossible to be done in this Cafe.

It was said, that the Determination of the Right of Elections of Members to serve in Parliament, is the proper Business of the House of Commons, which they would be always very jealous of; and that Jurisdiction of them is uncontroverted. That they exercise a great Jurisdiction in that Matter, for they oblige the Officer to alter his Return according to their Judgment, and that they cannot judge of the Right of Elections, without determining the Right of the Electors; and if Electors were at Liberty to prosecute Suits touching the Right of giving Votes in other Courts, there might be dangerous Judgments, which would make more a Cause, and be disseizable to the House of Commons, and that the first is an Action and a Breach of the Privilege.

As to the second, the Answer was, that it is an Action. It was admitted, That the House of Commons is a Corporation in determining the Right of Election of their own Members; and though the Time may be assign'd, when that Right is exercis'd in another Place, yet there has been a Usage long enough to hinder that Point from being drawn in Question, especially as the Election given to a Member by the Act made in the Seventh Year of King James's Reign.

But this it is true, That the Merit of the Election of a Member be a proper Subject for the House of Commons to judge of, because they only give the proper and most effectual Remedy, by excluding the Elector, and giving a Person of the Place to him who has the Right; yet there is a great Difference between the Right of the Electors, and the Right of the Elector, the one is a Temporary Right, the Place in Parliament, the other is a Freehold, or a Franchise: Who has a Right to sit in the House of Commons may be guilty of a considerable Crime, but who has a Right to choose, is a Matter of civil Liberty, even before there is a Parliament. A Member has a Right to his Freehold, by the Common Law, and the Law having concern'd his Right of Voting in the Freehold, it is of the Nature of his Freehold, and must depend upon it. The first Law that gives him his Right, must also give him his Freehold, and any other Power that will prevent him from enjoying his Right of vote, may as well prevent him from voting, as it shall prevent him from voting.

To say the Plaintiff, in this Case, may appeal to the House of Commons, is not sufficient, unless preceded by a return to the Elector of any County or Borough, and compliance to the House of Commons, that he was deserv'd of his Vote, and desire them to return to him the particular Right, namely, first of choice who have Right to choose in a Borough, or a County, that Persons have been return'd by the Officers who were not duly elected, as being an Injury done to the whole Community at the Borough, to have a Person without Right sit there, whose Representative, but this is only to bring the Merit of the Election in Question, of which that House hath Cognizance, and therefore, as incident and necessary thereto, they may try the Right of Electors, which of them, by Custom, or Statute, have Votes; but this is no more than all Courts have. In the Ecclesiastical Courts, which proceed according to the Civil Law, if the Suit be originally proper for their Jurisdiction, they have Power to determine a Cause touch'd therein, so if Letters Patent, or Conveyances of Land, come in Question, though given to a Person, yet determinable in the Courts of Common Law. Maturity of age, and the Jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts, may be a Qualification as to the temporal and real Parties in their Lifetime, or upon Death or Bedridden, it shall be try'd and determin'd there. But when an Action is brought by a Man and Woman, supposing her to be his Wife, if the Defendant pleads in Abatement, so that they were not married, it shall be try'd by a Jury where the Action was brought, for if any one's Title to Land depends on a Marriage, an Action brought to try the Title, the Marriage may be determin'd by a Jury. This shows plainly, That because the House of Commons try determine who are Electors, and who are not, incidentally, and as far only, as it is necessary to try the Right of the Election, it doth not follow, that when the Right of Election is not in Question, they carry the Right of an Elector.

When the Right of the Cause is examin'd in the House of Commons, it is in order to determine which Person hath the Right to join with them in the making of Laws, and other publick business; and in order to the determining this Point, the House of Commons must judge of the Right of Electors, they do it only to this Purpose. But the Courts of Law judge of an Elector's Right wholly to another End, as it is a legal Right, to admit that, and to repair in Damages the Elector who is wrongfully hinder'd from exercising it. This is what the House of Commons cannot do, not in this Day, nor were ever any Applications made to them to do so, and it may be reasonably suppos'd they will not now begin to take it upon them.

It commonly takes up a great Part of the Time of a Session, to determine the Cases of Electors, before they can be sure the House is compos'd of such as have a Right to sit; but should they once pretend to take Cognizance of particular Men's Complaints, in order to decide the Rights of Electors, it would be impossible for them to have any Leisure to employ themselves about the Affairs of Ultima Regni Regni, the Safety and Defence of the Kingdoms, for which the Word calls them together. It is granted, That the deciding of the Right of Election is a Matter of great Weight, and is consequently concern'd the Lives and Liberties of the Subjects of England; but the Law hath provided a proper Remedy to be pursued in the ordinary Methods of Justice, a Remedy that is adequate, where Damages may be recover'd. The Plaintiff, in this Case, knew he had a Right by Law to give his Vote, and when he found himself deprived of it, he resorts to the Law for his Remedy. And it is probable, most of the Electors of England will be of his Mind, and think it for their Interest to resort to the Courts of Westminster-Hall, for affording this great Right of theirs upon Occasion, when they may prove their Claim by Witnesses upon Oath, and have their Damages assign'd by the Courtmen duly sworn, rather of which can be done, if they are to seek for a Remedy in the House of Commons.

When a Man is injured, if he cannot bring his Action to recover the Thing which he hath lost by the Injury, the Law will always give him Damages in Lieu thereof.

It was said in the Debate of this Case, That Instances were to be given, where the Party injured did not recover Damages; as in Cases where one has a Right of Preferential, and is disturb'd, he could not recover Damages at the Common Law, and that was resemble'd to the Right of an Elector, which was said to be only a Right of Nomination. But the Answer to this Objection is plain, that the Law gives the Party a Remedy to recover the Preferential, the Thing that was taken from him, to which he is entitl'd by the Judgment; but in the present Case there is no Possibility for the Plaintiff to recover the Thing he has lost, which was his Vote at the Election, for that Election is over, and can never be had again, in which the Plaintiff cannot possibly have any Reparation, and therefore in Damages, and this Sort of Reparation the House of Commons cannot give him.

If the Plaintiff, and all other injured Electors, should be oblig'd to go to the House of Commons for Satisfaction, it may be reasonably suppos'd, that the first must be put off till before it could come to his Turn to have his Cause decid'd. What would be the Consequence of this? If the Plaintiff it self be that by without Remedy, Would not the Law be notoriously defective? And yet none will say, that another Parliament did ever take Cognizance of any Injury done upon Account of an Election as a breach of the Privilege. But yet it is true, that the House of Commons will determine it, when it shall think it worth the House of Commons to engage in it. For probably, the reason, why the House of Commons did not take Cognizance of that which was before them, and which the Plaintiff did not long enough to discuss.

As to what was object'd, that the first Matter may come in Question in the House of Commons, where it may be determin'd, that the Plaintiff hath no Right, for that great Objection would not have those different Judgments in different Courts, it is no more than what may happen every Day in Highgate Adm. where the first Court may be of various Opinion upon the same Question, and yet so there is sent to the Publick; nay, this is no more than happens often in the House of Commons, when the Right of Election on the same Point, is decided different Ways in different Parliaments, and they do not think themselves dishonour'd by it.

The Certainty of Judgment is not more necessary for the House of Commons, than for a single Judge, as in the case of an individual Election, as in the case of the House of Commons, where the Right of Election is in question, or where the Right of Election is the Basis of a great Cause, whether all the Members, or those under a particular Qualification, or whether the whole Community, or a select Number bear Votes, and all these are but Ways and Means to determine the Right of Election.

If the House of Commons judge the Right of a particular Elector at any Time, it is only for the sake, so far as it relates to the particular Case before them; but surely the House is not so stupid, the Elector's Privilege is fully consider'd thereby, because he is no Party to that Suit, his Right cannot be then in Question originally, but consequentially, as a Cause brought between other Persons, to which he is no Party, and cannot be grievous to right Reason, for the Privilege of Law, for a Man's Right is not essentially determin'd in a Court between other Parties.

And after all, Where is the Damage to the Publick, if there should be a Variation in the Determination of the House of Commons, and the Courts of Highgate? It is not impossible, in the Name of Theory, for the Courts of Law have great Advantages which the House of Commons want, they want the Help of Juries, and the Power of giving Oaths; and they ought not to be disturb'd with their Elections, if they resort to Courts provided with these Powers for asserting their Right of Elections, especially when it is consider'd, that the Parties whose Pretensions the House of Commons approves of, will sit there, which is all they are concern'd in: They are the Electors, and it would be strange if that should move them to challenge the Power of deciding the Rights of their Electors, which is indeed to chide their Electors.

It was said as a great Argument against the maintaining this Action, That it had been adjudg'd in the Case of Mr. Osborn, in the 33d Year of King Charles the Second, (second Post. 37.) That no Action did lie at Common Law for the Return of a Member to sit in Parliament; and that in the Case of Barnardiston and Brown, it was adjudg'd the Candidate could not maintain an Action against the Sheriff for a double Return, and if the Person elected to serve in Parliament cannot maintain an Action against the Officer, it was argu'd, a foruam, that the Person electing, who perhaps is but a Clerk, ought not to be allowed to have such an Action.

It was answer'd, That the Law of England has no respect to Persons; if an Elector be a Coffer, he is a Freeman of England, and has that great Privilege belonging to him, as he is enjoy'd in Parliament. It was remembered, with what great Variety of Opinion among the Judges that Case of Sir Samuel Barnardiston was determin'd, and what an Alarm that Judgment gave to the House of Commons, in such a Degree, that in the Session of Parliament, 1693, a Committee was appointed to enquire into it as a Grievance. And it was observ'd, That the great Design of the Act of Parliament made in the 15th Year of the last King (which was often mention'd in the Debate of this Case to other Purposes), was to cure many Inconveniences arising from that Judgment, and the Judgment in Mr. Osborn's Case, which they follow'd, and was judg'd upon the Authority of it. But there is no Reason to be drawn from these Cases and the Case of an Elector. In Barnardiston's Case of a double Return of Members, the Reason on which the Judgment was found, was, That a double Return was no Return which the Law took Notice of, but was only allowed of by the Custom of Parliament. When an Officer who doubts, makes a double Return, he is subject to the Judgment of the House of Commons; and if that House allows of such a Return, as they had often done, it would be hard the Law should subject a Man as a Justice of the Peace, to the Determination of those who have a Jurisdiction of the Matter, and approve the Manner of such a Return.

In the other Case of a false Return of a Member, several Reasons may be assign'd for the Judgment, which are not applicable to the Case of an Elector, perhaps it might be, because such a Return is a manifest Injury to every one of the Electors (though principally to the Candidate), and therefore it might fall within the Reason of Wickham's Case above mention'd, That every Elector might feel him, and therefore none of them severally can maintain the Action. But there is another Reason very obvious, because the Candidate has a proper Remedy to recover his Place, from which he is excluded by the false Return; the Right of Election is cognizable in the House of Commons, there he will them had been several new Admons brought by John Paty, John Ovis, John Paton, Junior, and Henry Boffe, and proferred by the said Robert Alder, against the Constables of Aplebury, in Breach of the Privilege of this House:

Ordered,

That the Matter of the said Complaint be also heard at the Bar of this House upon Tuesday Sevennight.

Ordered,

That the said John Paty, John Ovis, John Paton, Junior, and Henry Boffe, do attend this House upon Tuesday sevennight.

Ordered,

That Copies of the Original Declarations in the said Admons be laid before this House.

Februari 24 die Novembrii, 1704.

Ordered,

That Daniel Harris, a Plaintiff in one of the Admons brought against the Constables of Aplebury, of which Complaint was made to the House Yesterday, do attend this House upon Tuesday Sevennight.

Martii 5 die Decembrii, 1704.

The Orders of the Day being read for the Hearing the Matter of the Complaints of several Breaches of Privileges committed by Robert Alder, John Paty, John Ovis, John Paton, Junior, Henry Boffe, and Daniel Harris, and for the attending this House: The Sergeant at Arms was called upon, to give an Account of what had been done for the Summoning of them; and he requested the House, that his Messenger had been at Aplebury, and left a Copy of the Order at Mr. Alder's House, and at his Chamber in Thames-Street, but that he does not attend; but that all the other Persons had been summoned, and do attend.

And thereupon, Mr. Arthur Crake was called for, and brought in with the Mace to the Bar, who said:

That he was Attorney for the late Constables of Aplebury in five several Admons, at the several Suits of John Paty, John Ovis, John Paton, Junior, Henry Boffe, and Daniel Harris: And that he did serve Mr. Robert Alder, the 6th of March last, with the Resolutions of this House of the last Session of Parliament, relating to the Proceedings in the Cause of Aplebury and White, and others, by giving him a Copy thereof, and showing him the Resolutions signed by the Clerk of this House: And that he afterwards, viz. the 10th of June last, had from Mr. Alder Copies of five Declarations in the said Admons, viz. one from Mr. Alder himself, and the other four sent to him by Henry, which Mr. Alder afterwards earned, and that he paid Mr. Alder for them all.

Which Copies of Declarations the said Mr. Crake produced to the House, together with Notice in Writing from the said Mr. Alder, the 2d of July last, That he would try one of the said Admons, but not the other four, at the then next Assizes.

And then he withdrew.

And the Notice was read.

And the Copy of the Declaration between Paty and White &c was also read, and is as followeth (a):

The other Declarations were:

Johnes Ovis,	Thomas Ray 1 st
Johnes Paton, Jun.	of Capshale-
Henry Boffe,	her' Burgi de
Daniel Harris,	Aplebury.

And, mutatis mutandis, were the same with the former Declarations against White and others (b).

Then the Old John Paty, John Ovis, John Paton, Junior, Henry Boffe, and Daniel Harris, were severally called in to the Bar, and examined, and then withdrew.

Resolved,

That it appears to this House, That John Paty of Aplebury has been guilty of concerning and prosecuting an Admon at Common Law against William White, and others, late Constables of Aplebury, for not allowing ag his Vote in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament, contrary to the Declarations, in high Contempt of the Jurisdiction, and in Breach of the known Privileges of this House.

That it appears to this House, That John Ovis of Aplebury has been guilty of concerning and prosecuting an Admon at Common Law against the late Constables of Aplebury, for not allowing his Vote in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament, contrary to the Declaration, in high Contempt of the Jurisdiction, and in Breach of the known Privileges of this House.

Resolved,

That it appears to this House, That John Paton, Junior, of Aplebury, has been guilty of concerning and prosecuting an Admon at Common Law against the late Constables of Aplebury, for not allowing his Vote in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament, contrary to the Declaration, in high Contempt of the Jurisdiction, and in Breach of the known Privileges of this House.

(a) This Declaration of Paty relates to the Election of Members to serve in the Parliament called in the Tenth Year of her present Majesty's Re-22

(b) These Declarations relate to the Election of Members to serve in the Parliament called in the Fifth Year of her present Majesty's Re-23

Resolved,

Resolved, That Mr. James Montague, in pleading upon the Return of the Habeas Corpus, on behalf of the Prisoners committed by this House, is guilty of a Breach of the Privilege of this House.

Ordered, That the said Mr. James Montague be, for the said Breach of Privilege, taken into the Custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House.

Resolved, That Mr. Nicholas Lockyer, in pleading upon the Return of the Habeas Corpus, on behalf of the Prisoners committed by this House, is guilty of a Breach of the Privilege of this House.

Ordered, That the said Mr. Nicholas Lockyer be, for the said Breach of Privilege, taken into the Custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House.

Resolved, That Mr. Alexander Denton, in pleading upon the Return of the Habeas Corpus, on behalf of the Prisoners committed by this House, is guilty of a Breach of the Privilege of this House.

Ordered, That the said Mr. Alexander Denton be, for the said Breach of Privilege, taken into the Custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House.

Resolved, That John Poy, Prisoner in Newgate by Order of this House, for a Breach of the Privilege of this House, be discharged from his said Confinement there, and immediately removed and delivered over into the Custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House.

Ordered, That John Ovis, Prisoner in Newgate by Order of this House, for a Breach of the Privilege of this House, be discharged from his said Confinement there, and immediately removed and delivered over into the Custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House.

Ordered, That John Peter Jamar, Prisoner in Newgate by Order of this House, for a Breach of the Privilege of this House, be discharged from his said Confinement there, and immediately removed and delivered over into the Custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House.

Ordered, That Henry Bagg, Prisoner in Newgate by Order of this House, for a Breach of the Privilege of this House, be discharged from his said Confinement there, and immediately removed and delivered over into the Custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House.

Ordered, That David Horne, Prisoner in Newgate by Order of this House, for a Breach of the Privilege of this House, be discharged from his said Confinement there, and immediately removed and delivered over into the Custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House.

Ordered, That Abu Spauld do dissolve his Warrants for the Removal and Delivery over of the said John Poy, John Ovis, John Peter Jamar, James Denton, David Horne, into the Custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House.

Mardi 27 de Februarii, 1704.

The House calling upon the Sergeant to give an Account what he had done on Execution of his Orders of this House made Yesterday, he gave the House an Account thereof accordingly, as follows, viz.

That he had received into his Custody the five Persons which were committed to Newgate, this Morning, and had found Mr. James Montague at his own House, and taken him into his Custody; but that he showed a Protection from the House of Lords, upon the Petition of the said Persons, by which the said Mr. Montague and Mr. Poy, Mr. Nicholas Lockyer and Mr. Denton, and William Lee and John Harris (who were Yesterday ordered to be taken into Custody) were assigned Counsel and Attorneys for the said Persons, and provided by the House of Lords; and that all Officers, Sergeant at Arms, and other Persons, were thereby forbid to molest any such Person, with which Abu Spauld told Mr. Montague he would acquiesce this House.

That he had also like to have taken Mr. Nicholas Lockyer, but that he got out of his Chamber in the Trench, two Pair of Stairs high, at the back Window, by the help of his brothers and a Rope, and that the said Lockyer was also taken into Custody; but that Mr. Poy and Mr. Denton, and Mr. Lee, were not then found.

Ordered, That some Members be appointed to search the Journals of the House of Lords, what Proceedings have been in that House, in relation to the five Persons committed to Newgate for Breach of the Privilege of this House; and report the same to the House.

And some Members were appointed accordingly.

The Order of the Day being read.

Ordered, That the Consideration of his Majesty's Gracious Answer to the Address of this House of February last, relating to the Writ of Error therein mentioned, be adjourned till To-morrow Morning.

Mardi 28 de Februarii, 1704.

Mr. Bowley reported, That the Members appointed to search the Journals of the House of Lords, what Proceedings have been in that House, in relation to the five Persons committed to Newgate for Breach of the Privilege of this House, had searched the same accordingly, and had taken thereout what they found relating to the same; and also Copies of two Petitions of the said Persons, which he read in his Place, and afterwards delivered in at the Table, where the same were read, and are as follow, viz.

De Luna, 25 Februarii, 1704.

Upon reading the Petition of David Horne, Henry Bagg, and John Poy, Jun. as also the Petition of John Poy, and John Ovis, Prisoners in Newgate, in relation to some Proceedings for obtaining the Writs of Error, and praying (amongst other Things) the Protection of this House for their Counsel and Agents.

It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That the said Petitioners shall be taken into Consideration To-morrow at Twelve o'Clock, and all the Lords (convened to attend) as also the Judges in Town, who are to be compared to speak to the Point, Whether a Writ of Error be a Writ of Right, or a Writ of Grace? And that the Petitioners have Notice, That when they fend to this House the Names of their Counsel and Agents they desire to be protected, they shall have the Protection of this House for them.

* Though the Commons had refused before to take Her Majesty's Answer into Consideration, yet being apprehensive lest Her Majesty should grant the Writs of Error, whereby the five delinquents might be discharged from their Imprisonment, they advised that it be removed from Newgate, and taken into the Custody of their Sergeant at Arms, which Order was executed at Midday, with such Circumstances of Severity and Terror, as have been seldom carried towards the greatest Offenders. Annals of 200 Years Ago, Vol. III. p. 289.

In pursuance of the Order of this Day made, David Horne, Henry Bagg, John Poy, Jun. John Poy, and John Ovis, Prisoners in Newgate, sent the Names of their Counsel and Agents, viz.

James Montague , Esq.	} Counselors at Law.
Nicholas Lockyer ,
Alexander Denton ,
Francis Page ,
William Lee ,	} Attorneys at Law.
John Harris ,

Whereupon,

It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That James Montague, Esq. Nicholas Lockyer, Alexander Denton, and Francis Page, Counselors at Law, and William Lee, and John Harris, Attorneys at Law, shall, and they lawfully have the Protection and Privilege of this House, in the advising, applying for, and prosecuting the said Writs of Error; and that all Keepers of Prisons, and Gaolers, and all Sergeants at Arms, and other Persons whatsoever, be, and they are hereby (for, or in respect of any the Cases aforesaid) strictly prohibited from arresting, imprisoning, or otherwise detaining or molesting, or charging the said James Montague, Esq. Nicholas Lockyer, Alexander Denton, Francis Page, William Lee, and John Harris, on either of them, as they and every of them will answer the contrary to this House.

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament Assembled.

The humble Petition of Daniel Horne, Henry Bagg, and John Poy, Jun.

Sheweth,
THAT your Petitioners having a Right to vote at the Election of Members to serve in Parliament for the Borough of Abby, were refused their Votes, so their great Wrong and Damage.
That the Lords having given Judgment in the Case of Abby and Winton, viz. That by the known Laws of this Kingdom, every Freeholder, or other Person, having a Right to give his Vote at the Election of Members to serve in Parliament, and being wilfully denied or hindered to do so by the Officer who ought to receive the same, may maintain an Action in the Queen's Courts against such Officer, to assert his Right, and recover Damages for the Injury; your Petitioners thereupon brought the like Actions in their own Cases.

That they have for so doing been committed to Newgate, by Virtue of a Warrant from the Speaker of the House of Commons.

That your Petitioners have endeavoured to obtain their Liberty by such legal Methods as by their Counsel they have been advised, without Success, so that they have been deprived of their Liberty for about Twelve Weeks, for no other Reason, but the endeavouring to pursue their legal Remedies, according to the Judgment of this Honourable House.

Wherefore your Petitioners humbly beseech your Lordships to take the Petitioners into Consideration, and to do therein as to your great Wisdoms you shall think fit.

And your Petitioners, as in Duty bound shall ever pray, &c.

Daniel Horne,
Henry Bagg,
John Poy, Jun.
Hij & Merch.

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament Assembled.

The humble Petition of John Poy, and John Ovis.

Sheweth,
THAT your Petitioners having a Right to vote at the Election of Members to serve in Parliament for the Borough of Abby, were refused their Votes, so their great Wrong and Damage.

That the Lords having given Judgment in the Case of Abby and Winton, viz. That by the known Laws of this Kingdom, every Freeholder, or other Person, having a Right to give his Vote at the Election of Members to serve in Parliament, and being wilfully denied or hindered to do so by the Officer who ought to receive the same, may maintain an Action in the Queen's Courts against such Officer, to assert his Right, and recover Damages for the Injury; your Petitioners thereupon brought the like Actions in their own Cases.

That they have for so doing been committed to Newgate, by Virtue of Warrants from the Speaker of the House of Commons, Copies whereof are annexed.

That they did, by the Advice of their Counsel, on the 5th Day of this Instant February, move for their Writs of Habeas Corpus, directed to the Keeper of Newgate, to bring your Petitioners before Her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench: Whereupon the said Court, viz. Mr. Justice Pountney, Mr. Justice Pountney, and Mr. Justice Gould, did grant the said Writs, directing the same to be made returnable on the 10th Day of February following, notwithstanding that your Petitioners said Counsel did insist, That the time was an unusual Return, and prejudicial to your Petitioners; on which said Day of February, your Petitioners Counsel did argue on their Behalf, That by Law they ought to be discharged; but by the Opinion of the said three Judges, they were remanded to the said Prison.

That your Petitioners being thereupon advised, there was a manifest Error in the said Judgment, and that they were properly releasable by bringing a Writ of Error returnable before Her Majesty in this High Court of Parliament, they did severally exhibit their Petitions to Her Majesty, setting forth the Proceedings upon the said Writs of Habeas Corpus; and humbly pray'd, That a Writ of Error might be granted to them respectively returnable in this High Court.

That your Petitioners have not been able as yet to obtain Her Majesty's Warrant for authorizing the Curfew to make out the said Writs of Error, as is usual in such Cases.

That

arbitrary Votes, are more applicable to this Refutation of your Lordships, which hath no one Precedent to justify it.

According to the known Laws and Usage of Parliament, it is the sole Right of the Commons of England, in Parliament assembled (except in Cases otherwise provided for by Act of Parliament), to examine and determine all Matters relating to the Right of Election of their own Members.

And, according to the known Laws and Usage of Parliament, neither the Qualification of any Elector, nor the Right of any Person elected, is examinable or determinable elsewhere, than before the Commons of England in Parliament assembled, excepting such Cases as are specially provided for by Act of Parliament.

And were it otherwise, the Mayors, Bailiffs, and other Officers, who are obliged to take the Poll at Elections, and make a Return thereupon, would be exposed to Multiplicity of Actions, vexatious Suits, and intemperate Expenses; and such Officers would be subjected to different and independent Jurisdictions, and inconsistent Determinations in the same Case, without Relief.

And the Exercise of this Power by the House of Commons is warranted by a long unbroken Possession, and confirmed by the Act that passed 7 & 8 Geo. III. Cap. 7. And the House of Commons must be owned to be the only Jurisdiction that can allow the Elector his Vote, and settle and establish the Right of it; the last Determination in this House being, by that Act of Parliament, declared to be the Binding Rule for the Right of Election in each respective Place. Nor is any Election subject either to Inquiry, or Damage, by the Officer's denying his Vote. For when the Elector hath sworn the Person he would have to represent him, his Vote is actually given, both as to his own Right and Privilege, and as it avails the Candidate in his Election; and is ever allowed, when it comes in Question in the House of Commons, whether the Officer had any Regard to it or no.

In the Beginning of the Parliament, held 28 Eliz. Mr. Speaker acquaints the House, that he had received by the Lord Chancellor Sir Majesty's Pleasure; That he was sorry the House was troubled with the Matter of determining the choosing and returning of Knights for the County of Norfolk. That it was improper for the House to meddle in it, which was proper for the Lord Chancellor, whereas the Writ issued out, and whither they were reasonable: That Sir Majesty had appointed the Lord Chancellor to confer therein with the Judges; and, upon examining the time, to set down such Course as to Justice and Right should appear.

Nov. 9. A Committee was appointed to examine and rate the Certificates of the Return of the Knights for the County of Norfolk.

And on Friday, Nov. 11. Mr. Cromwell reports the Case of the Norfolk Election very largely, in which Report are these following Resolutions:

1. That the said Writ was duly executed.
2. That it was a pernicious Precedent, that a New Writ should issue without the Order of this House.
3. That the disaffection, or judging of this, and such like Differences, only belonged to the said House.
4. That tho' the Lord Chancellor and Judges are competent Judges in their Courts, they are not so in Parliament.
5. That it should be entered in the Journal-Book of the House, That the first Election is good; and that the Knights then chosen were received and allowed as Members of the House, not out of any Respect the House had, or gave to the Lord Chancellor's Judgment therein passed, but merely by Reason of the Refutation of the House itself, by which the said Election had been approved.
6. That there should be no Challenge sent to the Lord Chancellor, nor so much as to let him know what was done therein; because it was derogatory to the Power and Privilege of the said House.

It also appears, That Sir Edward Anderson, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, was acquainted, That the Explanation and Ordering of the Cases, appeared only to the Confusion of the House of Commons, not to the Lord Chancellor and the Judges; and that they should take no Notice of their having done any thing in it.

Accordingly Mr. Farmer and Mr. Gyles were received into the House, and took the Oaths; being admitted only upon the Confusion of the House, not as allowed by the Lord Chancellor, or the Judges; and so ordered to be set down and entered by the Clerk.

And this Right of the Commons to determine their own Elections, has never been disputed since the Case of Sir Francis Gwynne, 1 Joh. 1. when the Lords would have required into the Proceedings of the House of Commons upon his Election: But the Commons then told their Lordships, "It did not stand with the Honour of the House to give Account to their Lordships of any their Proceedings or Doings."

And in the Reasons of their Proceedings in that Case, which they laid by Petition before the King, among other Things, they say, "They are a Part of the Body to make New Laws; yet, for any Matter of Privileges of their House, they are, and ever have been, a Court of Ministers, of sufficient Power to discern and determine without the Lords, as the Lords have always used to do things without them."

In which Reasons, as well as in their Apology afterwards to that Prince, the House of Commons did above a hundred Years since, so clearly, and with so much Strength of Reason, assert their Right in the Matter of the Election of their Members. The Commons think it their Duty to resist all Attempts whatsoever to invade them.

And upon this Occasion it may not be improper to cite the Opinion of the House of Commons had of the Judges intermeddling in Matters of their Elections, as they have delivered it in the aforesaid Apology, in their Words, viz.

Neither thought we that the Judges Opinions (which yet in due Place we greatly reverence, being delivered with the Common Law, which extends only to inferior and standing Courts, ought to bring any Prejudice to this High Court of Parliament, whose Power, being above the Law, is not founded on the Common Laws, but they have their Rights and Privileges peculiar to themselves,

VOL. VIII.

When the Earl of Shaftsbury was Lord Chancellor, a Writ issued, during a Prorogation of Parliament, for electing Members in the room of those that were dead: The King himself was so anxious, as to the Regularity of this Proceeding, and had so much Regard to the Privileges of the House of Commons, that at the next Session of Parliament, 5 Feb. 1673, he spoke to the Commons, from the Throne, in these Words:

One Thing I forgot to mention, which happened during this Prorogation: I did give Orders for the issuing some Writs for the Election of Members instead of those that are dead, that the House might be full at their Meeting: And I am mistaken, if this be not according to former Proceedings. But I desire you will not fall to other Business, till you have examined that Particular; and I doubt not but Precedents will justify what is done: I am as careful of all your Privileges, as of my own Prerogative.

February 6, 1673. The House of Commons took this Matter into Consideration; and several Precedents being cited, and the Matter at large debated, and the general Sense and Opinion of the House being, "That, during the Continuance of the High Court of Parliament, the Right and Power of issuing Writs for electing Members so late in this House, in such Places as are vacant, is in this House, when it is present per Juges ad Elections, and Returns of their Members."

Thereupon it was Resolved, "That the Writs issued since the last Session, 1670, be void; and that Mr. Speaker do issue out his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown, to make out New Writs for such Places."

It was also resolved accordingly, "That all Elections, upon the Writs issued since the last Session, 1670, be void; and that Mr. Speaker do issue out his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown, to make out New Writs for such Places."

No other Court than the House of Commons hath or had the Determination of the Elections, or any Continuance of such Cases, except where by Acts of Parliament directed: And such an Action as this against the last Confessors of Shaftsbury, to bring the Right of Voting in an Election in Question in the Courts of Law, is a New Invention, never heard of before: which (as New Devices in the Law are generally attended with Inconveniences and Absurdities) was plainly to subject the Election of all the Members of the House of Commons to the Determination of other Courts.

This undoubted Privilege and Jurisdiction the Commons think will warrant these Commitments; and the late Declaration (which is agreeable to, and cannot lessen their ancient Right) had never been made.

For it is the ancient and undoubted Right of the House of Commons, To exempt for Breach of Privilege: And the Influence of their commanding Petition, nor Members of the House, for Breach of Privilege, and that to any Her Majesty's Subject, are so ancient, so just, and so well known to your Lordships, that the Commons think it needless to produce them.

And it being the Privilege of the House of Commons, to have the sole Examination and Determination of all Cases relating to their Elections, as aforesaid.

It follows, That any Attempt to draw any such Cases to the Determination of any other Court, is a Breach of the Privilege of the House of Commons; for which the Person offending may be committed by the Commons.

And here we cannot but take Notice of that unreasonable, as well as unusual Intimation, whereby your Lordships endeavour to separate the Interest of the People from their Representatives in Parliament, so pretent to no Privileges, but upon their Account, and for their Benefit; as are sorry to say, they are thus severely reflected on by your Lordships, for no other Reason, but for their interposing to preserve the Rights of the People, and their Liberties, from your Lordships arbitrary Determinations.

Your Lordships Fourth Refutation is,

That every Englishman, who is imprisoned by any Authority whatsoever, has an undoubted Right, by his Agents or Friends, to apply for, and obtain a Writ of Habeas Corpus, in order to procure his Liberty by due Course of Law.

The Commons do not deny that every Englishman, who is imprisoned, by any Authority whatsoever, has an undoubted Right to apply, by his Agents or Friends, in order to procure his Liberty by due Course of Law; provided such Application be made to the proper Place, and in a proper Manner: As upon the Commitments of the House of Commons (which sometimes are not, as other Commitments, in order to bring to Trial; but are, in Cases of Breach of Privilege and Contempt, the proper Punishment of the House of Commons) the Application ought to be to that House.

The Commons are so willing to allow and encourage every Englishman to apply, by his Friends or Agents, to obtain a Writ of Habeas Corpus, in order to procure his Liberty by due Course of Law, that they have not confined any Person merely for applying, for such Writ of Habeas Corpus, even in Cases where by due Process of Law the Prisoners cannot be discharged. For the Commons must observe, that in many Cases a Prisoner cannot, upon a Writ of Habeas Corpus, obtain his Liberty; as in Cases of Commitment in Execution, or for Contempt to any Court of Record, or by Virtue of Marine Process, or the like; and in the Act of Habeas Corpus, several Cases are expressly excepted: And that no Person, committed for any Contempt, or Breach of the Privilege, by the House of Commons, can be discharged upon a Writ of Habeas Corpus, or by any other Authority than that of the House, during that Session of Parliament, is plain from the following Precedents:

23 Mar. 1 Joh. 1.

Then, the Prisoner, to be sent for hither, and to attend his Discharge from the House.

That the Prisoners committed by us, cannot be taken from us, and committed by any other.

In May 1673, the House of Commons having Resolved, That there be no Appeals in the Judgment of the Lords, from Courts of Equity; and that no Member of the House should present any Appeal from any Court of Equity, before the House of Lords, Sir James Foweraker,

Setysag

Serjeant Peck, Sir John Churchill, and Charles Porter, Esq. were committed to the Custody of the Serjeant of the House, for a Breach of Privilege, in having been on Counsel in the Bar of the House of Lords, in the Prosecution of a Cause depending upon an Appeal, wherein Mr. Dalaboy, a Member of the House of Commons, was concerned.

But the Serjeant having been by Force prevented keeping them in Custody, the Commons did, the 4th of June, 1675, acquaint the Lords, at a Conference, as followeth, viz.

We are further commended to acquaint you, That the Enlargement of the Persons imprisoned by Order of the House of Commons, by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, and the Presentation, with Threats, to all Officers, and other Persons whatsoever, not to receive or detain them, is an apparent Breach of the Rights and Privileges of the House of Commons: And they have therefore caused them to be stricken into the Custody of the Serjeant at Arms, and have committed them to the Tower.

The said Council were afterwards committed to the Tower for a Breach of Privilege, and Contempt of the Authority of the House: And the House being informed, That the Lords had ordered Writs of Habeas Corpus for bringing the Counsel to the Bar of their House:

The Commons then passed the following Resolutions:

7 June, 1675.

Resolved, Nemine contradicente,
That no Person committed for Breach of Privilege by Order of this House, ought to be discharged during the Sessions of Parliament, but by Order or Warrant of this House.

Resolved, Nemine contradicente,
That the Lieutenant of the Tower, in receiving and detaining in Custody Sir John Churchill, Serjeant Peck, Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, performed his Duty according to Law; and, for so doing, he shall have the Assistance and Protection of this House.

Resolved, Nemine contradicente,
That the Lieutenant of the Tower, in case he hath received, or shall receive any Writ, Warrant, Order, or Commandment, to remove or deliver any Person or Persons committed for Breach of Privilege, by any Order or Warrant of this House, shall not make any Return thereof, or yield any Obedience thereto, before he hath first acquainted this House, and received their Order and Directions how to proceed therein.

Ordered,
That these Resolutions be immediately sent to the Lieutenant of the Tower.

Afterwards the Lieutenant of the Tower gave the House an Account, that he had refused to deliver the Council, upon the Lords Order, signified to him by the Black Rod, because they were committed by this House: and that since he had received the Writs of this House, he had Writs of Habeas Corpus brought him, to bring the Council to the House of Lords at ten o'clock the next Morning, and humbly craved the Direction of the House what to do.

Mr. Speaker intimated to him, he should further to return the Writs, And the House came to several other Resolutions.

9 June, 1675.

Resolved, Nemine contradicente,
That no Commoner of England, committed by Order or Warrant of the House of Commons, for Breach of Privilege, or Contempt of that House, ought, without Order of that House, to be, by any Writ of Habeas Corpus, or other Authority whatsoever, made to appear, and answer, and do, and receive a Determination in the House of Peers, during the Session of Parliament wherein such Person was committed.

Resolved, Nemine contradicente,
That the Order of the House of Peers, for the issuing out of Writs of Habeas Corpus concerning Serjeant Peck, Sir John Churchill, Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Charles Porter, is Infringement and illegal; for that it is general, and expresses no particular Cause of Privilege, and commands the King's Great Seal to be put to Writs not returnable before the said House of Peers.

Resolved, Nemine contradicente,
That the Lord-Keeper be acquainted with these Resolutions, to the End that the said Writs of Habeas Corpus may be superseded, as contrary to Law and the Privileges of this House.

Resolved, Nemine contradicente,
That a Message be sent to the Lords, to acquaint them, That Serjeant Peck, Sir John Churchill, Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Charles Porter, were committed by Order and Warrant of this House, for Breach of the Privileges and Contempt of the Authority of this House.

23 March, 1677.

Charles Darnley, Esq. having been committed by Order of this House, and afterwards discharged by Order of the House of Lords, without the Consent of this House:

Resolved,
That no Person committed by this House last, during the same Session, be discharged by any other Authority whatsoever.

Resolved,
That the said Charles Darnley be taken into the Custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this House.

There are some Instances, among many others, that might be produced upon this Occasion; and the last cannot but be particularly remembered by some Noble Lords that then sat in the House of Commons, and strenuously asserted this Privilege of the Commons.

Your Lordships fifth Resolution, viz.

Resolved, That for the House of Commons to enquire or punish any Person for offering a Prisoner to prosecute a Writ of Habeas Corpus, or by Vote, or otherwise, to deter him from following, prosecuting, and pleading upon such Writ of Habeas Corpus, in behalf of such Prisoner, is an Attempt of dangerous Consequence, a Breach of the many good Statutes provided for the Liberty of the Subject, and of pernicious Example, by denying the necessity Assistance to the Prisoner, upon a Commitment of the House of Commons, which has ever been allowed upon all Commitments by any Authority whatsoever.

The Commons take this to be another Instance of your Lordships Breach of your own Rule, your Lordships being no Judges of their Privileges, though by this Resolution you seem to make a Judgment, without having heard, and knowing what the Commons have to alledge for them.

This Attempt, therefore, in your Lordships is of dangerous Consequence, tending to a Breach of the good Understanding between the Two Houses, and of most pernicious Example. The Commons late Proceedings, in enquiring and punishing the Council that have pleaded upon the Return of the Writs of Habeas Corpus, in behalf of the Prisoners, is daily considered, is a great Instance of the Temper of the House of Commons: For this House did not interfere when the Prisoners applied to the Lord-Keeper, and the Judges, and to be bailed; and had the Lawyers thrown so much Modesty, as to have acquiesced in the Opinion of the Lord-Keeper and all the Judges, That their Prisoners were not bailable by the Statute of Habeas Corpus, the Commons had never taken any Notice of it: But they would not rest satisfied without bringing on again this Cause, and the Privileges of the Commons were, with great Commisurations of Speech, denied, and insisted in public Court, not with any Hope or Prospect of Relief of the Prisoners (who in this whole Proceeding have apparently been only the Tools of some ill-advancing Priests, that are contriving every Way to dilate the Venation of the Commons Elections), but in order to vent their new Doctrines against the Commons of England, and with a Design to overthrow their fundamental Rights. And after to wash Invenience thence to the Commons, they could do no less than declare the Doctors, Priests, Controversers, or Affiliates, of a Proposition is voided as, to be guilty of conspiring to make a Difference between the Two Houses of Parliament, to be Destroyers of the Power of the Kingdom, and to have undertaken, as far as in them lay, to overthrow the Rights and Privileges of the Commons of England in Parliament assembled.

And the Commons, in committing the Lawyers, have only done that Right to their Body which your Lordships have frequently practiced, in Cases of personal Privilege, where any single Member of your Lordships House is concerned.

Your Lordships last Resolution, viz.

That a Writ of Error is not a Writ of Grace, but of Right, and ought not to be denied to the Subject, when duly applied for, (tho' as the Request of either House of Parliament) the Denial thereof being an Obstruction of Justice, contrary to Magna Charta.

The Commons shall not enter into any Consideration, whether a Writ of Error is of Right, or of Grace; they conceiving it not unusual in this Cause, in which no Writ of Error lies, nor was ever any Writ of Error brought or attempted in the like Case before; and the allowing it in such Cases would not only subject all the Privileges of the House of Commons, but the Liberties of all the People of England, to the Will and Pleasure of the House of Lords.

And when your Lordships Exercise of Jurisdiction upon Writs of Error is considered, how unaccountable in its Foundation, how inconsistent it is with our Constitution, which, in all other Respects, is the wisest and happiest in the World, to suppose the last Relief in Judicature and the Legislature to be differently placed.

And when it is considered how that Usurpation, in bearing of Appeals from Courts of Equity, to civil causes, though often denied and protested against, yet still exercised, and almost every Session of Parliament extended, is it not to be wondered, that after the Success your Lordships have had in these great Advances upon our Constitution, you should now in once make an Attempt upon the whole Frame of it, by detaching the Choice of the Commons Representatives to your Determination; for this is a necessary Consequence, from your Lordships encouraging the late Actions, and your countenancing a Writ of Error; which, if allowed upon such a Proceeding, might as well be introduced upon all Actions and Proceedings of Courts or Magistrates of Justice: And though the present Instance has been brought on under the specious Pretence of preserving Liberty, it is obvious the same will as well hold to controul the bailing and discharging Prisoners in all Cases.

And the Commons cannot but see how your Lordships are contriving, by all Methods, to bring the Determination of Liberty and Property into the Intemperate and insupportable Grip of your Lordships Jurisdiction, which would swallow up both the Prerogatives of the Crown, and the Rights and Liberties of the People; and which your Lordships must give the Commons Leave to say, they have the greater Reason to do, when they consider in what Manner it has been exercised; the Ignominy whereof they further, because they hope your Lordships will reform: And they desire rather to censure the Act, than to create any new Disgrace.

Upon the whole, the Commons hope, That, upon due Consideration of what they have said before your Lordships, you will be fully satisfied they have offered nothing in all their Proceedings, but what they are sufficiently justified in from Precedence, and the known Laws and Customs of Parliament; and that your Lordships have assumed and exercised Jurisdiction contrary to the known Laws and Customs of Parliament, and tending to the Overthrow of the Rights and Liberties of the People of England.

Resolved, That a Conference be desired with the Lords, upon the Subject Matter of the last Conference.

Ordered, That Mr. Ashley do go to the Lords, and desire the said Conference.

Monday, 7th March, 1704.

Mr. Ashley reported, That he having been at the Lords (according to the Order Yesterday) to desire a Conference upon the Subject Matter of the last Conference, the Lords return an Answer,

That they do agree to a Conference accordingly, and appoint the same presently in the Painted Chamber.

Ordered,

Ordered,
That the Managers who managed the last Conference, do manage the Conference which is to be presently with the Lords.
And the Managers went to the Conference.

And being returned,
Mr. Brerley reported, That they had been at the Conference, and delivered to the Lords what the House had directed.
A Message from the Lords by Sir Robert Clifford and Mr. Pitt. Mr. Speaker, the Lords desire a free Conference with this House To-morrow at One of the Clock, in the Painted Chamber, upon the Subject Matter of the last Conference.

Resolved,
That this House will send to the Lords an Answer by Messengers of their own.

And the Messengers were called in again; and Mr. Speaker acquainted them therewith.

Feast, 8 die Martii, 1704. Ann 4 Anne Regiæ.

Resolved,
That a Message be sent to the Lords, to acquaint them, That when their Lordships sent Yesterday in the Afternoon, after Three o'Clock, to deliver a free Conference upon the Subject Matter of the last Conference, the House was full sitting; but that this House will meet their Lordships at a free Conference, as their Lordships have desired, at such Time as their Lordships shall appoint, the Time named Yesterday by their Lordships being now past.

Ordered,
That Sir Thomas Hower do carry the said Message.

Ordered,
That the Managers who managed the last Conference, do manage the said free Conference: And some others were added to them.

Sir Thomas Hower reported, That he having been at the House of Lords, to deliver the Message directed by this House, he found that the Lords were full up.

The Sergeant at Arms attending this House, having acquainted the House, That he had received Two Writs of Habeas Corpus under the Great Seal of England, to bring before the Lord Keeper the Bishop of James Montague, Esq. and Alexander Dimes, Esq. (who are committed to his Custody by Warrants from the Speaker of this House for a Breach of Privilege).

The House again affirmed the Consideration of that Matter: And after Debate,

Resolved, That no Commoner of England, committed by the House of Commons for Breach of Privilege, or Contempt of that House, ought to be, by any Writ of Habeas Corpus, made to appear in any other Place, or before any other Judicature during that Session of Parliament wherein such Person was committed.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms attending this House, do make no Return, or yield any Obedience to the said Writ of Habeas Corpus; and for such his Refusal, That he have the Protection of the House of Commons.

Resolved, That the Lord Keeper be acquainted with the said Resolutions, to the End, that the said Writs of Habeas Corpus may be superseded, as contrary to Law, and the Privileges of this House.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do acquaint the Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England with the said Resolutions.

Feast, 9 die Martii, 1704.

The Clerk acquainted the House, That he did, pursuant to their Command last Night, wait upon the Right Honourable the Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, and acquaint him Lordship with the Resolutions of the House Yesterday, relating to the Writs of Habeas Corpus; and left the Resolutions with his Lordship.

Sir Thomas Hower reported, That he having been at the Lords with the Message order'd Yesterday, the Lords do return Answer, That they do agree to meet this House at a free Conference this Day, at Two o'Clock, in the Painted Chamber.

Then the Managers went to the free Conference.

And being returned,
Mr. Brerley reported, That the Managers appointed had met the Lords at the free Conference, which had lasted very long. And that when the Managers for the Commons took Notice of some Invasions of the House of Lords in point of Judicature, particularly as to Appeals, the Lords broke up the Conference.

Ordered, That the Managers do draw up what has passed at the Conference, and lay the same before the House with all convenient Speed.

Mortis, 12 die Martii, 1704.

Mr. Brerley reported, That the Managers of the free Conference with the Lords had (according to Order) drawn up what has passed at the said free Conference, which they had directed him to report to the House, which he did in his Place, and afterwards delivered in at the Clerk's Table.

Ordered, That the said Report be enter'd upon the Journals, and is as follows, viz.

That the Lords who appear'd as Managers, and spoke at this free Conference, were, the Earl of Sunderland, the Lord Perrin, the Bishop of Salisbury, the Lord Holifax, and the Lord Wentworth, and the Duke of Devonshire, Lord Stewart.

That the free Conference was begun by the Managers for the Lords, who said, This Conference was desired to maintain a good Correspondence between the Two Houses, which was never more necessary than at this Time.

That the delivering Resolutions at their first Conference was Parliamentary; and influenced the Resolutions, 3 Car. I. which produced the Petition of Right.

That the Lords took upon the Commons to be a great Part of the Constitution, which cannot be preserved but by doing Right to both Houses.

That every Part of the Body Politick, as well as the Body Natural, ought to be kept within due Bounds; an Example in any Member will weaken the whole.

That this Constitution is the Wonder of the World, and Glory of this Nation; 'tis founded upon Liberty, and Property: And the House of Commons hath been a great Fence and Bulwark of Liberty.

That the Lords Resolutions are very well founded, and justified by the Laws of the Land, as is their Judicature in this Cafe.

That it was proper for them to receive the Petitions, and make their Resolutions thereupon.

That the Lords are the great Court of Judicature; and when the Courts below have offered in Opinion, there has been resort to the Lords for their Judgment, as in the case of Kindred or Half-blood claiming Shares of Inheritance Estates.

That when such a Complaint comes before the Lords, they ought to give their Opinion as to the Law of the Land; and that was the Foundation of their present Resolutions.

1. That the First Resolution was, in effect, agreed to by the Commons, tho' they go off to Foreign Matters, of which the Lords take no Notice.

That the Law of the Land can be altered only by the Legislature.

2. That the Second Resolution affirms the Subjects Redress by Action at Law, &c.

That all Constitutions have reckon'd this their Safety, That every Man, from the highest to the lowest, hath the Protection of the Law.

That, according to our Constitution, the subject may contest his Right with the Crown, and upon equal Terms, with that respect which it due.

That this Resolution only affirms the Right, does not share the respective Courts, where the Redress is to be had. If the Party mistakes the Court, he is punished by Costs of Suit.

The Term of privileged Causes is new, and the Distinction unknown.

3. To support the Third Resolution, it was urged,

That the Branch of Privilege was not well grounded.

That it belongs to the Crown to make Declarations; the Commons did indeed make Ordinances; and when their Prince was murdered, they came to Declarations.

That a Law without Promulgation cannot have Force to make an Offence.

The Liberty of Men's Persons is the greatest Privilege, and not to be taken away, but in known Cases; the invading of it has broke the bulk Constitutions.

That the taking away the Liberty of one man's Person, once endanger'd the Government of Rome.

That both Houses may commit for Breach of Privilege, but cannot declare any thing to be a Privilege, without good Grounds; nor consequently make any thing a Contempt, that is not known to be so.

That Commitments or Censures have not been used upon Adverses at Law, though such Adverses have brought the Proceedings, or Privileges, of either House in Question.

That in the case of Freedom of Speech, which is the greatest Privilege, there was a Judgment in King Charles the First's Reign, in the House of short Times, against some Members, for Speeches in Parliament: That the Commons first condemn'd, and then by Conference brought it before the Lords, who came to a Resolution, That it was erroneous, and desired the Lord Keeper to bring his Writ of Error; and thereupon it was reversed by the Lords, in the Time of Charles the Second; which shews the Care the Lords had of the Commons Privileges.

That in Saunders and Barnardine's Case, the Commons did not concern themselves, only in Support of the Adverses, when in 1678 they examined the Judgment of Reversals as a Grievance.

That the Lords had not interposed in any Suits which concern'd the Proceedings of their House.

That the Earl of Bedford (as he was called) was, by the Lords, adjudged to be no Peer. This was examin'd in the King's Bench, where, in Abatement of an Indictment for Murder against him, as Glorio Rex, Esq. he pleaded his Title of an Earl; and in Avoidance of that, the Order of the Lords was replied, and was examin'd by the Court, and shall hold.

That the late Bishop of St. David's was prosecuted in the Spiritual Court, and depriv'd, tho' a Member of that House; and the Lords did not interpose.

That it is the Will of all Governments, to have the Law open; and that's the Difference between a Legal and Arbitrary Government.

That the Lords do not meddle with the Commons Right of determining their own Elections; they have a settled possession of it, which is a Right; If all the Rights of Subjects concerned in these Elections are to be determined there, that will bring all Questions of Freehold, and the Allowance of all Charters, and all Liberty and Property, before them.

That a Freeholder of Forty Shillings per Annum has a Right of Intestance, to which he is born; and if his Vote is denied, he is damaged, and loses the Credit of his Vote; and if he shall only come to the House of Commons, they can neither give him Damages, nor Costs of Suit.

That a Freehold cannot be determined by any Court which cannot give an Oath.

That the Precedents produced concern only the Right of determining Elections in general.

And an Adverses by an Elector, for his Right of voting, does not avoid the Election.

4. To maintain the Fourth Resolution, they said,

That it may be lawful for a Man to apply for his Liberty, whose he cannot have it.

That the Proceedings in 1679, produced as a Precedent in this Case, were upon a Matter contested between the Two Houses, and resolved differently in the Lords House: Yaphen and the Lieutenant of the Tower were both sent out; and the Sentence was so high, that the Parliament was prorogued, and soon after dissolved.

5. The Fifth Resolution is a Consequence of the Fourth:

That the Commitment of the Lawyers was not for Inconvenient Speech, as was insinuated at the last Conference, but for pleading upon the Return of the Writs of Habeas Corpus.

That in the particular Character of that whose Court call'd the Inquisition, that nobody cares appear for, or resort to a Parliam. unprovoked there, but he is left to the Mercy of that Court.

The Lawyers are not to be answerable for every thing they argue; they are to do their Duty for their Clients, and the Court is to judge of it.

6. The Commons declining the last Resolution is an agreeing it, though not so Parliamentary as it would have been to have agreed it directly.

Thus

That the Lords are the only proper Judges, Whether the Writ of Error lies against them.

Ye Lords answered the Managers for the Commons As follows,

That they agreed the Necessity of a good Correspondence between the Two Houses, especially at this Time of common Danger; and that the Commons had fully shewn their Desire to maintain that good Correspondence, by endeavouring to meet their Lords in this free Conference, about their ancient and fundamental Privileges had been called in Question, and denied by their Lords; and that in an extraordinary and very unparliamentary Manner.

That the Delivery of Resolutions is so far from being the only Method of Conferences, that the most usual Method has been to offer Reasons, without Resolutions; and it would be very difficult to give any Influence (before this) of either House delivering positive Resolutions at a Conference, without the Reasons, at the same Time, to support them, and that induce them to make such Resolutions.

1. That the Commons Answer to the Lords First Resolution is not foreign to the Subject Matter of the Conference; because the Commons comprehended the Subject Matter to be their Lords denying the Privileges of the Commons on the one hand, and their extending their own Jurisdiction beyond its proper Limits on the other: And therefore the Commons could not but take Notice, how far their Lords had transgressed in the Exercise of an unparliamentary Jurisdiction, in Contradiction to that very Rule they had laid down for the Tell of the Proceedings of the Commons, and by a neglect the Commons had directly given themselves.

That the Commons cannot create new Privileges; yet in Cal's 17 Resolves, fo. 63. we find, the Privilege of Parliament, either of the Upper House, or of the House of Commons, belongs to the Determination or Decision only of the Court of Parliament, for every Court hath a Right to adjudge their own Privileges, according to the Book of E. IV. Sir John Poynt's Case.

2. To their Lords Arguments for their Second Resolution your Managers answer'd,

That every Person injured hath a Right to seek Redress; but then that Redress must be sought in the Place where the Matter is properly cognizable.

3. To what the Lords offered upon the Third Resolution, your Managers answer'd, That Matters of Election do not belong to the Courts below, but only to the House of Commons, which hath been in long Possession of them: That there was an Act of Parliament made in the Time of King Henry the Sixth, to give an Admon for a false Return of Members to serve in Parliament, because no such Admon lay at Common Law, as relating to Elections.

That double Return is not being within that Statute, no Admon lay in the Courts of Common Law for making any double Return, 'till the Statute of 3 H. VIII. III.

That besides the Influence given in the Answers the Commons gave to the Lords Resolutions at the last Conference, this Diffinition, as to privileged Cases, is fully and undeniably warranted by the Statute made in the Fifth Year of King William and Queen Mary, entitled, An Act declaring the Rights and Liberties of the Subject, and settling the Succession of the Crown; where, among other Endeavours of the late King James to subvert and extinguish the Liberties and Rights of the Kingdom, there are mentioned, his being the Privilege of Electors of Members in Parliament, and Privileges in the Court of King's-Bench, for Matters and Causes only cognizable in Parliament.

Besides, That there are privileged Cases as well as privileged Persons, against whom hence: A Prohibition, and afterwards an Attachment, lies for tarring in the Spiritual Court for a Temporal Cause determinable in the Temporal Court. There are divers Laws within this Realm, of which the Common Law is but one, as appears in Cal's 1. fo. 11. B. where he mentions Law of Conscience, Parliamentary, & Law Common, as distinct Laws.

As there are several Laws, so there are several Courts and Jurisdictions, and several Causes proper for those several Laws and several Jurisdictions: Of these the High Court of Parliament is the First; Law of Conscience Parliament is a great Branch of the Law of England; and many Causes are to be determined only by that Law, as appears in the 1st fo. 23.

With such Causes as are in their Nature Parliamentary, and so determined by the Law of Parliament, the Common Law, and Common-Law Judges have nothing to do; as further appears, 4 fo. 14, 15, where the Expressions are very suitable to the present Controversies.

That the Persons perilling in the Prosecution of such Actions, after a Prohibition by the Commons, for that such Causes belong to their Jurisdiction, the committing them for the Breach of their Privileges in that Particular, is no more than is done by the Common Law Courts for the like Contempts, when Persons will for after a Prohibition in the Spiritual Courts: And the Commons used way to defend their Privileges against such Infrusions, has been by committing the Tools and Instruments thereof.

It is a fundamental Maxim of the Law and Custom of Parliament, which is the highest and noblest Part of the Law of England, and particularly adapted to the Preservation of the Liberties of this Kingdom, That the Two Houses are independent of one another, and sole Judges of their Rights and Privileges: That their Lords do advise, the Commons have a Privilege to judge of the Rights of their own Elections to one Tenant, but not to another: But if the Commons have such a Privilege to one Tenant, they must be Judges of it to all Intents and Purposes whatsoever, and being sole Judges thereof, their Judgment cannot be legally called in Question, either by Writs of Habeas Corpus, Writs of Error, or otherwise, in any other Court; and consequently the Proceedings in Walsingham-Hall, and in the House of Peers, and the Judgment given there, are all null and void, as error non facit.

The Commons Commitment for commencing such Actions, is no more than what they and their Predecessors have in all Times practised in Cases of Breach of Privilege.

4. In Answer to what the Lords had offered upon the Fourth Resolution, your Managers insisted, That Application of Friends for the Liberty of any Person imprisoned, ought to be in a proper Place, and in a proper Manner, which in this Case ought to have been only to the House of Commons, and by the Petitioners of the Persons they had committed.

That the Proceedings in 1675 were so well grounded, that they must be Precedents to the Commons to follow at all Times upon the like Occasions.

5. To what the Lords offered upon the Fifth Resolution, your Managers answered;

The Locution of Speech used by the Lawyers, was only mentioned among other Particulars of the Provocations they gave the House of Commons, but they were committed for pleading upon the Return of the Writs of Habeas Corpus, in behalf of the Prisoners committed by the House of Commons, which the Commons (who are the only Judges of their own Privileges) take to be a great Breach of the Privilege of their House.

6. To the last Resolution your Managers insisted, That no Writ of Error lies in that Case, and that there may be Cases wherein no Writ of Error lies, as their Lords in Opinion in the Case of the late Bishop of St. David's, who brought his Writ of Error upon the Court's not granting him a Prohibition.

The Case of Sir Thomas Armstrong, mentioned by their Lords, was particular, in that the Commons then apprehended he was entitled to a Writ of Error within the Meaning of the Statute of Edward the Sixth.

Your Managers further urged the Necessity of the Action in the Case of Abby and Whitt, of which no Footprints can be found in any Book of the Law, or in any Record, although we have faithful Reports of all memorable Cases for four hundred Years past; and the Occasion of such an Action must frequently have happened.

The Lords themselves (when they had no Design upon the Privileges of the Commons) were in Opinion, in the Case of Sir Samuel Barnardiston, in the first Year of the Reign of King William, That no such Action lay; and there is no one Reason can be offered to maintain this Action, but held more strongly in the Case of Sir Samuel Barnardiston, as Damages, Costs, &c. And it is an absurd Diffinition to say, That in this Case the Right of Election cannot come in Question, because the determining of the Right of the Election does generally determine the Right of the Election; and almost all controverted Elections depend upon the Qualifications of the Electors.

That the Commons had shewn such a Disposition to maintain a good Correspondence with their Lords, though their Lords had, in the Case of Abby and Whitt, had, contrary to the Judgment of the Courts below, allowed the Action upon which the Plaintiff had taken out Execution, and levied the Money; that the Commons took no Notice of it, and were willing to let the Matter slide, which might occasion any Contest in this Time of publick Danger: But when other Actions of the like Nature were still commenced and prosecuted, whereby all Elections would be brought to the Determination of the Lords, or, at least, in some measure, as that the Lords would in effect take the Commons, and thereby the Independency of the Two Houses would be destroyed, which is the great Safety of the Constitution; then it concerned the Commons, who are the Representatives of the People, to oppose what would be so fatal to our Constitution.

The bringing Writs of Habeas Corpus upon the Commitments of the Commons, and a Writ of Error thereupon before the Lords, would bring all the Privileges of the Commons to be determined by the Judges, and afterwards by the Lords, upon such Writs of Error.

Nay, such Writs of Error upon every Habeas Corpus, would bring the Liberty of every Commoner in England to the arbitrary Disposition of the House of Lords.

And if a Writ of Error cannot be denied in any Case, and the Lords alone are to judge whether the Case be proper for a Writ of Error, then all the Queen's Revenue, all her Privileges, and all the Lives and Liberties of the People of England, will be in the Hands of the Lords; for every Felon, Burglar, and Traitor, will be entitled to a Writ of Error before the Lords; and they will have even Power of Life and Death.

And by Writs of Error and Appeals, as already exercised, they will have all our Properties; by such new-invented Actions they will have all our Elections; and by such Writs of Habeas Corpus, and Writs of Error thereupon, they will have all our Privileges, Liberties, and even Lives, as their Determination; who determine by Voice, with their Doors shut, and it is not certainly known who it is that hurts us.

The Novelty of those Things, and the infinite Consequences of them, is the greatest Argument in Law, That they are not of Right.

The Commons are not consenting for a small Thing, but for their All: Especially since the Lords have found out a way to subvert the Government, by defrauding the Money given by the Commons, which must come last of them, because the Money-bills must begin with the Commons; and if that Means they can extort Writs of Error when they never were heard of, the Commons must commit the Persons employed in all such Innovations, or else they must lose, by such Contrivances, All that they have.

In the Case of Denial Hall, Sir John Elliot, &c. in 1675, the Commons declared the Judgment given in 5 Car. I. to be an illegal Judgment, and against the Privilege of Parliament: And this they did of themselves, before they acquainted the Lords therewith.

Afterwards, because it concerned the Lords as well as the Commons, they impugned their Resolutions to the Lords, who concurred with the Commons; and the Writ of Error, which was afterwards brought at the Desire and Influence of the Lords, and not at all by the Desire of the Commons, they relied upon their own Resolution, That it was an illegal Judgment. Vid. Vol. VII. p. 123.

The Lords, by way of Reply, said further, That this is a Cause of Liberty and Property, and judicial Proceedings, which the Commons had endeavoured to stop.

That the Conference therefore asked by the Lords upon the Fundamental Rights and Liberties, was proper.

That they are the same Terms the Commons used, 3 Car. when their Liberties were attacked.

That

That the true Method of Conference is not by way of Question and Answer, but by Resolutions, which are not binding, but if the Lords are convinced by Argument, they may retract them.

That the Lords, here, may regularly take Notice of this printed Paper, when in Court, in such Declaration as all Persons are bound to take Notice of at the Bar of Commons.

That the Right of the House of Commons to determine their own Elections is not in Question, or intended to be changed, but the two Proceedings produced to support them are very much mistaken.

That the Case of Sir Francis Gooden is not fairly stated, the Word Order being omitted in the Commons Answer to the Lords Message, relating to the Commons Proceedings in this Case; which refers to a particular Order of the House of Commons, they having before determined that Election. That it is not taken Notice, that the Lords went with the Commons to the King, and were Mediators, and that at the last a new Will issued for a new Election.

That in the former Precedent, 28 Edw. the Commons have not taken Notice, That the Election was in that Case determined by the Judges.

That the Commons did not confine their Writ to return to the Judges's Case, but to the general and absolute, I have a Right to Error in Judgment, or Trial, or of Right, and not of Grace.

That by the Writ of Error, brought in the late Bishop of St. David's Case, upon a Case that is a trisubstant, and does not by the Lords, it appears, when a Record comes improperly before them, they are to judge as to its validity.

That instead of proving the Law, the Consequences are urged, which is not right arguing.

That the Question is, Whether the Queen is bound to grant a Writ of Error? If she is, it will be void for any Body of Men to interpose with the Crown, and stop it to hinder that Writ, which, by the Opinion of the Judges, she ought to give.

She is obliged too, by Magna Charta: Nullo regalium, nulli deferamus, vel levemus.

That whether a Writ of Error lies or not, will afterwards be proper for the Judgment of this Court, as 'tis of any other Courts where a Writ of Error is returnable.

That the Commons are very safe, and may depend the Lords will be as tender of their Privileges as of their own.

That whatever Privileges accrue to the Commons, will accrue to the Lords also: If the Commissioners of the Commons are free from the Cognizance of the Courts below, those of the Lords will be so too.

That 3 Cor. the Commons maintained, That the Measure of Persons being laid, is not from the Authority which committed, but from the Cause of Commitment.

Your Managers further observed, This Subject Matter was scarce ever in Conference before between the Lords and Commons, and will seem strange to Posterity.

That the Lords Concern for Liberty and Property cannot be equal with that of the Commons; for the Lords Liberty is better secured, and consequently their Property too, than that of the Commons.

The Lords are less interested in the Event of this Conference than the Commons, who are the Trustees of those who sent them, and are bound in Duty and oath to preserve their Liberty and Property. And having but a limited Duration, which is at this Time near expiring, it is not to be imagined they will infringe what they are entrusted with, and to such concerned to maintain; and that for notoriously, that the Lords should comply, who are much less concerned, but more to be feared, as their Designs, as well as Honour, may be Hereditary.

At the full Conference, six Resolutions were delivered as Matters of undoubted Truth and Law.

And the Proceedings of the Commons are to be tried by these Rules, though they have no Parties in the making them.

1. The Writ is not to be excepted against, only as an Information, if the Commons had pleaded the contrary which they are not conscious of.

2. To the second, There are many Injuries for which no Action at Law is allowed; as it is a Judge gives a wrong Judgment, the Benefits by Writ of Error is no satisfaction for the Damages.

3. In other Acts of a Judge, or Court of Justice, as denying a Writ of Habeas Corpus, or Bail, no Action lies, but upon the late Statute.

That the Lordships, not making any Distinction between Matters and Causes which were exempt from the Cognizance of the Common Law Courts, as being solely cognizable in Parliament, and Causes which were exempt only in respect of the Persons sued, being entitled to Privilege of Parliament, seems to be the Occasion of the Mistakes their Lordships have entertained in relation to the Proceedings of the Commons: That the House of Commons is a Court of Judicature in many respects, and as such, hath, as well as other Courts, Causes proper and peculiar to its Jurisdiction.

That the Law-Books, and particularly the Lord Coke, speaks of Matters of Parliament which are not to be determined by the Common Law, but according to the Law and Usage of Parliament.

That all Matters which are done in Parliament, may be questioned and determined there, and not elsewhere, has been heretofore asserted by the House of Commons, as their ancient and undoubted Right, and has been allowed both by the Judges of Law, and by their Lordships. And when the Judges on the King's Bench, in the fifth Year of King Charles the Fifth, upon an Information against Sir John Elliot, Mr. Holt, and others, held, That Matters done in the House of Commons, if not done in a Parliamentary Way, may be questioned elsewhere, that Judgment was afterwards reversed in Parliament.

That their Lordships allowed, all Matters relating to Elections ought to be determined solely by the Commons: And though their Lordships attempted to make a Distinction between the Right of Elections, and the Right of Elections, yet their Lordships cannot find Room for such a Distinction, unless they would say, the Right and Qualification of the Electors was a Matter not relating to Elections.

VOL. VIII.

That by the Parliament Roll, in Rich. II. it appears a Petition was exhibited by Parliament, in Answer by the King, That the Privilege and Privilege of Parliament should be enjoyed by the Parliament, and not by any other Courts, nor by Common Law; and therefore, when the Judges have been asked how they are in Matters of Privilege, it they are answered, That the Privilege of Parliament ought to be observed there, and not by any other, as they did in the Case of Thorpe, Speaker of the House of Commons, 31 H. VI.

That their Masters are not exempt from the Determination of other Courts, in respect of the Part in sued, for then they might be drawn in there after the Time of Privilege was expired; whereas it is evident, that such Matters and Causes cannot be determined in any other Court, as that of the Parliament, after the Expiration of the Time of Privilege, any more than before.

That these Matters are determinable in Parliament, although the Persons prosecuted are not entitled to the Privilege of Parliament, as appears by many Instances, particularly by that of the Mayor of London, in the Eighth Year of Queen Elizabeth, who, for taking Four Pence to get a Petition which a Burgess for that Borough, was fined and imprisoned by the House of Commons, although he was not a Person entitled to the Privilege of Parliament.

That it may as well be said, That an Action is maintainable for releasing any of the Lords a Right of Precedency in Parliament; yet it cannot be imagined the House of Peers would be content the same should be brought in Question in any the Courts of Law, and decided by a Jury of Commoners.

But the same Arguments will hold for maintaining such an Action, to recover Damages: for releasing Precedency to him that has Right to it, as for maintaining an Action to recover Damages for taking or taking upon upon the Poll the Vote of an Elector: For it may with equal Justice be said in both Cases, That the Plaintiff hath a Right, That the Defendant released him that Right. That such Release is an Injury, and consequently ought to be repaired in Damages.

That to the Third Resolution, the Commons are not accountable to the House of Lords, or any other Court, for what they do in an Matter.

Their Privileges being Rights peculiar to that House, which is their Privilege, and the Breach of it, is only examinable, and to be judged by themselves.

That the Courts of Westminster-Hall have that Deference for each other's Judgment, that in Commitments for Contempt, or Misbehaviour, which are frequent every Term, another Court, though superior, will not re-arrest the Prisoner by Habeas Corpus, or otherwise, but he shall address to the Court which committed him, much less can an inferior Court do it.

The House of Commons therefore, expelled the same Deference from their Courts which they pay each other, and ally from the Lords House what is due to a co-ordinate Jurisdiction: The Commons taking themselves to be superior to any Court in Westminster-Hall, and not allowing any Court in this Government to be their Superior, no more than their Predecessors have done.

The Commons do not extend by their Declaration to make a new Law, but barely declare what the Law was, and prohibit any Person to act contrary.

The Term Declaration is not peculiar to the Prince, but is a familiar Term at Westminster-Hall.

That the Commons are not for adding contrary to the Vote of the Commons, but for adding contrary to Law, after the Law was declared to them by that Declaration, and they thereby prohibited to proceed in that Court.

To set this in a true Light, if a Man fares in the Admiralty, or Ecclesiastical Court, for a Matter properly cognizable at Common Law, the Party shall not need to be committed for commencing that Suit; but if the Defendant in such Suit obtains a Prohibition, which declares what the Law is, and gives the Plaintiff Notice that his Suit is contrary to Law, and therefore prohibits him to proceed any further therein; if he does proceed, an Attachment will issue to arrest him for breach of the Prohibition, as it is in fact, though in Truth, it is for adding contrary to Law, after he had been advertised what the Law was.

Now there is no Difference between the Declaration complained of, and the Prohibition mentioned, but in the Name only; both declare what the Law is; both address the Person offending, and both command him not to proceed; for both there is as much Reason to complain of a Prohibition at Law, as of the Declaration mentioned in the Resolution.

4. To the Fourth Resolution, if it respects the Prisoners committed by the Commons, they apprehend the Application ought to be made to their House.

5. For the Fifth Resolution, the Commons have the same Exceptions to it as they had in the Third Resolution; for if Councils, Attorneys, or Solicitors, are prohibited, and act contrary to the Order of any Court, they are guilty of a Contempt of that Court, and for such Contempt they may be taken into Custody.

To their Lordships last Resolution, it is very true, That in the last Reign the House of Commons did resolve in the Case of Sir Thomas Arundel as hath been cited; which Case was, That Sir Thomas Arundel was indicted for High-Treason, and afterwards had beyond Sea, where he was at the Time of the Execution against him; and afterwards, within a Year after the Execution awarded, he was brought Prisoner into England, and would have a Writ of Error, but it was denied him, upon which the House of Commons made his Resolution mentioned. At the Common Law, if a Person had been guilty of a capital, or any other Crime, and had been in England at the Time of the Indictment found against him, but was beyond Sea at the Time of the Execution awarded, and thereupon an Outlawry was had, the Indictment would not be returned, nor would any Outlawry be issued; that Error in Fact: The Practice whereupon was, That Persons guilty of Treason, would fly beyond Sea, and there they 'till the Writs issued against them were denied, and then return into England, reverse their Outlawry, and become safe. To remedy which Mischief, was the statute of Edw. VI. made, which takes away that Error in Treason, unless the Person

Outlaw rendered himself to the Chief-Justice within a Year after the Outlawry; within which Exception was the Case of Sir Thomas Armstrong, as the Commons apprehended, which was the Reason of the Resolution: And in other Cases the Practice since that Resolution has been otherwise; for in the Case of Salisbury, who was attainted of Felony for counterfeiting the Stamp, a Writ of Error was denied him, though he petitioned for the same. But this Resolution is aimed at a Writ of Error for denying a Habeas Corpus, or denying to bail, or discharge Persons committed by the House of Commons, this Resolution is very wide from the Purpose; for, whether a Writ of Error be a Writ of Right, or a Writ of Grace, in all Cases where a Writ of Error does lie, yet their Lordships Resolutions cannot be carried so far as to make a Writ of Error lie in a Case where there is no Judgment pronounced, as there never is in the Case of a Habeas Corpus, or in any thing relating thereto; for if a Habeas Corpus is denied, or if granted, and the Person thereupon denied to be bailed or discharged, or in no such Judgment, but that the same, or any other Court, may grant an Habeas Corpus, and discharge or bail the Person committed.

Your Managers added, The Commons hoped it would be so Difficult to convince the Lords, that these Resolutions were both unreasonable and unparliamentary, and they have not been much justified; and certainly it cannot be parliamentary or reasonable, for the Lords to condemn the Commons in the Case of their own Privileges, when the Lords are no Judges of them: And therefore, though the Commons have now entered into this Debate with their Lordships, it was never meant to subject their Proceedings to the Lords Examination, but only to satisfy the Lords, and all Mankind, that the Commons have not done any extravagant Thing. That a Noble Lord said, They did not intend to interrupt the Commons in the Determination of their Elections. The Commons are beholden to them for that; for otherwise, when they thought fit, they might as well meddle with that, as several other Things they have of late taken upon them.

The Commons hope their Lordships will consider what the Constitution is, and think it not reasonable, that any Part should exceed due Bounds. But there have been great Invasions made upon it by the Lords, and some Instances of that kind have been delivered at the last Conference; and that the Commons can never suffer the Lords to assume this new Power to themselves. Were we certain Power could never be abused, an arbitrary, and what is called a Tyrannical, Power would be the best in the World; for that not being tied to any Rule, would apply the Remedies proper in all Cases; but since this is not to be expected, the Commons were in the right to stop this Writ of Error: They find one Thing has brought on another, and therefore, for the future, shall oppose any further Progress of this Nature.

It was further urged by the Lords, in Reply, That if such a Writ of Error wants a Precedent, 'tis a new Sort of Imprisonment has occasioned this. That the Consequences urged by Gentlemen cannot arise. That if the Law be fit, nothing but the Legislature can alter it. That 'tis said, the Lords cannot judge of the Privileges of the House of Commons. They do not say they can; there may be no Occasion: But from Precedents it appears they have done it by Writ of Error, and at the Desire of the Commons.

That not only the Lords, but all Mankind, will judge of what is not their Privileges, if they claim that which neither Sense, nor Reason, nor Law will justify.

That if the Commons say, To bring an Action at Law against Persons not privileged is a Breach of Privilege, all Mankind will say it is not.

That this comes upon a Petition of five Men to the Lords, saying (with, They have been imprisoned by the Commons for bringing their Actions against the Constables of Aldersbury, and for suing out Writs of Habeas Corpus, and are at last delivered in a Writ of Error.

The Question lies in a narrow Compass.

Whether they have a Right to bring their Actions at Law? If so, it is injustice to imprison them for doing it.

A Hardship to deny them Writs of Habeas Corpus, and a greater to imprison their Counsel and Agents, for endeavouring to procure them their Liberty.

That their Right is settled by a Judgment of Law, which will ever remain, till altered by the Legislature.

That a Declaration of one House, or both Houses, cannot alter the Law.

That the Lords intend not to disturb the Commons in their Right of judging, only as their own Members.

That the material Difference is between judging of the Right of the Election, and the Right of the Election.

And there may be Cases, as here, where the Election is not in Question, and yet the Election receives great Damage in being denied their Voss.

That the Right of Freehold is a Man's Birth-right, and cannot be taken from him, but by Law.

That if any Person be injured by any Officer whatsoever, he may, by Law, seek for Reparation: Otherwise, there is a Right without a Remedy, which is no Right at all.

In Answer to this, your Managers said;

This Action lies of the full Impediment; and 'tis a good Argument no such Action lies, because none was ever brought before; and especially, because Querebus cannot be preferred to have been wanting in every new Election of Members to serve in Parliament, say, many more justifiable than as the late Case of Aldersbury and Winton, where the Plaintiff was a Person likely to become chargeable to the Parish, and therefore removed by the Order of two Justices: And this, in the way, brings in mind the granted Case of Aldersbury and Winton, from the Report of the Lords Committee, where 'tis given in Answer, No such Action before was brought, That you had such a case English Spirit as a Plaintiff, though, it is said, he was then a Cleric, and formerly had been an Abbot, and his blood, it seems, was well warmed with this true English Spirit, who was rather a Spirit of Faction.

And in a worthy Objection, That in this Case two Costs and Charges followed by Aldersbury, or somebody for him, could not be less than twelve, more than the Costs and Damages he recovered, so that 'twas twelve to one, and no Benefit, but a Loss to him. A Noble Lord was pleased to say further, That though he would not pretend to judge of the Commons Privileges, yet he might of what was not their Privilege. In Argument appears very strange, since the Commons say, The Master in Question is their Privilege; and if the Lords bring 'em out to interfere to disturb them of it, the same Method may settle the Commons of all the rest. The Commons are not at all concerned about new Privileges, but continue the Possession of those which their Predecessors ever enjoyed and exercised, and which they think neither this or any other future House of Commons can ever depart from.

The Lords afterwards needed from the Generality of their Record and had Resolutions.

They said, the second, so far as that every one who apprehends himself injured has a Right to seek Redress, was general; but what followed of an Action at Law was confined to the present Case.

So the sixth, though it was general, was to be understood in this particular Case.

As to what was said, That none but a Superior Court can take Cognizance of what was done at the Commons, it was answered,

That when the Earl of Shropshire was committed by the House of Lords for a Contempt, he was brought by a Habeas Corpus to the Court of Kings Bench: This was complained of to the House of Lords, but they pulled it over, being of Opinion, a Man might seek for Liberty where he would.

The Lords Judgment was then forced a Thing to be touched. Your Managers in response returned, They wished their Lordships, had said that at the beginning, it would have saved much Time, and shortened the Debate; for the Commons think their Privileges as sacred as the Lords can their Judgment. Your Managers proceeded to say,

That as nothing offered at this Conference, or the last, was meant to subvert or lessen the Privilege of the Commons, much less had any Thing as the Predecessors in the Time of Queen Elizabeth and James I. produced at the last Conference, any Tendency that way.

And in Answer to four Objections made to those Proceedings, your Managers said, The Commons did not take upon them so far as the whole Proceedings, which are very long; but though they had not their Books there to make out the Questions, can depend upon what they have said to be true.

In the Precedent of Sir Francis Goodale's Case, cited by the Commons, there are no Outlaws that, duly considered, can make that Case lie to the Advantage of the Commons on this Occasion: for if the Word Order be omitted, and taking the Answer to have been, That they did not know it did not stand with the Honor and Order of the House is (as dissent of any your Proceedings) or Doing, that will leave after the Case, since it is plain, from the Entry in the Journal, the Commons, in returning this Answer, had referred chiefly to the Precedent then quoted, by Ellis, where the Commons Regard to give the Lords any Reason (though the Lords desired them) for the rejecting at the last Reading a Bill the Lords had sent down to the Commons: The Reason for the Commons Proceedings in this Case were prepared by themselves, which they did communicate to the Lords; but the Lords were not so bold or dimitted: And though some Lords were present at the Commons delivering their Reason, there is a material distinction upon the Commons Journals of their Lords being present as Lords of the Council, and not as Lords of the Parliament.

And the Noble Lord who took Notice of the Commons Omission in the first of this Case, and pretended to base it fully and truly himself, understood, That the new Writ was ordered to issue at the Request of Sir Francis Goodale, by his Letter; which, for the Satisfaction of the House, was read and entered on the Journal, before any Question for the new Election was made.

To that of the 28th Ellis, the Commons did not at the last Conference omit to take Notice of the Judges Determination; but it is fully filed as a Matter the Commons in the Examination of that Case were informed of, but did not reject; the Commons then asserting themselves to have the sole Determination of that Case.

Your Managers further urged, Though the Commons do not subvert their Privileges, it may be proper to attend what they claim, with the Reason why they are at this time so much concerned to appeal to the Commons upon them.

They suppose, the Rights of Voters may be protected upon Freehold, Chancery, or Prerogative, and they do not pretend to draw them from the Courts of Common Law, when as fact they come there originally, immediately and directly in Question.

But it is as plain, when the Right of Voting in an Election is the Thing originally, immediately and directly in Question, that is fully cognizable in the House of Commons, whose Determination is the standing Rule for all Places; and if the Elections only were examinable by the Commons, and every Election's Vote was examinable elsewhere, the Consequence of such different Determinations is fully felt, as delivered at the last Conference, which common and known Difference of coming originally or collaterally and incidentally in Question, will settle the Case of the Earl of Bedford, where the Order of the House of Lords came only incidentally in Question upon an Indictment for Murder, not is here any Injury in this Cafe that require an Action, much less Damages, the Elsher's View, upon every Election, depends upon its own true Foundation, as the Elsher then stands entitled by Freehold, Charter, or Prescription, whether he was entitled, or was allowed or refused, at any former Election, or not.

Not a Damage always necessary to a Remedy; that which is specific, and gives the Right, is the most noble and complete Remedy; Damages being only secondary, substituted by Way of Recompense where the other cannot be had, as appears by many Instances in the Law.

The Commons had great Reason to affect their ancient Right, and withhold their late and new Attempts upon the Constitution, which in every Step have been unprecedented, see the Attles, the Habeas Corpus, and the Writ of Error.

The Action was never known, though the like Occasions have been so frequent as Elections, unless these Ashby Men have more refused Notices of their Rights and Privileges than others ever had.

As to the Habeas Corpus, the Argument is to much stronger, as Liberty is dearer than Property.

As to the Writ of Error, though the Lords Resolution is general, they now assert it to be of Right only in this Cafe.

As the Commons at the last Conference saved the Point of a Writ of Error being of Right or of Grace, for they do now, not by Way of Admission, but as 'tis not material in this Cafe.

But thus much may be observed, That this is not the Common Cafe, where the Question arises and falls under the Determination of the Judges of the Law, which is of Penalties of Right, and Writs of Error in the Courts of Wylshire (as that of Sir Thomas Ashby was) where the Queen is Party; there it is in the room of a Suit against the Crown, and it denied, the Party has no Remedy.

This Petition to the Queen, for a Writ of Error in Parliament, is properly a parliamentary Cafe, and is the same when the Queen is Party, or not; and seems some Remains of our ancient Constitution, where all Petitions were to the King in Parliament, or to the King, and his Great Council, which was distinct from the House of Peers, and were examined by Them, Whether fit for the Parliament to proceed upon or not; and so by, That upon such Examination they could not be rejected, is to say, That Examination was insignificant.

And if in this Cafe no Writ of Error lies, it cannot then be said, That the denying of it is an Obstruction of Justice, or contrary to Magna Charta.

That a Writ of Error lies not in any Proceeding on any Habeas Corpus, has been the uniform Opinion at former Times, as appears in the Cafe of the City of London, 7 Jas. reported by the Lord Chief-Justice Cole, in his Eighth Report, where one under an Arrest, for the Fidelity in a By-Law, brought his Habeas Corpus; and the Judges took it for a Ground, That no Illice or a Demurrer could be joined upon the Return, nor could any Writ of Error lie upon their Award; and upon that, as a Principle, grounded their Resolution, Q. 228.

And that this never came directly in Question, is, because a Writ of Error in such Cafe was never asked, much less had, upon a bare Commitment of any Court whatsoever: And it is hard to imagine, that there is any lawful Recourse or Appeal for Liberty left untill at this Day, when so many, in all Times, have had Occasion to apply for it, especially considering the frequent Commitments of both Houses of Parliament.

That the Commons are not surprized to find the Lords make such a Shew of submitting their Privileges to the Courts of Wylshire, when it is in order to draw all the Rights and Privileges of both Houses to their own final Determination; and much less when they consider how insignificant all Courts of Justice are rendered, while their Lordships exercise the last Resort in Judicature.

The several Attempts in the Way of Judicature, which have been made upon the Constitution, are so many Reasons for the Commons at last to make a Stand.

The very Form of the Writ of Error in Parliament is altered in a most material Part.

It is still returnable into Parliament generally; and the Judgment is entered, per Cur. Parliamenti.

But where the ancient Form, which appears in Reginald's Entries, Fe. 202, was, Et de Consequencia et Adjunctione Denominatio Spontanea et Temporalis as Communione et Parlamento negra exhibitione interius pro Reveris arrogantibus factis formis quod de jure, &c.

Of late, as appears by a Writ of Error, printed in the Lord Chief-Justice Gascoigne's second Report, Fe. 228, (and agreeable to that are all the Modern ones) that Word (Communione) is omitted.

This is only taught for an Instance, That even the highest Records, which ought to derive to us our Laws and Constitution pure and entire, have been corrupted.

And so proceeded to influence some Modern Innovations upon our Constitution, in Point of Judicature.

In December, 18 Jas. I. it appears by the Lords Journal, That an Appeal to the Lords from a Court of Equity, was by them acknowledged to be as new and unprecedented as any of the Attempts which occasion the present Conference.

How the Lords interrupted your Managers, affirming, That they were restrained from entering into Debate of their Judicature of Appeals from Equity, as foreign from the Subject Matter of the last Conference. But it was answered, and replied by your Managers, That this was Part of the Matter offered at the last Conference.

And your Managers declared,

That they had more to offer, and were ready to proceed upon the Subject Matter of the last Conference in such Manner as they thought their Duty to the Commons of England required, if their Lordships thought fit to hear them: Whereupon the Lords did rise, and broke off the Conference.

Replied, That the Proceedings of this House, in relation to the Ashby Men, committed by this House for a Breach of Privilege, and the other Proceedings of this House in that Matter, are in assistance of the ancient and undoubted Rights and Privileges of the Commons of England.

Ordered, That all the Proceedings, in relation to the Ashby Men, committed by this House, and the Report of the Lords Journal, and Reports of the Conference, and of the last Conference, be printed.

Ordered, That Mr. Spadler do appoint the printing of the said Proceedings and Reports.

The Proceeding at the Court of Queens Bench on the Habeas Corpus.

A Complaint was made to the Honourable House of Commons, That since their last Resolutions in the Cafe of Ashby and White, several Actions have been brought by J. Pate, J. Ouse, J. Pate, H. E., and D. Hare, and prosecuted by R. Alton, against the Constables of Ashby, in Breach of the Privileges of that Honourable House; whereupon they were pleased to order the Matter of the last Complaint to be heard at the Bar of their House, and ordered the Persons concerned to attend there; and appointed a Day accordingly.

The Parties appeared, (all but Alton) when the Witnesses were examined, and they severally called to the Bar of the House, and then withdrew. And, upon full hearing, the House were pleased to order their Speaker to issue out Warrants for committing those (being taken into Custody) to his Majesty's Goal of Newgate.

In Michaelmas Vacation, 1704, they prayed a Habeas Corpus upon the Statute of 31 of Chas. II. upon the Return of which, all the Judges sat; and advised, whether they were bound by that Statute, when were unanimously of Opinion that they were not; and accordingly they were remanded. And in Hilary Term following, they moved the Court of Star-chamber for a Habeas Corpus by the Commons Law, which was granted, upon the Return whereof the Judges of the Star-chamber denied the Affirmance of the rest of the Judges, Whether they might be discharged? Who were all of Opinion, except the Lord Chief-Justice Bolt, That they ought to be remanded: But it was argued in the Queen's Bench by Council, and afterwards the Judges delivered their Opinion for, Mr. Page, Mr. Mansel, Mr. Lobner, and Mr. Dowse, were Counsel for the Prisoners, and upon the reading of the Return of the Commitment, Mr. Page said, That the Writ of Habeas Corpus is a Writ grounded on Common Law, and therefore this Court can had all Persons, that by the Laws of England are bailable; that he did not say, but that the House of Commons has Privileges that belong to them, and may commit for Breach of such Privileges, that he did not now only inquire, if there be any Law for the Commitment of the Prisoners; and therefore the last Question he made was, If there was a Breach of Privilege returned? Adding, That there being no Notice in the Return, that the House of Commons has any Privilege, he needed not argue, whether they have a Power or not, to imprison Men from suing in the Queen's Court. The Lord Chief-Justice Bolt told Mr. Page, That the Question was, If they were not to take Notice of their Power, though not returned to that Court? Mr. Page answered, That though the Court would take Notice of any Power of the House, yet that not appearing in the Return, they could not judge of it, the Commitment being by the Speaker, and not by the House. The Lord Chief-Justice replying, That the Commitment was in pursuance of the Order of the House, Mr. Page submitted, That then it should be shewn to be by the House, the Speaker being in the Chair, which was not mentioned in the Commitment. But this was over-ruled by the Lord Chief-Justice, who said, that by the House, was to be understood the whole House sitting, with the Speaker in the Chair.

Mr. Mansel continued the same Objection to the Commitment, adding, That it did not appear, that the Prisoners were any ways related to the House of Commons, either as Members or Officers. That as to the Lord Star-chamber's Cafe, he was a Member; that he agreed every Court must, and have Power to keep Order among themselves, but that to take a Man out of the House, who was not of the House, nor guilty of any Breach of Privilege, for ought appeared, by a Return, he knew no Law for it; that the Cafe assigned was, because the Prisoners had been in guilty of bringing and prosecuting an Action, which he did not take to be a Crime by any known Law; that in the Cafe of the Constables of Ashby, there was a Judgment at Law justly given, which could not be got over, until some Act of Parliament interposed, and the Law being so, that a Man might bring his Action, he did not know what Cause a Man could be guilty of that acted that Law; that the Words of this Commitment were foolish, That bringing this Action is a Crime by the Declaration, is a high Contempt of the Jurisdiction, and is Breach of the House's Privilege; that they know not what the Word Declaration means, unless it did intend and signify, that Breach of the House's Privilege; that as to the Words, against the known Privileges of the House, he was as a Lord what Action is against the Privilege of the House, because they can have no Privilege against Law, and he was sure it was not against Law to bring any Action. Then he took Notice, That the Commitment was during Præfure; adding, That he had known Persons committed per Mandatum Domini Regis basili, and therefore by stronger Reason ought they to be bailed, if committed by the House of Commons.

Mr. Lobner enforced what had been alledged by the other Two, adding, That one Part of the Commitment, which for the Reasons of it, was for bringing an Action at Law, contrary to the Declaration of the House of Commons, in Opposition to which Declaration, he must oppose the Declaration of the Lords; that the Commitment being also said to be for a Contempt of the House, the Declaration of the Commons, the Lords, in the Cafe of Ashby and White, had declared against it. Then he urged, That no other Court, save that of the Lords, and the Courts at Windsor, and other inferior Courts of England, can execute any Jurisdiction, touching any Actions at Law, and that Privileges which are against the known Laws of England, are in themselves void, Another Objection, or Exception, was, That the Continuance of the Imprisonment of the Prisoners was a new Commitment; That the Habeas Corpus in the Way the Queen takes to make Disquisition about the Liberty of her Subjects, That tho' both Houses of Parliament are proper Judges of their own Privileges, yet this Court has formerly judged of their Privileges, to which Purpose he intimated in the Lord Shaftesbury's Case, whereas Notice is taken of a Case, where an Original was filed against a Member sitting in the House; and that in the Case of the Lord Hayes, the Lords Temporal and Spiritual had declared he was no Peer, yet, in this Case, when he was brought to be tried for Murder, and denied the Jurisdiction here, intussuing upon his Privilege, this Court refused to try him, and allowed his Plea. That the Lords of Parliament are the Commons of Parliament; That there is no Precedent in Parliament to appoint or commit a Man for profaneing his Inviolability of Franchise, but on the contrary, he believed, in the Rolls of Precedents there might be found a Case, where Bail had been allowed by this Court, upon a Commitment out of the House of Commons.

Mr. Davis excepted to the Return of the Commitment, alledging first, That the Warrant did not sufficiently describe the Crime; Secondly, That it did not appear, that the Party committed had Notice of the Vote or Declaration of the House of Commons, for every Man is not bound to take notice of a Vote, because it is but a temporary Thing; Thirdly, That it not appearing by his Return, that the Prisoner was a Commoner, he might, notwithstanding any thing that appeared to the contrary, be a Lord, and then it must be agreed, the Commons had no Jurisdiction: That it had been a general Commitment, without showing the Offence particularly, and said for a Breach of Privilege only, perhaps it had been a good Commitment, but here the Cause was set forth, and it appeared by the Judgment of the Lords, in the Case of Ashby and White, that was no Cause at all of Commitment; that bailing the Prisoners in this Court, did not meddle with the Privilege of the House of Commons, because, if bailed, yet they are answerable to the House, and are Prisoners in Captivitate Legis; that indeed Justices of the Peace can commit for a Riot without Bail, but this Power arises from an express Act of Parliament for that Purpose, that the Queen herself cannot commit so as to bind the Power of the Law, but this Court can in such Cases, and always have, upon good Cause shewed, bailing notwithstanding such Commitment: Concluding, upon the whole, for the Release of the Prisoners.

The Council having done pleading, the Judges proceeded to give their respective Opinions.

Mr. Justice Gaud and Justice Pryor said, They would chiefly insist upon Lex & Consuetudo Parliamenti, but they would still maintain the Form of the Warrant.

Obj. It was objected, That it is not set forth in the Return, how the House of Commons have a Power to commit.

Ans. We must take Notice of their Power without shewing it.

Obj. That this is a Commitment by the Speaker only, for that the Warrant does not run, Ordered by the Knight, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament assembled, according to the Precedent in my Lord Shaftesbury's Case, 1 Mod. 144.

Ans. That it is good, being according to their Form, and that it must be presumed, the Speaker's Warrant was by Order of the House.

Obj. There is no Seal to the Warrant, and that every Warrant ought to be under Hand and Seal, or else the Commitment is unlawful.

Ans. Courts don't use to commit by Warrant under Seal, but a Justice of Peace must; but they at the Quarter Sessions don't commit under Seal; besides, the Custom of Parliament justifies this Warrant.

Obj. This is not like my Lord Shaftesbury's Case, for he was a Member of the Lords House; also his Commitment was, for a Matter done out of the House.

Ans. Then they must never commit for Breaches of Privileges, for men are committed by others than their own Members, and for Matters out of the House.

Obj. The Duration of the Imprisonment during Pleasure, is illegal and uncertain.

Ans. This is made use of for their Advantage, for they are discharged upon the Parliament's rising; but also this Form is according to their Customs. And for Concepts to this Court we commit, without expelling for what Time, which is by Consequence during Pleasure.

Obj. This Commitment is for bringing that Action to Law, and for taking the due Course of Law.

Ans. What a Privilege, but differing with the Law? The generality of Breaches of Privileges, are for taking the due Course of Law. As to the Case of Ashby and White, that is objected, who knows whether this is the same Case? It does not appear to us to be the same, for there may be different Votes, and different Circumstances in this Case; if you go to the meaning the Words of a Commitment, Who knows that most Commitments that would hold for such, do express the Cause but shortly, and but just give a Hint: And the Law does presume, that the higher Courts do understand what they do, and therefore are not tied up to such Stridings as inferior Courts.

Obj. If this Court of Queen's-Bench can discharge a Man committed per Mandatum Parvum Regis, they may upon a Commitment by any Member or Body of People whatsoever, if not legally committed.

Ans. That Commitment is not good, because the King does not assent in Person, but hath committed all his Power Judicial, some in one Court, some in another, so that nobody is to be committed to Gaol upon the King's special Command. But what is done in Court, is of greater Authority, and the Law does adjudge it to be done by the King.

Obj. Shall the House of Commons take a discretionary Power to regulate how Actions shall be brought, and what Actions shall not be brought?

Ans. Can we suppose that High Court would lay the Progress of the Common Law of England? This highly dishonourable to have such Thoughts, and nobody does think so, nor will presume to say so; and People would laugh at one that should say, The House of Commons will take away the Liberties of the People.

There is no better Way to determine the Jurisdiction of either House of Parliament, than by Usage and Custom, so the Bounds of Parliaments are. That there is no Precedent or Case, nor so much as an Opinion extant, that the Courts of Westminster-Hall have a Power to judge of the Authority of the House of Commons, or that the Orders and Commitment of the House of Commons can be discharged in Westminster-Hall, nor ever before attempted to be discharged here, upon such a Commitment by the House of Commons; which is a good Argument, according to my Lord Cab's Rule, that we want Power to do it.

'Twould be impossible for us to judge of the Privileges of the House of Commons, for there are no printed Books of their Privileges, nor are there any Means by which we can attain to the Knowledge of them, but their Customs and Privileges are kept as Arms in the Library of the House of Commons, and their Privileges depend altogether upon Precedents in Parliament; they do judge it is a Contempt of the House of Commons, And who shall say nay? They are proper Leges of the Matter, and upon the Return, it appearing they were committed by the House of Commons, our Jurisdiction ceases; and cited Frydew's Annotations, fol. 4. and the King alledging St. John Ellis, and others, in Gr. Lib. 181. (Ant. Vol. VII. p. 232, 233) That upon a Writ of Error in this Case, so the House of Lords, it was resolved, That this Court hath no Jurisdiction of a Misdemeanour committed in Parliament.

Mr. Justice Parson. That this is a Case of the highest Consequence, for it concerns the Privileges of the House of Commons, the Liberties of the Subject, and the Jurisdiction of this Court; for the first Custom of this Nature, for the Lord Shaftesbury was a Member of the House, and there may be a greater Jurisdiction in some Cases over their own Members, than over Strangers: However, they had not any Authority upon the Return, for they are committed by another Law than we proceed by; and to be committed by one Law, and to judge of the Commitment here by another Law, would be a strange Thing: For the House don't commit by the Authority of the Common Law, but by another Law, Leges & Consuetudines Parliamenti; for there are in England several other Laws, besides the Common Law, viz. the Ecclesiastical Law, the Admiralty Law, &c. and then the Law and Customs of Parliament, where they have particular Laws and Customs for their Durections.

To late Judicature will help to clear this Case. The House of Lords have a Power so judge by the Common Law, but not Originally, and so that Reason it is provided by the Constitution, for the Judges to give their Assistance, which they are bound to do. But they have another Law, viz. Lex & Consuetudo Parliamenti, which the Judges are not to assist in, or give any Opinion; and I dare say, the House of Lords would take it ill, should they assent or advise therein, for they have their Privileges in their own Rules and Books.

That the Commons have also a Judicature, not by the Common Law, but so judge of Breaches of Privileges, and Consuetudes to their House, secundum Legem & Consuetudinem Parliamenti, 4 Inst. 23. and by this Law these Persons are committed, and now are brought to be discharged by the Common Law. The Resolution of the Commons upon the Breach of Privileges is a Judgment, and the Commitment an Execution of it, which cannot be controlled; for this would be to draw it out of aliquid Examinis, and then the Commons would not be supreme Judges of their own Privileges.

That the Resolution in the House of Lords, in the Case of Ashby and White, does not bind the House of Commons, nor determine their Privileges, for they judge of the Privileges of the Commons as an Incident to the Action, and one Court may judge of a Matter within the Jurisdiction of another Court, when without it they cannot determine. The Case before them is by this Court may of Admiralty, or Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, if the Question arises in an Action depending in this Court. But such a Determination will not bind another Court, which has an original Cognizance of that Matter, as an Ecclesiastical now depending in the Common Pleas, the general Issue pleaded, and a special Verdict; the Question there is, If a Quaker's Marriage be good? Now if it should be held in that Court a void Marriage, and the Judgment should be affirmed in this Court, and upon a Writ of Error in the House of Lords, it might be reversed, that would not bind the Ecclesiastical Court, but they might proceed there for Incontestancy; and if they should proceed there to Excommunication, finding it a void Marriage, and the Party taken by the Excommunicationis Cognoscere should bring the Malice Copios upon the Return of it, we could not discharge him. But this is a Matter originally sitting in Parliament.

That this Court may keep other inferior Courts within their Jurisdictions, but not the House of Commons; for no Prohibition was ever granted to that Court, though they exceeded Jurisdiction. So if the House of Lords do exceed, or take Cognizance of Matters in the first Instance, no Prohibition would lie; for no inferior Court can prohibit a superior: And no Prohibition was needed here, nor could we have granted it; for the House of Commons is superior to all ordinary Courts of Law. When the House of Lords took Cognizance, and proceeded upon the Petition of my Lord Warham, complaining of an Order of the Court of Exchequer, for filing the Record of a Survey of the Honour of River, and of Landship of Bedfordshire, which the House of Commons, upon the Petition of Sir Batley, complaining of this Proceeding, Jan. 28. 1704. Refused to be without Precedent, and unwarrantable, and too big to the subverting all the Rights and Properties of the Commons of England as an illegal and arbitrary Power. They also Resolved then, That it is the undoubted Right of all the Subjects of England to make use of the Record; as they ought by Law to have done, before the said Proceeding of the House of Lords. Lord's Præf.

In a Just. go. It doth not belong to the Judges to judge of any Law, Privileges, or Customs of Parliament; for the Lords, Customs, Liberties, and Privileges of the Parliament, are better to be secured out of the Rolls of Parliament, and other Records, and by Precedent and continual Experience, than can be expected by any one Man's Power.

In a Just. Every Court of Justice hath Laws and Customs for its Direction; some by the Common Law, some by the Civil and Canon Law, some by particular Laws and Customs, in the High Court of Parliament pro propriis Legibus & Consuetudinibus fol. 181. That Judges ought not to give any Opinion of a Matter of Parliament, because it is

The Law given Jurisdiction in the House of Lords, and the Law given to the Jurisdiction of the House of Commons.

That the Ecclesiastical Courts exceed their Jurisdiction, a Prohibition will lie; and even the King's writ, contrary to Law, are void.

He insisted that the Lord Bishop's Case was a great Authority for him.

He petitioned the House of Lords to sit, and also to have the King's Leave. The Lords determined he was not a Lord; yet when he was brought upon an Indictment by the Name of Charles Kemler, Esq. he here pleaded, and insisted, that he was a Peer; which Plea was allowed, and he was not tried.

That the Lord Chief Justice was so clear in his Judgment, yet the other three Judges being of a contrary Opinion, the Majority prevailed; and the first three were condemned to Amputation.

Mr. Leveson moved, That the Judgment might be entered upon Record.

Lord Chief Justice Hall asked the Clerk of the Crown, How they entered the Judgment in their Cases? Who answered, That they never make up any Roll, but only enter a Remembrance generally upon the Book of the Writ. Lord Chief Justice Hall told him, That of right he ought to make up a Roll, (and as he was informed he had the Fees allowed for making up the roll), and then bid the Counsel come to his Chambers, and bring Precedents; and afterwards the Judgment was entered in this Manner.

The Judgment: Stylis Capiti's Cause Capiti & alii v. Dantem pro d. et al. per amicos et Curiam Domini regis, sua Remission.

Upon the Commitment of these five Abolition Men, and their being remanded to Newgate again, the House of Lords drew up the following Representation and Address, viz.

The Humble Representation and Address of the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, presented to her Majesty the fourteenth Day of March, 1704, and her Majesty's most Gracious Answer thereto: With their Lordships' Thanks for the same. Together with the Petition annexed to the said Address, and laid before her Majesty.

Do. Mem. 13. Martii, 1704.

WE your Majesty's most Dutiful and Loyal Subjects, the Lord-Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, are under an unavoidable Necessity of making our humble Application to your Majesty, upon an Occasion, which, as it is very grievous to us, so we fear it may be equally so to your Majesty: But the Proceedings of the House of Commons, in relation to five Burgesses of the Town of Abolition, John Pate, John Ouse, John Pate, Henry Boff, and David Howe, have been to us very extraordinary, and the Consequences of such Proceedings may prove so fatal to the Proprieties and Liberties of the People of England, and indirectly tend to the Interruption of the Course of Justice, to the eluding the Jurisdiction of Parliament, and to the Domination of your Royal Prerogative, that we cannot answer it to your Majesty, to the Kingdom, and to ourselves, without setting them before you in a due Light.

One Matthew Abdy, a Burgess of the Borough of Abolition, brought an Action upon the Case at Common Law, against the Constables of the Town of Abolition (being the proper Officers to return Members to serve in Parliament for that Place) for having, by contrivance, fraudulently and unlawfully hindered him to give his Vote at an Election.

In this Action a Verdict was found for him; but Judgment was given against him in your Majesty's Court. Quod Absque, which was reversed upon a Writ of Error brought in Parliament, where he obtained Judgment to recover his Damages for the Injury, and afterwards had Execution upon that Judgment.

The said Matthew Abdy being a Burgess of the same Borough, and having (as they conceived) had the like Wrong done them by the Constables there, and supposing the Law to be equally open to all Abolition, did lawfully commence and prosecute Actions against those Officers, in order to recover their Damages.

And for to doing, they were sent for to the Bar of the House of Commons, and committed Prisoners to Newgate, the fifth Day of December last, during the Pleasure of the House of Commons, as having acted contrary to the Declaration, in Contempt of the Jurisdiction, and a Breach of the Privileges of that House.

These Proceedings are wholly new and unprecedented. It is the Birthright of every Englishman, who apprehends himself to be injured, to seek for Redress in your Majesty's Courts of Justice. And if there be any Person who cannot seek that Right, and can procure what he shall, and when he shall not be allowed the Benefit of the Law, he ceases to be a Freeman, and his Liberty and Property are precarious.

The Crown lays Claim to too much Power, and we are sure the Law has trusted no such Authority with any Subjects whatsoever.

If a Man makes his Oath, in swearing himself to be a good Subject of State, when he has not, if he makes for Court, by applying to an incompetent Jurisdiction, he will fall of Relief, and be made liable to Costs, but to no other Punishment: He is not guilty of a Crime, nor is it a Contempt of the Court that he proper Jurisdiction.

But such Men were guilty of no Misdemeanor, the Power of Law was seized by the Judgment of that Court, which is allowed to be the last Resort; and they will continue to be the Law, till it be altered by the Law-Enforcing Authority. They fear their Neighbour quietly and lawfully reap the Fruit of the Judgment he had obtained, and yet, for pursuing the true Remedy, they are condemned to an indefinite Imprisonment, during the Pleasure of the House of Commons.

This Method does introduce an Uncertainty and Confusion never before known in England. The most arbitrary Governments cannot thus make such Influence of Partiality and Oppression.

The Power of Law is infinitely small; and yet the House of Commons take upon them to punish Men by Imprisonment, for such a daring to have the Benefit of what is established by Law.

We humbly observe to your Majesty, That the fifth Thing they alleged in the Warrant of Commitment, as the Offence of these five Persons, is, That those Actions were brought contrary to a Declaration of the House of Commons.

It was never yet heard, (when there was a House of Lords in being, and a King or Queen upon the Throne) that the House of Commons should challenge a Power, by any Declaration of theirs, to alter the Law, or to restrain the People of England from taking the Benefit of it; nor have their Declarations, any such Authority, as to oblige Men to submit to them at the peril of their Liberty.

If they have such a Power in such Cases, they may apply it to all Cases they please; for when the Law is no longer the Measure, Will and Pleasure will be the only Rule.

The Certainty of our Laws is that which makes the chief Felicity of Englishmen. But if the House of Commons can alter the Laws by their Declarations, or (which is the same thing) can deprive Men of their Liberty, if they do not as they take the Benefit of them, we shall have no longer Reason to boast of our Part of our Constitution.

The next thing alleged in the Warrant is, That the commencing and prosecuting these Actions was a Contempt of the Jurisdiction of the House of Commons.

Such a Jurisdiction was never claimed by the House of Commons, (in any this Occasion) and it is this Novelties is a Jurisdiction founded on their own Authority of Declaration, they will stand and tall together.

The House of Commons have for a long time exercised a Jurisdiction over their own Members, by allowing or disallowing their Elections, as they saw Cause. But they have never before entertained a Notion, That they had a Jurisdiction over their Electors, to determine (finally and exclusively of all other Court) the particular Rights of those to whom they owe their Being.

Your Majesty's Royal Writ commands, That the several Electors make choice of Persons to represent them in Parliament, in order to do and consent to such things as should be ordained there, relative to the Peace and Defence of the Kingdom, and the Honour, which the Parliament is called: And they thus sit in Council, in proceeding to elect Members for the Parliament thus summoned, but under the Writ which requires them to elect, nor the Indemnity by which the Return is made, impose any thing whereby it may be affected, that the Electors put into the Power of their Representatives their several Rights of Election, to be finally disposed of at their Pleasure.

It was as inserted voted in them by Law before the Election, and which the Law will preserve to them, to be exercised again as in the like Manner, when your Majesty shall be pleased to call another Parliament.

It was not possible for the Election to succeed, that such a Pretence would ever be set up by their Representatives, when in the Courts of Justice the House of Commons had never taken upon them to try or determine the Right of any particular Election, unless incidentally, and only in order to decide a Question, of the Title of some Member of their own House to sit amongst them.

The Right of Election is a legal Interest incident to the Freehold, or founded upon Custom, or the Letters Patentes of your Majesty's Royal Ancestors, or upon particular Acts of Parliament, and must be tried and determined like other legal Interests. And this Consideration does manifestly show the Absurdity of pretending, That such Rights can be decided by the House of Commons, when it is rather a Power of administering Justice, in order to do what the Truth, not a Power of giving Damages, which is the only Reparation the Elector is capable of receiving, as such a Case. Therefore, if the Electors, when they are deprived of their Rights, have no Place to resort to, but the House of Commons, the Right of Election would be a Right without a Remedy, which indeed is no Right at all.

And it is put into the Power of the Officers, who have the Return of Members to take in Parliament, to reject the Votes of as many Electors as they please, without being liable to make any Reparation in Damages to the Parties, which is a Notion not very likely to preserve the Freedom and Impartiality of Elections.

The third thing alleged is, that these Men in the Warrant of Commitment is, That by bringing these Actions they have broken the Privileges of the House of Commons.

A Breach of the Privileges of Parliament is certainly a great Offence; and, of all others, the House of Lords ought to be the last that should go about to lessen or excise it, as having a little Interest with the Commons as the Preservers of the Privileges of Parliament.

But however it might from the Interest of the Lords to be silent, while the House of Commons are setting a-foot new Pretences of Privilege, because they may share in the Advantage, yet we think it our Duty and our Interest to do all we can to preserve the Constitution entire, and not to sit quiet when we see Innovation attempted, which tend to the Diminution of the Rights of the Crown, or of the Privileges of the subject: Because the best and surest way to preserve the original Privileges of Parliament, is to abide by those that are ancient and known, and it is not in the Power of either, or both Houses, to create new Privileges to themselves.

It never was thought a Breach of the Privileges of Parliament, nor prosecuted as Actions against any Men who were so concerned in Privileges of Parliament, and therefore, since the late Constables of Abolition had no Title to Privilege of Parliament, at the Time when these Actions were commenced or prosecuted, we cannot imagine upon what Foundation the pursuing these Actions are by such a Breach of Privilege by the House of Commons.

It seems very necessary it should be known upon what Rule this Pretence is grounded, That the People of England may be at a Certainty,

* Do. Mem. 13. Martii. It is ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, That the Petition presented and Addressed this Day presented to her Majesty, with the Majesty's most Gracious Answer thereto, and the Petition of Abolition, and laid before her Majesty, shall be forthwith printed and, as before, ...

and for some Limits set to the Claims of Privilege. To seek the truth, it has been said, There are privileged Cases, as well as privileged Persons, but no Instance has been produced, whereby this Distinction can be applied to justify such Commitments.

Actions at Common Law have been brought upon false Returns and double Returns of Members to serve in Parliament, as in the Cases of Earl of Bernersham and Mr. Oxley, which proceeded to Judgment, and a Writ of Error was brought in one of them, and the Plaintiffs could not prevail in either of their Suits, and yet it was never pretended, that the committing or prosecuting those Actions was a Breach of Privilege of Parliament, nor were the Persons concerned in them assigned it or criminalised, tho' there was a much greater Calumny for such Pretence in those Cases, because the Question there directly concerned the Right of sitting in Parliament; and consequently that would have been almost proved against Cases, if any such Distinction had been once thought of in those Days: Whereas in the Actions brought by these five Members, neither the Plaintiffs nor Defendants were Members of Parliament, nor did the Actions relate in any manner to the Right of sitting there.

The Question of the House of Commons at that time was very different from what it is now.

When the Judgment of the King's Bench (where Mr. Matthew Holt sat then Chief Justice) which passed in favour of Sir Samuel Bernersham, the House of Commons was immediately, was received in the Exchequer-Chamber, the House of Commons was so far from thinking it for their Advantage, to have their Members deprived of the Benefit of the Common Law, that in the Year 1704 a Committee was appointed to enquire touching the reviving that Judgment, and by what Procurement and Solicitation, and by what Ways and Means the same was revived, and the Names of the particular Judges that were concerned: And when afterwards that Judgment in the Exchequer-Chamber was affirmed in Parliament, the House of Commons never thought themselves secure against the Corruptions of the Officers who were to take the Poll, and make Return at Elections, all they hadgot an Act in the seventh and eighth Years of the late King, which gave a Remedy in Writs of Habeas Corpus for false and double Returns: The Issue contained were then in their own hands with the Jurisdiction of the House of Commons, and the Remedy to be laid there, which now they feverely contend their Elders should instantly acquiesce in: And we cannot but think it manifest Partiality in those Gentlemen, to go about by such violent Means to deprive their Elders of recovering of Damages, when they are wronged in being deprived of giving Votes, since they thought it necessary for themselves to have that Advantage when they are injured in their own Elections.

The Sufferings of these unfortunate Men have not ended here, and the Rights of the free-born Subjects of England have received a further and no less dangerous Wound in their Person.

These five Men having endured a long and chargeable Imprisonment, and departing of their Liberty any other way, were advised to sue out Writs of Habeas Corpus remarkable in their Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench, hoping to obtain their Discharge by the Help of that Court, where the Judgment ought to be given according to the Laws of the Land, without regard to any Votes or Declarations, or Commands to the contrary: But this Endeavour proved unsuccessful, and they were remanded to Newgate by three of the Judges of that Court, contrary to the Opinion of the Lord Chief Justice Holt.

We shall not presume to offer any Opinion to your Majesty, upon Occasion of this Judgment, at present, because it is not regularly brought before the House: And we only mention it, because the House of Commons took such offence at the bringing these Writs of Habeas Corpus upon the twenty-fourth of February last, they voted, That whoever had uttered, pronounced, pronounced, or assisted in the Prosecution of such Writs, were Disturbers of the Peace of the Kingdom, and had endeavoured, as far as in them lay, to overthrow the Rights and Privileges of the Commons in Parliament.

This is a heavy Charge; and if it be to criminal a thing for a Professor to pray a Habeas Corpus, it does not only affect those who are at present concerned, but ought to touch every Commoner of England in the most insensible manner.

Liberty of Person is of all Rights the most valuable; and of which, above all other things, the Law of England is most tender, and has guarded with the greatest Care, having provided Writs of several kinds, for the Relief of Men restrained of their Liberty upon any Pretence, or by any Power whatsoever; that in every Case they may have some Place to retire to, where an Account may be taken of the Reason and Manner of the Imprisonment, and the Subject may find a proper Relief according to his Case.

No Crime whatsoever does put an Englishman into miserable a Condition, that he may not endeavour, in the Methods of Law, to obtain his Liberty; that he may sue, by his Friends and Agents, for out a Habeas Corpus, and have the Assistance of Solicitors and Counsel to plead his Cause before the Court where it is to be brought.

The Court is bound by the Law to assign him Counsel, if there be Occasion, and to give Judgment upon his Case, as it stands upon the Return of the Habeas Corpus, and to reward, discharge, or bail the Prisoners, as the Cause of his Commitment appears there: Inoffensive in Parliament in Law; and if what is alleged as the Cause of Imprisonment appears to be no Crime in Law, it is not the Authority of those who made the Commitment that can oblige that Court for remanding the Prisoner.

This is the Law of England. But according to these Resolutions of the House of Commons, a Man has the Undisputed [tho' through Ignorance or Mistake] to do an Act which shall be voted a Breach of Privilege, he becomes in a worse Condition than any Felon or Traitor; his Commitment makes it impossible for him in Person to solicit and procure a Habeas Corpus, and if any have Charms enough to assist him, or to plead for him, in order to draw to the Court the Inefficiency of the Commitment in Manner of Law, they become liable to lose their own Liberty, and are involved in the same Guilt of Breach of Privilege: So that let the Imprisonment be upon the most trifling Occasion imaginable, if it be by Order of the House of Commons, every Commoner is still subject to it without Redress; no Friends can help them, no other Power can deliver them, till your Majesty shall put an End to that.

The Lords have as yet a Concern, the House of Commons can have, to maintain the Authority, and keep up the Awe of Parliamentary Commitments: And they will always do so, as far as Justice and the Usage of Parliaments will allow.

There have been Cases, particularly that of the Earl of Shaftesbury, where Persons committed by the House of Lords, even Members of that House, have sued out Writs of Habeas Corpus, and got a Writ of Error of their Court, tho' there have been brought before the Court of King's Bench, and their Counsel have been heard on their behalf: And yet no Confine ever put upon them for their Endeavour to obtain that Liberty, or upon their Agents, Solicitors, or Counsel.

The House of Commons, formerly assisted with more Effect, were to sue an Order in, as the Liberty of the Subject, but in the Year 1704, when a Writ of Habeas Corpus was served upon the persons who were attending the House of Commons, in the behalf of Mr. Shaftesbury, who was committed by Order of that House, and the House was made sensible of that, that such a Writ was served upon their Officers, and that it was not to be despised, but to put any Confine upon the Persons concerned in procuring the Writ, or in appearing, in behalf of the Prisoner, but left the Benefit of a Writ of Liberty to obey the Command of the Habeas Corpus, which he had accordingly, by carrying his Prisoner before the Judge, when the Habeas Corpus was returnable.

The House of Commons have in former Ages shown a great and steady Concern for the Freedom of the Persons of their Fellow-Subjects: And upon their Persons many excellent Laws have been made to protect Liberty against all unlawful Restraints by any Authority, even that of the Crown: But now it is nullified, That such open Imprisonments are out of the Reach of those Laws, and their Legality not so to be examined.

In the third Year of the Reign of your Royal Grandfather, the House of Commons sent a noble Petition to the English Parliament and in order, by undoubted Evidence, that the Causes of the Imprisonment shall be explicated in all Cases, that it might appear, in the Mouth of the Habeas Corpus, whether they were sufficient in point of Law. Idem Pl. VII. P. 126, 127.

It could not then have been imagined, That the Sentences of the Men would ever have proceeded to an order to detain and detain a Power of depriving their Fellow-Subjects of their Liberty, or that it be criminal to much as to enquire into the Validity of those Sentences.

There is another Occasion of Offence, which in House of Commons have taken against John Pryn and John Oxley, two of that Prisoners, who thinking themselves wronged in their being remanded to Newgate, by the Opinion of the major Number of the Judges of the Court at Queen's Bench, humbly petitioned your Majesty for a Writ of Error, in order to bring the Judgment before your Majesty in Parliament. And if it is in the Subject a matter concluded by any Judgment, till he comes to the full Report made by the Law in this Case.

The House of Commons being informed of their Petition, came to a Resolution, which they laid before your Majesty, That the Commitments of that House were not examinable in any other Court whatsoever, That no Writ of Error lay in this Case; and that as they had expended their Duty to your Majesty as great Dispatch to the supplies, for they had an entire Confidence in your Majesty, That you would not give leave for the bringing any Writ of Error.

The full Petition on the Vote is very great, and the Consequences of it are plain; if the Commitments of the House of Commons are examinable in no other Place, then no Man in England can be committed; however, it secures of his Liberty longer than the Habeas Corpus can; and Men may be allowed as well to wish that it were not so, the Law may have a very high Opinion of the Justice of that House.

It has been held as an undeniable Maxim, That whoever executes an illegal Command to the Prejudice of his Fellow-Subjects, must be answerable for it to the Party grieved.

Let it be supposed then, That an Adieu of false Imprisonment was brought against the Sergeant of the House of Commons, and that the Sergeant justifies his taking the Plaintiff into Custody, by virtue of a Warrant of that House, and it appears upon the Face of the Warrant, That the Cause of the Commitment was no Crime in Law, and the Plaintiff demands, what must the Judge do for a Case? Will it be possible for them to avoid examining into the Commitment, and to give Judgment one way or another? Or can it be pretended, That a Writ of Error may not be brought upon such a Judgment? And yet the Court, before which the Writ of Error is brought, under a Necessity to do it three times, as the Law requires?

As to the second thing they have taken upon them to assert, That no Writ of Error lies in this Case, we admit of your Majesty with great Assurance, That by our Constitution the House of Commons have no Right or Pretence to determine whether that be a Crime or not. The Way of judging when a Writ of Error is properly brought, is by Law and not by the Court, to which the Writ of Error is directed; and then the Court shall not at present take any thing to your Majesty as an extraordinary matter, and before the proper Time, as to that Point, Whether a Writ of Error brought upon a Judgment for remanding Prisoners upon a Habeas Corpus can be maintained.

Which way that Question will be decided hereafter, who the Writs of Error are returned into the Parliament, is not at all material, in respect to the Petitions of the Prisoners which now lie before your Majesty. For unless your Majesty be pleased to grant the Writs of Error according to their Prayer, the Matter cannot come to the proper Decision in Parliament, and Justice will be manifestly obfuscated.

Whether the Writs of Error ought to be granted, and what ought to be done upon the Writs of Error afterwards, are very different Things.

to bring Liberty and Property into the National and infallible Gales of the Lords Judicature, and with direct Reproaches, as to the Manner in which that Judicature has been exercised, and in the most contemptuous Way told us they wished to mention the Influence, because they hoped we would reform.

We desire no other Judge but your Majesty, how such a Treatment of us becomes their Gentleness; and we dare appeal to all your Subjects, for Witness of the unprosecutable Manner of administering Justice in the House of Lords.

We hope the great Disaffection the House of Commons has conceived against us may prove of some real Service, and of useful Caution to your Majesty, for it has drawn them directly to arm (what was too visible before), that they were among us from Power, and a larger Share of the Administration than it could with them be the Nature of our Government. They directly complained, That by the Constitution the Judicature, in the last Resort, was not placed in the same Hands with the Legislature; though they cannot think it to be in any Country where the Government is not arbitrary, and the Prince's Will the Law. They have been long endeavouring to break in upon the Lords Share in the Legislature, of which we could mention too many Instances to your Majesty. From an antient Claim, These Aids to the Crown are to begin in the House of Commons, and that the Lords could not alter the Sum, they have of late Years pretended (but without any Reason, and against the known Usage of Parliaments), that we could make no Alterations in any Parts of a Money-Bill, though it have no Relation to the Money. And upon that Foot, when they have had a Mind to get any thing passed into a Law, of the Irregularities of which they have been desirous to convince the Lords, they have talked it to a Money-Bill, in order to put the Crown and the Lords under that unhappy Necessity, either to agree to a Law they might think prejudicial to the Publick, or to take the Money, which perhaps, at that Time, was absolutely necessary to the saving the Kingdom.

By this Method they assume to themselves the whole Legislative Authority, taking, in effect, the Negative Voice from the Crown, and depriving the Lords of the Right of deliberating upon what is for the Good of the Kingdom: For this Reason the Lords had, on a very solemn Manner, refused never to suffer such Impudence for the future, lest the Importance of the Bill be never so great. This Resolution was well known, and yet in this present Session (as appears by the printed Votes of the Twenty-eighth of November last) a great Number of the Gentlemen of the House of Commons, to the manifest Danger of disappointing the Supplies of the Year, which must have been the Ruin of the whole Confederacy, and delivering up of Europe into the Hands of France, made an Attempt to tack to the Land-Tax a Bill which had been rejected in two preceding Sessions of Parliament.

Thus the House of Commons have formerly for on Foot several Attempts against that Share in the Legislature which is placed in the Lords: But this is the first Time they have published their Desire to be let into the Judicature of Parliament.

Whatever they would assume upon this Occasion, we desire not to meddle with the Choice of the Commons Representatives; we willingly leave that Matter where it is: And in what Manner it is conducted them, how impartially, and how finally, is so well known by Experience to most Parts of the Kingdom, and so universally understood, that the People will be extremely desirous their Estates and Properties should be subject to such Determinations.

It is not strange the free Conference ended without Success, when the Commons came to it with such a Temper as appears by the Votes of the Eighth of March, made after they themselves had confined to the free Conference: If these Votes had been published soon enough, it would have fully convinced the Lords how vain a Thing it was to confer with them further upon the Matters in Debate at the former Conferences: For not content with what they had done before, upon Information that their Serjeant had been forced with two Writs of Habeas Corpus, submitted before the Lord-Keeper, in Behalf of Mr. Montague and Mr. Davies, two of the Gentlemen who had been of Counsel with the five Prisoners, they came on a Resolution, that no Commencer, committed by them for Breach of Privilege, or Contempt of the House, ought to be, by Habeas Corpus, made to appear before any other Judge, and request their Serjeant to make no Return, or yield any Obedience to these Writs; and that for such Refusal he had the Protection of the House of Commons.

It has been always held the undoubted Privilege of the Crown to have an Account of the Reason why any Subject is deprived of Liberty, and it has ever been allowed, That by the known Common Law it is the Right of every Subject under Release, upon Demand, to have the Writ of Habeas Corpus, and thereupon to be brought before some proper Court, where it may be examined, whether he be detained for a lawful Cause: And the Statutes made in the Reign of your Royal Grandfather, and your Royal Uncle, have enabled, That in all Cases Writs of Habeas Corpus be granted and obeyed by the respective Officers upon great Penalties.

But these Votes import a direct Repudiation of these Laws, and so all Persons committed by the House of Commons.

It is no longer worth disputing, Whether a Person committed by them, though for a Fact which appears to be both lawful and necessary, may be delivered by any Court; for by this new Law he shall never be brought thither, and the Serjeant is not only warranted, but commanded openly to condemn your Majesty's Royal Writs of Habeas Corpus, brought upon the Act of the One-and-thirtieth of King Charles the Second, which is an Assertion of your Privileges, never before upon great Penalties.

Your Majesty does not claim an Authority to proceed any of your Officers for disobeying a known Law. The Habeas Corpus Act, in Times of imminent and visible Danger, was in the late Reign suspended by Acts of Parliament for some short Time, and yet (so placed was that Law held) that those Acts passed with great Reluctancy, and one of the Arguments that prevailed most for agreeing to that Temporary Suspension was, That it would be an unanswerable Evidence to all future Times, that this Act could never be suspended afterwards by any left Authority than that of the whole Legislature: But we live to see a House of Commons take upon them to suspend this Law by a Vote.

Vol. VII.

They Ordered, That the Lord-Keeper of your Great Seal should be acquainted with their Resolutions, to the End the Writs of Habeas Corpus may be superseded, as contrary to Law and the Privileges of their House. They are contrary to no Law, but that of their Votes, which fairly are none of the Lords the Lord-Keeper was sworn to observe. But yet he is to act as his Feil. They have ordered this Law to be published to him by their Clerk.

The Lord-Keeper is a Contemner, and if he disobey, 'tis a Breach of Privilege; and if they should carry it so far, as to order him into Calais, he may keep, but is not to have, Relief from any other Court.

We humbly beg Pardon of your Majesty for this long and melancholy Representation, which we could not avoid, without being guilty of Treachery to your Majesty, and to our native Country. The five Persons immediately concerned are but poor Men; but we well know your Majesty's Justice and Compassion extends itself to the meanest of your Subjects.

The Matters in Dispute are of the highest Consequence: Your Majesty's Privilege, the Reverence due to Laws, and the Liberties and Properties of all the People of England are concerned and at Stake, if their Encroachments prevail.

We do not pretend to facilitate your Majesty to put it Stop to their Innovations, your own Wisdom will suggest the most proper Methods: We have endeavoured to do our Duty, in laying the whole Matter before you.

We humbly beg Leave so far to relate what has been said, as to prefer your Majesty's stout View of the unhappy Confusion of facts of your Subjects as have Right of giving Votes for choosing Members to serve in Parliaments, which has been hitherto thought a great and valuable Privilege; but by the late Proceedings of the House of Commons is likely to be made only a dangerous Snare to them, in case they who may be hitherto chosen to serve in Parliament shall think fit to pursue the Methods of this present House of Commons.

If they refuse from making Use of their Right in giving their Votes, they are wanting in their Duty to their Country, by not doing their Parts towards the choosing such Representatives as will use their Trust for the Good of the Kingdom, and not for the Oppression of their Fellow-Subjects.

If the Officer who has the Right of taking the Suffrages refuse to admit them to give their Votes, they must either sit down by it, and submit to be wrongfully and maliciously deprived of their Rights; or if they bring their Affairs at Law, in order to assert their Rights, and recover Damages for the Injury (as all other injured Men may do in like Cases), they become liable to indefinite Imprisonment, by incurring the Disfigurement of those who are elected.

If, being thus imprisoned, they seek their Liberty by Habeas Corpus, (the known Remedy of all other Subjects) they do not only put their own Chans at Risk, but bring all their Friends and Agents, their Solicitors and Counsel into the same Misfortune with themselves.

If they think themselves to have received Injury by the Judgment upon the Habeas Corpus, and seek Relief by Writ of Error, (the known Relief of those who suffer by any wrong Judgment) all that ask them is that Matter are liable to lose their Liberties for it, and they themselves will be removed to new Prisons, in order to avoid the Justice of the Law.

We humbly conclude with acquainting your Majesty, That we have been informed, by the Persons of two of the Prisoners, that they have been long delayed (though they have made their Applications in due manner for Writs of Error): We are under a new-fangled Obligation, for the Use of Justice, and asserting the Judicature of Parliament, to make this humble Address to your Majesty, That no Importance of the House of Commons, nor any other Consideration whatever, may prevail with your Majesty to suffer a Step to be put to the known Course of Justice, but that you will be pleased to give effectual Orders for the immediate issuing of the Writs of Error.

Die Martii 14 Martii, 1704.

Her Majesty's most Gracious ANSWER to the ADDRESS.

MY LORDS,

I should have granted the Writ of Error desired in this Address, had I found an adequate Supply of putting on immediate End to this Affair, I am sensible there could have been no further Proceeding up to that Matter.

Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the humble Thanks of this House be presented to Her Majesty, for Her most Gracious Answer, in which She has expressed great Regard to the Justice of this House, so much Compassion to the Prisoners, and such Tenderness to the Rights of the Subject.

The same Day the Queen came to the House, and put an End to the Session, and the Lord-Keeper prorogued the Parliament to Twelfth the First of May, which put an End to this Affair.

The Substance of what was offered by the Lords, at the Fifth and Second Conferences with the Commons, being already printed in the Proceedings of the Commons, and Page 148, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, in 130 Resolves it is not here again inserted.

Some of the Arguments that were made use of by the Lords in their Debates, and at the free Conference, to maintain their own Regulations, and answer the Objections of the Commons.

The House of Commons made an Objection to the Manner in which the Lords proceeded at the first Conference: They said, They had anticipated all Debates, by determining upon the Regulations, whereas this is the proper and ordinary Method of Proceedings between the two Houses: When one House has formed an Opinion, they communicate it to the other, to the End that if it be found reasonable, it may be approved; or, if upon Examination it be thought the Carriage of the Dispute may be therein better to convince the other House of their Mistake.

The Second Objection made to the Manner of the Lords Proceedings was, That the Regulations were grounded upon the Petitions of Criminals.

Z

minds, who had fallen under the just Displeasure of the Commons, and upon a printed Paper sent regularly before the House of Lords.

As to the first Part of the Objection, the Lords did (as just Judges always do) consider the Matter of the Petition, and not the Persons of the Petitioners. And as to the second Part, the Lords said, The printed Paper mentioned by the Commons, was the Vote of the House of Commons, of the 24th of February, signed by the Speakers. If the Commons had disowned that Paper, there had been some Weight in this Objection, but if they think it regular to print and publish their Votes to the People, the Lords will always think it regular to take Notice, and make Use of those Papers as they see Occasion; and it seemed strange for the Commons to object to the taking Notice of their Votes, when the only Colour they have hitherto pretended for their first Displeasure at the five Petitions, was, That they did not take Notice of some Votes of theirs, (which they call their Declaration) made during their last Session. And the printing their Votes is the only Method they have yet taken, for the Promulgation of the new Laws they take upon them to make.

The Lords had no Occasion to say any thing in Defence of their first Resolution, because the Commons did not think fit to avow in Words, That they had a Power to create new Privileges by their Votes, though they have manifestly attempted it in Practice, and particularly in the Case of the five Petitions.

As to the unjust Resolutions which the Commons made upon the House of Lords, as if they had entertained original Causes, and were guilty of some encroachment in hearing Appeals from Courts of Equity;

The Lords avowed their Claim of a Jurisdiction, in hearing and determining Appeals from Courts of Equity, and could shew a continued Exercise of it, since ancient times; the Determination of Elections in the House of Commons, which yet the Lords do not go about to call in Question; But they deny their having meddled with any original Causes, or that the Case particularly mentioned by the Commons was at all of that Nature.

The Lords did not understand what the Commons meant, by saying, The Lords had founded their second Resolution upon an extraordinary Vote. The Judgment in the Case of Abbey and Hyde was given with great Deliberation, and founded upon undeniable Reason and unquestionable Authorities: And the Lords considered far in that Matter, as to direct the State of that Case, and the Grounds of that Judgment, to be drawn up and printed.

2. The second Resolution of the Lords consists of two Assertions: That every Man who apprehends himself to be injured, has a Right to seek Redress by Action at Law.

Secondly, That the prosecuting Actions at the Common Law, against any Person, not entitled to Privilege of Parliament, is no Breach of Privileges.

What the Commons objected to the Universality of the first Part of their Resolution, as if it would destroy all Definitions of Courts, and make a Confusion of Jurisdictions, did arise only upon a plain Mistake. The Lords mentioned Actions in general, without confining what they said to Actions at Common Law, or affirming that Actions for all Sorts of Injuries may be brought in any one Court.

As to the Intimation, that the Lords had no other Aim than to extend their own Jurisdiction, by the seeming Regard and Tenderness they shew'd for the Rights and Liberties of the People, the Answer is, The only just Way of interpreting Men's Meaning, is, by observing what they say.

The Lords were silent with respect to Liberty and Property on this Occasion, as well as in all others: They have voluntarily condescended themselves to be restrained, at the same time they desire the Commons not to go about to create new Privileges: The Lords claimed nothing new; and the Commons cannot with Reason desire them to give up what the Law and the Constitution have placed in them, the Jurisdiction in the last Resort.

The principal Thing insisted upon by the House of Commons against this Resolution, was, That there are privileged Cases, as well as privileged Persons; but they do not think fit to give any Instances of such privileged Cases as were anyways applicable to the Matters in Dispute, that is, That were fit entirely of the Consideration of the House of Commons, that the bringing an Action at Common Law in those Cases was a Contempt to the House of Commons; and unless that could be done, this Division of privileged Cases from privileged Persons will have its Weight to justify the Commitment of the five Abbey Men; If Men refuse to bring Actions in Wigmore-Hall, for Matters cognizable in Parliament, so that they can have no Relief in the Courts below, it does not follow from thence, that they ought to be committed for Breach of Privilege on that Account.

The determining of Elections is admitted to be the Business of the House of Commons, and yet it is certain, that the prosecuting Actions at Common Law, for false or defamatory Libels, was never thought to be a Contempt to the House of Commons, nor was any Body punished or committed upon that Account, in the Cases of Sir Samuel Bernardes and Mr. Ogden.

The Freedom of Speech in Parliament, is the most necessary and the most acknowledged Privilege of the House of Commons: And yet when an Intimation was brought in the King's Bench against Sir John Elliot, and others, for Words spoken in the House of Commons, and Judgment was given against them in that Court, the Commons did not think it sufficient to condemn that Judgment by Votes of their own House, but brought their Votes up to the Lord, and desired their Concurrence, which was given; and immediately thereupon a Writ of Error was brought in Parliament, and the Judgment rigorously reversed there: And it cannot be denied, that upon this Occasion the most valuable Privilege of the House of Commons was brought under the Judgment of the Lords, as well as their Judicial as in their Legislative Capacity.

The Case of Richard Steele, and the Act of Parliament which passed upon that Account, in the fourth Year of King Henry the Eighth, was that which was principally insisted on by the House of Commons, in the Case of Sir John Elliot, for judging their words of Feigning of Feigning of Speech, and Denying the Injustice of what was done in that Case by the Court of King's Bench.

The Case of Stowe might be said by the Lords as another Instance, to shew, That this Division of privileged Cases will not save the Purpose of the House of Commons, to justify the Commitments of the Abbey Men. He was prosecuted in the Starry Court for Words spoken, and Bills offered in the House of Commons, in order to be pulled into Law, and upon that Account was imprisoned and condemned to pay a considerable Sum, and petitioned the House of Commons to be relieved in that Matter. The House of Commons did not then proceed to put a Stop to those Bills, or to commit the Persons concerned in them, but thought the only Remedy against those Prosecutions, and others of like kind, was to prepare a Bill, in order to be pulled into a Law, for making void the Judgments against Stowe; and took that Occasion for the same Bill, to declare the Law in general, and to give an Action to a Person who should be afterwards vexed or molested for the like Cause, in which they should incur treble Damages and Costs of Suit.

There is no Case that can more properly be called a privileged Case, with respect to the House of Peers, than the determining of Petitions; and yet if that Matter comes to be incidentally a Point, in any Case depending in the Courts in Wigmore-Hall, they must proceed to determine of it, as they think the Law to be; and the Law must not give cause to hinder it, nor found Fault with them upon that Account.

The Courts in Wigmore-Hall must necessarily judge of the Privileges of Parliament in many Cases: When any Person prays a Writ of Privilege, (which was always the Way anciently when Men desired the Benefit of Privilege, and is not of an established right upon Occasion) the Court where the Writ is prayed must judge, whether the Party has Right to Privilege or not.

Suppose the Sergeant of the House of Commons should kill, or be killed, in the Execution of a Warrant of that House; upon an Indictment for Murder, the Court must necessarily judge of the Legality of the Warrant.

The Commons supposed Cases of Affronts to the Person of the Speaker, or of reproachful Words spoken of the whole House of Commons, are Instances of what they called privileged Cases.

There is no Doubt, but either of these Cases would be Contempts, and such as might be punished by the House; but most certainly, there were also false Officers as might be prosecuted in Wigmore-Hall: And if the Attorney General should bring Information upon them, it could never be pretended, that he would be guilty of a Breach of Privilege of the House of Commons.

It was urged, That in privileged Cases, the Votes of the House of Commons were the Probations in the Ecclesiastical Courts, and that when Prohibitions were layed upon the Judges in the Admiralty, or Ecclesiastical Courts, it was a Contempt for them to proceed further.

The Answer to this is, that Prohibitions to the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts, were founded upon a particular Reason: The Proceedings in those Courts are according to the Civil or Canon Law, and therefore it was necessary to preserve the Constitution, and restrain those Courts from making Invasions upon the Common Law, that a Guard should be laid upon them, and a Power be left to restrain them; and this Power is lodged in the Courts of Wigmore-Hall, who are armed with the sliding Writs of Prohibition, in such Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts. Time to Time, upon Complaints made to them: And the Writs of Prohibition must be served personally upon the Judge of the Admiralty, or the Ecclesiastical Judges, who will be liable to Attachments if they proceed after such Service, until five hours as they have shewn the Nature of the Suit to the Courts from which the Prohibition issued; and if the Suit be properly of Ecclesiastical, or Admiralty Concurrence, the Court must grant a Constitution, whereby they are at Liberty to proceed as usual. This is a known and settled Method of legal Proceedings, but the Votes of the House of Commons were never yet referred to the Queen's Writ: No Court is bound to take Notice of them; on the contrary, the Judges are bound not to take Notice of them, but to act according to the known Law; nobody has Power to prohibit the Courts in Wigmore-Hall; the Judges there are sworn to proceed to the Judgment, notwithstanding any Command under the Great Seal, or Privy Seal, or by any other Authority whatsoever: And the Subjects of England have no longer an Intimacy in the Courts of Law, if the Judges are to take Notice of the Votes of either House of Parliament, and regulate their Judgments accordingly.

The Votes would not always be uniform in either House, and it appears by the preface Dispute, that the two Houses might often differ in Matters of Importance, and the Judges would be under Difficulty which of the House to obey: And if they yielded Obedience to both, they would be obliged to all very contradictory.

What was said against the Third Resolution of the Lords, was, First, That thereby the Lords took upon them to judge of the Commons Privileges: To this it was said, That if the House of Commons were the Name of Privilege, would proceed to no thing inconsistent with the known Prerogatives of the Crown, with the known Privileges of the Lords, contrary to the Laws, or defolutive to the Liberties of the People, the Lords were bound to tell them, There were not their Privileges. If by saying, they only are Judges of their own Privileges, they would deprive the Crown and the Lords from taking Notice of manifest Innovations, and oblige to them as there was Occasion, the Commons might take to themselves the whole Government without Control.

They were challenged to produce Precedents to warrant the Commitment of Men, only for proceeding in Suits at Law against those who had done them Wrong, and had no Pretence of Privilege.

The Lords did not dispute the Power of the Commons, in examining and determining the Elections of their own Members, nor of enquiring into all Matters relating to the Determination of that Question, and applied their reasoning to the Qualifications of Electors, and agreed that what they determined would be binding, as to the Right of the Member or no in the House: But that Determination would not bind the Right of any Elector, for he was no Party to that Dispute of the Election, he was not bound for himself, nor was his Cause in Agitation before the House: and the Affliction brought by the Elector has no manner of Relation to the fixing of the Member, but is only for Recovery of Damages upon Account of the particular Injury done him by the Officer at the Election.

Suppose there was a Contest about two Persons, which was Mayor of a Town; the Court, where that Cause was tried, in order to a Determination of the Right, must perhaps examine into the Rights of those who chose that, but would it be pretended, that the Electors would be bound by the Opinion of the Court in that Cause, and that they could not bring their Actions to recover Damages against the Officers who wilfully refused their Votes, however the Question was decided as to the Mayor? So that it was begging the Question to pretend, that because the House of Commons can try the Right of the Member to sit, therefore they only have a Power to decide finally the Rights of the several Electors.

There is no Weight in the Objection, That if their Sums were allowed, the Officers who are obliged to take the Poll would be exposed to Multiplicity of Actions.

The Law is so in all Cases of Elections of Officers: He who is to take the Poll is bound to do his Duty in his Office; 'tis as such with an honest Juror, though he should be guilty of a Misdemeanor, he is in no Danger, for no Jury ought to find him guilty. But if an Officer wilfully and maliciously refuses to admit those who have Right to give their Votes, every one of them may sue him in any proper Court, as they are cause, and the more he wrongs, the more he ought to suffer. And which would be the greater Mischief, that the Officer who does Injustice should be subject to Actions, or that he should be at Liberty to reject as many rightful Votes as he thought fit, without being liable to make any Reparation, and which is the true Sense of Commons ought to take? The Lords observed, That the Nature of Orders of Things seemed to be quite inverted in this Dispute; the House of Commons were taking part against the Freedom of Law, against the Liberty of Men's Persons, and against the Right of their Electors.

As to the several Precedents insisted upon, they conclude nothing to the present Question, every one of them relating to the Right of the House of Commons chosen of determining the Elections or Returns of their Members, which they are in the quiet Possession of, and the general Expressions which are found in the Relation of these Precedents, can be understood only with respect to the Subject-Matter of these Cases.

The first Precedent, in the 24th of Queen Elizabeth's, is of a double Return for the County of Norfolk. Though the Lords do not deny, That such Cases are proper to be determined by the House of Commons; yet this Precedent does not go far towards asserting their Right, for in that Case the second writ was quashed by the Chancellor and Judges, before the Determination made by the House of Commons: And in the same Precedent they have not rightly stated the Words of the Queen's Message, or of the Resolutions of the House of Commons, as will appear by Sir Simon D'Ewes's Journal, and they could not say they had any original Journal of that Time.

As to the second Precedent they cited, which is the Case of Sir Francis Goodwin, in the first Year of King James the First, which they made use of to prove their own power of determining Elections, and that they were not to give an Account of their Proceedings therein to the Lords: It appears by their own Journal, That they had not issued that Case Loddy, in fact the Lords, as the Desire of the Commons themselves, were Mediators between them and the King in this Dispute; and that the Commons at last yielded the Point; and notwithstanding their Determination in favour of him, suborned, That a new writ should issue for choosing a Member in the place of Sir Francis Goodwin. And though there be Mention in the Journal of a Letter wrote by Sir Francis Goodwin, desiring, That this Third writ should issue; yet that could make no Difference in the Case; for it will not be pretended, That a Member could give up the Right of his Election, and the Judgment of the House.

But all this makes nothing to the Justification of the Continuance of the Aylsbury Men.

The Precedent cited in 1672, relates only to the Right of issuing Writs for the Election of Members during the Continuance of the Parliament, the ordering of which was voted to be in the House of Commons only, and is not at all disputed at this time.

The Lords never disputed the Commons Power of committing for Breach of Privilege, as well Persons who are out of the House of Commons, as those who are: The Question is only, Whether a Member that has no Relation to the Sitting of any Member in Parliament, may be made a Breach of Privilege, by being called for in a Vote, or having that Name given to it in a Warrant of Commitment? That is, in other Words, Whether they have Power to create to themselves new Privileges by their Votes? For they will never be able to prove an Usage of committing Men for refusing to Law in such Cases, and it will be hard for them to convince those whom they represent, that this arbitrary oppressing poor Men, is or can be understood to be only an intemperate to preserve the Rights and Liberties of the People of England.

4. The Commons did not deny the Lords fourth Resolution, otherwise than by saying, That the Application was to be made to the proper Place, and that where the Commitment is by the House of Commons, there is to be Place to apply to for Liberty but that House.

The Lords thought this to be a Pious very fatal to Liberty; for it places an arbitrary and absolute Power of Commitment in the House of Commons. Tyranny may be in every as well as in a single Person. The worst Tyrant of Aylsbury carry that Name with as heavy an Imputation as any single Person.

The Lords never said, That every Prisoner who brings his Habeas Corpus ought to be discharged, or that there are not Cases escaped out of the Habeas Corpus Act; what they said upon it, That a Prisoner brought before a proper Court by Habeas Corpus, whose it does appear that the Matter he stands convicted for is no Crime in Law, ought to be discharged, by whatsoever Authority he was committed, or by whatsoever Name the Fact is called in that Commitment.

Several Precedents were mentioned by the Commons. First, The Case of one Jones; but it did not appear who he was, nor what his Case was, nor who would have taken him from the Commons; and therefore there can be no Pretence to draw any Inference from such a Precedent.

The Lords wondered to find any Weight laid on the Votes polled in the Year 1675. It is well known the Kingdom was at that time generally grown weary of that Parliament, which had been continued thirteen Years; and there was a great Number in both Houses who watched for any Advantage to make their longer Continuance impracticable.

And there happening a Question at that time, Whether there might be a Proceeding in Appeals before the House of Lords, in Cases where Members of the House of Commons were Parties? This was so managed, that in about a Month's time Matters were grown to such a Height between the Two Houses, that all Correspondence was in a manner broken off between them; and they proceeded to make such Votes, and to do such Acts from Day to Day on either Side, as they thought would most provoke.

The Commons cited some of these Votes which were passed in their House towards the Height of the Contest, and the Lords might as well have cited other Votes of the House of Lords, in Contradiction to them, which were altogether as high, and are at least of as much Authority as those of the House of Commons: So that it is hard to imagine, what Use there can be of citing such Precedents, which did occasion two Progresses, one after the other, and both always have had Consequences wherever they are followed.

The House of Commons took the same Exception to the Lords fifth Resolution, as they did to the third: That they therein made themselves Judges of the Privileges of the House of Commons: And the Lords contented themselves with giving them the same Answer.

What the House of Commons said in respect to such capturing and guarding the Council, who played at the Queens Bench Bar, upon the Return of the Habeas Corpus in behalf of the Prisoners, seemed very remarkable, That it was because they were not so much as to acquiesce in the Opinion of the Lord-Keeper and the Judges, that the Prisoners were not liable by the Habeas Corpus Act; and they would not sit not taken Notice of them, because they would not sit fact-fact, but would bring on the Cause again, where the Privileges of the House of Commons were with great Licentiousness of Speech denied and insulted in public Court, without any Hopes or Prospect of Relief of the Parliament, but in order to vent new Dollars against the Commons.

This seemed to be a kind of Excuse for the Council of the Council; but it does in no part agree with the Votes relating to this Matter, which passed in general Terms, and may be cited for Precedents hereafter, for committing Council (with as good Reason as the Votes in 1675), when their secret Murmurs, which induced the House of Commons in that Case, will not appear.

The Vote of the 24th of February, ordered the Committee to examine what Persons had been concerned in pleading upon the Writ of Habeas Corpus, not what was said by Council in their Pleadings; and the Votes against the several Gentlemen of the 30th of February, are, That by pleading upon the Return of the Habeas Corpus on behalf of the Prisoners, they were guilty of breaking the Privileges of the House of Commons: It does not appear that there was any Complaint of what they said, at least there was no Vote against them for their Words, and indeed, if that Charge against them had been for Words supposed to be spoken, would have been an unaccountable Harshness so to have hurried them into Civilly, without ever bringing them to the House to hear their Accusation, or to be heard as to what they had to say for themselves.

It does not appear that these Gentlemen were ever heard, or indeed were at all concerned, as to the Writs of Habeas Corpus, brought before the Lord-Keeper and the Judges in the Vacation-time: But suppose they had, and suppose they were indicted, that as the Habeas Corpus Act was drawn, that Men might not be so clearly liable by the Judges in Vacation-time, by virtue of their Writs, which were formed upon that Statute, and yet they might be of Opinion, That the Prisoners had a reasonable Prospect of obtaining Relief upon Writs or Habeas Corpus brought at Common Law.

If they thought so, it was not upon slight Grounds, as appeared by the Consequence; for the Lord Chief-Justice of the Court of Queens-Bench, whose Learning and Judgment is well known, and as universally esteemed as his Integrity, was clearly of Opinion, That they were entitled to the Relief they prayed for their Clients.

The Commons may give what hard Words they please to these Gentlemen appearing to plead in behalf of the Prisoners upon the Writs of Habeas Corpus, they may call it Lasciviousness to the Commons, and a conspiracy to make a Difference between the Two Houses, and to disturb the Peace of the Kingdom: But after all this they can be said, the Fact will only be, That four Gentlemen, Lawyers by Profession, retained in a Case of Liberty upon a Habeas Corpus brought by two poor Prisoners, did their Duty in their Profession; and for doing so, were themselves imprisoned by the House of Commons, and denied the Benefits of the Habeas Corpus Act: And thus the House of Commons called, Doing Right to their Ends.

No Lawyer has suffered for serving his Client even against the Crown: If the learned in this Profession may freely open the Laws when the Prosecution of the Crown are in question, it will seem very hard they should be punished for doing it in a Case of Privilege. To deprive Men under Sentence of the Assistance of their Friends, exceeds the Severity of any Court but that of the Inquisitors, the very Name of which ought to strike all Englishmen and Protestants with Horror.

The

The full Resolution of the Lords was not contradicted by the House of Commons; and therefore the Lords took it for granted, that as it was no longer controverted, but that a Writ of Error is a Writ of Right, and not of Grace; consequently, that the Commons did no longer insist upon that Part of their Address, That the Queen would not give Leave for a Writ of Error.

As to what was said by the Commons, That it was not material whether Writs of Error were of Grace or not, because they did not lie in the Case of the Petitioners: The Lords said, That whether the Writs of Error could be maintained or not in point of Law, was not of the Cognizance of the House of Commons, nor the Matter in Dispute between the Two Houses.

LII. The Proceedings in the House of Peers and House of Commons, on the Case of CHARLES BATHURST, Esq. (mentioned in the foregoing Proceedings) in January, 1703.

Jan 20 die Januarii, 1703.

A PETITION of Charles Bathurst, Esq. was presented to the House of Commons, and read, touching an Order made by the House of Peers, the Twelfth of February, 1702, with relation to an Order made by the Court of Exchequer, the Fifteenth of July, Dixies Verbi Regis Regis Guineas Terms, concerning an Inquisition and Survey of the Boundaries of the Honour of Richmond, and Lordship of Middleham, and of many other Honours, Manors, and Lordships, bounding thereupon; and praying the Consideration of the House thereof, and such Relief on the Subject-Matter of the said Petition, as shall be thought fit.

Ordered, That several Members be appointed to search the Journals of the House of Peers, as to their Proceedings touching the Matter aforesaid, and also the Officers of the Court of Exchequer, touching the Proceedings there, in relation to the said Inquisition, and report the same to the House.

And several Members were appointed accordingly.

THE CASE of CHARLES BATHURST, Esq. Petitioner. To the Honourable the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses, in Parliament assembled, in order to his Relief against certain Proceedings in the House of Peers, at the Instance of the Right Hon. THOMAS LORD WHARTON, Appellant, from an Order of the Court of Exchequer, bearing Date the 15th Day of July, 1702, against ROBERT SQUIRE, Esq. Respondent.

July 19, 1701.

THE Court of Exchequer made an Order ex officio for the Preservation of a Record of that Court.

Nov. 9, 1702. The Lord Wharton, finding that the said Record was made use of in Evidence against him in a Trial at the Duchess-Bench Bar, of an Issue directed out of Chancery, wherein the said Lord Wharton was Plaintiff, and the said Petitioner Mr. Bathurst, the said Mr. Squire, and others, were Defendants, concerning some Lead-Mines, did, on the 19th of December, 1702, petition the House of Lords (by way of Appeal) from the said Order of the Court of Exchequer, and prayed to have that Order discharged, and the Record taken off the File.

In which Petition the Lord Wharton complained, That the said Record was imposed on the Court (by contrivance between the said Mr. Squire and Mr. Bathurst, a sworn Clerk in the Court of Exchequer), and therefore prayed, they the said Mr. Squire and Mr. Bathurst might answer the said Petition (which he called an Appeal); and accordingly they were ordered to answer the same.

Jan. 5, 1703. Mr. Squire and Mr. Bathurst petitioned the House of Lords, strongly for, That no Suit was ever depending in the Court of Exchequer between the Lord Wharton, and the said Mr. Squire and Mr. Bathurst; and that therefore the Lord Wharton's said Petition was not an Appeal, but an original Complaint against them for a Crime of a high Nature, for which they ought to be left to be tried by the usual Course of the Laws of the Land; and prayed their Lordships to dismiss the Lord Wharton's Petition, and to discharge their Order, by which they the said Mr. Squire and Mr. Bathurst were obliged to answer the same.

Jan. 21, 1703. The Lord Wharton put in his Answer to their Petition, insisting on his Appeal as regular, and alleging that there was a Suit in Chancery, wherein the said Mr. Squire was a Defendant (among others) concerning the Lead-Mines in Question, and that the Order made in this Case (also in the Court of Exchequer) affected the Suit in Chancery; and he then obtained an Order to hear one Counsel on each Side the very next Day.

Jan. 22, 1703. Counsel were heard, and their Lordships were pleased (on Debate) to dismiss the Petition of the said Mr. Squire and Mr. Bathurst, and to order them to answer the Lord Wharton's Petition (or Appeal) on Monday next following. Against which Proceedings several of the Lords entered their Dissent (or Protest), and gave Reasons for their so doing in the Words following, viz.

First, "We conceive that by this we assume a Jurisdiction in an original Cause for their Reasons:

1st, "Because there has been no Suit between the Parties in the Exchequer, and consequently this Petition cannot be called an Appeal from that Court.

2nd, "Altho' there was a Suit in the Court of Chancery, yet one of the Parties required to answer was not a Party in that Suit; and therefore as to him (at least) it must be an original Cause.

3rd, "Tho' all had been Parties in the Chancery, yet it never was heard that an Appeal lay from our Court that had no Suit depending in it, because there was a Suit depending in another Court.

Secondly, "Because no Court can take any Cognizance of a Cause in "which that Court cannot make an Order; but in this Case the House of Lords cannot make an Order (because very many are concerned in this Record who are not before this House) therefore this House cannot take any Cognizance of it."

Jan. 25, 1703. The Lord Wharton acquainted the House, That he was willing to leave out Thomas, and did only expect Squire should answer his Petition; and thereupon he obtained an Order to that Purpose.

Feb. 2, 1703. Mr. Squire put in his Answer, still insisting, as he had done in his said Petition, That it was an original Complaint against him, and could not be called an Appeal, these being no Suit depending in the Court of Exchequer between the Lord Wharton and him, and that the Record (which the Lord Wharton would have suppressed) not only greatly concerned Her Majesty, but the Inheritance of several Thousands of Persons, who are equally concerned (if not more than he) in the Preservation thereof, and that it was more immediately incumbent on the Barons of the Court of Exchequer to justify their own Order, and therefore prayed their Lordships would not proceed further against him, 'till all Parties concerned might be duly heard.

Feb. 8, 1703. The City of London, who are Grantees from the Crown of the whole Honour of Richmond, and Lordship of Middleham, finding themselves interested in the Preservation of the said Record, petitioned the Lords to be heard by their Counsel against the Petition of the said Lord Wharton, and their Lordships accordingly ordered Counsel to be heard on the City, on the Twelfth of February, being the same Day, that the Counsel for the said Mr. Squire were to be heard.

Feb. 12, 1703. Their Lordships heard Counsel for the Lord Wharton and Mr. Squire, (but refused to hear Counsel for the City, notwithstanding their said Order) and thereupon were pleased to order a Trial at Bar in the Court of Common Pleas, the next Easter-Term, by a Jury of Middlesex, wherein this was to be the assigned Issue, viz.

"Whether the Skins of Parchment, directed by Order of the Court of Exchequer, of the Fifteenth of July, 1701, to be filed, are, as the petition, unaltered, exact, and entire Commission and Return first filed in the Court of Exchequer, in the Sixteenth Year of King James the First."

And Ordered, That in the said Action the said Robert Squire should be Plaintiff, and take the Proof of the said Issue upon himself, and the said Lord Wharton, Defendant, and that the Skins of Parchment, or any Copy thereof, should not be given in Evidence in any Court whatsoever until the said Trial was over; and that the said Skins of Parchment (being upon the File by Virtue of the said Order of the Fifteenth of July) should not be allowed as any Evidence on the said Trial for the Plaintiff; and that after the said Trial, the Verdict given therein should be certified and returned by the Court of Common Pleas into the House of Peers.

Mr. Squire did not decline the Trial of the Issue above directed, as being confident of any ill Practice by himself, or any others, or by that he was not able to produce sufficient Evidence to prove that the said Record is perfect, unaltered, exact and entire, as first filed in the Court of Exchequer, in the Sixteenth Year of King James the First, (tho' Mr. Squire said he was not that it was a great Hardship to make him Plaintiff in the said Action, to put the Validity of the whole Record upon his said Proof, and to oblige him to take the Proof thereof upon himself, and all that without his Counsel, or the Counsel of others, who were more immediately concerned in the Preservation of the said Record, than being better Proofs, in order to find the said Issue truly in the Affirmative, to be given for the said Record, than for any one of the most Authentic Records in any of the Courts of Westminster (as is very believed). For,

I. In a Decree of the Court of Exchequer enrolled, made in the Nineteenth Year of King James the First, the said Record is recited and referred to, as then on Record in the Court of Exchequer.

II. The said Record is entered and enrolled Exchequer, in the Book of Inrollments of Surveys, &c. kept at a publick Office at Windsor, belonging to the Auditor for Yorkshire, and the said Entry is now as old as the said Record.

III. The said Record, and particularly the Boundaries of the Honour of Richmond, and Lordship of Middleham, (about which only the Disputes are between the Lord Wharton, and the said Mr. Squire, and the other Defendants) are fully entered, and remain on Record, in an old Book, kept amongst the Records of the City of London, and the same Entry there appears to be made in the Year 1625.

IV. Divers ancient Office Copies (and other Copies) of the said Record, and particularly of the Boundaries of the said Honour of Richmond, and Lordship of Middleham, have been taken, and the same were examined with the said Record, when on its proper File in the Court of Exchequer.

* Note.—The Record is a Survey and Boundary of the Honours of Richmond, and Lordship of Middleham, which together are larger than the County of Middlesex, and more than One Hundred Miles in Circumference; whereas the Boundaries contained by the Lord Wharton and Mr. Squire, are not above Two or Three Miles thereof.

que, and testified to be true Copies. All which said Entries and Copies do exactly agree with the said Record, now on its proper File. And moreover, there are many other Influences, Evidences, and Proofs of the Truth, Validity, and Entireness of the said Record.

But Mr. Spence being apprehensive that the House of Peers, in making the said Order of the Twelfth of February, 1702, had assumed a Jurisdiction in an Original Cause, could not (as he believed) comply with that Order, without doing Injury to the Rights and Privileges of the Commons of England; and, for that Reason, did not think fit to try the Issue as directed.

Nov. 9, 1702. Narr. That at the first Trial at the Queen's-Bench Bar of the Issue directed out of Chancery, (where the said Record was given in Evidence) the Verdict, upon full Evidence, was given and found for the said Mr. Bantley, Mr. Spence, and the other Defendants; yet the Court of Chancery (as it usual where a Right of Inheritance is to be found) afterwards directed a second Trial to the same End as the former, which came on at the Queen's-Bench Bar in Michæmas Term last, Nov. 23, 1703.

That at the last-mentioned Trial, the Counsel for the Plaintiff, the Lord Wharton, insisted that the said Mr. Bantley, and the other Defendants, could not give in Evidence the said Indenture and Survey, (tho' on Record in the Court of Exchequer) nor any Copy thereof, by reason the said Mr. Spence had not tried the Issue directed by the House of Peers, the said Twelfth of February, 1702.

That by reason of the Premises the said Mr. Bantley, and the other Defendants, were deprived of that so necessary a Part of their Evidence, for the Support of their Title to the Matters in question at the said last-mentioned Trial, and so (and for that Reason alone) lost their Cause, which otherwise they could not have done; for that the said Record (back'd with the concurring Testimonies of so many ancient and credible Witnesses, produced on the said Defendant's Behalf) must necessarily have convinced the Jury (as some of them have since own'd and declared), that the Boundaries of the Manors of Abbingdon in Shropshire, and of Abbingdon in the said Shropshire, as the said Record mentions them to be, and consequently, the Issue and Verdict must have been found for the said Mr. Bantley, and the other Defendants.

Septem. 22 die Januarii, 1703.

Mr. Ward reported, That the Members appointed to search the Journals of the House of Peers, and Offices of the Court of Exchequer, as to their Proceedings touching the Matters mentioned in the Petition of Charles Bantley, Esq. presented to the House on Tuesday last, had searched the Journals and Offices accordingly, and as they sit in Place what they found therein, and afterwards deliver'd the same in at the Table, where the same were read.

Ordered, That the Consideration of the said Report be refer'd to the Committee of the whole House, to when the Consideration of the Report made Yesterday, relating to the Case of Abby and White, is refer'd.

Ordered, That the same Members do search the Offices of the Court of Chancery, for the Bills and Answers, and Order on Hearing, made in the said Court, between the Lord Wharton, and the said Mr. Bantley and others, and report the same to this House.

Martin 25 die Januarii, 1703.

Mr. Bridges reported, That the Members appointed to search the Offices of the Court of Chancery for the Bills and Answers, and Order on Hearing, made in the said Court, between the Lord Wharton and Mr. Bantley, had search'd the same accordingly, and had Copies of the Bills and Answers, and Order on Hearing, which he presented to the House, and the Titles thereof were read: And also touching their Lordships Proceedings in the Matter mention'd in the Petition of Mr. Bantley, in which Cause it was alleg'd, that Lordships had taken upon them an original Jurisdiction, in contravention an Order made by the Court of Exchequer, for the King of a Record that had been several Years in Mr. Grange's Chamber in the Temple.

Ordered, That the Consideration of the said Copies be refer'd to the Committee of the whole House, to whom the Report, with relation to the Petition of the said Mr. Bantley, is refer'd.

Janis 27 die Januarii, 1703.

The Order of the Day being read, for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, to consider further of the Report of the Journal of the House of Lords, and also of the Petition of Charles Bantley, Esq. refer'd to the Committee:

Ordered,

That the Sergeant do go with his Mace in Westminster-Hall, and Courts there, and Court of Requests, and Places adjacent, and summon the Members there to attend the Service of the House.

And he went accordingly, and being arrived,

The House (according to Order) resolv'd itself into the said Committee of the whole House, and after some Time spent therein, Mr. Spence refused the Chair, and Mr. Frances reported from the said Committee, That they had come to some Resolutions, which they had directed him to report, when the House will please to receive the same.

Ordered,

That the Report be made To-morrow Morning.

Febru. 28 die Januarii, 1703.

Mr. Frances (according to Order) reported from the Committee of the whole House, to whom it was refer'd to consider of the Report of the Journal of the House of Lords, and the Petition of Charles Bantley, Esq. the Resolutions which they had directed him to report to the House, which he read in his Place, and afterwards deliver'd in at the Table, where the same were read, and (with some Amendments to the first of them) agreed unto by the House, and are as follow:

Resolved,

That the House of Lords taking Cognizance of, and proceeding upon the Petition of Thomas Lord Wharton, complaining of an Order of the Court of Exchequer, bearing Date the fifteenth Day of July, One thousand seven hundred and one, for filing the Record of a Survey of the Manors of Abbingdon, and Lordship of Middleton, in the County of York, is without Precedent, and unreasonable, and tending to the subverting the Rights and Properties of all the Commons of England to an illegal and arbitrary Power.

Resolved,

That it is the undoubted Right of all the Subjects of England, to make such Use of the said Record as they might by Law have done before the said Proceedings of the House of Lords.

After this, the House of Lords took into Consideration the Proceedings of the House of Commons, and made the following Resolution:

Die Lunæ 27 Martii, 1704.

It is Resolved and Declared by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That the House of Commons taking upon them by their Votes to condemn a Judgment of the House of Lords, given in a Cause depending before this House in the last Session of Parliament, upon the Petition of Thomas Lord Wharton, and to declare what the Law is, in Contradiction to the Proceedings of the House of Lords, is without Precedent, unreasonable, and an Usurpation of a Jurisdiction, to which they have no Sort of a Pretence.

March Twelfth,
Clk Parliamentor.

LIII. The Trial of Nathaniel Denew, Gent. John Merriam, Gent. and Richard Britton, Gent. at the Queen's-Bench Bar, for an Assault and Conspiracy, with an Intent to Wound and Beat, &c. William Colepeper, Esq. before the Lord Chief-Justice Holt, Feb. 14, 1703-4.

[Published (from the Trial taken in Short-Hand) by Mr. Colepeper.]

THE QUEEN Plaintiff,

AGAINST

DENEW, and others, Defendants.

Tried at the Queen's-Bench, before the Lord Chief-Justice Holt, Feb. 14, 1703-4.

AFTER Proclamation made for Silence, the Jury was Sworn, whose Names are as follow:

Richard Bealing,
Thomas Dail,
John Mills,
Robert Rogers,
John Norton,
John Wynter,

Richard Davison,
Edward Smith,
Edmond Bannet,
Andrew Cook,
John Hest,
John Glover.

Proclamation was made for all concerned in the Trial to appear.

Then the Record was read as follows:

Midd^{le} II. THE Jurors for our Sovereign Lady the Queen protest, That Nathaniel Denew, late of the Parish of St. Clement Dunes, in the County aforesaid, Gent. John Merriam, late of that Parish, in the said County, Gent. and Richard Britton, late of the same Parish, in the same County, Gent. being Fighters, Swords-men, and Dishonors of the Peace, and being versed in fighting Duels, on the 21st Day of August, in the second Year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lady Anne, by the Grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Queens, Defenders of the Faith, &c. did, in the Parish of Clement Dunes, in the said County of Midd^{le}, unlawfully, feloniously, deceitfully, wickedly, and maliciously, under Pretence of Disput^{ed} Points, and Contention between Sir George Rooke, Knt. & One of His Majesty's Most Honourable Privy-Council, and William Colepeper, Esq. then and before now's, Just, and lawful, judiciously, prudently, and intend, and did among themselves, and others in the Towns aforesaid, confederate and conspire, and each of them did maliciously, perfidiously, and intend to kill, wound, and evilly treat the said William Colepeper, and him the said William Colepeper, either by Duel or otherwise, feloniously and maliciously to kill and murder. And that afterwards, that is to say, on the 21st of August, in the Year aforesaid, about the Hour of Ten in the Forenoon of the same Day, in the Parish and County aforesaid, the said William Colepeper being in the Power of God and the Queen, came the said Nathaniel Denew, with Force and Arms, and lying in wait of his Malice first-thought, and doleful premeditation, then and there offered himself to fight a mortal Duel, in Behalf (as he said) of the said Sir George Rooke, against the said William Colepeper, and with threatening, spiteful, and abusive Words

* De Luna 27 Martii, 1704. It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That the Resolution and Declaration made the Day, with respect to the Votes of the House of Commons, as relation to the Judgment of that House, given upon the Petition of Thomas Lord Wharton, the last Session of Parliament, shall be without Precedent, and unreasonable. March Twelfth, Clk Parliamentor.

† When Mr. Colepeper stood for Knight of the Shire for Kent, Sir George Rooke vigorously oppos'd him, and wrote Letters to some of the Freeholders of that County, importing, "That he hoped they would not give their Votes for a Man who had carried up a Petition (Mr. Colepeper being one of the Knights Petitioners) that had been condemn'd feloniously, deceitfully, and sedulously, by an English Parliament." This was the first Occasion of the Quarrel between them.

Case. S. J. A. And when you refused it, what did he say then?
Mr. Colp. Says he, the Quærel is publick in its Nature, Sir George Rest is in the Flower of Kear, and there are above Twenty Friends depending upon him; and, says he, Come out, I will stand by him. I told him, it was an unworthy of him to tender such a Pledge, and I would lose the last Drop of my Blood before I would sign it.
Case. S. J. A. What did he say then?
Mr. Colp. Then, says he, you'll be infusled.
L. C. J. Then you did not hear Mr. Merriam say any thing, or do any thing?
Mr. Colp. Yes, my Lord, I saw him make a Motion, when Mr. Denew said, Here is Mr. Merriam, and I have another Friend hand by. And after the Scuffle was over, I met Mr. Britton hand by.
L. C. J. How far?
Mr. Colp. It was near Temple-Bar.
L. C. J. This Side, or the other?
Mr. Colp. Just this Side, coming through as it were. I was first overtaken by Mr. Denew near St. Clement's Church.
L. C. J. What Time of the Day was this?
Mr. Colp. It was during the Time of Divine Service.
L. C. J. Where were you going?
Mr. Colp. My Lord, I am a Man, as other Men are; I thought myself most barbarously used, and since I had made this Agreement with Sir George Rest, to give him Satisfaction upon the Coast of Holland, I went to tell Mr. Britton, that if he would go over with Sir George Rest, I would speak with him after I had spoke with Sir George Rest.
L. C. J. I ask you where you were going then?
Mr. Colp. I was going from my Lodging to beyond St. Clement's Church.
L. C. J. Upon what Occasion?
Mr. Colp. My Lord, to speak with Mr. Britton.
L. C. J. Did he lodge thereabouts?
Mr. Colp. Yes, my Lord, I think in Byford-Court. I was in so much Passion, that as I went in, I felt not the Ground that I trod upon.
Case. S. J. A. How soon after Mr. Britton was gone from you did you go out?
Mr. Colp. Immediately.
Case. S. J. A. How soon after that did you see Mr. Denew?
Mr. Colp. Immediately he overtook me.
L. C. J. What need had you to go after Mr. Britton? You had seen him just before at your Chambers; you say you went to speak with Mr. Britton; you say he was just before at your Lodgings; Why did you not tell him so then?
Mr. Colp. My Lord, my Passion began to rise afterwards, upon the Reflection.
L. C. J. Had you not told him as much before?
Mr. Colp. Yes, my Lord, but I had not bid him prepare to go, and that I would take him after Sir George Rest to Holland.
L. C. J. Did you intend to tell him, that you would meet with him in Holland, and deal with him after Sir George Rest?
Mr. Colp. I did so.
L. C. J. Did you go after Mr. Britton, to attack him immediately?
Mr. Colp. Yes, my Lord; but always on the defensive Part here.
Case. S. J. A. How far from your Lodgings did Mr. Denew stand?
Mr. Colp. I lodge in Coil-Street, and he overtook me about St. Clement's Church; and he ran. Mr. Merriam was with him at that Time, and he pointed at him as a sower; I apprehended Mr. Merriam to be one of them.
Case. S. J. A. Was he the first Day Mr. Denew came to you?
Mr. Colp. Yes, the first Day.
L. C. J. Did Mr. Merriam say any thing to you?
Mr. Colp. No, my Lord.
L. C. J. Did he hear what Mr. Denew said to you?
Mr. Colp. Yes, my Lord, at the Time of the Assault.
L. C. J. But the first Time?
Mr. Colp. No, my Lord; he gave me a withful Look at going into the Coffee-House.
Case. S. J. A. Did he lay his Hand upon his Sword, or any thing?
Mr. Colp. No; I believe not.
Case. S. J. A. That is not far: Pray, Sir, be pleased to answer me a Question or two. You say you was going to Mr. Britton's; Was it not with a Design to challenge him? You say likewise, Your Passion was so high, you did not well conceive what you did, Did you not design to challenge him then?
Mr. Colp. No neither to challenge, nor to quarrel with him instantly. But I told Sir George Rest, at parting, that I hoped he would change his Resolution; but, said I, if you persist in it, I will wait upon you; and if he would persist in the Resolution, then I thought, that since Mr. Britton had used me in this Manner, he was sower than another, that was an innocent Person.
Case. S. J. A. I think you say you had a Challenge from Sir George Rest; Was it in Writing, or by Word of Mouth?
Mr. Colp. By Word of Mouth, by Mr. Denew.
Case. S. J. A. You say, Mr. Denew overtook you by St. Clement's; Do you apprehend that they came thicker to meet with you?
Mr. Colp. I apprehended it wherever I went; I looked to be attacked in the Street, and I told Mr. Denew, and desired him to be with me, and take Notice, that I was upon the Defensive, for there will be Swords drawn.
Case. S. J. A. You say you lodged in Coil-Street? How could you think to meet them there? Did you think they would be in wait?
Mr. Colp. Yes, and that they were waiting for me every where: When I awoke in the Morning, and looked from my Lodgings, I saw four Persons stand at the End of Coil-Street, and bid, and ran: I apprehended were Sowers.
Case. S. J. A. Mr. Calverley, the 21st, you say, was the first Time that you had any Discourse with these People. Did you not send to Mr. Denew to come to your Chamber?
Mr. Colp. No.
Case. S. J. A. At Eleven o'Clock, you say, you came at Eleven to your Chambers, and accordingly he came: My Reason was, I found he would make a Quærel of it, if I disappointed him but a Moment.
Case. S. J. A. Did you not send your Servant for him?
Mr. Colp. No, I sent my Servant to the Coffee-House, to see whether he was there.
Case. S. J. A. Did you not feed for Mr. Britton?

Mr. Colp. No, I believe my Sister did; she thought him to be a Peace-maker, as he pretended himself to be.
Case. S. J. A. Give me Leave to ask you one Question. You say you were in great Passion, you thought yourself likely to be attack'd, Why then did you go out that Morning to Mr. Britton's?
Mr. Colp. I have given you an Account of that already, I was provoked more than human Nature could bear.
L. C. J. He says, that what Mr. Britton had offered to him; made him to be further engaged, and went after him to acquiesce him, that after he had dissuaded Sir George Rest, he would engage with him.
Mr. Colp. I don't know what I should have said to him; but that, my Lord, were my present Thoughts.
Case. S. J. A. When Mr. Denew met with you, Were there not some hard Words that passed between you two?
Mr. Colp. No, not any on my Part.
Case. S. J. A. Did you not give him some abusive Language?
Mr. Colp. I did not, Sir; he called me Scoundrel and Rascal, but I made no Return to him.
Case. S. J. A. But when he came to your Chamber at Ten o'Clock at Night, did you not tell him that you had been at Sir George Rest's, and that he had used you like a Scoundrel; and that you believed him to be like him?
Mr. Colp. No, nothing of that. I have not seen Sir George Rest, I said, and I believe he desired himself.
Case. S. J. A. Pray, Mr. Calverley, the first Time Mr. Denew, you said, said nothing that was unkind to you: Then he only fairly delivered to you a Message.
Mr. Colp. And that Sir George Rest had Friends; and, that there would be a Way found out for that.
Case. S. J. A. What sort of Reposement had Mr. Britton? Is he used to fight Duels? Is he famous for Duelling?
Mr. Colp. I know nothing of him: He is my Country-man, but I live a great Way from him.
Case. S. J. A. What Age is he of?
Mr. Colp. He is an able, strong Man of his Age. He is in Court, you may be him.
Case. S. J. A. I ask you, on your Oath, upon the Time you admit he, Mr. Denew, was civil, did he give any Reflections at first?
Mr. Colp. He did not call me scoundrel and Rascal the first Time.
Case. S. J. A. You admit, the first Time he was civil?
Mr. Colp. No, Sir, he gave me several Reflections, but did not call me Scoundrel and Rascal at the first.
L. C. J. Who did not?
Mr. Colp. Mr. Denew did not, at the first Time.
L. C. J. Did he ever call you so?
Mr. Colp. Yes, my Lord, at the Time of the Assault.
Case. S. J. A. Which call you the second Time?
Mr. Colp. When he came to my Chamber at Eleven o'Clock in the Morning, that was the second Time, then he would quarrel with me, because, as he said, I disappointed Sir George Rest.
L. C. J. When was this?
Mr. Colp. Saturday Morning, at 11 o'Clock.
Case. S. J. A. You say he went away satisfied?
Mr. Colp. I do not say he was satisfied.
Case. S. J. A. I ask you upon your Oath, the third Time, Whether there was not angry Words on both Sides? You gave him reproachful Language, and asked him what he had to do there at Ten o'Clock at Night? I think this was so?
Mr. Colp. There was some on my Side: He said that he might and it: I said I had been with Sir George Rest, and I was of Opinion that he was at home, and deny'd himself.
L. C. J. That was Sunday Morning.
Mr. Colp. No, my Lord, I had been there Saturday Afternoon, and they said he was not at home then: This Gentleman said, Whether I did not, at 10 o'Clock at Night, give Mr. Denew bad Words? I said, No.
Case. S. J. A. Did he quarrel with you on his own Account?
Mr. Colp. No, he declared it was upon Sir George Rest's Account; and said he would take the Quærel upon himself.
Case. S. J. A. The third Time I thought you said he quarrelled with you upon his own Account?
Mr. Colp. Yes, on Sunday, then I spread my Hands out, I asked him what Quærel he had with me? Said I, What is your Quærel with me?
Case. S. J. A. You spread your Hands out thus, and spoke the loud.
Case. S. J. A. Was that all?
Mr. Colp. Yes: Then I asked him, said I, Sir, is this a Reason you must shed my Blood, or put me under the Necessity of shedding yours?
L. C. J. When was that?
Mr. Colp. On Sunday Morning, when he overtook me.
Case. S. J. A. The Quærel I would ask you by this: You have said, Sir, that Mr. Denew overtook you by Little Drury-End?
Mr. Colp. No, Sir, he overtook me behind St. Clement's Church.
Case. S. J. A. Then, pray, Sir, when you had some Paspas with him, I would ask you upon your Oath, who drew the first Sword?
Case. S. J. A. He told you that before.
L. C. J. He has told you the Manner of it.
Mr. Colp. I'll tell you again: Says I, you have Skill in Fencing, that is enough; you must lay down your Case: With that, he took up his Case to strike, I then dropped back to draw, and he was slower than I, because his Case hindered him.
Case. S. J. A. They who made the first Pals?
Mr. Colp. I cannot tell, I stood my Ground, he came up at me.
Case. S. J. A. I thought you said you made the first Pals at Mr. Denew.
L. C. J. He told you the Manner: He said he drew his Sword, and went back, and Mr. Denew came up to him.
Case. S. J. A. I would know who made the first Pals? You say you threw your Hat at him?
Mr. Colp. Yes, I did afterwards.
Case. S. J. A. But was it not you that made the first Pals?
Mr. Colp. Indeed I cannot tell; if there was any Advantage, I believe I might take it.
Case. S. J. A. Where was the Place proposed for your Fighting with Mr. Denew?
Case. S. J. A. There was no Place; he way-laid him.

Mr. Colp.

Mr. C. P. He let it rest in air, and would not let me stir a Foot from him; but I did not intend to run away from him.

Coat. Def. But you said you design'd to meet Sir George Rusk in Holland.

Mr. C. P. Yes.

Coat. Def. Then how came it to pass you did not meet him?

Mr. C. P. Because I think Sir George Rusk had not intend me as a Gentleman, and I don't think my self oblig'd to observe Rules of Honour with him.

Coat. Plaintiff. That is not fair.

Coat. Def. Had not Mr. Deane his Case in his Hand, when he fought you?

Mr. C. P. Yes I am glad you ask me that Question: He held his Case in his Left Hand, and I found it inconvenient in my Fencing; said I, Coward, lay down your Case, but he kept it in his Hand; said English People love to Play, and thou that stood behind him, cry'd out, Lay down your Case; and then he fumbled to lay down his Case, and I threw my Fencer at him, and made a Pass at him: Thou after four or five Passes.

Coat. Def. I beg the Favour of you to ask you one Question, You say the Place you saw Mr. Deane fight was the Top-Shop?

Mr. C. P. Yes.

Coat. Def. Is it not an usual Place where Gentlemen used to stand?

Mr. C. P. Yes.

Coat. Plaintiff. When you were going along the Back-side of St. Clement's Church, I ask you in what Manner did Mr. Deane come after you? Did he walk very fast, or ran he?—Mr. C. P. He ran.

Coat. Deane. Did Mr. Deane run?

Mr. C. P. I did not see him till he came up to me.

Coat. Def. I ask you this: At the Time you drew your Sword, did he offer to strike at you first?

L. C. J. Has he not told you plainly?

Mr. Deane. Yes.

Coat. Plaintiff. Pray, Madam, will you be pleas'd to acquaint my Lord and the Jury what you know concerning this Matter, and what pass'd between your Brother, Mr. Colepeper, and Mr. Deane, at his first coming to him?—Mrs. Sted. On the 21st of August—Coat. Deane. Speak as loud as you can.

Mrs. Sted. On the 21st of August, my Lord, I went to the Temple to my Brother's Chamber, to go along with me into the Country, according to his own Appointment; and my Brother was not at all ready, at which I was mightily surpris'd; but my Brother was refus'd to me, and I could not tell the Reason: I was forth to leave him in Town, because he had several Immortals in the Country, that he was mightily engag'd after: So that, at length, I did find out, that there was some Danger in the City; and sent my Coach and Equipage to Mr. Sted into the Country, that he might not come up to expose himself to Danger too: At length, while I was at my Brother's Chamber, about 11 o'Clock, a Gentleman came to the Door, whom I knew understand to be Mr. Deane, and though I could not hear distinctly what he said, but something about Honour, justice, and Honour, and praise in Time; my Brother answer'd, That he had a Respect to Sir George Rusk, and Sir Jacob Banks, on the Account of the Ladies they had married, and the Family he had married into, and never meant him Wrong.

Coat. Plaintiff. Say that again, what your Brother said to Mr. Deane in relation to Sir George Rusk?

Mrs. Sted. I heard him say he had Respect for them on the Account of the Ladies they had married; and never had the least Intention to affront or wrong them.

Coat. Plaintiff. What said Mr. Deane to the Matter?

Mrs. Sted. I do not know, I know so far as the Temple. We went afterwards to Coit-Street, and my Brother sent a Letter to Sir George Rusk, and the Message that was brought back, was, That he expected him at his House, or would send immediately after him; and quietly after, Mr. Deane came, and my Brother was gone out, then I thought it would be Time well spent to have Mr. Deane in my Lodging: Of myself I fancy'd, that while my Brother was absent, he would come. I knew my Brother was at Jack's Coffee-House in Coit-Street, and I sent my Brother Word, Mr. Deane was with me: I ask'd him if he wanted to speak with Mr. Sted, my Husband? He said, No, it was with Mr. Colepeper, him he wanted to speak to: I told I had sent to him, and soon after Mr. Deane wanted to be gone; and I said, It will make but a Comedy of Errors to go when I had sent and expected him to return; so Mr. Deane, after some Time spent, went away: He said, That was but one Coffee-House in the Strand, and there he was to be spoken with: Just after he was gone, I went to seek after my Brother, and just as I was taking Coach with Mrs. Harlequin, Mr. Britton came, and ask'd after my Brother, Whether he was there, or at the Temple? I promis'd he should know where he was, so I took Coach; and when I could not find my Brother, I return'd. My Brother came to my Lodgings, with Mr. Deane, a French Gentleman, who speaks English very ill, about dark; and a little while after, my Brother sent to Mr. Deane, to the Coffee-House in the Dining-Room, says he, Mr. Colepeper, I will speak with you in private. Says he, You may speak here: No, says Mr. Deane, you must come out: Says my Brother, I have been with Sir George Rusk, and I could not find him; either he denied himself, or was not at Home: Says Mr. Deane, That shall not serve your Turn, let us make an End of it now: Says he, Come out; God I will have you out; God I will have you out. There was a Multiplicity of Words, but my Brother was civil and respectful to all the while, and Mr. Deane managed somewhat upon the Stage, and went off. The next Morning my Brother went very early, as contrary to my Design very much, he went to wait upon Sir George Rusk: I was full of Error at that, and thought of nothing else, but to Surgeons heal the Wounds and Stabs. I knew nothing how Matters went, to my Brother return'd, and about Nine o'Clock Mr. Britton came again.

L. C. J. Where?

Mrs. Sted. To my Brother's and my Lodgings in Coit-Street; and he came over Night for my Brother, and not finding him, and doubting whether he would be at the Temple, or at Coit-Street, I sent a Messenger to seek him he was at Coit-Street, and I thought him to be a Mediator, or else I should not have introduced him to my Brother; so when he came in, he desired that Mr. Britton, and my Woman would withdraw.

Vox. VIII.

Coat. Deane. Who desired this?

Mrs. Sted. Mr. Britton desired the Woman to withdraw, of whom I was one, Mrs. Harlequin, and I stood at the Door, to hear what we could, being very inquisitive in so hurried a Case; and I heard them read something, but what that I could not tell, but my Brother told me since, it was Colonel Seymour's Affidavit.

L. C. J. Where was all this?

Mrs. Sted. At Coit-Street, about Nine o'Clock a Sunday-Morning: I heard him proceed to be a Mediator, he said he was a Mediator, and that he had a Paper, which if my Brother would sign, all would be well, and if he would refuse himself he must fight it; I did not hear what the Paper was, but my Brother said him, that was essentially of him, as a Mediator, to tender to him first a Paper, which he look'd upon as immortals, and would rather do than sign it: Then, says he, you'll be satisfied; then, says my Brother, I shall defend myself.

Coat. Deane. What did he say then?

Mrs. Sted. He said, Sir George Rusk was the Flower of Kent, and the Quard was of a publick Nature; and for his Part, he would stand and fall by him, and would Twenty more.

Coat. Deane. Did he talk of any Satisfaction he had?

Mrs. Sted. He said he would stand and fall by him, and so would Twenty more.

Coat. Def. I hope you will not put Questions in her Mouth.

Another for Def. You do not ask for Questions.

L. C. J. She has not asked very fast, pray don't quarrel.

Coat. Deane. When did he say father?

Mrs. Sted. Mr. Britton came to the Door, he bid my Brother not to be in a Passion, I wondered he desired my Brother not to be in a Passion: Said I to my Brother, Will you not get to the Stairs with him? Says he, A Villain, he has challeng'd me out.

Coat. Deane. What time of the Day was this?

Mrs. Sted. About 9 or 10 o'Clock.

Coat. Deane. When did your Brother go out?

Mrs. Sted. He went out immediately after that, and told me he was going to drink a Dish of Coffee: I was full of Concern, for Mr. Deane over Night had challeng'd my Brother out, and said he had a Friend below in a Hackney Coach.

Coat. Deane. When did he go?

Mrs. Sted. Mr. Deane said he had a Man in the Coach below; a Friend he had too, as well as my Brother.

L. C. J. Where was this?

Mrs. Sted. It was at my Lodging in Coit-Street.

L. C. J. Indeed I mis took, for I thought it was at Mr. Colepeper's Chamber.

Mrs. Sted. No, my Lord, it was in Coit-Street, and when Mr. Britton was going: Said I, Brother, do not you attend him to the Stairs? as I thought in point of Civility he ought to do: Says my Brother, a Villain, he has just now challeng'd me out.

L. C. J. Who said to—Mrs. Sted. My Brother said so.

L. C. J. Who did he say was a Villain?

Mrs. Sted. My Lord, I said to my Brother, Why do not you wait on Mr. Britton to the Stairs? Says my Brother, a Villain, he has challeng'd me.

Coat. Deane. Pray give an Account of what pass'd over Night between you and your Brother.

Mrs. Sted. I have spoken to it already; if you will have it again, I will repeat it.

L. C. J. She hath said it: Have you any more, Madam?

Mrs. Sted. I have done with that, my Lord. Just after Mr. Britton had left my Brother, Mr. Britton, an honest Gentleman and Friend of ours, went out with my Brother, and quickly return'd, and told me of the Affidavit my Brother had had in the Strand; and that Mr. Deane had said, my Brother had been too free in his Tongue with Sir George Rusk.

Coat. Def. You say, your Brother said, the Villain challeng'd me; but you did not hear Mr. Britton make any Challenge at all?

Mrs. Sted. He said he would stand and fall by Sir George Rusk.

L. C. J. He said he would be satisfied; that he would stand and fall with him.

Coat. Deane. And that Twenty more were engag'd; that they would make an End of it now.

Coat. Def. Madam, you were pleas'd to say, you apprehended Mr. Britton to be a Mediator: Pray, what Reason had you for thinking so?

Mrs. Sted. Because, Sir, he had been, when I was a Child, with my Father very civilly and friendly, and he was a Man more in Years, I thought, than to undertake such a Bully-Action.

Coat. Def. Then pray, do you know any thing of Mr. Britton's being sent for to make up?

Mrs. Sted. I said sent for him by my Brother's Servant, because he desired the Night before to know where my Brother was.

L. C. J. When did he come to you?

Mrs. Sted. My Lord, he came Saturday in the Afternoon, to know whether my Brother was to be spoken with at the Temple, or Coit-Street, or where: I told him he should know if he had a mind to sit, and apprehending him to be a Mediator, I sent to him.

Coat. Def. In whose Name did you send to him?

Mrs. Sted. I did not mention any Name, but that my Brother was now in Coit-Street.

Coat. Def. Did you yourself feel, or know of his being sent for more than once, or how?—Mrs. Sted. Never, I dare say, but that one Time.

Coat. Deane. I would only ask you this Question, Was there any talk of making an End?—Mrs. Sted. Yes.

Coat. Deane. I only ask you this, at the Time he refused the Paper, did he talk of making an End of it?

Mrs. Sted. He said, they might make an End of it now, it was not so plain as Make and Fight; but that he would make an End of it now.

L. C. J. Make an End of it now, Who said so?

Mrs. Sted. Mr. Britton.

Coat. Def. What did you mean by that? Your Brother did not understand him; he thought that if your Brother would sign that Paper, that that would make a speedy End.

Mrs. Sted.

Coar. Def. What did Mr. Deane say when they were going to draw? Bea. I was not about it, it was a great way off.

Coar. Def. With Mr. Gorge's case to you, or first for you, did not tell you the reason why he first for you?

Bea. I apprehend Mr. Reed had first for me.

Coar. Def. You went along with Mr. Colepeper? Bea. Yes, I did so.

Coar. Def. What did he tell you he was going to do?

Bea. He said he was going to speak with Mr. Deane, he told me he desired to see him, I told him to go in to him, to meet with Sir George Reed, and he said he would call him to-morrow, and that he had fought with Sir George Reed, he would fight with Mr. Deane.

Coar. Def. Did he say, upon your Oath, say he went to challenge Deane?

Bea. No, I do not remember that.

Coar. Def. Did you observe any Case in the Hand of Deane?

Bea. Yes.

Coar. Def. How did he dispose of it?

Bea. He said he had it down.

Coar. Def. Was he called first? Bea. I do not know.

Coar. Def. Did Mr. Deane pass before he parted with his Case?

Bea. Yes, he did.

L. G. J. I ask you this Question: Mr. Reed, did not Mr. Deane lift up his Case in Mr. Colepeper, before any Sword was drawn? Did you see that? Bea. No, I did not for that, I was at some Distance, and in a little bit of a Confusion.

L. G. J. How far was you behind?

Bea. I believe half the Length of this Hall.

Coar. Def. When Mr. Colepeper drew his Sword, did he make up to Mr. Deane, or retire back? Bea. He retired back first.

Coar. Def. Upon your Oath, did he offer to make any Pass at Mr. Deane, till Mr. Deane came up with his Sword drawn?

Bea. I did not observe that.

Coar. Def. Mr. Colepeper retired, and Mr. Deane came forwards?

Bea. Yes.

Coar. Def. Did he not throw his Hat before any pass?

Bea. I did not for that.

Coar. Def. Did he not throw his Wig before any Pass?

Bea. No, the Wig was left off.

Coar. Def. What did Mr. Colepeper do then?

Bea. Mr. Deane said it was not fair; Yes, says Mr. Colepeper, it is, and I will take all Advantages against Adversities, as I take you to be lost Sir George Reed.

Coar. Def. What was done after the Scuffle?

Bea. They ran away, they one Way, and we another; this was at the May-Pole in the Street. We met Mr. Brewster at Temple-Bar.

Coar. Def. At the Time they met at Temple-Bar, did Mr. Colepeper decline?

Bea. He said he had been with Sir George Reed, and had given him Satisfaction.

Mr. Wells speaking for the Defendant.

I am in this Court, my Lord, for the Defendants, and as for Mr. Deane, I think here is nothing that they offer can assist him, as to my Challenge that he gave: He was in Company, 'tis true; he did not strike any good Advice, he did lay indeed at left, Mr. Colepeper must have a Care what he said; and, I think, it was good Advice if he had been well taken. And as to the other Two, Mr. Colepeper you have heard in the material Evidence in this Matter. Gentlemen, you will observe who are the Witnesses; and what are the Circumstances of this Fact. It is, my Lord, a thing we cannot possibly be provided with many Witnesses in, being trusted between Mr. Colepeper and these Gentlemen, therefore we have the Disadvantage in this Case, because the Law does lay, I must own, that Mr. Colepeper is allowed to be a Witness, but we cannot be Witnesses, for ourselves, in the Matter; and it being a private Transaction, it is not to be presumed that we can make any good Defence, nor have any positive Witnesses; but that there was a Quarrel between himself and Sir George Reed, is declared by them: And I believe every provoking Language hath been given by Mr. Colepeper, which might occasion what hath happened. As for Mr. Deane, he is a Gentleman of very good Fortune, a Gentleman of Estate and Quality; a Justice of the Peace in the Country, and not such a kind of Person as Mr. Colepeper would represent him to be: He is a Person that Sir George Reed hath an intimacy with, and he had for a great while together. Being at Sir George Reed's House the 21st of April, the Day that is fixed upon, then truly Sir George Reed said, Mr. Colepeper had highly offended him, and he did say he would give him some Satisfaction for what he had done; upon that we do agree that Mr. Deane, as from Sir George Reed did go in the Morning to expostulate with Mr. Colepeper the Reason of this Usage; he met him at the Temple-Gate, and acquainted him with it; says he, I cannot come to you these two Hours, if you go into the Review Coffee-House, and stay two Hours, I'll come; but he did not come. And Mr. Colepeper, as much Apprehension as he had from these Allusions, sent for this Gentleman up to his Chamber in the Morning, and when he came, it is true what Mr. Colepeper says, That he said, he had said nothing of Sir George Reed, but that he was a very honest Gentleman.

Mr. Cole. I did not say that neither.

Mr. Wells. Says he, If you will say that, I believe Sir George Reed will go it up; for Sir George Reed is a Man that will have his Honour vindicated, for it is not in such Language as you have spoken that he is spoken of. Says he, If you will say so Sir George Reed, I shall be glad, because I believe there will be an End of it. No truly, Mr. Colepeper could not go then, but two Hours after he would go: Says Mr. Deane, You say you will come within these two Hours, but will you go certainly at the two Hours End? Yes, said he, I will be there within two Hours; then, says he, I have nothing to say, I am very glad you design it. My Lord, he afterwards, as he frequently did, died with Sir George Reed.

Mr. Deane, you may think, did acquaint him with what passed between Mr. Colepeper and him, and about two o'clock, after Dinner, there came a Message from Mr. Colepeper to Sir George Reed, to tell him, that he could not meet him then, but he would meet him at five o'clock, which is the Time Mr. Colepeper is agreed he was to meet.

Truly Mr. Colepeper did not come according to his Appointment, and Mr. Deane, says he, I have trouble, and do not come according to his Promise and Appointment, and then these came a Man with a Letter from Mr. Colepeper, a Message he his Servant: It was, That he could not come then, at five o'clock; I say he, if you would needs have me meet you, it is upon a Time and Place, if you will say upon it, I will not fail. Upon that, Mr. Deane being there, I tell him, says Sir George Reed, I'll go to the Court at five o'clock, and I'll tell you as he comes, for I have a great deal to say to you, and I'll tell you the Truth of this Matter that is spoken to much about.

He went, and he was not at Home, and he said till ten o'clock at Night, and then he came up into the Chamber. Mr. Colepeper was in another Room, as Mr. Colepeper hearing his Voice, says, did not come to him, but he came to a Pair of Stairs higher. Mr. Deane came up, Mr. Colepeper, holding the Door as his Hand, would a little, and he came in.

Upon that, Sir George Reed says Mr. Colepeper, You know I will fight you, well enough, said Mr. Deane. He told him, that he could fight Sir George Reed, he said, that he had no Business with him, but he would fight him, and he did say something, but I could not hear him, for at that time he was, but would not for him, and he began to be a little angry; he took this Mr. Deane to be a cowardly fellow too, and he would have nothing to say to him. Mr. Deane said, my Lord, he did not expect such Language as that was; and I answer your Quarrel, said he, may be with Sir George Reed, he so saying, he gave me Provocation. Says he, If you have been with Sir George Reed, you have heard the Matter, and shall not talk of it, but since you have given me such provoking Language, you cannot expect I should take it very calmly; and away went he. The next Morning, my Lord, by pure Chance, about Temp o'clock, he saw Mr. Colepeper in his Palace, and there he told him, says he, You may remember the Language you gave me last Night, it is not such Language that one Gentleman ought to give to another, and you must consider, and learn to be wiser. Says Mr. Colepeper, What need have you to trouble yourself with Sir George Reed's Business, when I have been with him? Says he, I am not such a Gentleman that I concern myself about; and upon that, there was a short part of a Challenge upon his own Account. But the next Evening, I tell you, it was not the intention of that, but that he desired to fight the Duel on Sir George Reed's Behalf, for this Quarrel was upon the Account of that Gentleman himself. When he came to other Witnesses, that Gentleman who came last, he tells you, That it was upon his own Account, and not upon the Account of Sir George Reed. So this is far as there were any Witnesses present, so far they give you that Account.

My Lord, as to this Mr. Deane, there is no great Matter fixed upon in this Case, they do own, that Mr. Deane was taken up as a Friend, and Mr. Colepeper's different to him as a Mediator, the looked upon him as a Friend, and did not think so, for indeed, he was so purely in this Matter, and had no Design to Enmity against Mr. Colepeper; but having that had been such a Provocation, he was so angry to see him, that Sir George Reed was angry, and he would have him make up this Matter, and sign an Acknowledgment, but he would not; and thereupon he said, Sir George Reed was the Darling of Reed, and he would be satisfied if he would not sign that Paper; every one would expose him Quarrel, and be among the rest, if he would not acknowledge that Rudeness. My Lord, this is no Challenge, Mr. Deane only told what the Event would be, if he did not make Acknowledgment for that Offence; every Gentleman would expose Sir George Reed's Quarrel; this was only to show the Reason Sir George Reed had in the Country, that Mr. Colepeper would be satisfied, not by Sir George Reed, but by the Country, and he might well think so, if it were true what is reported of Mr. Colepeper, in reference to Sir George Reed. But he told him what he believed the Consequence would be, and he came purely as a Friend, and nothing else; so that, my Lord, there is nothing to be fixed, that he challenged Mr. Colepeper to fight upon Sir George Reed's Account, he came purely as a Friend, and nothing else. Your Lordship hears that they would inform, that these Gentlemen lay in wait, and were hired on purpose to affront and assault this Gentleman, and that they were Men fit for such evil Practices and Designs; but there is nothing that hath been proved of that. These Ladies talk of Stories they heard in the Country; and if they had a Mind to assault Mr. Colepeper, he was at his Chambers, and he might well be afraid of what need they be much to do. And even this very Day he went abroad about this Battle business.

But, my Lord, how could it be possible this should be otherwise than Chance? Mr. Colepeper, he lodged in Court Street, in the Street, they met him at White-Chapel, near St. Clement's Church; it could not be presumed, that they should be in wait there, expecting to meet with him, so that the very Circumstance of the Place showed there could be no Design of their meeting him in that Place; for how could they suppose he should come there, after he lodged in Court Street? And then, my Lord, it shows he had not this Apprehension of Danger, that he was not so much concerned, as he would have been, if he was immediately out, took two or three with him. It was no challenge this Morning; but he would make you believe it was not a private Challenge, but after he had fought with Sir George Reed in Holborn, he would fight with this Gentleman there; so that, my Lord, this shows he was far from this Apprehension of Danger as he hath pretended. We shall call two Noble Lords to these Gentlemen's Reputations, that will give an Account of these Gentlemen, that they are no such men as they pretend; and then we hope, though it is our Misfortune not to have Witnesses, the Matter will be taken, as in all Probability it was.

L. G. J. Mr. Wells, say till me the Affairs Mr. Colepeper gave Mr. Deane? Mr. Wells. I did open it to your Lordship.

* Not true, one offered to be proved; but being not to the Point, was let pass, as every other Thing for the Cause.

L. C. J. It was not plain enough for me to see.
 Mr. Hall. I am sorry for that, my Lord, it is often my Misfortune; but, with humble Submission, it was at Ten o'Clock at Night when he came; he told Mr. Denew, he had been with Sir George Raol. Mr. Colpeper said, says he, I have been with Sir George Raol, but like a Scoundrel Fellow he denied himself at home, and you are both another Scoundrel.

L. C. J. And he say that to—Mr. Bristow. Very, my Lord, he did.
 Caus. Denew. Have you any Evidence of that?

Mr. Hall. My Lord, we have nothing but Mr. Denew, and he will give his Oath on it, as well as Mr. Colpeper his Oath to the contrary.

L. C. J. Mr. Colpeper, you deny your Oath? Did you say Sir George Raol was a Scoundrel Fellow for doing as himself?

Mr. Colpeper. Needs, neither then, nor in my whole Life.

L. C. J. Did you say Mr. Denew was a Scoundrel Fellow?

Mr. Colpeper. No, my Lord, never: I saw that Mr. Denew wanted a Colour, and I was relucant not to give him one.

Another Charge for the Defendants.

My Lord, it cannot be recalled, as this Cause stands, that we can be able to see much Evidence. If we could do so, I would not take up your Lordship's Time with my Observations of my own; but I think it is very observable upon the last-mentioned, that the Gentlemen on the other Side have chosen even to Leave to make an Answer to what was said, in reliance to the Defendants.

L. C. J. You had best to call what Witnesses you have; and then if you have a mind to make Observations you may.

Caus. Denew. My Lord, we wish still to have Leave to introduce another Piece of Evidence, the Paper that I have at my Head.

Chief Lord asked.

Caus. Denew. We would first beg Leave to show how Mr. Bristow went to Mr. Colpeper and the Gentlemen that we shall bring, that he showed the Paper to fill: I believe, my Lord, it will appear there was nothing in the Paper but what any Gentleman might say.

Caus. Denew. (Speaking to Chief Lord.) Did Mr. Bristow show you that Paper at any Time, and on what Account?

Chief Lord. Mr. Bristow and I was at the Coffee-House upon the 21st of August, talking of the Behaviour of Mr. Colpeper in Sir George Raol: Considering the different Characters of their Gentlemen, we thought it advisable to have an Accommodation; and in order thereto, we proposed the drawing up of a Paper; Mr. Bristow drew it up, and upon Perusal I approved of it, and did think there was nothing in it but what Mr. Colpeper, or any Gentleman, might for their Heads to, without any Reflection upon their Reputation, and thought Sir George Raol would accept of it; and accordingly Mr. Bristow went, and said Mr. Colpeper was not at home. My Lord, I believe this is the Paper.

Caus. Denew. But I suppose Mr. Colpeper would not sign that Paper: What then?

Chief Lord. There was not a Word spoken of that.
 Caus. Denew. How many Gentlemen were there talking over this Matter?
 Chief Lord. Nobody but Mr. Bristow and myself that I know in the Room there were some other, but no other People knew any thing of the Matter.
 Caus. Denew. But was there any thing said in case he should refuse to sign the Name?

Chief Lord. No.

The Paper shown to Mr. Colpeper.

Caus. Denew. Is that the Paper?

Mr. Colpeper. I am almost sure it is not.

L. C. J. What do you say?

Mr. Colpeper. Indeed, my Lord, I believe it is not.

Caus. Denew. (Speaking to Chief Lord.) Can you say it is the same Paper?

Chief Lord. I cannot say it is the same Paper.

Caus. Denew. But is that a Copy of the Paper that was drawn up?

Chief Lord. I do believe it is the same Paper.

Caus. Denew. But he was not at the Delivery of the Paper to Mr. Colpeper; therefore it is not Evidence.

Serj. Darrell. My Lord, it cannot be read, for so read it is to make it Evidence: And it does not appear by any Proof that it is the Paper, but on the contrary is sworn by Mr. Colpeper not to be the Paper.

L. C. J. (Speaking to Mr. Colpeper.) Can you say it is not the Paper?

Mr. Colpeper. My Lord, to the best of my Judgment it is not the Paper, nor the Signify of it; and there is this Clause left out, That I was to signify Sir George Raol, and all his Friends.

L. C. J. Was that in the Paper you had?

Mr. Colpeper. My Lord, in the Paper I had, I was to ask Pardon of Sir George Raol and all his Friends, though I had never spoke amiss of him.

Caus. Denew. My Lord, he does not believe it to be the same Paper.

Mr. Colpeper. I do not believe it to be the same.

L. C. J. It cannot be read as Evidence.

Caus. Denew. We do not offer it, my Lord, as the Paper that was actually drawn, but that the Jury may see that Mr. Bristow went upon an amiable Design; we offer it so far.

Caus. Denew. Do you, Mr. Colpeper, say it was the same Paper?

Mr. Colpeper. That which was tendered to me was most ignominious.

The Lord Winchester was read.

Caus. Denew. Pray, my Lord, will you be pleased to give an Account of what you know of this Gentlemen.

Lord Winchester. When I understood there were under such an extraordinary Prosecution, I could do as I thought right to appear for them here: I wonder that their Gentlemen, that are known to be Gentlemen of good Estates and great Honour, should be called Fence-Masters and Duellists. I'll speak first of all to Mr. Bristow, who is a Gentleman that is Esteemed and Worth in Town and Country, that I need say but a very few Words of him; I have long had an intimate Acquaintance with him; there is nothing can be less improper to any Man than he: He is one that values himself upon his Honour and Reputation, and would not do a base Thing for the World. And Mr. Denew is represented as a Fence-Master and Duellist, a Master of Deceit; it is well known he is a Gentleman of good Repute.

L. C. J. He is offered to be one that is silent in Fencing.

Lord Winchester. He has a Commission from the Queen, and hath a double Commission from the Prince at this Time, and is now in a good Circumstances in many Man in the Country, and is well known to be of a good Family; and I am sure he would be very sorry to change (if) Circumstances with this Gentleman that makes Complaint against him; I never knew him give Offence to any Man.

Caus. Denew. Was he a quarrelsome Man?

Lord Winchester. He is a Man of Honour, and will endeavour, when he is injured by any Man, to do himself Right: He hath a great Regard to his Reputation.

The Earl of Thanet sworn.

E. of Thanet. I have known Mr. Bristow for near these twenty Years past, and I never heard but that he acquired himself, as all the Business he transacted, like a very worthy, honest Gentleman, and an understanding Man; and thus is the just Character he hath in the World; and thus did recommend him to the Station he is now in to serve the Queen: He hath been a very civil, honest Man, and I never heard but he was steady and willing to do all kind of good Offices. As to the other Gentlemen, I believe Mr. Denew to be an honest Gentleman; but as to Mr. Bristow, I never heard his Name before.

Caus. Denew. Do you think, my Lord, they would be guilty of an Affliction?

Lord Winchester. Yes, indeed.

Caus. Denew. Is Mr. Bristow in any Place in the Government?

E. of Thanet. He has had a Place in Dover these twenty or thirty Years; and I believe, by the just and good Character he hath had, is made One of the Commissioners of the Customs-House.

Caus. Denew. Are they taken Notice of to be Men of peaceable Temper?

E. of Thanet. I believe Mr. Bristow, by all that I know of him, that there is not another Man in England can believe he would have any Intimation of being in an Affliction.

Lord Winchester. As to Mr. Bristow, hearing his Name, I should have said something of him. He is now actually employed under the Prince and me; and I verily believe he cannot be concerned in a base Affliction.

Sir Benjamin Bathurst sworn.

Bathurst. I have known Mr. Bristow, my Lord, these twenty-seven or twenty-eight Years: I never knew a Man in my Life more moderate, or more diligent to do any good Office; a Man of a very good Temper; ever inclined to quarrel, never provoked; but is always ready to do all the good Offices he can. Mr. Denew, I hear, hath been slightly spoken of, which I wonder at. He was bred a Merchant, has always behaved himself very well, and is a Gentleman of a good Family and plentiful Estate, and hath lived in great Reputation, and did sometimes trade as a Merchant, and, that notwithstanding, he lives now upon his Estate in the Country. As far as I have heard of Mr. Bristow, he hath a good Character of all Mankind, and is now One of the Commissioners of the Customs-House, and I believe is very well esteemed by all that know him.

Caus. Denew. Do you think he would have been guilty of an Affliction?

Bathurst. Indeed, I do not.

L. C. J. (Speaking to the Queen's Counsel.) I would ask you how you fit any Cause upon Mr. Bristow? I will suppose the Words in the Paper which he showed Mr. Colpeper were not proven, and not fit for a Man to sign. But does that make him Guilty?

Caus. Denew. My Lord, he challenged him in express Terms.

Serj. Darrell. My Lord, Mr. Colpeper says, Mr. Bristow came to him, and proposed the signing of a Paper, and that now they shall bring another Paper, and not the same that was first tendered to him, I think is very extraordinary, and makes against them: But then, my Lord, after the Paper was tendered to Mr. Colpeper, (but refused by him) immediately after that Mr. Bristow gave the Challenge.

L. C. J. That is a Question.

Caus. Denew. Says he, Sir George Raol is the Flower of Kent, does friendly Offices, promotes and advances his Friends, and there are twenty will engage themselves in his Quarrel, and I myself for one.

L. C. J. Mr. Colpeper, Pray tell us the Matter.

Colpeper. Says he, I for you have a Friend here, and I have one hard by; Come out, and end it.

L. C. J. I have a Friend by—But this is not an Assault.

Colpeper. Says he, I will take the Quarrel upon myself, and I will stand and fall by Sir George Raol.

Caus. Denew. Did you hear him say so—Colpeper. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. Did he say the same?—Colpeper. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. Mr. Denew. Did you hear him say that he had a Friend below, and therefore he would have him go down and end it; and, that he would take the Quarrel upon himself?

Mr. Denew. He said he would make an End of it presently; that he would stand and fall by Sir George Raol, and to would twenty more; and that if he did not sign, he would be infamed; that there were twenty engaged to the Quarrel.

L. C. J. But did he say, Come out, and end it now; I have a Friend hard by?

Mr. Denew. I did not hear him say, Come out; but I heard him say, There were twenty more would stand and fall with Sir George Raol.

Serj. Darrell. Did you hear him say any thing of coming out?

Mr. Denew. He did, we will end it presently.

L. C. J. Did he say, Come out?

(a) Mr. Colpeper is glad of the different Characters, and hopes the Reader will think it well made out.

(b) Whether this is any Cut to the Paper?

(c) The Gentlemen his Lordship might be misinformed, are the Defendants indicted for Perjury.

My Lord, said Mr. William Colquhoun, going on, I am the most injured Gentleman of my Country. The Matter of my Dispute is true. Perhaps the Matter may be more excusable, than justifiable: Mr. Dundas from a Captain, is made a Lieutenant-Colonel, and Mr. Ansell has a Place of School for Annulls, both since that Crime. 'Tis no wonder if the extreme Sense of my Wrong should excite from me Expectations which your Lordship thinks do not become me. As your Lordship has apprehended me, I doubt not but you will also give just Judgment on the Affidavits.

The Council for the Defendants then apprehending a great Fine, put Mr. William Colquhoun in mind, that he had said at the Trial, Mr. Dundas had but a small Estate.

Mr. William Colquhoun own'd he had said so, and refer'd the Fine to the Pleasure of the Court.

Accordingly Sentence was pass'd upon the Defendants as follows:

Nathaniel Dennis Fin'd 200 Marks.

Richard Brinsley, 100 Pounds.

LIV. The Proceedings before the LORDS of the Council in Scotland, against David Baillie, in Feb. 1703-4, for Defaming the Duke of Queensbury, and the Marquis of Anandale.

THERE having been several Letters stopp'd at the Post-Office in Edinburgh, written in Cypher, &c. which gave Alarm to the Masters of a Plot invented, the Government caus'd David Baillie to be seized, who being brought before the Privy Council, the Lord Justice-Clerk ask'd him, if he was the Person he offer'd to enter him in dispute against the Duke of Hamilton, the Duke of Argyll, and his Brother the Earl of Glencairn, and also, as it had been in a Plot against Mr. M'gilly. To this Question Baillie had by him ready: That the Duke of Queensbury, and Marquis of Anandale, had been meeting with him, as agents against the Person the Lord Justice-Clerk had nam'd.

The Lord Justice-Clerk to examine Baillie, Heed, and when, and upon what Occasion he had met with the Duke of Queensbury, and the Marquis of Anandale? All the Answer they could get of him, was, That he had writ a Letter to the Duke of Hamilton, which contain'd all that he was, as I said, of what he had writ to him. He was told in Council, That he must declare what he had writ in that Letter; it not being enough for him, in a Case of that Nature, to rely to it in general Terms. And in the mean time, left that it might be impossible, Informations, or Advice given from by the Party, which was there Intereft to do, he was committed chief Professor, which in the usual Course the Privy-Council takes, all the Examinations are over. But at the same time he was allow'd Pen, Ink, and Paper, and he said he was in Writing all that he had to say, of what he propos'd to have pass'd between the Duke of Queensbury, the Marquis of Anandale, and him.

Instead of drawing up what he had to say in Writing, as desired by the Privy-Council, he writ a Letter to the Earl of Selkirk, President of the Council, acquainting him, That upon the whole Matter, he could say no more than what he had writ in that Letter, (meaning his to the Duke of Hamilton), and pricks that the Lord Justice-Clerk might show the same to the Privy-Council.

In the mean time, the Lords of the Privy-Council sent two of their Members to the Duke of Hamilton for the Letter Baillie had writ to him, which his Grace deliver'd to them, upon the Clerk of the Council returning him an attested Copy. Thereupon Baillie was again call'd before the Privy-Council, and ask'd, That since he had said in general, that the Duke of Queensbury, and the Marquis of Anandale, had endeavour'd to bribe him to dispute against certain Noble Persons, it was expected now, he should give the Board all the Particulars of that I understand. Baillie still insist'd, That he could make no Answer, except he had a sight of his Letter to the Duke of Hamilton. The Queen's Advocate told him in Council, That by the Law he was oblig'd to answer such Questions as were put to him by the Board, and that if the Letter he had writ to the Duke of Hamilton were true, he could not but remember the material Heads thereof, and if it were false, he ought not to continue in a Lye. The Queen's Advocate put him also in Mind, how unaccountable a Thing it was, That he should not remember what he had writ but five Weeks before, which was the Date of his Letter to the Duke of Hamilton, when at that very Letter, he propos'd to remember a great many Things which had happen'd to him Five Months before, which was the Time he had met with the Duke of Queensbury. The Advocate insist'd further, That his Shuffling in this Matter, caus'd with it, all along, a great Probability, that the Letter he had writ to the Duke of Hamilton had been falsified, or suggest'd to him; and he had first quite forgot his Lesson; whereas, if what he writ to him had been true, (being a Thing in itself so extraordinary,) through he might possibly forget some remote Circumstances, it was impossible he could forget, in so short a Time, the Bulk and material Parts of it. To this being unanswer'd, and him, for the most Part, defending and countering themselves.

Baillie continu'd deaf to all that the Lords of the Council could say to him, and they, to give a fair Handle to recollect his Memory, agreed to draw up some Interrogatories in Writing, which they deliver'd to him, desiring him to give in his Answers likewise in Writing, against the next Time he should be call'd before them.

Accordingly Baillie, when remanded back to Prison, falls to writing something like Answers to the Interrogatories which had been given him. But, upon second Thoughts, he breaks off abruptly, and to cover his Confusion and Intimidation, throws the Ink-Bottle upon the Papers, at Design to blot out what he had writ: Which Paper the Keeper of the Prison brought to the Council.

The Council seeing they could have nothing from him in Writing, after several Days Time given him to do so, call'd for him again, and desired him to answer the Interrogatories Pro Per: And what Answers they were, will best appear, by placing the interrogatories and the Answers in Order.

Baillie's Interrogatories and Answers.

1. Interrogatory 1st. What was the Rise, or Occasion of his being sent for by, or going to the Duke of Queensbury, and Marquis of Anandale, about the Plot? And, if it was any Discourse he had had with any of their Servants or Dependents; or that either he inform'd them, or they discus'd him on that Subject?

Answer. He can give no Answer thereto at all.

2. Inter. 2^d. Who brought him to the Duke of Queensbury? And what was said to him by the Person who desired him to enter to his Grace? And what he answer'd? And about what Time this happen'd, as near as he can remember?

Ans. The Time was about the latter End of July, or the Beginning of August, and does not remember what Mr. Stewart, Servant to the Duke, who brought him to the Duke, said to him; and the Declarant answer'd, Nothing; but went away with him.

3. Inter. 3^d. What the Duke of Queensbury said to him? What Account he gave of the Reason or Cause why he sent for him; or that any Person had recommended him? And who the Person was? And that he give Account of any other Circumstances, that might have been the Cause or Occasion of the Duke's Enquiry?

Ans. Does not remember what the Duke of Queensbury said to him; nor can he answer at present, what was the Reason the Duke gave for sending for him. And says, That the Duke said, he was recommended to him; but would not tell the Declarant, by whom.

4. Inter. 4th. What the Duke said to him? What he inform'd him of either as to Things, or Persons? And what he defin'd of him? And for what Cause? And what Arguments he us'd, to induce him to be free and plain?

Ans. He cannot recollect himself of what the Duke inform'd him, as to any other Person, and will not answer, at present, what the Duke defin'd of him: Nor will he answer, what Arguments the Duke us'd with him, to be free and plain with his Grace.

5. Inter. 5th. If the Duke nam'd to him any Persons? And what the Persons were? And what the Duke desired to know of him concerning them? And what he answer'd about the said Persons, or any thing that was discus'd to him?

Ans. Yes: And what their Persons were, will not answer at present. What did the Duke desire of him concerning their Persons? He is not to answer that at this Time: What Answer he gave to the Duke, when he desired to know any thing of their Persons, &c. Will not answer that either.

6. Inter. 6th. If the Duke, at parting, appointed him a new Time, or said he would send again for him? And to what Purpose? And, if he did him require, at remember himself better, as to any Particular, and bring him an Account of it?

Ans. If the Duke, at parting, appointed a new Meeting with him? Says No: But said he would send for him again. If the Duke did bid him to remember, or enquire, as to any Particular, and bring him an Account of it? He cannot answer that just now.

7. Inter. 7th. When he met with the Duke the second Time? And what was the Occasion of it? And what further Discourse was betwixt them? And if any Persons were then nam'd? Or he defin'd to witness against them, or to witness any Part of the Plot, or then Hand therein, or any Correspondence thereabouts? And what else pass'd in the Second Meeting?

Ans. At what Time he met with the Duke the Second Time, he cannot remember: And that was the Occasion of his Meeting with the Duke the Second Time, he cannot answer. As to that, What Discourse was betwixt them the Second Time, he cannot recollect any Particular that pass'd betwixt them just now. And if he us'd any Persons to him? Declares, Yes: And what their Persons were? He will not answer that. And if he defin'd him to witness against any Person? He will not answer that just now.

8. Inter. 8th. How long after was the Third, and then the Fourth Meetings? And if any thing occur'd in the mean time? And what was the Occasion of the said Meetings? And what pass'd therein, either as to Persons or Things?

Ans. When was the Third or Fourth Meeting he had with the Duke? He did not mind: And what occasion'd the Third or Fourth Meeting with the Duke? He will not tell that at this Time: And what pass'd betwixt them at the Third or Fourth Meeting, either as to Persons, or Things? He is not to answer at this Time.

9. Inter. 9th. That you answer all the above Questions: As to the Occasion and Manner of your coming to the Marquis of Anandale? And what he said to, and demand'd of you? And what you answer'd? And what Persons he nam'd to you? And what he requir'd of you as to those Persons? And what Encouragement he promised you? And for what Cause?

Ans. Who brought him to the Marquis of Anandale? Answer'd, A Gentleman, whose Name is hous, as he believes: And what the Marquis said, or ask'd of him? He will not answer at this Time: And what Persons the Marquis nam'd to him? Answers, He is not to name them now. And what he did require of you, as to these Persons?

* These, and the other Letters, are all inserted together at the Close of this Proceeding.

Answers

"I believe, and that is a Quality makes any Person capable both to manage and conceal his Designs: And I so assure you, Madam, said he to me, I do think there is no Person fit to carry on a close Design, as Mr. Baillie; for though I know there has been nothing done these ten Years or more, since the other Side, but what has been acknowledged, or proved to; yet I could never, notwithstanding of my Religion and Intimacy with him, discover whether he was so engaged or not, but that I knew it perfectly well from another that is concerned, that I hope to see in a Week or two, then I shall know the meaning of these Letters. Soon after that, may it please your Grace, I went to call for Mr. Baillie, where, near his Door, upon the Stairs, I met, or rather found standing, a Black, who I have since in a red Coat, laced, and he was then in a dark Gown. I went to the Door, knocked, and he went in and engaged for Mr. Baillie, the Maid told me, he was not within; then, said he, I will go into his Chamber, and sit down, and cool myself, and he was going, but the Maid stopped me, and prayed me to walk in to her Mistress, who told me, I must excuse the Maid; for to tell me the Truth, Mr. Baillie was within, and a Gentleman that I met; but had given Orders to say he was out, because he was to be busy, so I proved me to sit down there a little, which I did; and after some Time, what I had heard, which was a great deal more than what was said to say here, because it mentioned the Person, who I fancy the Black I saw upon the Stairs, belongs to, gave me the Curiosity to ask, if they knew who was with Mr. Baillie. They said, No. Dear me, I wish I have forgotten was I told you when I met the Black upon the Stairs. What does he belong to the Gentleman that it was Mr. Baillie? I do not know, said the Maid, but I see a Black came in to Mr. Baillie this Afternoon; and it is very like he came to see if he was within; for I heard Mr. Baillie say, as he went out, Give my Service, and I will wait myself until he comes; and to be walked up and down the Entry for above half an Hour, and then the Gentleman that is still with him, knocked, and Mr. Baillie let him in himself; and as soon as he had earned him in, he came out and said, I am not within to any Body; this is all I know, said he: So I was obliged to go home without feeling of him. But I could not be at Ease till I see him, and so I found him this Morning sitting, but I know not what yet it served to increase my Suspicion, for after he had done writing, he put what he had wrote into a Play-Book, and rolled it up hard, and tied it with a Pack-thread, and sealed it; and so left then half an Hour, which was ten o'clock, there came a Maid who I have seen since in a red Livery Laced, with Good Morrow, Sir, I come for Gravel, if you think fit to send him. No, answered Mr. Baillie, I cannot spare him: But there is a Play will do as well; and they may either keep it, return, or burn it as they please; so away went the Maid, who was in black; and I said, What Mass is this? But Mr. Baillie waved answering, and talked of the Weather, and indifferent Things, so I had no other Way left to satisfy my Curiosity but to call out, Nay, now I believe all I heard Yesterday of you, Mr. Baillie: Pray, what was that, said he? Why, that you are a Plottist; and so I told him all, and what Suspicion he being that way with him I fancied the Black belonged to; and his sending away Writings under the Cover of this Play. He only smiled, and said, I think it is certain, that he will Nobody that knows me, believe me a Plottist; for I have not a Head for that, and I know nothing of any Letters at all, nor of any Body that would write to me, that need to do it secretly: But if they did, I should not trouble any Body to explain them; neither, if I were capable, should I give myself the Pain to unlock any other Persons Letters: So I do not see how it concerns me at all; for that Gentleman's Weakness that is pleased to give me such a good Character, as he believed, I pray him for it if he designs it kindly; if otherwise, I dispute the Impertinence of it, as being altogether groundless, as your Suspicion is, Madam, said he: And no doubt, wherever is contained in those Letters, is very well known before this Time; for I believe it is only a Trick to amuse the People with an Apprehension of a Popish Successor, that they may, with the more Ease, bring about the Design of turning Hann declared here, as in England. And thus, I suppose, is Mr. Baillie's Plot, and his Father-in-Law, the Queen's Advocate, and the rest of our Courtiers, excepting his Grace the Commissioner. Nay, at that word, said I, you except him. Yes, Madam, said he, I except him, not because he is Commissioner, but because he is the Devil, if not the only good Man amongst them. For though I am no Courtier, I go sometimes to see them; but the Dutchess looks always to find at me, I believe I shall go no more. At that time I observed her Grace looking so to me, I thought it might be because of my Climate, or my Stockings, being sometimes Pink-coloured, or blue, which are too youthful for me; but she I find is not the Thing: For the last Time I was there, her Grace still looked, though I think there was nothing remarkable, or very monstrous about me. But I am apt to imagine his Grace, the Commissioner, knows me again; which I wonder, considering he never sees me but once, and that was at Night, and I was in my own Hair; and so I had feared me to the Dutchess; and she wonders I come there. Why, said I, should I wonder at that? Nay, that I cannot tell, said he, except he, that formerly has done me the Honour to be the Duke of Sydney's know, or at least believe, I could do him some Manner of Service last Winter while I was at London. And his Grace was pleased to send me by Mr. Stewart. But that I imagined what it was, yet I feared ignorant, because I could not have done what would have been of Service to his Grace, without injuring others; though for what I know, I might as well have done it as not. Nay, said I, if it be so, why do you not do it? No; that Time, says he, is past. Not but that I know that it would be of more Service to his Grace than that would have been, or any Thing else that can happen to him. Pray, for God's sake, tell me what that is, said I. No, says he, I dare not, but I have a Care of that: It is not for you, or any Woman to know that, without it were the Queen; nor any Man except it were the Queen's Commissioner. And if he knew his Enemies, I think, would have a great deal to say at that. Madam, we have had enough of this; say, and it shall be done, I shall sometime longer; then bid adieu; and was so gone. I then, but I undertook to give your Grace this Trouble, which I have done with all the Exactness my Memory would serve me, and which I thought myself obliged from two powerful Reasons: First, I have the Honour to be of your Grace's Country; and the next, I have received many extraordinary Civilities from your Grace's most noble and unresolvable Brother, my Lord of Bedford. And therefore, if your Grace thinks fit to take Notice of this, I hope you will order it so, that Mr. Baillie may not suffer me for having given your Grace so much Intelligence, for that might prove of very ill Consequence to me, being a stranger, if your Grace should intimate this to any Person but the Commissioner, who, no doubt, will certainly find it return to account, to give Mr. Baillie. He lodges at Mrs. Arden's, in Kensington's Church, near the Treasury.

"May it please your Grace,

"I am your Grace's, &c."

About the 11th of October, the Day before the Marquis of Arundell, left London, to attend her Majesty upon a special Call, there was a Letter directed to him, from the same Hand with that to the Dutchess of Sydney, signed Charlotte Gaylard, in the following Words, viz.

LETTER to the Marquis of Arundell.

My Lord,

"THE Desire I have to serve your Lordship, puts me upon giving you your Lordship this Trouble, which is, in my Words, to let you know, my Lord, I had one Mr. Baillie has in his Power to do an extraordinary Piece of Service, to the Advantage of the QUEEN's Affairs, and your Lordship's Interest, which is to inform me: Therefore do not fight the Advance of her that loves you, and wishes your Prosperity and Glory, but send for Mr. Baillie, who is truly, to do him Justice, a Person of great Modesty and clear Sense, and generous to be yours. And though I shall not be able to do this Time, my Lord, yet I will tell you that he is able to do what you will put the Queen's Honours and your own upon your Power, and for ever desire the Dutchess. I think I need say no more, the Queen's Service and your own Interest will sufficient Persuasions to Discretion and Care, only I am to beg of you, my Lord, not to say any Thing of this Letter, unless that I have given your Lordship, in any Person; for I suppose you need not want a Presence to find Mr. Baillie in your coming to speak to you; and I have as little Reason to doubt but your Lordship, if he comes to you, will take all the kind and friendly Ways to gain the Point. To make which the more easy, you may tell him, You know very well that at this very Time, there is Designs carrying on both in England and France, as well as in Scotland. And though you do not know all the Particulars, and Persons concerned, yet you know that he does; and that is not all, for your Lordship may intimate that you know that my Lord Dumfries, the Night before he went out of Town, came to Mr. Baillie's Chamber about ten o'clock at Night, and that till Eleven; at which Hour came a certain Duke, and a little after another Titular or pretended Duke in Women's Cloaths, and several others, to the Number of eleven Persons; and that till about four o'clock in the Morning. This I think is sufficient to your Lordship, for you must manage all with Secrecy and Caution, and give no Alarm by Unkindness or Violence. Now, my Lord, I am to tell you your Lordship, Mr. Baillie's last, the very first Clue about the Sign at the door, on the South-side of the Way, at one Mr. Adam. I am, my Lord, your Lordship's unknown, but most sincere and hearty Well-wisher, and most humble servant,

"CHARLOTTE COMSTABLE."

The Letter directed thus: To the Right Honourable the Marquis of Arundell, Lord Professor of Her Majesty's Privy Council. And in a Cover directed to Mr. Croft, at the Marquis of Arundell's. And wrote within, Sir deliver the enclosed immediately to my Lord.

Upon the 21st of December, Baillie, after he had been at the Lord Bathurst's, came to the Duke of Hamilton's Lodgings, where he delivered a signed Declaration, by Way of Letter to his Grace, in the following Words:

Edinburgh, Decemb. 21st, 1793.

May it please your Grace,

"THE Noise that is every where of a Plot, makes me think it my Duty to inform your Grace what happened to me during the last Session of Parliament, which, in a few Words, was this, The Duke of Sydney, then Commissioner, sent for me, (but by whose Intimation I was never able to learn) and after a great Proclamation of Kindness, and Declarations of Readiness to do me Service, his Grace did allege, That he had in from very good Hands, that there were Designs carrying on in Scotland, England, and Ireland, to subvert the present Government, and to restore the Prince of Wales; and as he alleged, I was an ignorant of them; so that he hoped and expected me for his Side, as well as my own, and above all, for his Preservation of His Majesty's Person and Government, so far as he knew the whole Matter. To which Demands, I was obliged to answer, though not without Surprize, and extreme confusion. Yet Truly, when I hope I had never given me, obliged me to declare my own Innocence, and my Ignorance of all such wicked Schemes.

D 4

"When the Duke of Anjou's Bill inflicting, I was oblig'd to offer to at what I was going, he call'd me back from the Door, confessing his Kindness to me, for he had us'd me not only as a Servant, but his personal Friendship, and desired me to what I did, for he would not leave me in, which indeed I found I - my small Mortification, for a few Days after, he sent Mr.
Stewart, the same Gentleman that he had employ'd to bring me to him before I and Mr. Stewart having left the Room, the Duke went to his Cabinet, and as he was opening it, told me, He would show me a Raby, but having search'd some of the Drawers of his Cabinet, he seem'd as if he had been surpris'd, and said, he believ'd he had left what he look'd for with his Wife, and had forgot to go to her to the Door, coll'd, came back again, and sat down, and would needs, whether it was Reason or not, force me to do the like: And then he told me, He had a mind to show me three Letters, that were carry'd by the Duke of the Duchess to a Person, that it seem'd was of the same Name; that on doubt they contain'd Matters of dangerous Consequence against the Government. Just as he had said that, Mr. Bruce, that is his Fa-let de Chene, &c. came and whisper'd him, and when he was gone, the Duke told me, That the Duchess had let the President of the Sessions carry away the Letters, but however, said he, I know very well you know what is in them, and more so. Which when I replied, it was impossible, having never seen them: He smil'd, and said, I will warrant you do not know nothing of my Lord Number Three, or Seven, nor Phosphorus.
Not indeed, my Lord, I answer'd, I know nothing of what your Grace means. Then you do not know Duke Hamilton, my Lord of Abol, nor the Chancellor, nor never so much, at head of my Lord Duke of most, Redoubt, nor my Lord Tark, nor Blaster. Well, well, said he, Mr. Baulie, you will say nothing to me, but you for I am not to ignorant as you take me to be, for I know very well who are Pensioners to France, and who are not; Nay, I know my Lord of Abol, and your Convert, the Chancellor, is amongst the first of them now, tho' may be they have not been so long as your great Duke of Hamilton, Marshall, and Ambassadors, for I know the Duke of Hamilton has been in these many Years. But when I again, and again aliter'd the Truth, That I knew nothing of all that, and that at your Grace, and all the rest of the Noblemen named, were as ignorant, and as innocent as I, certainly they were unnecessary to his Grace, for they were generally believed to be the best Men of the Nation: At which he cry'd out mightily, and said a great many words Things that had been done by your Grace, as he proceeded: But I will not now trouble your Grace with a Relation of them at this Time, deigning, if it please God I live, to publish the whole Conference at large, both to satisfy my Conscience, and Country, or the Duke of Anjou's Practices to gain me to make the most hard of all Lyes, and the most dangerous, for he offer'd me great Promises, and Money, even what I pleas'd, if I would but, as he term'd it, tell the Queen what he would tell me; for it seem'd, I would force him to be plain with me, because I would not understand. But if I would go to the Queen, and tell her Majesty, That Duke Hamilton, Abol, the Chancellor, and the other named Lyes, are actually Pensioners to France, and that they had a Publick Bond and Assign'd for buying up Arms, and other Stores of War, then he would not only promise, but perform. And if I could undertake this, then he would immediately let me see a List of all these he would have brought into the Plot, and he would swear never to let any Person know but that it was a real Plot: And that I had made the Discovery first to him; and that he had sent me to the Queen: I say, provided I would say after him, and swear to it. Your Grace may imagine, I was not a little put to it for an Answer, and as I remember, it was this: That I thought his Grace's Advice were certainly the best, where there was a real Plot: But for a Person to make a Lye to me, and to expect from that upon altogether innocent, for as I knew, it was what I hope that I shall never think of but with Trembling and Detesta-tion. But if any thing occurred to me, the Discovery of which might be a Service to the Queen, or my Country, none would be readier than myself. Th's, as may it please your Grace, I thought fit to advertise you of, being a short Abridgement of what pass'd 'twixt the Duke of Anjou and me. But it seems to me, he having failed in his Attempt on my Integrity, employ'd the Marquis of Anandale on the same Design; who did, to do him Justice, use no other another manner. For having got me into his Clutches, if I may speak for for he sent for me the very Day before he went to London, and would not part with me, he said, till I went to London with him, to tell the Queen how well he was serv'd by Duke Duke of Abol, who, he knew, had been at the Chambers with your Grace in Women's Cloaths, and that there came thence, all that I named before, and my Lord Drummond, and Fenwick, and several others, to the Number of Eighteen: And that there they us'd of bringing home the Prince of Wales, and all that was necessary for such an Enterprize. To which, when I answer'd, there was never any such Meeting, he said, we should understand one another better when we got into English Ground: For he thought it was unnecessary to tell me, That I must not only say there was such a Meeting, but swear it, which if I did, it would leave it in my Power to make myself for ever, and might be an Officer of State before I left London again. But when I reply'd, that I was not fond of leaving a Lye, and that it was impossible for me, to bring myself to think of such a thing, and that I would not, that I had never us'd an Inclination to go to London, so go on that Score, there follow I hop'd he would excuse me. But he was so far from that, he drew in a Pistol, and (swore he would be revenged. And when he fix'd that did not prevail neither, he fell a coaxing me again; but I think God, he did not succeed that Way neither. Yet I told him at parting, I was his humble servant; and when I really would have been, so far as never to have had upon this most abominable Villainy, tho' fare nothing could be more provok'd in, than to be sent for by People
I had never had Convers'd with, nor Obligation to, nor Dependence upon:
And there to be flatter'd with great Rewards, if I would become a "Villain, the most perjured of all Men; but threaten'd to De- stroy him, if I refus'd my Integrity and Loyalty. For finally, by the sort of these presents what they will, nothing can be more absurd, than thus to abuse the best of Queens, and to endanger the best of Subjects, and indeed the only good Part of the Nation: And who, if there were any way to be attempt'd, would certainly stand by the Queen, and Country, when such Men as the Duke of Anjou, and Marquis of Anandale, would desert both. May it please your Grace, I was saying before, I would never say any thing of this, had not the Noise of a Plot met me everywhere, and I could find no longer Patience. And I never think of my Silence, but you easily to do with Apprehensions of the Danger, that the Duke of Abol, and a great many other Persons are fallen into; which perhaps I might have in some measure prevented, if I had sooner given your Grace the Truth of this, so you might have warn'd the Duke of the Danger of his Enmity, which I hope you will do now without further Delay. May it please your Grace, I am Your Grace's most humble Servant as all Sincerity and Truth.

The LETTER is the Earl of Eglinton, Prefect of the Council, pro Tempore.

My Lord,

"FROM what my Lord Justice Clerk said, I find that I owe my pe- dest Misfortune to him; and that it was his Lordship that procur'd my Confinement, upon the Information given him, by whom I know not: But he may please to know, that I give no Information to any Person, in relation to the Business that happened to me, from his Grace the Duke of Anjou, or my Lord Marquis of Anandale, conditionally. For I left it to them, whom I inform'd, to make what Use they pleas'd of my Information. So consequently my Lord Jus-ice Clerk may, without the least Scruple, produce his Informer, and He my Information, which was not Verbal, but in Writing. Therefore, my Lord, if you please, this is what I think most honorable for me; because, as I understand my Lord Justice Clerk, it was three Weeks since he had notice of this Business, but that he delay'd apprehending me, because the Person that spoke of me to him, did not think it fit to attempt it, till there was a Warrant to seize me, because I was a Gentleman. Now, my Lord, I think what he pleas'd to add, would not have given me the Assurance, to have said that I did so myself, for it is a very glorious One, and it shall be one of the chief Studies of my Life to maintain it. And therefore, my Lord, without Prejudice, or Disobedience, or Obligation, to either the Duke of Anjou, or the Marquis of Anandale, or my Lord Justice Clerk, I do plainly say, that whatever Information I gave on this Affair, was in Writing, and without either Caution or Secrecy for my own Safety: which, I think, will by my own Innocence be best secur'd to me, not but that I hope all Justice from the Board, where my Lord Eglinton sits, and who most certainly beg, that your Lordship will be pleas'd to define my Lord Justice Clerk to show the Information I have already given; which, I think, will abundantly show how little I regard the Esteem of my Persons, when I come in Competition with that of my Conscience, for I will always speak Truth, through the Assistance of God, whatever be the Consequence. Now, my Lord, I am really to ill, that I am scarce able to say any thing of what the Earl of Glasgow seems to lay some Stress upon; my not owning ready enough, (as he thinks) the Signification of every Word in Mr. Stiel's Letter: I will only say this, That Mr.
Stiel and I have convers'd long, and very frequently, and with great Freedom, but without any other Design than to direct and amuse with little bits of good Humour: For sometimes Hours to one another would be all Killers, after our manner, some all Tenderers; some all Scandals, some all Gallantry; some all Selfishness; some all Devotion; and some all together, and some all Commendations, and Services, to the Lord knows who; the acquiescent, and unacquiescent. But I cannot think that or that Mr. Stiel had nam'd all the People of both Nations that were at London, when I was there, and desired me to give his Service to them all, if I like them, that was any thing in this, to oblige me to deny it; for I think Mr. Stiel may very freely own any thing he ever wrote to me in his Life, and I am sure will own any Letter I ever wrote to Mr. Stiel.
My Lord, excuse this, I am sensible I have thras'd from your Lordship's Orator, but the Reason why I did so, was, because my Lord Justice Clerk did seem to say as much, as if it were to secure his Informer from the Suspicion of a false Accuser, that I was taken into Custody, seizing I might either deny, or go out of the Way. As to the saying Truth, I think no human Estate could induce me to do that. And as for my going out of the Way, I had no Inclination, for if I had, I am sure I have had Time and Opportunity enough these five Weeks to have done that: For upon the very first breaking out of the Plot, at least, so as to be publick here, I sent a written Account of what had happen'd, which I am sure is Truth, as to the Matter of Fact which I am to say from denying, that I define your Lordship may prove my Lord Jus-ice Clerk to present the Paper to the Council, if you think fit; tho' I do say it was not to his Lordship that I sent it; yet it is certain it has been communicated to him; and I desire to have an Opportunity to own it, as well to free the Person that communicated it to the Justice Clerk from the Suspicion of a malicious or false Accuser, as to satisfy your Lordship. To do which, and to obtain my Liberty again I will do every thing becoming a Christian and a Gentleman, a Prisoner but no Plaiter. My Lord, I beg leave to say, that I am,

Edinburgh, Tolbooth,
Feb. 4, 1746.

The Earl of Eglinton.

very Obedient Servant.

John Felt,		Edward Bransfield,
John Wally,		Samuel Legg,
Joseph Lynde,		Near Waples,
John Thacher,		Samuel Apollon,

Members of His Majesty's Council, in the Province of the Massachusetts-Bay, &c.

The COURT being Set: Proclamation was made for Silence.

AND then the Statute made in the Eleventh and Twelfth Year of the late King WILLIAM, ENTITLED, An Act for the more effectual Suppression of Piracy; And also the late King WILLIAM's Commission under the Great Seal, pursuant to the Act aforesaid, constituting the Court, &c. were publicly read.

After which, John Melville, Gent. Notary Publick, was sworn Register of the Court by the President: And then the Register administered the Oath prescribed to the President, and then the President administered the Oath to the other Commissioners in open Court, pursuant to the Act aforesaid.

And then the Court was opened by Three Proclamations, as a Court of Admiralty, for Trial of Pirates, &c.

After which was read Her Majesty's Proclamation, signifying Her Royal Pleasure, That all Persons being in Office of Authority, or Government, at the Death of the late King, should to continue till Her Majesty's further Direction: Then was read Two Letters from Her Majesty to his Excellency, in the Trial of Pirates, to govern the same according to the aforesaid Act of Parliament, and Commission thereupon.

A Warning having been given by several of the Commissioners to the Keeper of the Prison, to bring Captain John Quelch before them, to answer several Articles of Piracy, Robbery, and Murder, exhibited against him and Company, pursuant to the Governor's Order for the Setting of the Court this Day.

The Court adjourned to Three of the Clock in the Afternoon. When the Court being met, and opened, Matthew Pinner, John Clifford, and James Powell (the first of whom had furnished himself previously after his Arrival to his Excellency the Governor), were brought to the Bar, and Arraigned upon several Articles of Piracy, Robbery, and Murder, drawn against Captain Quelch, and others his Accomplishers.

On the Tenth following, Matthias Montano.

At a Court of Admiralty, hold at Boston, in Her Majesty's Province of the Massachusetts-Bay, in New-England, in America, the Thirtieth Day of June, Anno Dom. 1704. And in the Third Year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lady ANNE, of England, &c. Queen.

ARTICLES of Piracy, Robbery, and Murder, shew and then exhibited against John Quelch, Charles de Boston, as the said President, Maritime, Lieutenant of the Brigantine Charles, whereby Daniel Ploverman, Adamus, &c. were late Comers.

You stand here accused of Piracy, Robbery, and Murder.

THAT notwithstanding the said Brigantine was fitted out by several worthy Merchants of Bydon, good and loyal Subjects of Her Majesty, (against the French and Spanish Kings, their Vassals, Subjects, and Allies, the declared Enemies of Her most Excellent Majesty Queen ANNE) who obtained a Commission for that Purpose, from His Excellency, Joseph Dudley, Esq. Her Majesty's Captain-General, Governor, and Commander in Chief, in and over the said Province, by Force wherof, and in pursuance of the necessary Instructions to your Commissioner, the said Captain Ploverman delivered (whereof you were apprized), He, with his Company, sailed in the said Brigantine from Bydon, the Fourth Day of August, 1703, for Newfoundland, and L'Anse-au-Loup, but falling violently sick, and languishing in his Cabin, you, with divers others, for some Time, bolted the Cabin Door upon him, and he, shortly afterwards, That it is say, the sixth Day of the said Month of August, 1704, you neglecting his Orders, and trade of your Owners, to return with the said private Man of War to Bydon, would use for on Shore Matthew Pinner, and John Clifford, Two of your Company, who (declaring your first and intention) secretly desired the same, but here up the Blind to Sea, directing your Course for Paradise Island, and the Coast of Brasil, whither it is open, manifest, you intended Murder, Piracy, and Robberies; which afterwards you perpetrated.

I. For that you, the said John Quelch, with divers others, on or about the 18th Day of November, 1703, in the Second Year of Her Majesty's Reign, at or near the Latitude of Seven, South Latitude, on the Coast of Brasil, at or near Cape St. Augustine, by Force and Arms, upon the High Sea (within the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England), piratically and feloniously did surprise, seize, and take a small Fishing Vessel, (having Portuguese Men on board) and belonging to the Subjects of the King of Portugal, (Her Majesty's good Ally) and out of her, then and there, within the Jurisdiction aforesaid, feloniously and piratically did, by Force and Arms, take and carry away a Quantity of Fish and Salt to the Value of Three Pounds.

III. That you, the said John Quelch, with divers others, on or about the Twenty-fourth Day of November, 1703, in the Second Year of Her Majesty's Reign, at or near the Latitude of Nine South, near Cape St. Augustine aforesaid, by Force and Arms, upon the High Sea, (within the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England aforesaid) piratically and feloniously did surprise, seize, and take a small Brigantine, of the Burthen of about Forty Tons, (having Portuguese Men on board) and belonging to the Subjects of the King of Portugal, (Her Majesty's good Ally) bound for Paradise and out of her, then and there, within the Jurisdiction aforesaid, feloniously and piratically did, by Force and Arms, take and carry away Five Chests of Brasil Sugar, to the Value of One Hundred and Fifty Pounds, a Quantity of Molasses, Rice, and Famine, to the Value of Ten Pounds.

IV. That you, the said John Quelch, with divers others, on the Fifth Day of December, 1703, in the Second Year of Her Majesty's Reign, at or near the Latitude of Thirteen South Latitude, off or near Alora, by Force and Arms, upon the High Sea, (within the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England aforesaid) piratically and feloniously did surprise, seize, and take a small Portuguese Ship, navigated by, and belonging to the Subjects of the King of Portugal, (Her Majesty's good Ally) and out of her, then and there, within the Jurisdiction aforesaid, feloniously and piratically did, by Force and Arms, take and carry away a Quantity of Eastern-wares, Value Five Shillings, Two Jars of Rum, Value Ten Shillings, a Quantity of Linen Cloth, Value Ten Shillings.

V. That you, the said John Quelch, with divers others, on the Fifth Day of December, 1703, in the Second Year of Her Majesty's Reign, at or near the Latitude of Thirteen South, off or near Alora aforesaid, by Force and Arms, upon the High Sea, (within the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England aforesaid) piratically and feloniously did surprise, seize, and take a Portuguese Boat, navigated by, and belonging to the Subjects of the King of Portugal, (Her Majesty's good Ally) and out of her, then and there, within the Jurisdiction aforesaid, feloniously and piratically did, by Force and Arms, take and carry away four Pieces of Cloth, Value Five Shillings, Two Pieces of Silk, Value Twenty Pounds, and took the said Boat, Value of Thirty Pounds.

VI. That you, the said John Quelch, with divers others, on the Ninth Day of December, 1703, in the Second Year of Her Majesty's Reign, at or near the Latitude of Thirteen South, off or near Alora aforesaid, by Force and Arms, upon the High Sea, (within the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England aforesaid) piratically and feloniously did surprise, seize, and take a Portuguese Brigantine, Burthen about Twenty Tons, and an open Boat navigated by, and belonging to the Subjects of the King of Portugal, (Her Majesty's good Ally) and out of them, then and there, within the Jurisdiction aforesaid, feloniously and piratically did, by Force and Arms, take about Forty Pounds in Portuguese coined Money, a Negro Boy, Value Twenty Pounds, some Rice and Famine, Value Five Shillings.

VII. That you, the said John Quelch, with divers others, on the Twentieth Day of December, 1703, in the Second Year of Her Majesty's Reign, at or near the Latitude of Twenty-three and Forty Minute South, upon the Coast of Brasil, near the Island of Graciosa, by Force and Arms, upon the High Sea, (within the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England aforesaid) piratically and feloniously did surprise, seize, and take a small Portuguese Brigantine, Burthen about Twenty-five Tons, navigated by, and belonging unto the Subjects of the King of Portugal, (Her Majesty's good Ally) and out of her, then and there, within the Jurisdiction aforesaid, feloniously and piratically did, by Force and Arms, take and carry away Five Chests of Brasil sugar, Value One Hundred and Fifty Pounds, and a small Parcel of Portuguese Money, some Gold and silver, Value Fifty Pounds.

VIII. That

VIII. That you, the said John Quelch, with divers others, on the Fifthteenth Day of January, 1725, in the Second Year of His Majesty's reign, as we read the Laws of Twenty four Statute, upon the Coast of Brazil, by Force and Arms, upon the High Sea, (within the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England) piratically and feloniously did surprise, seize, and take a Portuguese Brigantine, burthen about Thirty-five Tons, the same being Ship's Tender, bound for Rio de Janeiro, navigated with, and belonging to the Subjects of the King of Portugal, (His Majesty's good Ally) and cut her, then and there, within the Jurisdiction aforesaid, feloniously and piratically, by Force and Arms, did take and carry away One Hundred Weight of Gold Dust, Value Six Thousand Pounds, and Nine Hundred Pieces of silver Gold, Value Nine Hundred Pounds.

IX. That you the said John Quelch, with divers others, on the Seventeenth Day of February, 1725, in the Second Year of His Majesty's reign, as we read the Laws of Twenty-five and Fifty Statute, near the River in Piauí, by Force and Arms, upon the High Sea, (within the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England and elsewhere) piratically and feloniously did surprise, seize, and take a Portuguese Ship, burthen about Two Hundred Tons, Twelve Guns, laden with Hides and Tallow, bound to Beyra, navigated with, and belonging unto the Subjects of the King of Portugal, (His Majesty's good Ally) and then and there, within the Jurisdiction aforesaid, did feloniously kill and murder the Commander thereof, and wounded several others, and out of her piratically, by Force and Arms, did take and carry away Twelve Bunches, and a Pipe of Beef, Value Ten Pounds; Four great Guns, Value Twenty Pounds; Four Bombs, Value Forty Shillings; Twelve small Arms, Value Six Pounds; One Hundred Weight of Shot, Value Three Pounds; Two Barrels of Powder, Value Twelve Pounds; a new Main-sail, Fore-sail and Fore-top-sail, Value Forty Pounds; a Negro Boy, Value Forty Pounds; and about Two Hundred Pieces of Light, Spanish Money, contrary to the Statute in this Case made and provided.

Upon which Articles, Matias Mateus, Matthew Pinner, John Clifford, and James Parrot, being arraigned, severally pleaded Guilty.

Ordered, That Matthew Pinner, John Clifford, and James Parrot, be received unto the Queen's Mercy, and be declared Witnesses in Behalf of the Queen, against John Quelch and Company, for their several Piracies, Robberies, and Murders.

Ordered, That Matthew Pinner, John Clifford, and James Parrot, stand within the Bar, and be sworn as Witnesses on Her Majesty's Behalf.

Ordered, That Captain John Quelch be brought to the Bar, where being brought, he was arraigned upon the several foregoing Articles of Piracy, &c. to which the said John Quelch pleaded, Not Guilty, but moved for Time to prepare for his Trial.

Ordered, That Time be given him 'till Friday Morning next, at Nine o'Clock.

The Prisoner also moved, to know whether he might not have Counsel allowed him, upon any Matter of Law that might happen upon his Trial.

Order, The Articles upon which you are arraigned are plain Matters of Fact; however, that you may have no Reason to complain of Hardship, Mr. James Matthews, Attorney at Law, may assist you, and officiate as Matter of Law on your Behalf upon your Trial.

Ordered, That the Prisoner at the Bar have a Copy of the Articles exhibited against him; and then he was remanded to Prison.

Ordered, That a Minute be made, that it is declared by Pinner, Clifford, and Parrot, that James Quelch, of Buenos Aires, was not of the Company belonging to the Brigantine Cherish, which was named in the first Articles for the Voyage.

Ordered, That John Lambert, John Miller, William Williams, Benjamin Fortin, Christopher Saunders, James Aylin, John Dorely, Abraham Richardson, Ricard Lawrence, John Tompkins, John Parsons, Abraham Jones, Erasmus Perkins, John King, Francis King, Charles Kay, Peter Ranch, David Carter, and John Larner be brought to the Bar; who being placed at the Bar, were severally arraigned upon the Articles of Piracy, Robbery, and Murder, before-mentioned, Matias Mateus: To which they severally pleaded, Not Guilty, and then moved for Counsel, and Time to prepare for their Trial.

Ordered, That Mr. Matthews assist the Prisoners in any Matters of Law, and that the Prisoners prepare for their Trial on Friday next, at Nine o'Clock in the Morning: And then the Court adjourn'd 'till Friday Morning.

Friday, 10th Feb.

Proclamation being made, the Court was opened, and Captain Quelch being brought to the Bar, presented a Petition in Behalf of himself, and the rest of the Prisoners, praying for further Time.

Ordered, That the Prisoners be allowed Time till Monday Morning next at Nine o'Clock, and then promptly to come upon their Trial: A Motion was also made by the Prisoners Counsel, that the Queen's Witnesses might be kept aside till the Prisoners came upon their Trial; to which it was answered by the Counsel for the Queen, that though in Cases of High Treason, and some other Cases, the Prisoners have been so far favoured, as that upon their Trial, Approvers, or other Evidences for the Crown have been kept out of hearing, of one another while they were giving their several Evidence, yet to separate them before their Trial, was without Precedents, upon which the Court deny'd the Motion of the Prisoners Counsel in that Matter; has directed that at their Examination at the Bar they should be separate. Then the Court adjourn'd 'till Monday Morning, Nine o'Clock.

Monday, the 10th of June, 1724, at Ten o'Clock in the Morning.

The Court being opened, and Capt. Quelch to the Bar.

Ordered, That his Issues be taken off during his Trial.

Mr. Newton, of Counsel for the Queen. May it please your Excellency, and the Honourable Commissioners of this Court: The Prisoner at the Bar stands charged, for that he, the said John Quelch, late of Regle, in the Province of the Massachusetts Bay, late Master, Lieutenant of the Brigantine Cherish, wherof Donal Parsons, Matthews, deceased, was late Captain, notwithstanding the said Brigantine, &c. With a Article when we have prov'd upon the Prisoner at the Bar, we doubt not but your Excellency, and the rest of the Honourable Commissioners of this Court will do him, our Nation, and the World that Justice, as to condemn and punish him for the same.

Paul Dorely, Esq. Attorney-General, and Mr. Matthews's Advocate for the Court of Admiralty. May it please your Excellency, and the rest of the Honourable Commissioners of this Court: The Prisoner at the Bar, stands charged against you, and charged with several Piracies, Robberies and Murders, committed by himself and Company, upon the High Sea, upon the Subjects of the King of Portugal, Her Majesty's good Ally; the worst and most intolerable of Crimes that can be committed by Men: A Pirate was therefore justly called by the Roman, Hostis Humani Generis: And the Civil Law faith of them, that neither Faith nor Oath is to be kept with them; and therefore if a Man that is a Prisoner to Pirates, for the sake of his Liberty promise a Ransom, he is under no Obligation to make good his Promise: for Pirates are not entitled to Law, so in much as the Law of Arms: For which Reason 'tis said, if Pirates be committed upon the Ocean, and the Pirates in the Attempt happen to be overcome, the Captains are not obliged to bring them to any Port, but may expose them immediately to Punishment, by hanging them at the Main-yard: A Sign of its being of a very different and worse Nature than any Crime committed upon the Land; for Robbers and Murderers, and even Traitors themselves, may not be put to Death without passing a formal Trial: And if the Fate of the Prisoner at the Bar, with his Company, had allowed them to have been overcome as their Pleasors, and immediately hung up before the Sun, it had been very just upon them. But being then suffered to live, and now brought unto a Court of Justice, they are to be tried, heard, and tried, as the Laws of England, and our own Country do direct. Hereupon I must observe, that until the Statute of the sixth of Henry the Eighth, all Piracies, Robberies and Murders committed upon the Sea, were Treated before the Admiral, his Lieutenant, or Commandery, after the Course of the Civil Law: the Nature whereof was, that any Judgment of Death could be given against the Offender, either they must plainly confess their Offence (which they will never do without Torture), or else their Offences be so plainly and directly proved by Witnesses indifferent, such as for their Offences committed, which was next to impossible to be had, therefore that Statute enacted, That the said Crimes should be Treated in any County in England, by such and such Commissioners, and the Trial to be according to the Course of the Common Law: This Act continues in England in Force to this Day, and 'till very lately serv'd for all Piracies that were committed in the Plantations, or any Parts beyond the Seas. For Nath, the said Pirate that went from this Country, was serv'd upon that Statute, but it proving very troublesome and chargeable to transport Pirates and the Witnesses from the several Plantations, there was another Act of Parliament made in the 12th and 13th Years of the late King William the third, that provides principally and particularly for the Trial of all Pirates that are sent to any of the Plantations. It is by virtue of this Act of Parliament, and a Commission power thereto, that your Excellency, and this Honourable Court, are now sitting in Judgment upon the Prisoner at the Bar, and his vile Accomplices; and though it may be thought by some a pretty severe thing to put an Englishman to Death without a Jury, yet it must be remembered, that the Wisdom and Justice of our Nation, for very sufficient and excellent Reasons, have so ordered it in the Case of Pirates, a Crime which, as I before observ'd, scarce deserves any Law at all: Besides, the late Statute hath appointed such Commissioners, as will take Care to do equal Justice to the Prisoner on the one Hand, and to the Crown and Allies of England on the other. The English Word Pirate, is derived from a Word that signifies Raiding; for Pirates, like Beasts of Prey, are seeking and hunting upon the Ocean, for the Estates, and sometimes the Lives of the innocent Merchant and Mariner: His Character and Description is this; A Pirate is one who, to enrich himself, either by surprise, or open Force, sets upon Merchants and others trading by Sea, to spoil them of their Goods or Treasures, and sometimes taking their Vessels, and depriving them of their Lives: And 'tis no wonder if Pirates be reckon'd a much greater and more pernicious Crime than Robbery upon the Land, because the Confusion of the General Navigation, and Commerce of Nations, is far beyond any Man's particular Property: Besides, whereas Robbery upon the Land is most commonly from particular Persons, a Pirate is from many, and either attended with the Death of others. Thus it was in the Case now to be tried; one of the Captains of one of the Portuguese Vessels being unfortunately, if not badly kill'd and murder'd in the Action. But before we proceed to the several Articles upon which the Prisoner is to be tried, I beg leave a little to set forth the aggravating Circumstances of the Crimes committed by these vile Men: And to begin with their Murders, their robberies, inhuman, I with I might not say, their monstrous Use of their worthy Commander, Captain Parsons: God knows how in their Treatment of him might lessen his End; however, that must be answered for at a higher Tribunal. The next Thing I would observe in this Matter, is their Commission which they obtain'd from Her Majesty's Government of this Province, a Sword to fight the open and declared Enemies of Her Sacred Majesty; but, instead of drawing it against the French and Spanish, they have directed it in the Bowels of Love of the best Friends and Allies of the Crown of England to this Day, the Portuguese being Confederates with Her Sacred Majesty against the French and Spanish, for the Peace, Rights, and Liberties of Europe. This was the Betrayal, the Treachery, and Contumacy of this Matter, that instead of fighting for Honour with the French, or Money with the Spanish, they will go and surprise a Colours, which were Portuguese; her English was not up till within half an Hour before she was taken; I was sent on board her, but Captain Quelch was there, many of our Men had entered her before he did; I had about thirty-five Men and twelve Guns: When the Ship fired upon us, we had English Colours flying; we kept the ship for some time, and took out of her what is far richer in the North Atlantic. This Ship came from a Portuguese Galleon, had been out about twenty-four Hours, and was bound for Spain.

Prisoner. Set up the Negro Boy who was taken in this Ship, which being done, and examined by the Interpreter, with his Name is Estevan, that he was captured, first in the River of Spain; his Mother's Name was Isabel, was a Portuguese, and Captain of the Ship that was taken by the Portuguese, in the River of Spain; that he was one of Quelch's Company; that his Mother was a Portuguese; that his Mother died suddenly of that Wound; that he heard say the Words, And he says: Says, that there were no more Men killed on board besides his Mother, only two wounded: Adds, that his dead Mother was thrown over-board immediately after his Death; and says, if the law the Portuguese at the Bar came on board the Portuguese Ship, and with a Canoe and two Boats.

After this, the Interpreters were directed to examine both the Negro Boy, & what their new Mother had then say of themselves when they came to Spain; to which the Negro Boy made Answer, That their Mother had then say, they were not Portuguese, but Spanish Negro Boys.

Court. Now, Have you any thing further to offer to the Court relating to the Prisoner?

Answer. When we came about the Latitude of Bermuda, the Company sent me my Journal to be taken from me, I had I had not something that might do them Damage, and relating to their own self, what Captain Quelch would have had me, he took it out himself, about five or six Lines, from Osborne, to February 22, that they committed their Piracies. Captain Quelch made a Speech, telling them, What they should say when they came on Shore; as that he had not with some Indians, who had got that Treasure out of a Wreck, of whom we had our Gold, and without we never had any Gold from our Indians, it being but once that any of them were on board of us, and then we did not trade with them. It being now late, the Court adjourn'd till Four o'Clock in the Afternoon.

Monday, Four o'Clock in the Afternoon: Clifford, the second Witness, was sworn, and Power removed out of hearing.

Prof. You are now to answer the Majesty's Commissioners of this Court, of what you knew relating to the Prisoner at the Bar, his being Guilty of what he is charged with in those Articles which you have heard read.

Clifford. Yes, Sir, I shall, and I will begin with the taking the Doe upon our Captain Phanous. Peter Rankin, one of the Company, kept the Doe by Order of Anthony Halden, and some others that rode up to run away with the Vessel. The Prisoner at the Bar was then on shore, but when he came on board, did not object against what was done, or what they were intending to do: Quelch then at that Time had been Commanded, but Halden was the Ringleader, and had the Majority of the Crew on his Side. Power was myself offered to go on to the Captain, but the Counsel, that guarded the Doe with a Sword in his Hand, would not let us.

Prof. Let the Articles be read, and let the Evidence say what he can to each of them.

Art. 1. read. Clifford. The first Prize that we took any thing out of, was a Fishing-Boat, out of whom we took some Fish and some Salt, near Paradise, and that which induced me to think it was a Portuguese Vessel, was, because 'twas taken near their own Shore: But I do not understand the Portuguese Language.

Art. 2. read. Clifford. This was the Second Vessel we took, a Brigantine that we carried with us during the Voyage, Quelch was then our Commandant, and went on board the said Vessel himself.

Art. 3. read. Clifford. I remember well the taking of this Vessel by Quelch himself, we carried a Pilot along with us, who told us they were Portuguese. Peter Tawley, who is since dead, was the Interpreter's Name. One of the Prisoners, who was first taken, understood a little English by this Time, and then said what was the Reason that we, being English, took the Portuguese. And one of our Men, named John Taylor, the Dutchman, was what, for telling them we were English.

Art. 4. read. Clifford. I remember the taking this Vessel very well, he was taken by one of the Prize Vessels: I saw the Eastward were that was taken; we were all along, during the Captivity, in Sight of the Shore, and near Osborne.

Art. 5. read. Clifford. I remember the taking of this Boat by Captain Quelch; the Men that we took were Portuguese; as we were told by our Interpreter. I do not remember any of the Vessels we had yet taken had Colours.

Art. 6. read. Clifford. I saw the Bag of Money, but cannot tell how much there was of it. The Negro Boy, Cafra, was then taken; as I felt he wanted on the whole Ship's Crew, but then was sold at the Mark to Benjamin Perkin: This Vessel was taken by a Tender, with about Fifty Pounds, all whole Money.

Art. 7. read. Clifford. I remember this Vessel was taken by our Tender, near the Island of Gouadalupe: I saw the Sugar brought on board (the Brigantine Charles) and some of the Gold; there was only one Dutchman in this Vessel, who sent'd himself with us for the Voyage. But because the Company voted he should not have full Share, he threatened, when he came on Shore, what he would discover; upon which they voted him to be put on Shore, Captain Quelch being present at their Vote.

Art. 8. read. Clifford. I was not in the Boat that took this Brigantine: I saw the Hundred Pound Weight of Gold Duff on board the Brigantine Charles, which Captain Quelch had among us. There might be about Fifteen or Sixteen Men, with two Women, on board the Brigantine that was taken, she came from Spain South, and was bound for Rio de Janeiro, she was taken by our own Privateer, with half a Score Men, the Prize sent not in it.

Art. 9. read. Clifford. I was on board this Ship when she was taken, and so was the Prisoner at the Bar. It was thought the Captain of her was wounded before we boarded her, but there was some Dispute among the Men, which of them it was killed by, Captain Quelch command'd the Brigantine when we took her. We took Ten or Twelve Dutchmen, and a Pipe of Rum in her, and sundry other Things. A few such as London as that which was shown in Court in the Forenoon, on board some Ship. We took, like that Negro Boy, who was in the Court in the Forenoon.

Then Clifford was by, and Power, the third Witness for the Queen, was brought in.

Prof. Prisoner. You are now to give an Account to His Majesty's Commissioners of this Court, of what you knew relating to the Prisoner at the Bar, his being guilty of what he is charged with, in those Articles which you have heard read.

Power. I can say nothing as to the Prisoner's Carriage towards Captain Phanous, but the Cabin Door was bolted upon him, and I believe, was a Portuguese Thing, but we were of the Land; the Prisoner at the Bar was not on board till Night. When the Captain was thrown over-board, he took upon him the Command, and order'd us to sail to sea.

Art. 1. read. Power. We were not in Sight of Land, but believe the Vessel to be Portuguese, being upon the English Coast.

Art. 2. read. Power. I saw the Captain of this Vessel, which was a Brigantine, she was taken by the little Fishing Shallop, commanded by Captain Quelch: I was afterwards on board her, and saw the Sugar brought on board the Brigantine Charles.

Art. 3. read. Power. Do you remember the Caption of this Vessel?

Power. I do not remember it very well. Captain Quelch was on board the Vessel; that took her, we kept her two or three Days.

Art. 4. read. Power. What do you know concerning the taking of the Vessel?

Power. I remember the Vessel with Carthen were; it was an English Vessel, taken in Sight of Land. There was Molasses in the Port; there were Men and Women on board her, whom we took on board the Brigantine Charles. We left the Boat's Rudder, so that she could not sail, wherefore we took her in Tow; and taking out what we had need of, we then sunk her. Captain Quelch and I were in the Brigantine that took the Vessel.

Art. 5. read. Power. Do you remember the Caption of this Vessel?

Power. Yes, I had some of the Salt taken in this Vessel; so much as would make a Pair of Shoes. We took all their Fences after the little Fishing Boat, in Sight of the Shore, as near as I can remember.

Art. 6. read. Power. As before.

Power. As I remember this Caption; the Prisoner at the Bar was at it; they were Portuguese that were on board. I was put on board that Boat that Cafra was taken out of, and out of that Boat I took about Twenty or thirty Pounds of Portuguese Money. She had Rice and Peas in her, which we took out of her.

Art. 7. read. Power. As before.

Power. As I believe this was the Brigantine we took at an Anchore before the Town. I went to fetch her myself; Captain Quelch went over with us; we took Four or Five Chunks of Black Sugar, all the Men had run away, and left the Brigantine, only one Man, who at first told us was a Dutchman, but afterwards we found he was a Portuguese.

Art. 8. read. Power. As before.

Power. As Captain Quelch did not take this Vessel, he was taken by our Boat, but I was not in the Boat that took her. Captain Quelch, the Quartermaster, and Carpenter, shared the Hundred Pound Weight of Gold Duff among us.

Art. 9. read. Power. As before.

Power. As I was present at the Caption of this Ship: Captain Quelch was the Commander of the Brigantine, we saw the last Ship Two or Three Days before we took her. I saw the Colours, that were in Osborne to-day, first on board our Brigantine. We took itself, Sails, Ships, Boards, Four Guns, and an hundred Pieces of Light, and Gold, and a Negro Boy, whom one George Norton bought. The Captain was thrown over-board before I came on board; he was said to be killed by Sunderland, our Coxswain.

Prof. Power. And was the Prisoner at the Bar Captain of your Brigantine during all this Time that you took these several Vessels you have mentioned?

Power. As I say; and a little before we came in, it was agreed that we should say, We took our Gold out of a Vessel, that ran about about Port Molasses, but that the Indians were first at work upon her. Anthony Halden had called us upon Drake; Power said at first, they had taken our Journal, and that they order'd every one to throw over-board whatever was in the Ship.

Prof. Power. or Clifford, have you any thing further to offer?

Clifford. As I saw the Captain take Power's Journal out of his Hands, and order it to be torn out, and all Portuguese Prints to be thrown over-board. We were all upon the Deck, when it was concluded we should say, we had taken the Gold out of some Wreck that the Indians had acquainted us with.

Power. I saw the Man whips, that told them the Brigantine belonged to New-England. The Captain and Quartermaster order'd him to be whip'd. Anthony Halden was the Man who whip'd him. I was down below when the Agreement was made, what we should say when we came aboard, and was struck by Power when I came upon Deck, because I was not present.

Mr. Norton. May I please your Excellency, Yes. We shall now (though there be no Necessity for it) prove, that Power swore, and at the Time that these several Prisoners, Power, were committed, He swore Majesty and the King of Portugal were entered into a Treaty Alliance.

Upon this, Two London Gazettes, dated in the Months of May and July, 1723, were produced, and Two Paragraphs were read, viz.

Paragraph. May 24. The Treaty of Alliance, between the Emperor, His Majesty, the King of Portugal, and the States General, which had been to long talk'd of, was signed at Lisbon the 15th Instant, N. S. and is brought forth by an Excerpt.

Paragraph. July 14. Yesterday the Ratification of the Treaty, lately concluded at Lisbon with the King of Portugal, passed the Great Seal.

Prof. Gentlemen of the Queen's Council, Have you now done on the Queen's Part?

Queen's Council. Yes, Sir; we have gone through the Court of the Queen's Evidence against the Prisoner at the Bar.

Prof.

Quelch, and Atkins, and assigned upon the Articles of Piracy, &c. afterwards, (Mr. Mayne) and several Pleas, &c. Not Guilty.
Quelch's Pleas. Mayne is pleads your Ex. cellency, and the rest of the Court, Commissioners of this Court, the three Professors now at the Bar are of different Countries, His trust, from the rest may have been and upon this Article, but it is very well known, that the first and most famous Pirates that have been in the World were of the Country and Negroes, though Slaves, are as capable of taking away the Lives and Limbs of Mankind, as any Freeman in the World, and if we prove that these Fellows have been as active at this Matter as the rest of the Company, we doubt not but you will think and adjudge them equal in guilt with the rest.

Prof. Powell, look upon the Professors now at the Bar, and assign the Cause, Whether they were on board the Brigantine Charles during your last Voyage, and how they behaved from this while they were on board.

Pow. (Leading in de Profisurs.) These three Negroes were on board during the whole Voyage, but were not active, nor did they any thing but as they were commanded, Capt. Powley and Charles were the Cooks as the Brigantine, and boarded the Frigate when they were commanded, but handled the Arms; neither did Atkins.

Clifford and Parris being examined, affirmed the same Thing.

James farther added, that he knew Mayne to have been Capt. Pharmor's Slave, and that he brought him from Guinea.

Mr. John Gower informed the Court also, that the other two Negroes, Capt. Powley and Charles, were his Brother C. Smith Henry's black; that he did not run away from their Master, but were forcibly carried away by Capt. Smith and his Company.

Upon this, the Court being cleared, in less than Half an Hour was open again, and the three Negroes assigned brought in.

Prof. Charles Powley, Charles, and Atkins, you have been charged with several Articles of Piracy, &c. to which you have pleaded, Not Guilty; this Court has considered of the Matter, and declares you to be Not Guilty.

Whereupon they were ordered upon their Knees, &c.

After this, Mr. Mayne moved for leave further Time for the rest of the Professors, and then the Court adjourned 'till three o'Clock Afternoon.

Then P. M.

The Court was opened, and Proclamation made: Then Lambert, White, Shawcross, Reed, Perkins, and James, were set at the Bar, and after some little Time, upon John Lambert, and Charles James, desired that they two might be tried by themselves; upon which the Court ordered the Bar to be taken from the Bar; and then the Court proceeded to examine the Witnesses on Behalf of the Queen against the Prisoners.

Prof. Power, What do you know as to Lambert's being concerned in committing Capt. Pharmor's, and slaying the Voyage?

Pow. I don't say that either he or James were concerned in holding the Cibola down, but they were both on board when we came to fill; and though they did not they were unwilling to go to the Southwest, yet after Capt. Pharmor's Death, there was a Consultation held, and both Lambert and James were at it; and I know nothing to the contrary, but that they conspired with the Ship.

Ques. Please to let the Articles be read to the Witnesses, and then ask, how far Lambert and James were concerned in all, or any of them.

Art. 1. read. Witnesses. Lambert and James were on board when we took that Vessel, and so to the second and Third, Fourth and Fifth.

Prof. And as active as any of the rest?

Witnesses. Yes.

Art. 2. read. Witnesses. They were both on board our Brigantine when this was done, and sailed at the Seventh and Eighth Captains.

Art. 3. read. Witnesses. Lambert was on board the Tender, above a Mile off at that Time, but James was one that boarded the Ship.

Prof. Lambert and James, would you ask the Witnesses any Questions?

Lambert. I was sick when in the Gun-room when they boiled the Beer upon the Table, and never gave my Consent to go to the South-west.

What I did, I was forced to.

Prof. James. Did you ever hear Lambert protest against any of these points, or did he desire to be set on Shore?

James. He did desire to be set on Shore; but it was before the Captain went from Narragansett. I never heard any of them mention their Desire as to our going to Providence, but were as forward as the rest were.

Prof. Power. Do you know whether Lambert and James had their Share of the Treasures?

Witnesses. They had each of them their Shares.

Prof. What say you, James?

James. I was contradicted against my Will to go to Sea, and was deluded by Atkins.

Prof. Power. What say you as to James?

James. I cannot say that he had any Thing of what he pretends he said, but that he was unwilling to pilot the Ship, which I judged was, because he was averse to the Voyage.

Prof. Did you hear Lambert advise the Captain to go off from the Coast of Brill against some known Enemy?

Witness. No, we never heard him give any such Advice.

Prof. I have heard him several Times declare himself against the Voyage, but never express himself forward for, or pretend against any of the Prisoners, nor James either.

Prof. You have brought in a very considerable Treasure with you, wherein each of you had your Share: Whereat had you it? Where are the French and Spanish you took it from?

James. It was the Commander did it; and we were not on board the Vessel that took the Gold Duff. The Reason we accepted of our Shares was, because otherwise they would have killed us, or let us upon some desolate Island, where we should have been starved.

Lambert. I was only at the taking of two of the Vessels; and you may be sure I would never have come Home as the Vessel, if I had thought I had done any Thing worth, or that I should have been assigned for.

The Prisoners being nothing farther to offer, the Court was ordered to be cleared, and as some little Time was opened again, and the Prisoners set at the Bar.

Prof. John Lambert, and Charles James: you have both been assigned upon several Articles of Piracy, &c. (count 7 Articles) which either upon the Subjects of her Majesty's good Ally, &c. to which you have pleaded, Not Guilty: You have heard thirteen, what you had to say for yourselves: I am Court having considered the Evidence for the Queen against you, and your own Allegations for you, do adjudge each of you Guilty of the several Articles of Piracy, &c. What have you to say, why Sentence of Death should not be pronounced against you?

Atkins. We must leave it to God and your Honor. We are as innocent as the Child unborn of this.

Prof. James: as to the Sentence of the Court, &c. without.

Then Sentence was pronounced by the President of the Court, as the Law directs in Cases of Piracy, &c.

After this, Benjamin Perrier, William White, Christopher Sawdover, and Peter Ruch, were set at the Bar.

Ques. That Sawdover be tried by himself, and the rest taken from the Bar.

Several Articles being read to the Witnesses, they all swore, That Sawdover was with them all the Voyage, that he was very active at every Thing, and that he had his Share of the Gold.

James's Advocate. May it please your Excellency, we shall farther prove against the Prisoner at the Bar, That he was the only Man who gave the mortal Wound to the Captain of the Perseus Ship.

Prof. Power. What do you know as to that?

James. There was a Court sitting on board our Brigantine, concerning who it was that killed the Captain of the Perseus Ship, Sawdover saying, it was he, and another said, it was he that did it.

Prof. Set up the Negro Boy who was taken on that Ship.

The Negro Boy being set up, was bid to look upon the Prisoners, and say, Whether it was he that killed his Master?

And the Interpreters reported to the Court, That the Negro Boy said, That was the Man who killed his Master, and that he killed him with a Pistol; that his Master laid down immediately, and did not speak a Word.

Prof. What say you, Sawdover?

Sawdover. I did not kill the Captain of the Perseus Ship.

Prof. Where is your Gold?

Sawdover. I can't tell: What I said upon my first Examination about it, is false.

Prof. Have you any thing farther to say?

Sawdover. No.

After this, a Pension was given into Court, signed by several of the Prisoners, viz. William White, John Dorrin, David Carter, P. Ruch, Francis King, John Pinner, Richard Lawrence, Benjamin Perrier, English Perrier, John Carter, Nicholas Richardson, John King, John Ash, William James, and Charles King, praying that they might withdraw their several Pleas of Not Guilty, as he admitted to commit and plead Guilty, having the Captain for the Queen's Mar 7, &c.

Upon which they were each of them asked, Whether they felt their Hands to the Petition? And they all severally answered they did.

Prof. You who have here subscribed this Pension, must be told, that your Commander, and some others of your Company, have had their Trials, and are found Guilty: We don't take your plea taking Guilty now so as by Submission, nor will it at all entitle you to Mercy, this Court can make no Bargain with you: If any of you can be distinguished, as being second away, protesting against the Voyage, sickness, or the like, this Court will consider of it, in so far as is proper for them.

Mr. Ruch. You must ask each of the Prisoners, one by one, Whether they are Guilty, or Not Guilty, of what they are charged with?

Prof. How say you, Richard Lawrence, Are you Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Richard Lawrence. Guilty.

So did Benjamin Perrier, John Carter, Francis King, Peter Ruch, &c. the rest of the Prisoners.

After this, John Miller was set to the Bar.

And the Queen's Witnesses being examined about John Miller, made Oath, that he was on board the Brigantine Charles during the Voyage, and did not protest against going upon the Coast of Brill; that he was in Health, and temperate, at the Time of every Captain, as the rest were, and had his Share of the Gold, &c. that was taken.

Miller. Saying he was sick some Part of the Voyage.

Witnesses. He was fit, but was well again before we made our last Capture. (Article 4th read.) He was at this Captain well in Health, and confiding to us, to do the 6th and 8th Articles, and at the taking of the Prize in the 9th Article. (Article 10th read.) He was then on board the Tender that took the Gold Vessel. (9th Article read.) He boarded that Ship with Sword and Pistol.

Prof. What have you to say for yourself? You have heard what has been proved against you.

Miller. I was at the taking of the Ship and a Bark; but did not know what they were, for they showed no Colours.

Prof. Power. Did you ever hear any of your Company say, as if Miller was one of Atkins's Crew?

James. I heard some of them say, they heard him say to himself, so said Clifford.

Miller. I was none of Atkins's Company.

Prof. Set John Tomlinson at the Bar, which you done; and the Queen's Witnesses being sworn, &c. asked, That John Tomlinson was on board the Brigantine all their late Voyage, and that he did sometimes bear Arms, but being not above fifteen Years of Age, they allowed him but Half a Share, which his Master was also to have: That he was for two Months together Cook on board the Tender, but being not a Boy, he had no Vote with the rest of the Company, but was entered as every one pleased.

Mr. Henry Frick being sworn, deplored, That the Prisoner at the Bar was his Servant, and that he put him on board the Brigantine Charles as such, upon Captain Pharmor's Request: That he saw him by the Rev. Dr. Keeling after the Prize came in, and that his Share of Gold was never never in his own Keeping, for that the Company would not trust him with it, but he receive it for him.

Prof. Templeton, What have you to say?

Templeton, I have nothing to say, but that my Master sent me out, and I know not whether we were wrong.

And after this, William Whiting was set to the Bar, and charged with the same Articles of Piracy, &c. who thereupon pleaded Not Guilty.

And Pinner and the rest of the Writars being examined concerning him, informed the Court, That from the first Time of their coming upon the Coast of Brazil, unto their coming Home, Whiting was sick, and never bore Arms, being utterly incapable of doing any thing.

Prof. Had he any Share?

Whiting, He had sixteen Ounces offered him by the Company; but they told him it was not for his Defects, but out of their Generosity that they gave it him.

Prof. Did he express any Dissatisfaction at what was done?

Whiting, No, nor that I heard; but he was taken sick on the Beginning of November, and came very sick a-shore.

E. Smith, Esq. Whiting, upon his Examination, told me, That he had been acquainted with Captain Pinner at New-York, and that it was out of Respect that he had for him that he came hither, and went the Voyage.

Mr. William Clark sworn.

Deposited, That Captain Pinner sent for Mr. Gilson and himself, and recommended the Prisoner to them as a Person fit to be Clerk, or Secretary on board the Ship, and to take an Account of all their Affairs; and that Captain Pinner's Letters to them were written by the Prisoner; and when he came ashore, he was in a very low Condition; but said, when he was able, he would do them all the Service he could.

Pinner, I know of his writing Letters from Captain Pinner.

Prof. Would you say any thing yourself, Whiting?

Whiting, I never went in any Action, being sick all the while we were on the Coast of Brazil, and did not discover their Piracy when I came on Shore, because I was then very sick, and like to die.

The Court was ordered to be cleared, and then adjourned to nine o'Clock next Morning.

Wednesday, June 21, A. M.

The Court being opened, and Proclamation made, John Templeton and William Whiting were set to the Bar.

Prof. John Templeton, This Court has considered your Case, and have been very respectful to you in regard of your Youth, and have adjudged you to be Not Guilty.

And you also, William Whiting, the Court has considered of your Case, and have adjudged you also to be Not Guilty. Upon which each of them upon their Knees thanked the Court, &c.

After which, Christopher Scudmore and John Miller were set to the Bar.

Prof. Scudmore and Miller, upon hearing the Queen's Evidence against you, and your own Allegations for yourselves, this Court doth adjudge you both to be Guilty of what you have been charged with. What have you to say, why Sentence of Death should not pass against you?

Scudmore, I had no Hand in altering the Voyage, nor killing the Portuguese Captain.

Miller, I was never alive after the Voyage was altered.

Prof. Attend to the Sentence of this Court against you.

This Sentence was pronounced by the President of the Court, as the Law directs in Cases of Piracy, &c. against the said Scudmore and Miller.

Ordered, That all the rest of the Prisoners that pleaded Guilty, be brought to the Bar.

Prof. Set seven of them to the Bar.

Then William White, John Durst, Dennis Carter, Peter Reach, Francis King, John Pinner, and Richard Lawrence, were set to the Bar.

Prof. You, and each of you, have been arraigned upon several Articles of Piracy, &c. to which you have severally pleaded Guilty. What have you to say, why Sentence of Death should not pass upon you?

Ans. Nothing.

Prof. Then attend to the Sentence.

This Sentence was pronounced by the President of the Court, as the Law directs in Cases of Piracy, &c. against the said seven Persons last named.

Prof. Set the rest to the Bar.

Benjamin Perbit, Erasmus Peterkin, John Carter, Nahiel Richardson, John King, James Ayton, William Jones, and Charles King, were set to the Bar.

Prof. You, and every of you, have been arraigned upon several Articles of Piracy, Robbery, and Murder, unto which you, and each of you, did plead Guilty. What have you to say, why Sentence of Death should not pass against you for the same?

Ans. We leave ourselves to God Almighty.

Prof. Attend then to the Sentence.

This Sentence was pronounced by the President of the Court, as the Law directs in Cases of Piracy, &c. against the eight Persons last named. And then the Prisoners were all remanded to Prison, and the Officer charged to take great Care of them.

On Friday, June 30, 1704, John Quelch, John Lambert, Christopher Scudmore, John Miller, Erasmus Peterkin, and Peter Reach, were executed in Chapel-River, between Brighthelm's Wharfe and the Point.

As to most of the Behnbrother, and last Dying Speeches, of the six Persons that were executed as Charles Renner, Bolton died, on Friday, June 30, 1704, viz. Captain John Quelch, John Lambert, Christopher Scudmore, John Miller, Erasmus Peterkin, and Peter Reach.

ON Friday the 30th of June, 1704, pursuant to Orders in the Dead Warrant, the aforesaid Persons were guarded from the Prison in Bytton, by forty Malefactors, Constables of the Town, the Peace-Marshall, and his Officers, &c. with two Ministers, who took great Pains to prepare them for the last Article of their Lives. Being allowed to walk on Foot through the Town, to St. Mark's Wharf, where the Silver Car being carried before them, they went by Water to the Place of Execution, being surrounded and guarded on all Sides with Multitudes of Spectators.

At the Place of Execution, they then severally spoke as follows, viz.

I. Captain John Quelch. The last Words he spoke to one of the Ministers at his going up the Stage, were, I am not afraid of Death, I am not afraid of the Gallows; but I am afraid of what follows: I am afraid of a Great God, and of a Judgement to come. But he afterwards seemed to brave it out too much against that Fear: Also when on the Stage, first he pulled off his Hat, and bowed to the Spectators, and not concerned, nor behaving himself so much like a dying Man as some would have done. The Ministers had, in the Way to his Execution, much desired him to glorify God at his Death, by bearing a due Testimony against the Sin he had ruined him, and for the Ways of Religion which he had much neglected. Yet not being called upon to speak when he had no say, it was but thus much: God bless 'em! 'Tis all I have to speak: What I have to say is this, I desire to be informed for what I am here: I am condemned only upon Circumstances; I forgive all the World: To the Lord be ascribed to my soul. When Lambert was warning the Spectators to beware of bad Company, Quelch joining, They should take care how they brought Money into New-England, it is bought for it.

II. John Lambert. He appeared much haughty, and pleaded much on his Innocency: He desired all Men to beware of bad Company; he seemed in a great Agony near his Execution: He called much and frequently on CHRIST for Pardon of Sin; that God Almighty would save his innocent Soul: He desired to forgive all the World: His last Words were, Lord forgive my Soul! O God, receive me into Glory! My Name of Christ is Jesus my Lord.

III. Christopher Scudmore. He appeared very penitent since his Condemnation; he was very diligent to improve his Time going to, and at the Place of Execution.

IV. John Miller. He seemed much concerned, and complained of a great Burden of Sins to answer for; expressing often, Lord! What shall I do to be saved?

V. Erasmus Peterkin. He cried of Injustice done him; and said, It is very hard for my many Miles' Lives to be taken away for a little Gold. He often said, His Peace was made with God; and his soul would be with God; yet excuse him hard to forgive those, he said, wronged him: He told the Executioner, He was a strong Man, and prayed to be put out of Misery as soon as possible.

VI. Peter Reach. He seemed little concerned, and said but little, or nothing at all.

Francis King was also brought to the Place of Execution, but relieved, LVI. The Trials of Daniel Dammarce, a Waterman, Francis Willis, a Footman, and George Purchase, a Sheriff's Officer, for High-Treason, in levying War in the Kingdom, against the Queen, under Pretence of pulling down Meeting-Houses. 9 Annæ, 1710.

[At the Sessions-House in the Old-Bailey.]

D^{ns} Martin, D^{ns}les Ottens D^{ns} Arville, D^{ns} Duvoni, 1710, D^{ns} Anne, D^{ns} Grove, D^{ns} Briccaux, Frensis, & Hilaria Regine, &c. N^{rs}.

A BILL of Indisment for High-Treason, in levying open War against her Majesty, having been found Yesterday by the Grand Jury for the County of Middlesex, at St. Mark's, against Daniel Dammarce, Francis Willis, and George Purchase, the Prisoners, being in Custody of the Keeper of Newgate, the Court proceeded thus: Clerk of Arraignment. Set Daniel Dammarce to the Bar.

(Which was done.)

Clerk of Arr. Daniel Dammarce, Hold up thy Head.

(Which he did.)

Vou. VIII.

You stand indicted by the Name of Daniel Dammarce, late of the Parish of St. Clement Dunes, in the County of Middlesex, Labourer; for that you, not having the Fear of God before your Eyes, nor weighing the Duty of your Allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the Inligation of the Devil, the Love, and trust and due Obedience which every true and faithful Subject of our Sovereign Lady Anne, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, &c. towards our said Lady the Queen should, and of Right ought to bear, wholly withdrawing, and conspiring, and with all your Strength intending the Peace and common Tranquillity of this Kingdom of Great Britain to disturb; the first Day of March, in the 9th Year of the Reign of our said sovereign Lady the Queen, that now is, at the Parish of St. Clement Dunes aforesaid, in the County of Middlesex, aforsaid, falsly, unlawfully, devilishly, and traitorously, did compass, imagine, and intend upon War, Infurrection, and Rebellion, against our said Lady the Queen, within this Kingdom of Great-Britain, to raze and levy: And your said Treasons, Conspings, Imaginations, and Intentions to fulfil and bring to effect, you the said Daniel Dammarée afterwards, that is to say, the said First Day of March, in the Ninth Year aforesaid, in the said Parish of St. Clement Danes, in the County of Middlesex aforesaid, by Force and Arms, against our said Sovereign Lady the Queen, your Sovereign and undoubted Liege Lady, with a great Multitude of Men, to the Jurors unknown, to the Number of Five Hundred Persons, armed and arrayed in a warlike Manner, that is to say, with Colours flying, Swords, Clubs, and other Weapons, as well offensive as defensive, unlawfully and traitorously being assembled and gathered together, publick War against our said Lady the Queen, at the Parish aforesaid, in the County aforesaid, the Day and Year aforesaid, traitorously did prepare, begin and levy, against the Peace of our said Sovereign Lady the Queen that now is, her Crown and Dignity, and against the Form of the Statute in that Case made and provided.

Cler. of Arr. How say you, Daniel Dammarée, are you Guilty of the High Treason, for which you have been indicted, and are now arraigned, or Not Guilty?

Dammarée. My Lord, I was too much in Liquor, that I do not know what I did.

Mr. Serj. Ribblesdale. You must now plead either Guilty, or Not Guilty. If you plead Not Guilty, you will be put upon your Trial, and be heard fully in your Defence, by yourself, or Counsel.

Cler. of Arr. Are you Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Dammarée. Not Guilty.

Cler. of Arr. Calvary. How wilt thou be tried?

Dammarée. By God and the Country.

Cler. of Arr. God fend thee a good Deliverance.

(Then the Prisoner was taken away.)

Cler. of Arr. Set Francis Willis to the Bar.—(Which was done.)

Cler. of Arr. Francis Willis, held up thy Hand.—(Which he did.) You stand indicted by the Name of Francis Willis, late of the Parish of St. Andrew, Holborn, in the County of Middlesex, Labourer, for that you, not having the Fear of God before your Eyes, nor weighing the Duty of your Allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the Devil, the Love, and true, and due Obedience, which every true and faithful Subject of our Sovereign Lady Anne, by the Grace of God, of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, &c. towards our said Lady the Queen, and of Right ought to bear, wholly withdrawing, and conspiring, and with all your Strength intending the Peace and common Tranquillity of this Kingdom of Great-Britain to disturb; the First Day of March, in the Ninth Year of the Reign of our said Sovereign Lady the Queen, that now is, at the Parish of St. Andrew, Holborn, aforesaid, in the County of Middlesex aforesaid, falsly, unlawfully, devilishly, and traitorously did compass, imagine and intend upon War, Infurrection, and Rebellion, against our said Lady the Queen, within this Kingdom of Great-Britain, to raze and levy, and your said Treasons, Conspings, Imaginations, and Intentions, so fulfil, and bring to effect, you the said Francis Willis afterwards, that is to say, the said First Day of March, in the Ninth Year aforesaid, in the said Parish of St. Andrew, Holborn, in the County of Middlesex aforesaid, by Force and Arms, against our said Sovereign Lady the Queen, your Sovereign and undoubted Liege Lady, with a great Multitude of Men, to the Jurors unknown, to the Number of Five Hundred Persons, armed and arrayed in a warlike Manner, that is to say, with Colours flying, Swords, Clubs, and other Weapons, as well offensive as defensive, unlawfully and traitorously being assembled and gathered together, publick War against our said Lady the Queen, at the Parish aforesaid, in the County aforesaid, the Day and Year aforesaid, traitorously did prepare, begin, and levy, against the Peace of our said Sovereign Lady the Queen, that now is, her Crown and Dignity, and against the Form of the Statute in that Case made and provided.

Cler. of Arr. How say you, Francis Willis, are you Guilty of the High Treason whereof you are indicted, and for which you are now arraigned, or Not Guilty?

Willis. I am entirely innocent.

Mr. Serj. Ribblesdale. Then plead Not Guilty; and if upon Trial you appear to be innocent, you will be acquitted.

Cler. of Arr. Are you Guilty, or Not Guilty? You must use the Words Willis. Not Guilty.

Cler. of Arr. Calvary. How wilt thou be tried?

Willis. By God and the Country.

Cler. of Arr. By God and the Country.

Cler. of Arr. God fend you a good Deliverance.

(Then he was taken away.)

Cler. of Arr. Set George Partridge to the Bar.—(Which was done.)

Cler. of Arr. George Partridge, held up thy Hand.—(Which he did.) You stand indicted by the Name of George Partridge, late of the Parish of St. Giles in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex, Labourer, for that you, not having the Fear of God before your Eyes, nor weighing the Duty of your Allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the Devil, the Love, and true and due Obedience, which every true and faithful Subject of our Sovereign Lady Anne, by the Grace of God of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, &c. towards our said Lady the Queen, and of Right ought to bear, wholly withdrawing, and conspiring, and with all your Strength intending the Peace and common Tranquillity of this Kingdom of Great-Britain to disturb; the First Day of March, in the Ninth Year of the Reign of our said Sovereign Lady the Queen, that now is, at the Parish of St. Giles in the Fields aforesaid, in the County of Middlesex aforesaid, falsly, unlawfully, devilishly, and traitorously, did compass, imagine, and intend upon War, Infurrection, and Rebellion, against our said Lady the Queen, within this Kingdom of Great-Britain, to raze and levy, and your said Treasons, Conspings, Imaginations, and Intentions, so fulfil and bring to effect, you the said George Partridge afterwards, that is to say, the said First Day of March, in the Ninth Year aforesaid, in the said

Parish of St. Giles in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex aforesaid, by Force and Arms, against our said Sovereign Lady the Queen, your Sovereign and undoubted Liege Lady, with a great Multitude of Men, to the Jurors unknown, to the Number of Five Hundred Persons, armed and arrayed in a warlike Manner, that is to say, with Colours flying, Swords, Clubs, and other Weapons, as well offensive as defensive, unlawfully and traitorously being assembled and gathered together, publick War against our said Lady the Queen, at the Parish aforesaid, in the County aforesaid, the Day and Year aforesaid, traitorously did prepare, begin and levy, against the Peace of our said Sovereign Lady the Queen that now is, her Crown and Dignity, and against the Form of the Statute in that Case made and provided.

Cler. of Arr. How say you, George Partridge? Are you Guilty of the High Treason for which you have been indicted, and are now arraigned, or Not Guilty?

Partridge. Not Guilty.

Cler. of Arr. Calvary. How wilt thou be tried?

Partridge. By God and the Country.

Cler. of Arr. God fend thee a good Deliverance.

(Then he was taken away, and the Court adjourned to the Day following.)

Die Marturi, 29 Aprilis, 1709, 9 Anne.

Cler. of Arr. Cryer, make Proclamation.

Cryer. O Yes, if any one can inform my Lords the Queen's Justices, the Queen's Serjeant, the Queen's Attorney-General, or this Inquest now to be taken, of the High Treason of which the Prisoner at the Bar stands indicted, let them come forth, and they shall be heard, for now the Prisoner stands at the Bar upon his Deliverance; and all others that are bound by Recognizance, to give Evidence against the Prisoner at the Bar, let them come forth, and give their Evidence, or else they forfeit their Recognizance. And all Jurymen of Middlesex that have appeared, and are not sworn, may depart the Court for this Time, and give their Attendance here again to-morrow Morning.

Cler. of Arr. Daniel Dammarée, hold up thy Hand.—(Which he did.)

Gentlemen

Gentlemen of the Jury, look upon the Prisoner, and hearken to his Confess. He stands indicted by the Name of Daniel Donnelly, late of the Parish of St. Clement-Dani, in the County of Midshire, Labourer, for that he not loving his Fear of God before his Eyes, but being moved and seduced by the Instigation of the Devil, &c. (proceeds in the Indictment, multis modis, against the Peace of our Sovereign Lady the Queen, her Crown and Dignity, against the Form of the Statute in that behalf made and provided. Upon this Indictment he has been arraigned, and thereunto hath pleaded Not Guilty, and for his Trial hath put himself upon God and his Country, which Country you are. Your Charge is to inquire whether he be Guilty of the High-Treason wherewith he stands indicted, in Manner and Form as he stands indicted, or Not Guilty. If you find him Guilty, you are to inquire what Goods and Chattels, Lands and Tenements he had at the time of the High-Treason committed, or at any time thence. If you find him Not Guilty, you are to inquire whether he fled for it: If you find that he fled for it, you are to inquire of his Goods and Chattels, Lands and Tenements, as if you found him Guilty. If you find him Not Guilty, nor that he fled for it, you are to say so, and no more, and hear your Evidence.

Foreman of the Jury. My Lord, here is such a great Noise in the Court, that unless a Stop be put to it, we shall not be able to hear the Counsel, or the Evidence: We humbly pray the Court may be kept quiet.

L. C. J. O'Yees, make Proclamation of Silence.

Crier. O'Yees, My Lords, the Queen's Justice, briefly charge and command all manner of Persons to keep Silence upon Pain of Imprisonment.

L. C. J. Gentlemen of the Queen's Council, be pleased to proceed.

The William Thornton of the Middle-Temple, Esq. (afterwards Recorder of London, and Baron of the Exchequer, &c.) for Counsel for the Queen, speak the Indictment thus.

Mr. Thornton. May it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, Daniel Donnelly, the Prisoner at the Bar, stands indicted, for that he, not having the Fear of God before his Eyes, but being moved by the Instigation of the Devil, and desiring to withdraw the Cordial Love and Natural Obedience, which true and faithful Subjects of our Sovereign Lady the Queen do, and ought to bear towards Her, and intending to disturb the Peace and common Tranquillity of this Kingdom, on the fifth of March last, in the Parish of St. Clement Dani, in the County of Midshire, traitorously compassed and imagined to levy War, and stir up Rebellion and Insurrection against our said Lady the Queen within this Kingdom: And that he might accomplish his said Treasonous Imaginations and Designs, on the said fifth of March, and in the said Parish being assembled, with a Multitude and great Number of People armed, and arrayed in a Warlike Manner, he did then and there unlawfully and traitorously levy War against our said Lady the Queen, contrary to the Duty of his Allegiance, against the Peace of our said Lady the Queen, her Crown and Dignity.

To this Indictment he has pleaded Not Guilty.

Gentlemen, if the Evidence for the Queen prove the Charge, as laid in the Indictment, 'tis your Duty to find him Guilty.

Mr. At. Gen. May it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, the Record that has been opened to you is an Indictment of High-Treason against the Prisoner at the Bar: It charges him with disturbing the General Peace and Quiet of the Realm, and exciting Rebellion within your Country. The Crime that this Indictment is founded upon, has in all Ages and Countries been accounted the highest Crime that can be committed against any State, or Government. The Laws of England are very express, that if any Man takes himself to be aggrieved by any Law whatsoever, and endeavour by Force to seek Redress of their Grievances, or to get any Reformation of those Things he complains of, and thus against the Civil Authority, it is levying of War, and is High-Treason within the Statute of the 25th of Edw. III.

That there has been an Insurrection within this County, not only in the Place mention'd in the Indictment, but in other Places, I believe is so well known to all here, that it would be superfluous Time to call many Witnesses to that matter. But it will be incumbent on us, now the Prisoner stands on his Trial, to shew what particular Part he had in this Business; and therefore we shall call many Witnesses to prove what Part he had in this Affair: And if they give the same Account that they have given in their Informations, we shall make it appear that the Prisoner at the Bar was the Ring-Leader of those Tumultuous and Rebellionary Persons, that assembled the fifth of March last; first to pull down the Meeting-Houses in the Neighbourhood, and after burning them, went on to pull down others.

The immediate Design which they pretended was, the pulling down the Meeting-Houses, that is, those Places which are allowed to hold in us unhappy enough to dissent from the Church of England, to meet in for their Religious Worship.

Whether Mr. Burgh's has given any Offence to the Prisoner, or whether any of the Congregation have given him any Offence, we shall hear from himself, but no Prover can justify such Rebellionary Tumults as were made on this Occasion: The Penances that are mentioned, will not excuse what the Law makes High-Treason.

It will be in vain for the Prisoner at the Bar, or any Person in his Circumstances, to pretend that he is a Friend to the Government, or a Loyal Subject, when he Acts thus: he is guilty of High-Treason. The Prisoner at the Bar stands doubly obliged to bear Faith and true Allegiance to Her Majesty, not only as all good Subjects are obliged to it, but as he is a Menial Servant to Her Majesty, for you will find that he was, at the time he committed this Treason, as Her own Clerk, wearing Her own Badge, which he was then acting in Rebellion against Her.

That this tumultuous Meeting was not accidental, will appear, when the Witnesses shew, That four Days before that, there had been great Disorders in the Streets: And the Night before, you will find by our Witnesses, that a great disorderly Tumult was in the Temple, and there it was raised upon, by these tumultuous Persons, that the Night following they would pull down Dr. Burgh's Meeting-House, and all the other Meeting-Houses thereabout. You will find, that was not only talk'd of, but put in Execution, by the Prisoner, and others with him: For, the Fifth of March, they fell the Prisoner, and about Five Hundred others, with Staves, and Clubs, and other Weapons, in the Indictment mention'd, both off-nire and defensive, these they were laying War, as the Law expresses it. And that the Darkness of the Night would otherwise have contrived him, yet the Fire they made in Lincoln's-Inn-Field, with the Materials of that Meeting-House, did afford Light enough for the Witnesses to give an Account of the Prisoner: How he went more forward than all the others; and that he was not content with doing the mischief he design'd there, but afterwards, as Head of the Mob, commanded them to go and assault at another, and they went with him, through Wynd Street, to Drury-Lane, to another Fire, that was made by another Company.

We shall shew, that it was not only at these Two Places, but that it was a general Design, to pull down all the Meeting-Houses at that time. And when we have made out this General Intention, and shew it was executed in this manner, we don't doubt, but you will all be sensible, that this Prosecution was very requisite: For it is the Interest of every honest Man to put an End to these Tumults and Disorders, hear their Opinions what they will. It is the Interest of all People (in order to enjoy what God has blessed them with, be it more, or less) to put an End to these Disorders: For there are like the great Tumults of Waters, that bear down all before them. Wherever these things are, all the Burglars and Robbers, and such Persons, join with them to do mischief.

We will call our Witnesses, and give an Account of what relates to the Prisoner, and they will make it appear, that he was chiefly concerned in this Insurrection; and see only said in Lincoln's-Inn-Field, but in other Places.

Mr. At. Gen. My Lord, the Facts that have been open'd by Mr. Attorney, we take to be fully and plainly Rebellion, and High-Treason: I shall not therefore trouble your Lordship with saying any thing more of the Facts, but only shewly here the Course of our Evidence.

We shall shew that there was a Design, the Day before these Meeting-Houses were pull'd down, to pull them down: That the next Day that Design was put in Execution: That the Prisoner was the most active among them, and took upon him to be the Leader, and Captain of the Mob, on that Occasion. And if this be made out, I hope it will give your Lordship, and the Jury, full Satisfaction, that he is Guilty of the Crime laid to his Charge in this Indictment.

Call Thomas Selby. (He is now sworn.)

Mr. At. Gen. Pray, give my Lord, and the Jury, an Account what you know of the Design and Intention of pulling down Meeting-Houses, and when, and where it was.

Mr. Selby. My Lord, I was passing through the Temple, on Tuesday Night, when I saw a great Mob. I heard them confab of demolishing the Meeting-Houses the next Day.

Mr. At. Gen. What Meeting-Houses did they talk of?

Mr. Selby. 'Twas Mr. Burgh's in Lincoln's-Inn-Field.

Mr. At. Gen. Was you among them?

Mr. Selby. No; I was passing through the Temple, and heard them talking as I pass'd.

Mr. At. Gen. How many were there together at that time?

Mr. Selby. I believe there were some four or five hundred.

Mr. At. Gen. When were they to be pull'd down?

Mr. Selby. Some were for pulling of them down then, and some were for leaving of them 'till the next Night, and others were for leaving of them alone, 'till the Event of Dr. Saurin's Trial.

Mr. At. Gen. What was the Occasion of the Meeting of that Mob that talk'd of this?

Mr. Selby. I don't know that.

Mr. At. Gen. Do you know that this Meeting-House was pull'd down?

Mr. Selby. Yes, I know it was pull'd down.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you see it?

Mr. Selby. No, I did not see it, I only heard say so.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you see the Prisoner at the Bar in that Company, in the Temple?—Mr. Selby. No.

Mr. At. Gen. When you overheard them, were they talking low, or loud?

Mr. Selby. It was loud.

Mr. At. Gen. How came you not to give Information of it to some Magistrate?

Mr. Selby. It was known before; they had broke the Windows the Night before.

Mr. At. Gen. Do you know any particular Person, that express'd himself for pulling down the Meeting-Houses?—Mr. Selby. No.

Mr. At. Gen. Who then did you hear say there was such a Design?

Mr. Selby. I heard several.

Mr. At. Gen. Then you don't know any one?—Mr. Selby. No.

Mr. At. Gen. Then you only express yourself, that you heard the Mob say so?

Mr. At. Gen. We don't call this Witness to speak in particular against the Prisoner, but to shew, that these People resolved among themselves, to pull down the Meeting-Houses.

L. C. J. You say you were passing through; You did not make any long Stay, did you?

Mr. Selby. No, my Lord.

L. C. J. Were they come to a Conclusion of the Discourse of pulling them down? Or did you leave them talking of it?

Mr. Selby. I left them talking of it.

Mr. At. Gen. He said there was an Intimation of it on Monday Night, I desire to know how he knew or heard of it?

Mr. Selby. You know the Windows were broke on Monday Night.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you see them?

Mr. Selby. No, but I heard so.

Mr. At. Gen. Who told you so?

Mr. Tally. It was a Man that lives in the House with me.
 Lord Chief Baron. What were they met about?
 Mr. Tally. They were the Mob that accompanied Dr. Sackville home to the Temple.

Then Captain Edward Orrel was fusile.

Mr. At. Gen. Pray look on the Prisoner at the Bar, and give an Account of all you know of this Riot, and how he was concerned in it.

Capt. Orrel. My Lord, I heard there were several Disturbances on Afternoon Night. On Tuesday Night I was at a Coffee-House, where there were several House-keepers. When I was there, there was News brought, that they had pulled down Mr. Burgoyne's Meeting-House.

Mr. At. Gen. Who?

Capt. Orrel. The Mob that came with Dr. Sackville. Pray, says I to Mr. Lonsdale, who keeps the Coffee-House, (he is one of that Congregation) pray step up and see the Truth of it, and whether you can do him any Service: You will find his Son, and, perhaps, he will put you into a Way to put a Stop to it. He went up to Mr. Burgoyne, and found that they had broke the Windows of his House, and Meeting-House; and after they had done that, they went off. From thence he went to Mr. Burgoyne's Son, and, I suppose, he went to the Secretary of State. On Wednesday I went to a Whistling-Hall, with some Neighbours, and went into Oliver's Coffee-House, where I find some time, and afterwards saw Mr. Maypole return through the Park to St. James's. There were several Papers dispersed about a Piece-Fighting; I thought they had been the common Papers that are dispersed about such Places, but I found it was about a Piece-Fighting, and I observed a little Man in the Pelvis very busy, pulling it down: I took particular Notice of him, but could not see him among the Prisoners that have been taken. I came out, and told my Friend, that it was all destroyed. We find a little while at the Corner of the Street, and then I went in again: I went in several Times, till some of them, that were pulling up the Boards, faces at me, and said, Damn him, What does that lazy Fellow do? And I believe, they took me for a Spy. I went again to the Coffee-House, and gave this Account to my Neighbours, and presently News was brought, that they were gone to several other Meetings. We went out again, and went round by Fetter-Lane.

I saw the Conflagration and the Watch were very much inflamed. I spoke to the Conflagration: He said, I with I could do any Service; but we have our Lives in their Hands; we dare not do any more, we have been so much abused. I went into Hallers, and saw the Fire lighted, and went round at a distance, and saw several Pieces of Timber thrown into it. From thence we went again to Lincoln's-Inn-Fields; there I heard some shuffling, Which was the Lord Wharton's House? Others said, St. James's: No, said others, the City, the City, the Bank: Damn them, says I, then, we will have all the Meeting-Houses down. We walked down to the Row where Sir Francis Chantrell's House is, and went towards my Lord Chancellor's House: I saw a Chariot standing at his Door; I said to my Friend, I believe there is somebody from Court, I hope there will be some Guards come down by and by. When I was there, I hallooed a little, and observed a small Body of the Mob detached from that Fire; they ran after one another, cross the Fields: I observed a pretty tall Man at the Head of them; I kept my Eye on that Party. In the middle of the Field they grew stronger, and then they divided themselves, some went towards the Arch, but none towards Peter's House: I went towards those at Peter's House, and there I saw Dammaree in the Queen's Livery, with his Badge; and there they held a Council of the Mob, as I called it. God damn it, says Dammaree, we will have them all down. Some went for going into White-street; Damn it, says another, that's a Hell-Road, the other it worth ten of it: Says Dammaree, I'll lead you on, Boys; Huzza! High-Church and Sackville! God damn them all, we will have them all down. Some of them turned off towards White-street, and others towards Peter's House. Dammaree, and the Mob with him, went through White-street, and came in ten or twelve Yards, he turned about, Huzza! Why don't you come on, Boys, to Drury-lane? God damn them, we will have them all down. I called to him, and said, How now, Dammaree! He turned about, Huzza! Come along, Boys; but he made me no Answer. In this Manner, he led them on from Lincoln's-Inn-Fields to Drury-lane, but I never saw him afterwards. By-and-by comes a little Fellow; I'll make way, says he (and, with a Pick-Axe, which he had in his Hand, endeavoured to break open the Meeting-House Door, and was working about it at the Bottom. Afterwards, while he was working at the Door, comes another Man, one Henry Sanders, about my Size, or a little higher, he had a Hatchet in his Hand: He comes up, and fears, God damn you, you break open a Meeting-House! You don't know how to do it; and, with the second or third Stroke, he broke through it. I stood close by him, laid my Hands upon him, and looked upon him, while he broke open the Door, and made the best Remarks I could of him: I have been one of the Prisoners, but could not find him among them; but, at last, was informed, that he was Apprentice to one Piddis, a Sawyer, in Parker's Lane.

Mr. At. Gen. It is no manner to give an Account of him: I ask, When they had broke open the Door, what did they do next?
 Capt. Orrel. I went into the Meeting-House with them, and stand, Where is Jolly, the Queen's Waterman? Says one, He is gone to the Back-Door: No, says another, he is gone to my Lord Wharton's. But I never saw Dammaree after that.

Mr. At. Gen. You say, he led them from the Fire at Lincoln's-Inn-Fields?

Capt. Orrel. I believed him first there, but did not know him, till they came near the Arch, and there they confused together, which way to go; and by that time they came to Drury-lane, I believe there were two or three Thousand of them.

Mr. At. Gen. At Drury-lane, you say, there was a Tumult of two or three Thousand; pray observe the Prisoner, and tell us, whether you are sure, that he is the Man that headed the Mob at the Arch in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, and led them to Drury-lane?—Capt. Orrel. Yes, he is.

Mr. At. Gen. What happened afterwards? Did any Guards come? And was there any Opposition given to them? Or did they disperse themselves?

Capt. Orrel. My Lord, I was in Drury-lane half an Hour and more, My Friend had been some time in a House, and after we had heard all that Noise, Well, says I, I will go to my Neighbours at the Coffee-House, and acquaint them what has happened. As we were going into Lincoln's-Inn-Fields we met a Detachment of the Horse-Guards: I went up to the Captain; Sir, says I, this is the best Way, through the Arch, for there is a very great Mob: I run back along with them. As soon as they came, they halted at Great Square-Street. There came another Detachment of the Horse-Grenadiers, and met them, and both joined. After they had drawn themselves up in one Line, the Officer commanded them to ride among the Mob, and disperse them, which they did; but were very favourable, and struck them with the Flies of their Swords. After this, a Fellow drew his Sword, and got under a Bulk, I stepped up to him, and as soon as I came up, Sir, says I, What the Devil are you doing? I saw two or three Grenadiers strike him with the Flies of their Swords: He stood with his drawn Sword, and pricked at two or three Horses, so to as to do them any Harm.

Mr. At. Gen. Don't go into the Particulars relating to that Mob, but tell us, Did you for any other Tumult?

Capt. Orrel. I went down with the Grenadiers and Life-Guards to Black-Friars.

Mr. At. Gen. Was any Opposition given to the Guards at Drury-lane? Capt. Orrel. None by Dammaree, nor to the Horse-Guards, as I saw.

Mr. At. Gen. Was there any to the Grenadiers?

Capt. Orrel. There was Opposition; for I saw a Sword drawn, and the Officer alighted, and he swore, God damn them, he would fight the bait of them.

Mr. At. Gen. Do you know of any other Meeting-Houses that were pulled down that Night?

Capt. Orrel. I went to the Guards, and told them that I heard some of the Mob were gone into the City, (some said to the Bow; some said to Mr. Stour's), and others said to other Places. I went to them; Gentlemen, says I, is it better to have all the Meeting-Houses destroyed than the Bow, pray let us go thither: I went along with them down Hallers, and brought them up White-lane; there I heard they were not gone to the Bow, but that they were gone to Black-Friars: I showed them the Way, and went down with them almost to the Meeting-House, and showed them where it was.

Mr. At. Gen. Was that Meeting-House pulled down?
 Capt. Orrel. It was then pulling down, but it was prevented by the Guards.

Mr. At. Gen. Then you speak as to Mr. Burgoyne's, and the Meetings in Fetter-lane, Drury-lane, and Black-Friars?—Capt. Orrel. I was at them all. Mr. Whistler. Pray, What Time of Night was it that you saw Mr. Dammaree?

Capt. Orrel. I can't be positive, but I believe it was about half an Hour after Ten.

Mr. Whistler. Pray, In what Condition was he?

Capt. Orrel. I did not much observe it; I believe he had been drinking, he looked Ruffled.

Mr. Darnall. I think you say, you was in Mr. Burgoyne's Meeting-House, and saw several there pulling it down; Now, did you see Dammaree there?—Capt. Orrel. No.

Mr. Darnall. Did you see Dammaree, till you came to the Fire?

Capt. Orrel. No, nor at the Fire.

Mr. Darnall. Did you see him at the Meeting-House in Drury-lane?

Capt. Orrel. No, nor did I see him after he had brought up that Party through White-street: But I believe him to be the chief Person that led them from Lincoln's-Inn-Fields to Drury-lane.

Damm. When I was in Goal, you asked me, Whether I was the Waterman? Yes, I am, said I, Do you know me? If you are the Waterman, find you, I do.

L. C. J. If you have a mind to ask him any Questions, you may.

Damm. I desire to ask him, Whether he saw me in any of the Meeting-Houses?

Capt. Orrel. I said before, I did not. My Lord Sackville desired me to see the Prisoners in Newgate; I did so: When I came, they were in a dark Hole. I desired to speak with Dammaree and Parbury; and as soon as we went into a lighter Room, I knew them both.

Then Joseph Collier was sworn.

Mr. At. Gen. Do you know the Prisoner at the Bar? Tell us, whether you ever saw him before, and where?

J. Collier. My Lord, I saw him at the Fire, at Lincoln's-Inn-Fields.

Mr. At. Gen. What Time?—J. Col. About Eight or Nine o'Clock.

Mr. At. Gen. What Day?

J. Col. Wednesday, the Fifth of March last; I saw him being the Branch that holds the Candles.

Mr. At. Gen. Where had he it?—J. Col. In Dr. Burgoyne's Meeting.

Mr. At. Gen. What did he do with it?

J. Col. He went two or three Times round the Fire, and then threw it in.

Mr. At. Gen. What did he do besides?

J. Col. He hallooed, and threw up his Hat and Wig several Times.

Mr. At. Gen. Where did you see him first?

J. Col. In Lincoln's-Inn-Fields.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you go into the Meeting-House?—J. Col. No.

Mr. At. Geo. Where did you see him with the Branch?
J. C. J. Just at the End of the Alley.
Mr. At. Geo. Did you see him come out of the Meeting-House?
J. C. J. I do.
Mr. At. Geo. And you saw in his Hand the Branch?—J. C. J. Yes.
Mr. At. Geo. Where did he carry it?
J. C. J. He carried it to the Fire.
Mr. At. Geo. What did he do then?
J. C. J. He went about hallooing for Soldiers, and went round the Fire two or three Times, and then turn'd in.
Mr. At. Geo. What was that Fire made of?
J. C. J. It was made before I came.
Mr. At. Geo. How long was he there?
J. C. J. I believe two or three Hours.
Mr. At. Geo. When did he go away?—J. C. J. He went before the Guards, and led the Mob off to Dum-Dum.
Mr. At. Geo. How do you know he led them off?
J. C. J. He said, Let us go to Dum-Dum, and he went with them, and I saw them go to Great Queen-Street.
Mr. Thynne. What Sort of Cloaths had the Prisoner that Night?
J. C. J. His Workman's Coat and Badger.
Mr. At. Geo. Who appeared to be the most active Man at the Fire?
J. C. J. The Workman: he was the most active.
Mr. Thynne. Do you know of any Thing else forced by this Man, besides the Candlestick?—J. C. J. No.
Mr. Thynne. What Time of Night did you first see Dum-Dum?
J. C. J. I believe it was near Nine.
Mr. Thynne. Will you be positive it was about that Time?
J. C. J. It was about Nine, or Ten.
Mr. Thynne. Will you be positive it was before half an Hour after Ten?—J. C. J. I cannot be positive to half an Hour.
Mr. Thynne. Was any the Meeting-House pulled down before you saw Dum-Dum?—J. C. J. Yes, there was a Fire before.
Mr. Pitt-Rivers. What Time was that?—J. C. J. It was about Nine.
Mr. Thynne. If the Meeting-House was pulled down, did not they take out the Candlestick at first, before they pulled it down?
J. C. J. No, there was a great Fire before they brought it away: I was not there at the Beginning.
Mr. D. At. Geo. You say you came after the Fire was lighted, and there you saw Dum-Dum, but you did not go into the Meeting-House; how then can you say he was in the Meeting-House?
J. C. J. Because I stood at the End of the Alley, and saw him come out.
Mr. D. At. Geo. Why, were there any Lights there?
J. C. J. Yes; the Alley was very full of Lights, and the Meeting-House too.
Mr. At. Geo. I desire he may be asked, Whether he saw Dum-Dum bring that Branch out of the Meeting-House?
Mr. At. Geo. What did you see him bring out of the Meeting-House?
J. C. J. The Branch.
L. C. J. Could you see the Door of the Meeting-House where you stood?—J. C. J. Yes.
L. C. J. Did you see him bring that Branch out of the Meeting-House?
J. C. J. Yes; and I saw him throw it into the Fire.
Mr. D. At. Geo. Was you near the Door?—J. C. J. As near as I am to you.

Then John Still was sworn.

Mr. At. Geo. Look upon the Prisoner, and see if you know him.
J. Still. Yes, I do know him.
Mr. At. Geo. Where, and when did you see him?
J. Still. The Night that the Fire was, I saw him in the Alley, that leads to Mr. Burgin's Meeting-House.
Mr. At. Geo. Where was you?—J. Still. Just in the Alley.
Mr. At. Geo. Where was he going, or from whence was he coming?
J. Still. They were all standing and hallooing.
Mr. At. Geo. Did you see him do any thing more?—J. Still. No.
Mr. At. Geo. What time was it?
J. Still. It was as near as I can guess, about Eleven.
Mr. At. Geo. Was the Meeting-House down, or not?
J. Still. I cannot tell; there was such a Crowd, I could not get to it.
Mr. At. Geo. Was you at the Fire?
J. Still. Yes, but I did not see him there.
Mr. At. Geo. Did you hear him say any thing?
J. Still. Nothing, but only halloo.

Then John Mitchell was sworn.

Mr. At. Geo. Was you at the Fire in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields the first of March last?—J. Mitchell. Yes.
Mr. At. Geo. Do you know the Prisoner?—J. Mitchell. Yes.
Mr. At. Geo. Where did you see him?
J. Mitchell. I saw him that Night at the Fire.
Mr. At. Geo. What did he do there?
J. Mitchell. I only saw him run about the Fire, and halloo.
Mr. At. Geo. Where had they the Wood for that Fire?
J. Mitchell. From Dr. Burgin's Meeting-Place.
Mr. At. Geo. Did you see any Wood brought from thence?
J. Mitchell. No; it was all laid there before I saw it.
Mr. At. Geo. Was you at the Meeting-House?—J. Mitchell. No.
Mr. At. Geo. Was you there when he went from the Fire?
J. Mitchell. No.
Mr. At. Geo. What time was it that you saw him there?
J. Mitchell. About Eleven.
Mr. At. Geo. Pray, who appeared the most active Person there?
J. Mitchell. I don't know, they were all active.
Mr. Thynne. Did you hear him say any thing to the Mob?
J. Mitchell. No; only halloo.

L. C. J. Did they force him to halloo, as he said?
J. Mitchell. No; there was no forcing of him.
Mr. At. Geo. Did he act as a Man that was forced to halloo? or as one that did it willingly?
J. Mitchell. My Lord, he had no Occasion to halloo unless he would.
Mr. Thynne. What Time of Night was this?
J. Mitchell. About Eleven.
Mr. Thynne. Was you there when the Mob went away to Dum-Dum?—J. Mitchell. No.

Then Francis Morgan was sworn.

Mr. At. Geo. Pray look upon the Prisoner at the Bar, and tell us if you know him.
Mr. Morgan. My Lord, the first of March last, at about Ten in the Evening, I heard there was a Tumult in the City: I live in Seaboard, and I came over the Water, with another Person, so for what it was that occasioned it. I came to Dr. Burgin's Meeting-House, where I saw a great Number of Persons pull it down. After I had viewed them there 20-minutes, I went to Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, and I saw them make a Bonfire; and there I saw the Mob in the Queen's Livery, as a Waterman; he excited the Mob very much in their Proceedings, and I saw him pull off his Wig, and halloo, and seemed mightily to be rejoiced; I saw them with several other Persons, that had Sticks in their Hands. I did not see him have any, but he had his Wig in his Hand; he walked round the Fire with them, in Procession, with a Bedstead that was going to be thrown in.
Mr. At. Geo. You say it was ten o'Clock at Night when you came there?—J. Morgan. Yes.
Mr. At. Geo. Did you see Dum-Dum there when you first came?
J. Morgan. I did see him: I did not then know his Name; but that is all I saw.
Mr. At. Geo. Where had they the Materials for that Fire?
J. Morgan. I saw a great many bring Wood from the Meeting-House: I had to loose of them, Gentlemen, what are you doing? The Guards are coming. Said they, Damn the Guards, and the Parliament too; we are ready to face them all.
Mr. At. Geo. Why did they carry the Parliament?
J. Morgan. I don't know that.
Mr. At. Geo. Pray who seemed to be the most active Man, and Inciter of them?
J. Morgan. The principal Man I observed was the Prisoner at the Bar, whose Name I understand since to be Dum-Dum.
Mr. At. Geo. How long did you stay at the Fire?
J. Morgan. About half a quarter of an Hour, and then I heard them enquire, Where is the Fellow that fired the Guards, were coming; so I got away as fast I could, for I came over the Water in my Night-Gown.
Mr. At. Geo. Was Lincoln's-Inn-Fields the only Place you came to?
J. Morgan. I saw no other Fire; I came to the Meeting-Place first, and saw them pull it down, and then went to the Fire, which was very great, and I saw the Prisoner encourage them in bringing Things to throw in: I saw him walk round the Fire, and several about him with Sticks in their Hands; but as to him, I observed none in his Hand.
Mr. At. Geo. How many People do you think might be there at that Time?
J. Morgan. I believe two Thousand.
Dum-Dum. What Time of Night was this?
J. Morgan. About half an Hour after Ten, or Eleven.
Dum-Dum. Well, my Lord, I am very well satisfied.
Mr. Thynne. You say you saw a Procession before the Bedstead was thrown in? Did you see any Thing else that was thrown in?
J. Morgan. Yes, the Doors of the Meeting-House.
Mr. Thynne. Was there any Procession, or Hallooing before then?
J. Morgan. Yes, and I saw abundance of other Materials thrown in.
Mr. Thynne. Did they make the same Procession before all of them?
J. Morgan. No, not before all.
Dum-Dum. Did you see me throw any Thing in?—J. Morgan. No.
Thynne. Did you approach him to be drunk, or sober?
J. Morgan. I did not approach him to be disguised in Drink: I took him to be rather a Madman, than any thing else.
Thynne. Did you see him with any of the Mob, between the Meeting-House and the Fire?
J. Morgan. The Mob was so large, as to extend from the Meeting-House to the Fire; there were great Numbers running to and again, but I saw him at the Fire.

Then John Eaton was sworn.

Mr. At. Geo. Pray give an Account of what you know of this Occurrence, and of the Prisoner at the Bar.
John Eaton. I saw him at the Place where the Fire was.
Mr. At. Geo. Was you there at the making of the Fire?
J. Eaton. No.
Mr. At. Geo. What was the Fire made of?
J. Eaton. Of the Wood brought from the Meeting-House; I went to the Meeting-House with the Gentlemen that was up before.
Mr. At. Geo. What did you see brought out?
J. Eaton. I saw a great many People bring out Pieces of Board.
Mr. At. Geo. Did you see the Prisoner bring any thing out?
J. Eaton. No, I only saw him at the Fire.
Mr. At. Geo. How did he behave himself there?
J. Eaton. Hallooing, as the rest of the Mob did.
Mr. At. Geo. What Ceremony did they use to the Timber before they threw it in?
J. Eaton. They hallooed when they threw it in.
Mr. At. Geo. Did they walk round the Fire with any?
J. Eaton. Yes, with the Bedstead.

G g

Mr. At. Geo.

Mr. Ser. Geo. Who did appear to be the most alive?
J. Esau. There were many as alive as he; but he was very alive.
Mr. Ser. Geo. Pray what condition was he in; drunk or sober?
J. Esau. I am no Judge of that.
Mr. Ser. Geo. There can be nothing in that; no Weight can be laid upon it.
Mr. Ser. Geo. There is nothing in it; if any one kills a Man when he is drunk, he must be hanged when he is sober.
Damarce. I desire he may be asked what Time of Night it was.
J. Esau. It was about half an Hour after Ten.
Mr. Ser. Geo. Did you see any Soldier there?
J. Esau. Yes, one that looked like a Soldier.
Mr. Ser. Geo. What said he between them?
J. Esau. He, and some others, forced the Soldier to pull off his Hat.
Mr. Ser. Geo. Did you see Damarce with them that forced him to pull off his Hat?
J. Esau. Yes.
Mr. Ser. Geo. Did you say all he went away, or did you leave him there?
J. Esau. I left him there.
Mr. Young. Did you hear him say any thing to that Soldier?
J. Esau. I heard him say, Pull off your Hat.
Mr. Damarce. You say you saw several Persons bring out Materials: How many might there be?
J. Esau. I can't tell; but there were a great many.
Mr. Damarce. Did you see Damarce bring any thing out?
J. Esau. No.
Mr. Darnall. Where was he?
J. Esau. I saw him follow the Fire, and I left him there.
Mr. At. Geo. My Lord, there was a Question asked by the Counsel for the Prisoner, which we did not then oppose; but we must be an your Lordship's Judgment, whether it is a have any Regard to the Merits of this Cause. For admitting he was drunk to that Degree they would have by that is an excuse of his Crime, I don't find they clear that Matter up: But if it be so, it is an Excuse for Felony or Treason. The only Question is, Whether he was not assisting in this Tumult?
L. C. J. It is almost necessary, that when a Man goes upon such Actions, he should be in Drunk; and I don't know but a little more Drunk might have carried him to St. James's, where pulled out down.
Mr. At. Geo. My Lord, we have done with our Evidence for the Queen.
Mr. Whistler. May I please your Lordship, and Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of Counsel for the Defendant: The Defendant stands in need of twenty four Crimes; it is Treason, and levying War against the Queen, under whose Government we are the happy People in the World. And I agree with the Gentlemen that are of Counsel with her Majesty, that a Prosecution of this Nature is very necessary, if their tumultuous Actions amount to levying War; and that no Tumulture is to be borne. But the Question is, What Shew the Prisoner had in this Tumult? I agree these Tumults are not to be endured in any Civil Society, nor will any body, I believe, say, that those Methods are to be taken with, or any Injuries whatever to be used to, no Defendants. The Law is their Protection as much as of any other Subjects of this Kingdom: Ill Ways of Force and Violence towards the Defendants are unjustifiable, and their Ways are unreasonable; and no such evil and base Methods are to be used towards them. But that which we insist on, is, that the Prisoner had no Share or Guilt in the Actions, and if so, then there will be no Colour to say, that he is guilty of a Riot, much less of levying War.
 I beg leave just to state what has been sworn against him, and then apply myself to give an Answer. The first Witness was only to prove that there was a Design, and that the Witness heard a Rumour among a great many People in the Temple, to pull down the Meeting-House of Mr. Bury's; but he did not say for Damarce there, nor is it proved that Mr. Damarce was any way privy thereto: And we shall shew that he was innocent of any such Design. The next Witness is Gerril: He speaks directly to the Prisoner at the Bar; but I will observe that he does not speak to him till half an Hour after Ten, when he said him in Leicester-Fields, at the Fire of the Materials of Mr. Bury's Meeting-House: Indeed he does speak as to his having some Share in the Destroying of the Mob; but we shall shew that he was not a voluntary Agent as that Matter; and if so, that will sufficiently account for, and thereby we shall answer the Evidence given by him. The next is Gilber: We will shew him to be under a great Mistake, and that it is impossible that what he swears can be true: He confines himself to about Nine o'Clock, when this Action of carrying out the Search, and throwing it into the Fire with such a formal Prosecution was. We shall shew where the Defendant was till half an Hour after Ten; and that it is impossible for him to have the least Hand in planting or demolishing the Meeting-House. And if that be answered, we think it will go a great way towards clearing him of this Charge. The other Witnesses only speak to his being among the Rabble, hallooing amongst them: If we give an Account how the Prisoner came to be there, and that he was under a Necessity to do as he did, and that it was a perfect Accident, we hope the Imputation of any Crime for his being an Actor in this Matter, especially Treason, will not be laid to his Charge.
 The Prisoner's Case was this: On Wednesday Morning he had occasion to apply to the Officers of the Blue-Guards for a young Fellow that he had a mind to have for his Apprentice: He was with the Beetles from Ten in the Morning till about Two o'Clock, and indeed he might have been employed his Time, for they were all that while at an Alehouse drinking. After that, he falls into Company with one Wood, with whom he continued at another Alehouse, till about Ten o'Clock at Night. As they were drinking, there came a Report that there was a Fire in the Strand. The Officers and the rest of the Company were surprised, and got up, says the Prisoner, There is a Lady I serve with Coals, that lives in the Strand, I must go and take my things: He comes out of Wood's, leaves Wood alone, and there he was surprised, and bound, and taken into their Force, and finding there was no Fire in the Strand, he was going to a house, he thought the Strand was a miserable poor Place; he was going there, and therefore chose to go the back way. His Companion, Man Wood, went with him; but he being as a civil Condition that Wood never, he got out of the Mob. But we shall prove that this Mob was under a Force, and by force of the Mob dragged into the Mob at Wood: And you observe the Witnesses against the Prisoner, that they heard every Body say to the Mob that did it a join with them, and that they said the Power of these idle People, and such other such, and that they can say he was a Criminal. And there is no Power to say, that this Mob was over night, or at any time before, in any Leicester-Fields, or any other place, the tumultuous Night before, but by your Lordship's leave as among them at Night, on the first of May. If we did not know this, we should think the Court and the Jury will not believe that he was not a criminal Actor in this Cause.

 If the Defendant should be so unfortunate to be taken up as a criminal Actor, yet we hope the Fact will not amount to more than a Riot, and not to levying War, nor to High-Treason. I shall not take up your Lordship's Time at present in speaking to that Point, but we have called our Witnesses, when we see how the Matter stands. If any Gentleman should appear against him, or the Fact be doubtful whether he was a willing Agent in these Irregularities or no, the Question will then be proper, Whether it amounts to levying War, or not? We will call our Witnesses, and hope that about Point shall be referred to us.
Mr. Darnall. My Lord, I beg a few Words on the first of May. A civil Indictment charges the Prisoner with levying War, then will be a Charge of Fact such as amount to a levying War. The Witnesses for the Queen have sworn, that the Prisoner was at the Fire in Leicester-Fields, and that he then did halloo and shout up his Hat. I have that must be agreed, for my Indictments are that he did so, and our Witnesses will all say so much. But if that were all, then the Witnesses against the Prisoner must be equally Guilty. For the Chief of them, Gerril, says, he was forced to pull off his Hat, and it was known to him the Prisoner of the Mob that Night, to make all that passed by say Obedience, as he, called it, to Dr. Johnson, and High Church. My Lord, that which I barely say on behalf of the Prisoner, is, that unless he were in the front of pulling down the Meeting-House in general, and doing something as Execution of that general Intention, it will not be a levying of War against her Majesty. My Lord, it is observed that this Man was at the Fire in his Coat and Budge, and we think a great deal may be inferred from his Habit, that he was not in to do an Intention, or levying War against her Majesty, which Stratton he was so remarkably distinguished to say; but a Man who had such a vile Design to execute, would dress himself in such a manner as would best conceal him: Therefore we think his being armed at the Fire, and hallooing, and the rest of the Evidence against him, is not enough to prove him in that general Intention, and the Execution of it.
 The Gentlemen of the other Side thought it necessary to give some Evidence of a Design to pull down the Meeting-Houses in general; and for that purpose proved that a great Number of People were got together the Night before in the Temple-Works, where there was a Discourse by some of them, that they would pull down Mr. Bury's Meeting-House, but who these People were, I don't know, nor do they by my Means bring that home to the Prisoner. And it is impossible for us to give an Answer to that Evidence, for to say the Mob did so, is to say that Nobody did so; and no Witness can be relied on for an Evidence, for who that Mob were is not explained. And, my Lord, if there were no Intention, or no general Intention to pull down Meeting-Houses, we apprehend there can be no levying of War: If the Fact were sudden and accidental, or only intended against a particular Meeting-House, we must submit that to your Lordship, whether if he were Guilty of that Fact, it would amount to High-Treason? We think all the Cases on this Foundation, that there must be an Intention to commit such Offence in general; and an Intention to commit it to the particular Injury of a Person, or Place, will not be sufficient. The Witnesses against the Prisoner say, there was an Intention, or Discourse of going to Mr. Bury's Meeting-House, and no Talk of any other; but when they were there, then they went to a second, and on to a third: But the original Intention by the Mob, doth not appear to be more than to go to Mr. Bury's Meeting-House, and to pull that down, and therefore is not a levying of War.
 The Case in Point, in the second Assize, 66. where the People in Osney were sent to assemble together, and move others to join them, and to pull down Inclosures, was decided with this Circumstance, that it was a general Intention, and when they were got together themselves, they persuaded others to join with them, they conspired to go on several Gentlemen's Houses, and to take Arms and Horses, and to kill several Gentlemen, and then to come to London; and their Intent was general, not to pull down any particular Inclosure, but all of them, for the Enlargement of Highways and Commons, and so to reform that which the Law ought to do.
 So in the same Book, in the Case of the Apprentices of London, 3 Assize, 4. 5. For reducing the Price of Fish in general, they agreed to break open the Prison, to release some of their Companions, and to go to the Lord-Mayor's House, and to kill him, and burn his House, and then to break open two other Houses near the Tower, where there were Arms for several hundred Persons: Then to Gilbert Liberty, and to purchase other People to join with them.
 There is a later Case in my Lord Chief Justice Kings's Reports, which was the Intention of pulling down Bury's Meeting-House; there they took upon themselves Regal Authority, and would not take the Oath the Law prescribed; but, my Lord, those Cases are attended with many worse Circumstances than this is, for there they assembled with Arms, there they had one they called Coyne to lead them, with his sword drawn,

Mr. Darnell. Did you stop any where?

Wind. No where, Sir, I went on. He was at Temple-Bar, making way to the Gentlewoman, and the Crowd forced him up Sherr-Lane, into Lincoln's-Inn-Fields; and when they saw his Badges, they said, Damn ye, you are the Queen's Waterman, you shall go with us.

Mr. Whistler. Give an Account of what passed when he was there.

Wind. I saw him stand against the dead Wall, and they took hold of him, and said, Damn ye, you are the Queen's Waterman, you shall go with us, or we will tear you in Pieces.

Mr. Whistler. Did he go willingly? Or what did he say?

Wind. He said, God bless the Queen, Gentlemen, I'll do any Thing you would have me, don't knock me on the Head.

Mr. Whistler. Whereabout was this?

Wind. It was, I think, just by the Street they call Dale-Street.

Mr. At. Gen. You say you were with him all this while, and came along with him, and at Dale-Street, you say—

Wind. At Dale-Street, I think they call it, as you go to Tavern-Side, just at the Wicket, as you go through Lincoln's-Inn.

Mr. At. Gen. Where did they lay hold of him?

Wind. Just at Lincoln's-Inn-Gate.

Mr. At. Gen. But I thought he had been pulled by the Mob at Temple-Bar?

Wind. We were going to the Gentlewoman's House.

Mr. At. Gen. Why, I thought he lived in the Street; Was Lincoln's-Inn-Fields the Way to the Street?

Wind. The Multitude of People forced him from Fleet-Street up Sherr-Lane.

Mr. At. Gen. Where did you meet them at first?

Wind. He was going through Temple-Bar to the Street, and they said, Here is the Fire; so we turned up the Lane: There was no passing thro' to the Street, there was such a Crowd.

Mr. At. Gen. But you found no Crowd afterwards, I suppose. Was the Press so great at Temple-Bar that you was forced up Sherr-Lane?

Wind. Yes.

Mr. At. Gen. You did not touch the Ground all the while, did you?

Wind. I saw them force him all the Time.

Mr. At. Gen. Did they force you too?

Wind. No, I went alone.

Mr. At. Gen. Was you forced up from Temple-Bar to Lincoln's-Inn-Gate?

Wind. Forced? No, Sir.

Mr. At. Gen. Why, he is an big a Man as you, how came they to force him, and not you?

Wind. He was taken hold of by the Mob in Dale-Street.

Mr. At. Gen. Now you say, the first Time he was touched by them was at Dale-Street; can you say you was forced from Temple-Bar to Lincoln's-Inn-Fields?

Wind. Yes, we were forced by Violence.

Mr. At. Gen. Was you forced for one?

Wind. Yes, we were forced among the Crowd of People.

Mr. Justice Tracy. You say you were carried in the Crowd from Temple-Bar; how far was you carried?

Wind. To Dale-Street.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Where is Dale-Street?

Wind. It is behind Lincoln's-Inn; as you go through a little Wicket; it is where the Shopkeepers are.

Mr. At. Gen. Where is this which you call Dale-Street?

Wind. I am not well acquainted with the Streets.

Mr. At. Gen. How came you then to call it Dale-Street?

Wind. They tell me it is called so: It is a narrow Street, just behind Lincoln's-Inn. When you come through the Wicket, you must turn of the Right Hand up to Tavern-Side.

L. C. J. You say you went to Temple-Bar to go into the Street, and then you met a great a Press, that you could not go through. Where did you go then?

Wind. I went up Sherr-Lane.

L. C. J. Did the Crowd force you up?—Wind. Yes.

L. C. J. Did all that Crowd that you met at Temple-Bar go up Sherr-Lane?

Wind. Some went one Way, and some another.

L. C. J. Which Side of Fleet-Street was you when you went to Temple-Bar?

Wind. On the Side next the Temple.

L. C. J. Then how came you to cross the Street, when there was such a Crowd you could not get along?

Wind. They forced us along.

L. C. J. I ask you, if there was such a Crowd, that you could not get through, how could you go cross the Street to Sherr-Lane?

Wind. They all went that way.

L. C. J. Then you say, that all that Crowd that filled up the Street, so as to hinder your passing into the Street, were all received into Sherr-Lane: When you was got up into Sherr-Lane, where did the Crowd carry you then?

Wind. Into Lincoln's-Inn.

L. C. J. When you was in the Square, Where did you go then? Did he Crowd carry you through the Wicket?

Wind. They forced as hard as ever they could force.

L. C. J. Then you say, when you was in the open Square, you could not avoid being carried by the Crowd through the Wicket. Consider what you say, you are on your Oath. How could you, when you was in the Square, be forced by the Crowd through the Wicket? In the next Place, Where did you get out from the Crowd, when you was got thro' the Wicket? How did you get from the Crowd?

Wind. I came down Lincoln's-Inn, into Sherr-Lane; there is a way that goes backw'ards, behind the Houses: I went away, and left them all.

L. C. J. When you left them, where was Dammaree?

Wind. They forced him to the Fire.

L. C. J. Where did they lay hold of him?

Wind. It was at the dead Wall at Dale-Street.

L. C. J. Is that between the Wicket and the Fields?

Wind. Yes, it is opposite to the Wicket.

L. C. J. I ask, Was it between the Wicket and the Fields?

Wind. Yes, it was.

L. C. J. I thought you had not gone at all of the Right Hand towards the Fields, but that you crossed down towards Sherr-Lane.

Wind. No, there was no getting that Way; I went down into Chancery-Lane.

L. C. J. Now tell me, Which Way did you get into Chancery-Lane, if you were at the Backside of Lincoln's-Inn, and did not go into the Fields? Is not the other Way the Way to Sherr-Lane?

Mr. At. Gen. How could you get into Chancery-Lane, without going by Sherr-Lane, or into Holborn?

Wind. I went the Backway.

Mr. At. Gen. Then tell us which Way did you go.

Wind. I turned on the Left-hand.

Mr. At. Gen. Where was you standing when you turned?

Wind. Just at the Wicket.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you go no further?—Wind. No, no further.

Mr. At. Gen. Then how could you see the Mob lay hold of him at the dead Wall? Pray tell us where, and in what Manner you got from the Mob as you go home?

Wind. I came down into Fleet-Street.

Mr. At. Gen. Where did you come into Fleet-Street?

Wind. Just against the lower Temple-Gate.

Mr. At. Gen. Which do you call the lower Temple-Gate, that next to the Bar, or the other?

Wind. I mean that next to Fleet-Bridge.

L. C. J. At that Time might not Dammaree and you have gone away into Chancery-Lane, or where you would?

Wind. No, they took hold of him.

L. C. J. If they seized him in that place, whether did they take him? what did they do with him?

Wind. They took hold of him, and pulled him, and hauled and forced him by Violence.

L. C. J. Well, did you see him afterwards? Did he not go along with you?

Wind. No, when I saw they laid hold on him, I left him.

L. C. J. Then you saw nothing of what passed in the Fields?

Wind. No, nothing of that.

L. C. J. Now you have been telling us that it was a Quarter after Ten when you parted from the Mob, in Chancery-Lane; how came you to be so exact as to the Time? How could you, that had been drinking twelve Hours, be able to tell to a Quarter of an Hour what Time it was?

Wind. What say you to it?—No Answer.

Mr. Whistler. Do you know the Names of the Streets about Lincoln's-Inn?

Wind. I know the Street again.

L. C. J. He has described the Streets sufficiently; no Advantage will be taken of his mistaking the Name.

L. C. Baron. You speak of some that took hold of him; whereabouts was that?

Wind. At Dale-Street, behind Lincoln's-Inn Wicket.

L. C. Baron. You said, as soon as they laid Hands on him, you left him. Was it so or not?—Wind. Yes.

L. C. Baron. Then you say so more; you saw no more what was done by him, or with him, after that?—No Answer.

Then Fardell rose, & swore.

Mr. Whistler. Did you see Dammaree on the first of March last?

Wind. I kept the Bell Alarum in Water-Lane; he came to my House about Two, and said there till half an Hour after Ten.

Mr. Whistler. Are you sure of that?—Fardell. I am sure of it.

L. C. J. Was he full of Drink then?—Fardell. Yes, full of Drink.

Mr. Darnell. Do you remember that any gave an Account of a Fire on the first of March?

Fardell. I knew nothing of that.

Mr. Darnell. Do you know on what Occasion he went away?

Fardell. He went on no Occasion that I know of, but being in Drink.

Mr. Darnell. Did you hear any Thing of a Fire?—Fardell. Nothing.

Mr. At. Gen. Where do you live?

Fardell. At the Bell, in Water-Lane.

Mr. At. Gen. What Countryman are you?—Fardell. A German.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you take any Account when he went away?

Fardell. Yes, about half an Hour after Ten.

Mr. At. Gen. How came you to take particular Notice of the Time? Fardell. I can't tell how it came.

Mr. At. Gen. Did nobody come in and tell of a Fire?

Fardell. I heard nothing of it.

Then Charles Bishop rose, & sworn.

Mr. Whistler. Was you with Dammaree the first of March last?

C. Bishop. Yes.

Mr. Whistler. How long did you stay with him?

C. Bishop. 'Till half an Hour after Ten.

Mr. Whistler. Did any body bring any Account of a Fire?

C. Bishop. Yes, our Poilition.

Mr. Whistler. What was done then?

C. Bishop. We laid an Hour after that.

Mr. Darnell. When was it that they brought the News of the Fire?

C. Bishop. It was half an Hour after Eight, or Nine.

Mr. Darnell. Pray give an Account what passed after?

C. Bishop. We had a Pound of Snuff, and smoked a Pipe.

Mr. Whistler. When he went away, on what Occasion did he say he would go?

C. Bishop. He said nothing of the Fire, but parted from me, and was much in Drink.

Mr. Darnell. How long did he stay after the Talk of the Fire?

C. Bishop. About an Hour.

Mr. Darnell. Did you leave him there, or did he leave you?

C. Bishop. He left me; I find a while after, and I saw him afterwards in Fleet-Street talking with a Woman.

Mr. Darnell. Whereabout was that?

C. Bishop. Just by the Green-Dragon Tavern.

Mr. Darnell. Did you speak with them there?

C. Bishop. No; he was so much in Drink, that I did not care to speak with him.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Was Wind with him then?

C. Bishop. No; I did not see him.

L. C. J. Did Wind go with him from you?

C. Bishop. Yes.

L. C. J. Do you remember that when the News was brought, he said that was a Gentlewoman in the Street that he must take Care of?
C. B. J. No. I do not remember it.
Mr. Dawd. Our Interest in calling this Witness, is to show that he was at that House half an Hour after Ten.
L. C. J. He says, the News was brought at half an Hour after Eight or Nine, and that they parted half an Hour after Ten; and when he is asked how long they staid after the News, he says, about an Hour.
L. C. B. J. How long did you staid after the News of the Fire?
C. B. J. I can't exactly say, but we staid 'till half an Hour after Ten.
L. C. B. J. When you saw him at the Tavern Door, was it half an Hour after Ten?
L. C. B. J. No.
L. C. B. J. Pray, what time was it you saw him there?
C. B. J. It was about three Quarters after Ten.

Then John Light was sworn.

Mr. Whistler. Was you at the Bell Alleyhouse the Fifth of March last, or thereabouts?
J. Light. Yes, I was there.
Mr. Whistler. At what time of Night?
J. Light. Between Eight and Nine o'Clock.
Mr. Whistler. What Accus'd did you bring of a Fire?
J. Light. I brought in the News.
Mr. Whistler. How long did you tarry with him after that?
J. Light. I did not tarry at all, I came on for a Pint of Drink, and went away.
Mr. Whistler. Was you not in his Company after that?
J. Light. I came into the House before they went away.
Mr. Whistler. What time of Night was it when you came in the second time?
J. Light. About Ten o'Clock.
Mr. Whistler. How long did they stay after that?
J. Light. 'Till between Ten and Eleven.

Then Wm. W. was sworn.

Mr. Whistler. Did you see Dumaine the Fifth of March, at Night?
Wm. W. Yes.
Mr. Whistler. What time of Night was it?
Wm. W. Half an Hour after Ten.
Mr. Whistler. Where did you see him?
Wm. W. I left him at this Gentleman's Shop.
Mr. Whistler. Where does the Witness live?
Wm. W. In Plot Street.
Mr. Whistler. In what Condition was he when you saw him there?
Wm. W. He was drunk.
Mr. Whistler. Did you see him do any thing indecent?
Wm. W. Yes, he walked about, and asked what the matter? We told him there was a Difference; he says he, I hear there is a Fire.
Mr. Whistler. What did he do after that?
Wm. W. I left him there.
Mr. Whistler. Was any body with him?
Wm. W. No, none but himself.
Mr. Dawd. How long before the Fire burn?
Wm. W. A long time, I think there were forty People had come and said, that all the Inside of the Meeting was burnt.
Mr. Dawd. How long before that?
Wm. W. I believe it might be an Hour before, about Eight o'Clock: I was going into the City, I saw a great many People, and they had the two Inns that were up the Top of the Pulpit: What is the Matter, said I? Why, say they, shole Men have the Bars that kept up the Top of Mr. Burgoyne's Pulpit; and I knew them to be shole Bars, for I have seen them often.
Mr. Dawd. Where was it that you saw them?
Wm. W. It was at St. Basil's Church.
Mr. Dawd. You say the Fire had been an Hour before you saw him in Plot Street?
Wm. W. Yes.
L. C. B. J. Who told you they were the Bars?
Wm. W. The People that knock'd after them.

Then Mr. Giles was sworn.

Mr. Whistler. Do you remember the Night that this Difference was, that you saw Mr. Dumaine from Mrs. Giles? I saw him, I believe, about a Quarter after Ten; he stood and talked with me.
Mr. Whistler. How long did he stay?
Mrs. Giles. Above a Quarter of an Hour.
Mr. Whistler. How do you know it was that time?
Mrs. Giles. After he was gone, I did but lock up my Door, and go up Stairs, and it struck Eleven.
Mr. Whistler. What Condition was he in?
Mrs. Giles. Very drunk.
Mr. Whistler. How long had the Fire been before that?
Mrs. Giles. A long time, four Hours: The People that went along, said, they had burnt the Inside of the Meeting. About Eight o'Clock they were burning it, and about Ten o'Clock they said it was all burnt.
Mr. Just. Tray. Did you hear him talk of any Fire at a Friend's House in the Street?
Mrs. Giles. He had nothing of that, but asked me if there was not a Fire: I told there was a Fire at Leach's See-Field.
Mr. Just. Tray. Was any body with him?
Mrs. Giles. No body but himself.
Mr. Just. Tray. Was you acquainted with him?
Mrs. Giles. I never saw him before, that I know.
Mr. Just. Tray. Then you was an utter Stranger to him? How came he to be talking with you?
Mrs. Giles. I was standing at the Door with four others, and he came to us.
Mr. Just. Tray. Did he come to you on any Business?
Mrs. Giles. He came as he was walking along, and asked me, What was the matter?
Mr. Just. Tray. Had not you been asked that Question by a great many times?
Mrs. Giles. By a great many.
Mr. Just. Tray. Do you remember who asked you the Question before he came to you?
Mrs. Giles. No.
Mr. Just. Tray. Then how came you to take more Notice of him than of others that asked the same Question?

Mrs. Giles. Because he stood a great while, and talked, and had the Queen's Coat on: He was very satisfied, and stood and talked with me, and that made me take notice of him.
Mr. Just. Tray. How came you to be subpoena'd?
Mrs. Giles. Because I had said to several Gentlewomen, that there was such an one taken up, they said he was pulling down the Meeting-house: I said it was impossible, for that he was with me at that time, and came from the City-wards, and that made me inquire into it.
Mr. Just. Tray. Then you was sent to him, was you?
Mrs. Giles. No; I did not go, but a Gentlewoman in Leach's See-Field, one Mrs. Plowden, I know nothing of him; but because I thought on could not see the Man, I was willing to clear him if I could.
Mr. Whistler. How long have you in all whilst you now do?
Mrs. Giles. I have lived there twenty Years.
Mr. Just. Tray. What did you talk about? He could not be a Quarter of an Hour asking that Question.
Mrs. Giles. No; but a great many came by, and asked, Who are you for? and what are you? And he said, You may for me who I am for; I am for the Queen.
Mr. Just. Tray. How did he not talk with you so long?
Mrs. Giles. I was at the Door all the time, and he talked with me and others.
Dawd. I desire to ask her, whether I told any thing of a Nark-Child?
Mrs. Giles. He said he had nursed my Lord Mayor's Children.
Mr. Just. Tray. What else did you talk of?
Mrs. Giles. I advised him to go home; and I turn'd about and went in, and he said, Good Night, My Mistress.
L. C. B. J. Did he talk freely?
Mrs. Giles. He talked as if he was drunk.
L. C. B. J. He gave an Account you say of nursing Children: How came that?
Mrs. Giles. I told him, I wished my Lord Mayor would send out the Guards to pull the Mob: Say he, I nursed his Children; that was the Reason of it.
Mr. Dawd. Did he say any thing of any other Nark-Children?
Mrs. Giles. Yes, he said he nursed for Richard Heard's, Did you nurse them, said I? Yes, says he, we did at home.
Mr. Just. Tray. Are you sure that is the Man?
Mrs. Giles. Yes; for I went to Amoy to see him.
Mr. Whistler. How came you to remember the Time so exactly?
Mrs. Giles. Because I had stood at the Door so long, and heard several go by, and say, I was at home.
Mr. Whistler. How near do you live from St. Dunston's Church?
Mrs. Giles. Just over against it.
Mr. Whistler. Will you now call some Witnesses, to show that he was under Force and Constraint.

Then Mr. Cammies was sworn.

Mr. Dawd. Do you remember that you saw Dumaine the Night that this Difference was at the Meeting-house?
Cammies. My Lord, I don't know the Man; but I did see a Man with the Queen's Coat and Badge; I keep a Shop in Leach's See-Field, and a House in Targate: I being robbed there some time before, I went between the two Shops to see they did me no harm: I sent my Servant to bed, and going to see if he was there, I did not find him; but going back again by the Fire, the Mob cry'd, Huzza, Seize him. I thinking of the Day, did I intend to pull off my Hat, and they struck me over my Head, and then I was forced to believe as they did. I met my Boy presently, and sent him to bed: I went away immediately, and by the Fire I saw that Man, and some People had him by the Shoulders, and thrust him about, some out way, and some another: Sometimes he was at a distance from the Fire, and sometimes very near it; but he seemed as if he could not stand.
Mr. Dawd. What time of Night was this?
Cammies. As near as I can guess, it was about Eleven o'Clock.
Mr. Dawd. Did you see the Mob lay Hands on him?
Cammies. I saw them pull him from Hand to Hand, and I could compare him to nothing but a Dog as a Ring, they pulled him up and down; but I don't know the Man, but only by the Coat.
Mr. Dawd. Do you take it the Mob made themselves merry with him, or that he asked them?
Cammies. I can't be a Judge of that Matter.
Mr. Just. Tray. What time did you shut up your Shop?
Cammies. That is up, as near as I can guess, at Seven o'Clock, because there was a great Mob: My next Neighbour would not keep open any longer; so we shut up our shops.
Mr. Just. Tray. What time did you find your Servant to bed?
Cammies. I sent him out about three Quarters after Ten, or more, and I run down after him.
Mr. Just. Tray. How long was it after you sent him away, that you went to look after him?
Cammies. I went presently after him; I got to the Shop before him.
Mr. Just. Tray. Were not other People pushed about besides him?
Cammies. I saw nobody; I asked about him him that had the Queen's Coat on; I did not say, but made all the haste I could away.
L. C. J. Are you sure the Prisoner is the Man you speak of?
Cammies. No.
L. C. J. Do you believe it is he?
Cammies. I can't tell; I can't take upon me to say, for it was a Man with the Queen's Coat on.
L. C. J. Whereabout did you see him?
Cammies. I was coming up the dead Wall under Leach's See-Field Garden to see for my Servant, and at the lower End, just by the Shops, there was a great Number of People made a Ring, like that where they play at Card-games: He was in the middle of them, and they shov'd him about sometimes to another. I met immediately with my Boy, and I took him a Box on the Ear.
L. C. J. I only want to know the Place where you saw him.
Cammies. In Leach's See-Field, within the Rails, under Leach's See-Field Garden, towards Paragon-Road, I believe it might be seven or eight Yards within the Rails.

H h

Dawd.

Mr. M. Lark. The Shirt which I have on now, was torn by them.
Mrs. Mary Reading was Joane.

Mr. M. Lark. Was you near this Fire?
Mr. M. Lark. I heard there was a great Fire, so I went out, and I saw one of our Neighbours; says he, Where is your wife? I said it was in Lucas's-lane-Field; at that, says he, you see her was here just now, I with he is not gone to it. She asked me so relating with her, we went into Lucas's-lane-Field, and saw the Fire. As we stood there, I saw a Sconce brought, and thrown into the Fire. I saw a little short Man, a black Man, in black Hair, carry the Sconce round the Fire three times.

Mr. Whitaker. What Dress was he in?
Mr. Reading. I could not see what Dress; I saw he was in Waterman's Cloaths, but I could not see the Colour, but that it was not the Man.

Mr. Darnell. Is that the Man?
Mr. Reading. Nay, he was a little short Man in his own Hair.
Mr. Darnell. Was there any more than one Sconce thrown in?
Mr. Reading. I saw no more.

L. C. J. You could not say what Colour his Cloaths were; and can you say that that was not the Man?—Mr. Reading. Yes.

Mr. Darnell. Did you see any thing more?
Mr. Reading. When I came away, the Fire was pretty well burnt, and coming along, we met with a Waterman, says the Woman that was with me, Lord bless me! How is one of the Queen's Watermen. What have you to say to the Queen's Waterman? says he: Nothing, said he; but God bless the Queen, and her Watermen too. Says he, You are a little Girl, and I will tell you.

L. C. J. Whereabouts did you meet that Waterman?
Mr. Reading. As we were going from the Fire, we met him going up to it, and this is the Man that we met going towards the Fire when we came from it.

L. C. J. Was that before or after the burning the Sconce?
Mr. Reading. It was afterwards.

L. C. J. How long was it after?
Mr. Reading. I can safely take my Oath, it was Half an Hour.

L. C. J. Was any thing thrown into the Fire after that Man came?
Mr. Reading. I never went thither after it.

Mr. At. Gen. Where was you?
Mr. Reading. In St. Andrew's Street, near the Seven Dials.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you ever see him before?—Mr. Reading. Never before.
L. C. J. Where was you going when you met him?
Mr. Reading. I was going homewards, towards Great Queen-Street, and I was coming towards the Fire.

L. C. J. Was there at that time any Fire in Drury-Lane?
Mr. Reading. They were pulling down the Meeting-House in Drury-Lane.

L. C. J. Then you met him coming from Queen-Street, a little time after that they began to pull down the House in Drury-Lane; and about half an Hour after the Sconce was thrown into the Fire in Lucas's-lane-Field?—Mr. Reading. Yes, it was.

L. C. J. Where did you see that he was in Drink?
Mr. Reading. I believe he was; for the Woman he killed said, he smelt strong of Liquor.

Mr. At. Gen. How long was this after the Sconce was thrown in?
Mr. Reading. It was about half an Hour; I believe rather more than less.

Mr. Whitaker. Was you at the Fire in Lucas's-lane-Field the first of March last, at Night?—Mr. Reading. Yes.

Mr. Whitaker. Do you remember who it was that carried the Sconce?
L. C. J. Sir, I went to the Fire, because I have a Brother lives by there, and was afraid that he might come to some Damage. As I was going, there was a vast Crowd, and a great Ring, and in that Ring, as I could see between them, I saw a little Man with black Hair, very short; he carried the Sconce three times round the Fire, and then threw it in.

Mr. Whitaker. What Sort of Man do you say he was?
L. C. J. Sir, He was a black Man, a short Man with his own Hair.

Mr. Whitaker. Is that he?—L. C. J. Sir, No.
Mr. Whitaker. Was he in a Waterman's Habit?
L. C. J. Sir, Yes; but I can't say he had a Badge.

L. C. J. Was you with the last Witness?—L. C. J. Sir, Yes.
L. C. J. How near was you to the Fire when you saw him carry it round?

L. C. J. Sir, As near as I could get for the Crowd, I believe as near as that Place. [Pointing to the other Side the Court.] I could not go any nearer, for the Fire was vally hot.

L. C. J. Was there any Crowd there?
L. C. J. Sir, Yes, a great one; but I was of the Outside of the Ring.

L. C. J. Then if he was a little Man, and you are so tall Woman, and you were of the Outside of the Ring, how could you see him?
L. C. J. Sir, Because I looked through under their Arms as they passed along: The Crowd was still going to fetch Fire, so that they many times about, and came again.

L. C. J. You say you distinguished his Hair to be black; what Colour was his Coat?
L. C. J. Sir, I can't well tell; but I believe it was either grey or black.

L. C. J. Had he any Badge?—L. C. J. Sir, I believe he had.
L. C. J. Where was it?—L. C. J. Sir, I saw it upon his Arm.

Mr. Whitaker. Was the Crowd greater about the Fire at some times than others?
L. C. J. Sir, Yes, the Crowd abated; some went to Hobbs, and some to the Right, and some to the Left.

L. C. J. The last Witness said, the Fire was burnt as a Coal.
L. C. J. Sir, Yes, the Fire was burnt as a Coal; and as I was going home, I met this Man: Says I, There goes the Queen's Waterman: Says he, What have you to say to the Queen's Waterman? Nothing, says I, but God bless the Queen, and her Watermen too. And then he gave me a Kiss, and then we parted.

Mr. Whitaker. Did you ever hear him talk disrespectfully of the Queen or Government?
L. C. J. Sir, No; quite otherwise: In February last he came to me, and asked me, Do you hear what a Noise this Mob makes? Yes, said I, I am sorry for it; and I am sorry too, says he: They say the Queen is angry at it; and it troubles me to think of it.

Mr. Whitaker. At any times when there has been publick Rejoicings for any Victory, how has he behaved himself?
L. C. J. Sir, He has behaved himself as a good Man.

L. C. J. I take Notice of that Expedition, That you said, there goes the Queen's Waterman: Had you heard any Talk before of the Queen's Waterman?

L. C. J. Sir, No; but I heard that the Guards were coming.
L. C. J. You did not take the Waterman for one of the Guards, did ye?
L. C. J. Sir, No.

L. C. J. But had you heard any sort speak of the Waterman before?
L. C. J. Sir, No.

L. C. J. Where did you meet him, when you had that Favour from him?—L. C. J. Sir, Within the Rails; he was going to the Fire, and I was going from it.

L. C. J. Sir, Whence did he come?
L. C. J. Sir, I think either from the Corner, by the Duke of Newcastle's, or from Chancery; I don't know which, for I met him within the Rails.

Mr. Whitaker. Did you see Dammaree the first of March last?
R. Walker. Yes.

Mr. Whitaker. At what time?
R. Walker. At half an Hour after eleven.

Mr. Whitaker. Where did you see him?
R. Walker. At Strand-Brick, I carried him in my Boat.

Mr. Whitaker. Where did you carry him?
R. Walker. Cross the Water.

Mr. Darnell. Did you observe any Clock strike?
R. Walker. Yes; St. Andrew's Clock struck two Quarters past eleven before he came into my Boat.

Mr. Darnell. Where did you carry him?
R. Walker. To St. Andrew's Church.

Mr. Darnell. Does he live there?—R. Walker. Yes, just by.
Mr. Darnell. Did you see him home?
R. Walker. No; I helped him out of the Boat; but I did not go home with him.

Mr. At. Gen. Was you defor to take Notice what o'Clock it was?
R. Walker. No; but I was in my Boat waiting, and heard the Quarters strike.

Mr. At. Gen. You say it struck the Quarters; how many Strokes denotes it?—R. Walker. Two.

Mr. At. Gen. Then you did not hear what the Clock itself struck?
R. Walker. Yes; I heard the Clock strike eleven before he came down.

Mr. Darnell. What Hour did the Clock strike, before it struck the two Quarters?
R. Walker. The great Clock struck eleven, and I sat in my Boat and smoked a Pipe, and at the second Stroke eleven I took him into my Boat.

L. C. J. Bore. What Condition was he in?
R. Walker. Very much in Drink.

Mr. Whitaker. Did you see Mr. Dammaree the first of March last, at Night?—H. Hain. Yes.

Mr. Whitaker. At what time?—H. Hain. A little after eleven.
Mr. Whitaker. At what Place did you see him?
H. Hain. At the Mappels, in the Strand.

Mr. Whitaker. Which Way was he going?—H. Hain. I was coming out of Strand-Street, and he was going the other Way.

L. C. J. Which Way was you going?—H. Hain. I was going out of Strand-Street home, where I live.

L. C. J. Where do you live?
H. Hain. Over-against St. Andrew's.

L. C. J. Where did you meet him?—H. Hain. I met him by the Mappels:
L. C. J. What Place did you come from?
H. Hain. I came out of Strand-Street.

L. C. J. Which Way did you apprehend he had come?
H. Hain. I did not see him; but he was in the Strand, going along towards Temple-Bar.

L. C. J. Whereabouts in the Strand?—H. Hain. On the other Side the Mappels, going towards Strand-Brick.

L. C. J. What o'Clock was it then?—H. Hain. A little after eleven.
Mr. At. Gen. What o'Clock do you take it to be now?
H. Hain. What o'Clock? Why, 'tis past one.

Mr. At. Gen. Which Side of Drury-Lane was it you say him?
H. Hain. On this Side Drury-Lane.

Mr. Whitaker. Did you meet the Professor at the Bar on the first of March last, at what time?
Mr. Hain. I met him in the Strand, as I was going home to my Lodging about eleven o'Clock: He was in Drink, and I told to the Gentlewoman with me, Pray, have a Care of the Man, for he is so Drunk.

Mr. At. Gen. Whereabouts did you meet him?
Mr. Hain. I met him about three Doors from the Seven Tavern.

Mr. Whitaker. My Lord, we shall find some Witnesses to his Reputation, to show how he has all along demeaned himself.

Mr. Whitaker. Did you know the Prisoner at the Bar?
Mr. Hain. Yes.

Mr. Whitaker. Do you live in the same Parish?—Mr. Hain. Yes.
Mr. Whitaker. What are you then?
Mr. Hain. The Church-warden.

Mr. Whitaker. What Behaviour is he of?
Mr. Hain. Of very good Behaviour.

Mr. Whitaker. Is he disaffected to the Queen and Government?
Mr. Hain. I believe no Man better affected.

Mr. Whitaker. Did you ever hear him talk disrespectfully of the Queen or Government?
Mr. Hain. No; quite otherwise: In February last he came to me, and asked me, Do you hear what a Noise this Mob makes? Yes, said I, I am sorry for it; and I am sorry too, says he: They say the Queen is angry at it; and it troubles me to think of it.

Mr. Whitaker. At any times when there has been publick Rejoicings for any Victory, how has he behaved himself?
Mr. Hain. He has behaved himself as a good Man.

J. Michalson. The most forward Man is there.
L. C. J. Is he a sober Man?—J. Michalson. Yes.
L. C. J. Does he like to drink?
J. Michalson. I have seen him in Drink.
L. C. J. What kind a Man is he then?
J. Michalson. A quiet Temper; not at all quarrelsome, but a law-ing Temper.
L. C. J. Did you ever hear him talk about the Meeting-Houses?
J. Michalson. No.
L. C. J. I ask that Question, because there has been a gross Misdake spread abroad as if they were serving the Queen, when they made that Bullie; that is a Misdake that has gone ahead.
L. C. J. Did you ever hear him say any thing of Dr. Sacheverell?
J. Michalson. Yes.
L. C. J. What did he say of him?
J. Michalson. He said, he wished the Sermon had never been preached, as pointed; and then this Trouble had not been.
Mr. Pettegrew. Did you see him after this?
J. Michalson. Yes, I saw him the next Day at Noon.
Mr. At. Gen. Had you any Discourse about the Meeting-Houses?
J. Michalson. No, none at all.
Mr. Darrell. Where did you see him the next Day, and at what Time?
J. Michalson. At Twelve o'Clock I saw him pass by my Door.
Mr. Thynne. You have conversed with him: Did you never hear him give his Opinion of the Dissenters, and the Meeting-Houses?
J. Michalson. No, never.

Then Mr. Pettegrew was sworn.
Mr. Darrell. How long have you known Mr. Deemster?
Mr. Pettegrew. I have known him eighteen or nineteen Years.
Mr. Darrell. Do you call him to be admitted to the Government?
Mr. Pettegrew. No, not in my Opinion.
Mr. Darrell. When you conversed with him, how has he declared himself?
Mr. Pettegrew. Always for the Government as much as any Man is nor Parish, and I believe has been as fit as any Man in getting Men to serve the Queen when he was Master of the Company.
L. C. J. What are you?
Mr. Pettegrew. I call myself a Timber-Merchant.
L. C. J. Then I suppose you have not had much Conversation with a Waterman?
Mr. Pettegrew. Not a great deal.

Then Mr. Moor was sworn.
Mr. Whitfield. How long have you known Mr. Deemster?
Mr. Moor. I have known him above thirty Years.
Mr. Whitfield. What Character has he had?
Mr. Moor. An honest, civil Man, and as good a Neighbour as can be.
Mr. Whitfield. How has he carried himself to the Queen and Government?
Mr. Moor. I never heard him say a Word against the Queen, or Government, but was always willing to serve the Queen, and particularly when he was Master of the Company, in sending Men into the Service.
Mr. Whitfield. How did he behave himself in that?
Mr. Moor. He did great Service to the Queen.
Mr. Whitfield. Were there a great many Men taken up by him?
Mr. Moor. He took up a great many Men.

Then John Hatfield was sworn.
Mr. Whitfield. How long have you known the Prisoner at the Bar?
J. Hatfield. Almost twenty Years.
Mr. Whitfield. How is he with respect to his Principles towards the Government?
J. Hatfield. I never knew any Ill by him; I never heard but he was an honest, careful Man: I never heard but that he lov'd the Queen.
L. C. J. As to the Matter of his Reputation, I think it is pretty well established, and they say nothing against it.

Mr. At. Gen. We come so to try the Man for this Fact only, and have nothing to say to any former Transgressions.
Mr. Whitfield. My Lord, we will call no more Witnesses, unless the Queen's Counsel give Occasion in their Reply. We think we have proved that he was not a free Agent, but under the utmost Force. We hope we have made it appear to the Satisfaction of your Lordship, and of the Jury, that this Man, though he had the Misfortune to be present when these Tumults and Disorders were, yet he had no Share that was criminal in them.

Gravina. You will remember that though our Petition did force that he carried the Sentence in Prison, yet we have proved that in point of Time it was impossible he should be there, and that there was another Person that did it. As to the other Witnesses, they take upon them to say that he did talk with the Mob; we must appeal to you, the Gentlemen of the Jury, and don't doubt but you have taken Notice of what has been said; that he was under a Force; and when he was in that Condition, and in fear of such a tumultuous Assembly, if to free himself he did so far comply with them, that will not make him guilty of Treason, and leaving War against the Queen.

I must observe as to Orrell, that Witness that seems to affect us most, and carries us to far as towards Droxy-Lane, he does not pretend to give an Account of any thing that concern us precedent to that. Now if this Man was got into such a Tumult as this, and he did go along with them, a little way, and they cannot show that he acted any thing afterwards, there will be no Reason to think him guilty of any Crime, at least, not of leaving War, and so not of High-Treason. We hope we shall stand fair in the Opinion of the Jury, that he was not a voluntary or free Agent in these Disorders: But if we should be so unfortunate as to be thought otherwise, yet we must insist, that the Point which the Queen's Counsel insist on, to wit, that the Fact attempted to be proved on the Petition is leaving a War, is not yet to be sent a Point, but may deserve a further and deliberate Consideration. I am sensible there is one Case of the London

Apprentices, that that Fact was leaving of War, and so High-Treason; but I cannot but observe one thing about my Lord Chief Baron Hale, who can never be spoke of but with the greatest Esteem that may be, in the very Case mentioned, that he differs with the other Judges, and that he was of Opinion that that Fact was not leaving War, and he grounded his Opinion upon that which we think was great Reason, and that is the Statute provisæ Mariæ 1. Cap. 22. It is not printed at large in Kewell, but is in Regell; and on View of that Act, his Opinion is well justified, for that Act of Parliament shews, that all the several Facts for which the Apprentices, in King Charles the Second's Time, were indited, as reported in King's Reports, all the several Circumstances, that are in that Case, were not looked upon then to be High-Treason. But even in that Queen's Time, who had left Reason to be very apprehensive of Tumals, and Wars, in that Statute made, to make the Actors in such Tumults guilty of Felony: And if such Tumults did amount to leaving War, and was High-Treason, it is strange, that the Parliament should make so unnecessary a Statute as this, provisæ Mariæ. And before Queen Elizabeth's Time, no one can give an Instance, that a Tumult of this Nature was looked upon, or adjudged as leaving of War. That it was not so before the Statute of 13 Edw. is plain, because that Statute seems to be made on purpose to flow it was not a capital Offence, and that such Tumults had not been adjudged leaving War, and so not Treason, before that statute of the 13th of Queen Elizabeth; and for that very Purpose, and to prevent such Riots and Tumults, was that very Statute made. And the Provision made by this Statute of Queen Elizabeth, which was a temporary Law, was the Reason of the Refusal on the Earl of Essex's Case, and that Statute made him Indicted for leaving leaving War and High-Treason, and shews that it was necessary to have another Act besides the 25 Hen. III. to make such Tumults and Riots Treason.

The Case in King's Reports, of Myssenger, and the others, supposing it to be Law, will not warrant the adjudging this Case to be Treason, in regard those appears to be many Circumstances as these Cases in King's Reports, which are not proved in this Case now before your Lordship. But I must needs say, the Prisoner at the Bar has had so little Care taken of him, that I had no Notice of this till Eight o'Clock last Night, and have not had Time to look into the Cases, and to be able to discharge my Duty to my Client as I ought; but I am sure, the Gentlemen that appear for the Queen have so much Candour, that they will not desire any thing in this Man's Case, but what shall be a Precedent in all future Cases; therefore I shall state the Cases only upon for the Authority of the Resolution in King's Reports, as well as I can, upon this short Notice. The first Case is in a London, Vol. 5. it was the Case of the Apprentices of London and Southward: They assembled together upon a formed Design, concerted and contrived among them before, to break open the Prison, to kill the Lord-Mayor, to burn his House, and to seize some Arms in Houses near the Tower of London. They had a Trumpet before them, and a Flag displayed with them, and that was adjudged to be leaving War, within the 13 Edw. I must observe, that this was an Opinion not given in Court, nor upon a special Verdict, but given privately, and not otherwise; so that we think the Authority in that Case will not weigh very much, though all the subsequent Cases in King's Reports, and King's Reports, are built on the Authority of this Case, and yet the Judges in this Case, in Anderson's Reports, rely for that Opinion on the Statute of 13 Edw. and that Statute was on very great Reason made to prevent the ill Designs then on Foot by the Roman Catholics. There were many Roman Catholics then began openly to shew their Aversion to the Reformation in general, and it was then, for the Preservation of that good Queen and her Government, thought necessary to enlarge the 25th of Edw. III. and also to make the Design to levy War High-Treason during her Life only, so that that Case, in a London, was not resolved on the 25th of Edw. III. but on the 13th of Edw. III.

There is another Case, which was the Earl of Essex's Case, and that was resolved on as an Authority in King's Reports of the Earl of Essex's Case, but that differs from this: There was a Design of the Earl to have Assistance from the City, and by Force to remove his Exemptions from the Queen, and with armed Force to go to the Queen's Palace, and so her Person, and an actual Rising and Appearing in Arms accordingly. This was conspiring the Death of the Queen, and leaving War in the most notorious Manner; and this was one of the Cases relied on in Anderson's Case: But here, in the Case now before your Lordship, there is no one Circumstance resembling the Earl of Essex's Case. There is one Circumstance in that Case applicable to ours, and that is the Resolution of the Judges, in the Earl of Essex's Case, that were People by Accident came among, and were in Company with the Earl of Essex, and his Adherents, and afterwards departed upon Proclamation made, they should not be guilty of the Treason.
 In the Case before your Lordship, it appears, the Prisoner came there by Accident; and we have shewn by Witnesses, he quickly left these disorderly People.

Another Case relied on in King's Reports, is, that in Orrell Case, the Case of the People that kept Lambeth House; that was a most unjustifiable Act, done in Despair, and in the utmost Contempt of the Crown and Regular Dignity, and with an armed Force with Drums, and an armed Multitude; and the Resolution in that Case, will be no Warranty for the ad-judging this Case of the Prisoner Treason, supposing we should not be so happy as to have our Witnesses believed, that we were brought in by Force; for, in our Case, here are no Drums, nothing resembling War, but only a tumultuous Rabble.

The Case of Bradlow and Burns, in King's Reports, 123, is wholly built upon, and absolutely depends on the Authority of the Case in 2d Anderson; and yet in the Case of Bradlow and Burns, there was a previous Agreement, to go from House to House, and to pull down all Indulgences. It is true, that the putting this Agreement in Execution accordingly, is referred to be High-Treason. We think, that that Agreement, and Rising according to it, is more than appears in this Case of the Prisoner at the Bar; and besides, it is a Resolution in the 29th Year of Queen Elizabeth, when the Statute of the 13 Eliz. was in Force, and depends on the Authority of the Case I have mentioned in 2d Ayley's Reports. But in our Case there is no Proof that we knew any Thing of this tumultuous Meeting, nor that by Accident we fell among them. We hope, that if the Jury shall think it any Colour to be laid, that we have not answered by our Witnesses (whose Credit is not questioned) the Evidence go'd against the Prisoner, that this Point may be referred to us, in our Affidavit, that it is not settled, that this Case of Ayley, and the others in Kyng's Reports, is Law: But supposing it should be Law, yet we hope it will not affect us, for it goes upon a previous Agreement, and all there were Partners of it, and willing, and outrageous Actors in it, and knew of the Design before executed: And there was this Circumstance, that when the Captain of the Guards came to execute them, they said if it was the Duke of York; and when they apprehended it was the Duke of York, they called out. That they came out for the Guards, and that they would come and pull down Widdells Station, by their Declaration, it is plain, the King and his Associates were aimed at. But in this Case of ours, there is nothing of nothing Authority charged on this Man, but that he came by Accident, and acted only by Compulsion and Force, when unhappily amongst a disorderly Mob. Therefore, my Lord, on the whole Matter, in regard we do, with Submission, think, that the Law is not settled by the Rebelliousness of Kyng's Reports, but that a Review thereof may be admitted, and in regard we think our Case is far different, and a much better than any of the former Cases, which have been looked upon or esteemed as leaving War, we hope, that in case the Jury should think we are guilty of any criminal Act, that whether such Acts be leaving of War, or no, shall reserve a further, and more deliberate Determination. I shall therefore take up no more of your Lordship's Time.

Mr. Darnley. My Lord, the first Time I heard from the Prisoner relating to the Case, was last Night last; and must own my Opinion to be, that a longer Time is necessary to encounter the Authority of the Report of my Lord Kyng. But, my Lord, without disputing the Authority of that Book, we must say, this Case comes far short of that Resolution; for there was a plain Hostility, a Captain, with a Sword drawn, Colours, two Meetings to confound, and a Resolution taken, a refusing and wounding the Constable, and striking the Officer of the Guards, and their Intention to pull down Bowley-Houses, which might be any House they thought fit to call so. As for the Case of Coxsford, it is plain, there was in aiming themselves, they had put on Armour to act offensively, as well as defensively; they proposed to come to London, and to have our Jan with them, and that Case was adjudged High-Treason. For the general Intention to pull down Inlosures. Where there is any Rebellion, that these great Tumults amount to High-Treason, it is on this Foundation, that the Design is general, and in an exercising of a Royal Authority, which Nobody but Her Majesty ought to make use of. It is said in Mellish's Case, that the Intention may be such, and that such Intention must appear by each Proof as will satisfy the Jury. Now how do they offer to prove the Intention of this Man? If there is any Thing to prove it, it is Subjection to the pulling down the said Meeting-House, for it is plain he was not there till the Design was to be executed, and the Fire had been made an Hour before he came. Now if he comes there, and ballows, and rejoices at it, this cannot make him Guilty. I agree, that if any Nunber of Persons are going to commit High-Treason, and a Man comes there, and joins with them in the Execution of that Act, he is Guilty, but if he be ignorant of their Design, and ballows and rejoices with the Crowd, that will not make him Guilty: And in this Case, it appears, that every Body that joined by the Crowd that Night were confirmed to do so, but where such Person, who is got into such a tumultuous Assembly, does get off so full as he can, this cannot be High-Treason, or any Crime whatsoever. If the Prisoner had gone to Dewey-Lane, and they had judged that he did any Thing there, we should have had a harder Case than we have now, but we think there is no Proof of the Intention of this Man to commit those Acts of pulling down the Meeting-Houses in general, and of assisting in the Execution of that Intention. My Lord, if our Witnesses (whose Credit stands unimpaired) be believed, it is impossible that he could be concerned in this Design, or the Execution of it, or know any Thing of it, till it was executed: For it doesn't appear, that on any of the Days, when the Mob were together, that he was among them, or that he acted any thing till after the Meeting-House was pulled down, and the Fire made. We have shown where he was all that Day, and that it was near Eleven when he came to the Fire. I think we have shown, by the Waterman that carried him Home, that there was not room for him to hear any there in this Outrage; far between the Time of his coming to the Fire, and going Home by Water, there is no room for him to do any Thing more, than to go between those Places. There is no Proof that he did any Thing but to see the Mob in a manner forced him to do, and perhaps it might have cost him his Life in so tumultuous an Assembly, or, at least, have cost him his Health, if he had done less.

Mr. At. Gen. My Lord, I beg Leave to say a few Words, in Answer to what has been insisted on by the Prisoner. They have insisted on these three Things: First, That notwithstanding our Witnesses have given that Account which you have heard, yet they are mistaken in the Fact, for he was not the Man that they say was there bringing the Brass Candlestick; that it was another Man, a little Man in his own Hair, and not like the Prisoner, and therefore he is not Guilty of the Act charged on him. In the next Place, they tell you, That something he was there, and that our Witnesses have told you Truth, yet he was there involuntarily, and what he has done was under a Force, and therefore he can't be looked upon to be guilty of the Treason, because, intentionally, he did not go along with them in that Design. The third is, That admitting you should believe all that the Witnesses say, that he was there, that he did know of this Design, and acted in it, in concert with the rest, yet this Charge doesn't amount to High-Treason, and therefore he ought to be acquitted.

Now, tho' this is the last Thing mentioned, yet it is of the most Consequence, and ought to be taken Notice of first, because it is the guilty of the Fact, yet if it doesn't amount to Treason, he must be acquitted. They tell you it is a notorious Fact, such a Tumult as is not to be endured, that a Punishment ought to be inflicted on those People that were concerned in it: But they insist on it, that this is not High-Treason, as charged in the Indictment. Now I think it is a plain, plain British Law, that whenever there is Force used against the Government, whenever there is a general Intention to work a Revolution, whenever there is an Opposition complained of, and the People of Force in order to remedy it, and there is an Assembly of a Multitude for such Purpose, it is leaving War; for it is an Opposition to the Government, and the Civil Magistrate.

My Lord Gid in his Comment on the Statute of Treason, takes Notice of this, and says, That if any go about by Force to reform any thing they complain of, it is leaving War, because they take upon them Royal Authority, which is against the King. The Case they mention of Bradford, where a great Number assembled, in order to settle the Rate of Wages, they thought there was not enough given them for their Labour: They did agree to publish an order to redress that Grievance, and that Appearance in publick was looked upon to be High-Treason.

It is not proper here, to enter into all the Cases that may be cited, the last Book they take Notice of is my Lord Chief-Justice Kyng's, which was printed with the Approbation of all the Judges of the Queen's Bench; and every body knows that he was at great a Judge, particularly in the Crown-Law, as any that went before him. And it is the Opinion of all the Judges, excepting one, that this Case is Treason; and you see on what his Opinion was founded, that it was not High-Treason, because there is a particular Act of Parliament which says, That in Case Proceedings had made for them to depart, those Persons that do not depart on that Proclamation shall be guilty of Felony. That Act relates only to the Meeting and Assembly on a private, particular Account, for if a Lord sues a Waste, and the Tenant sits in Opposition to that Act, in order to redress that Inconvenience, Nobody will pretend to say, it extends to High-Treason; because it is a private Inconvenience that goes no further than that Manner. But at the same Time that they made use of this Distinction, it is taken notice of, That if there be a publick Law, that is looked on to be the Grievance, and they came to redress the Grievance arising from that Law, that is opposing the Publick, and is High-Treason.

Now, to compare these Cases: There was a Design on Tuesday Night declared against the Mob, that on the next Day they would destroy all the Meeting-Houses thereabouts: Sure must say (let their Opinions be what they will), that destroying a Meeting-House is more Seditious to the Publick, than destroying a Bowley-House. And yet their answer to pull down the Bowley-Houses was adjudged to be Treason. And shall they be hanged for pulling down Bowley-Houses, and have nothing but a Fine for pulling down Meeting-Houses? Every body knows they are allowed by Law. The Act of Parliament that gives Indulgence to the Dissenters, allows them so much in those Places: It were to be wished, there were no such Persons that did dissent from the Church; but these Places being allowed by Law, it is lawful for them to meet there. Now for People to find fault with this Law, and to say, We will redress this Inconvenience, though the Publick will not those three People into Jail for meeting there, we will pull down their Houses against their Law; this is an Insultance not to be suffered. This is assuming an Authority that don't lie in the People; every body that lives under a Government has Courts of Justice to apply to, and when any Thing is acted contrary to Law, the Courts of Justice are open, and I may say any one to show that there has been a Denial of Justice upon due Application.

Now for People to meet together to do right to themselves, and to be Judges and Executioners at the same Time, is never to be borne, but deserves the most severe Prosecution; and it is a Sense of this that brings this Case here. For, as to the Man, I never saw him before: Nobody bears him any ill Will; but it is known that there have been such Riots and Rebelliousness committed; and it is agreed that he was among them. This brings me to take Notice whether our Witnesses are mistaken in saying he was there: They know the Man; they spoke with him; and they are positive to him; and they give a particular Account of what he and they said, and what they saw him do; and now they say, our Witnesses are mistaken. As to the House, little is to be depended on, because People are so uncertain in their Computations: It is plain they were all supplied by Twelve o'Clock, so that he might stay as long as any, and yet he be dead by Twelve o'Clock, for it is that Time the Guards came and suppressed them. They gave an Account of him till Ten o'Clock; I find there was no Hufkins that detained him till that Time; he had nothing to do in the Alehouse; he was got drunk, and he fled in this disorderly Place till the Time was proper for him to come out, and at that time this Man. For it was about Ten that one of our Witnesses saw him at the Meeting-House, and at the Fire, and he went along with him towards Dewey-Lane, and there he left him: And this age as with what he saw two Witnesses say, they say, they saw him by the Duke of Neuville's Corner, coming from Queen's Street, and going towards the Fire: It was after this, that he had hallooed them away to Dewey-Lane, and was again returning; it is plain by the Evidence of both Sides, that he was there. All that they insist on, is, that he was forced into the Crowd; but how agreeable is that to the Story of the Witnesses that saw him bring the Seamer, and carry it in Procession round the Fire, and throw it in?

He calls Huff, who tells you he was his Friend, that he had been with him all Day. He tells you, that they received News that there was a Fire in the Church; that the Prisoner was concerned for a Gentleman that lived there, and that they went away immediately to assist him. Huff says, he went with him as far as Temple-Bar, and then the Crowd was so great, that they were forced by the Torrent of People up Dewey-Lane, and through London's Inn Square, and they could not get away.

At the same time, the Commission has been working to improve the quality of the data it collects. It has been particularly concerned with the accuracy of the data on the number of people who are employed in the public sector. In the past, the Commission has often found that the data on public employment were inflated. This was due to a variety of factors, including the fact that many public employees were not properly recorded in the official statistics. The Commission has now taken steps to correct this problem. It has introduced a new system of data collection which is designed to be more accurate and reliable. This new system has been put in place for the 1990 survey, and the Commission is confident that it will provide a more accurate picture of public employment in the future.

During the past year, the Chinese government has made a number of important decisions, in order to improve the country's economic situation. First, the government has decided to increase the production of grain and other foodstuffs. This is a very important step, as it will help to ensure that the country has enough food to feed its people. Second, the government has decided to increase the production of cotton and other textiles. This is also a very important step, as it will help to ensure that the country has enough clothing to wear. Third, the government has decided to increase the production of steel and other metals. This is a very important step, as it will help to ensure that the country has enough raw materials to make its products. Finally, the government has decided to increase the production of coal and other energy sources. This is a very important step, as it will help to ensure that the country has enough energy to power its industries and homes.

They have indeed upon the Statute of the right of Habeas, which they use as an Argument to shew that they are not Traitors within the Statute of Edward the Third, that they are not a Crime, and a Crime of High Treason. But then how stood the Case of the Inclosures at that Time? Several Persons conspired to throw down Inclosures, and that was adjudged High Treason, because it was a Conspiracy to levy War; and how could that be High Treason, if taking Arms to throw down Inclosures were not for We take it, that the Case in Adonion is in Point, and these Cases are affirmed by the Judges in the Case of Sidgely so that it is the greatest Authority, and never to be shaken. They say the Case in Adonion is a private Opinion; as is the Opinion of the two Chief Justices, and the Master of the Rolls, who are the highest of the Law, and yet they are not the same, and therefore they are to be followed.

Thus flows the Fountain, that there is but the one Perfection, that the only way for that it is not in the Power of every Man, according to his own Fancy, to find Fault with the Government, and also the Laws; and deprive the blessed of any Benefit he is entitled to by Law, it is an Invasion of the Royal Authority; they may by the same Reason fall upon a Man's Person, as they may pull down his House, and things of this Nature must run into endless Confusion, and none can be so, unless Peril, that are due Guilty be brought to Punishment.

Their Authorities then being so strong, we hope, that, as the Café Anglais, on the Evidence for the Queen, that the Professor has been proved guilty of the Charge in the Indictment: For that there was a general Design, appears; & what was done in the Execution of it. The only Question is, Whether this Man was privy to any precedent Design? And for this, I rely on the Lord Effra's Cafe, in Moor's Reports, which was tart, most of abillate need-its be laboured by the Civil Magistrate, where the publick Peace is rebelliously broken, or private Property notoriously invaded. Without their full and publick Sanctions, it is impossible that Order and good Government should subsist in any Nation; and how movingly to sever your present melancholy Situation may plead for Pity and Compassion, yet the good of the Whole, and the Promotion of the Interest, are Considerations of much higher Importance: And you have the left to offer for yourself, since the Nature of the Crimes you have committed is such, as that they must be the Effects of very various Principles, or extravagant Follies. One of you both offers Violence to a Body of People, whom the Law has thought it to take care of; and your manner of proceeding was attended with great deplorable Circumstances of Torment and Mischief, such as threaten'd Destruction and Destruction to an innocent Neighbourhood, when to your own notorious Admissions you added the Fury of an Element more cruel and merciless than yourself. You have indeed endeavour'd to excuse yourself by pleading, that your Crime was the Effect of Drunkenness, which is a much weaker Defence than your Fellow Prisoners make, who say, he rob'd us out of Necessity. Neither of these Cries will justify a Breach of the Law in the least degree, much less will it excuse High-Treason, or Felony. The notorious Persons, indeed, has a fairer Claim to Pity than the Drunkard; for the latter voluntarily weakens his Reason, and inflicts his Patients, and by that very Action is guilty of an Offence against common Decency, and the Laws of the Land; while it is possible the Misfortune of the other may be unavoidable, though they are too often the Consequences of Idleness, Extravagance, and Debauchery. We live in a Trading Country, and, I believe, there are few Instances where a Man in Health, and of an honest Character, may not earn the Bread of Industry, and eat it in Security. It was for this Purpose, for the Security of the Inmate, that the very Laws were made by which you are now to suffer: And as these Laws are founded upon an higher Institution, even the Laws of God, you will do well to consider yourselves as Offenders against the Laws of your Maker, and accountable not only for these Crimes, but for every Action of your Lives, at a higher Tribunal, at which you are likely to appear in a short time, perhaps in a few Days. Upon these Considerations, the Lenity of our Constitution gives a short Respite to Prisoners in your deplorable Circumstances; and this Cury provides a Clergyman, whose Prudence and Experience enable him to advise and assist you in making a proper Preparation against your approaching Change; to which important Preparation I shall assist you, having first discharged the Court of the Duty incumbent upon it, by pronouncing the former Sentences the Law has appointed.

You Daniel Danvers, having been convicted of High-Treason, the Judgment of the Law is, and the Court doth award:

That you be carried from hence to the Place from whence you came, and from thence be drawn upon a Hurdle to the Place of Execution, where you shall be hang'd by the Neck 'till you are almost dead, and then alive, you shall be cut down, your privy Members shall be cut off, and your Bowels taken out, and burnt before your Face: That your Head be sever'd from your Body, and your Body divided into four Quarters, to be dispos'd as the Queen shall appoint. And the Lord have Mercy upon your Soul.

And you Sampson Archer, having been convicted of Felony, with the Bench of Clergy; the judgment of the Law upon you is, and it is awarded by the Court:

That you return from hence to the Place from whence you came, and that from thence you be convey'd to the Place of Execution; where you are to be hang'd by the Neck 'till you are dead; and the Lord have Mercy on your Soul.

Danvers. My Lord, I desire my Wife and Children may have Liberty to come and see me in Prison, in the Absence of the Keeper.

Mr. Serj. Richardson. As for seeing your Wife and Children, that we don't deny you; but we can't allow them to be alone with you, because it may occasion an Escape.

Danvers. My Lord, if any other Minister will be so kind as to visit me in my Dungeon, I hope it will be permitted.

Mr. Serj. Richardson. Ay, by all means. 'Tis a Liberty that, I think, was never refused. You shall have all the Favour that is usually shewn to Prisoners in your Condition.

Then the Prisoner was taken away, and the Court proceeded to the other Business of the Sessions, and afterwards adjourn'd to Wednesday the 15th of May following.

Upon the Report of the Prisoners Cases to the Queen, they had some remission, and some time after Danvers received his most gracious Pardon.

LVII. The Trial of FRANCIS WILLIS, a Footman, for High Treason, in levying open War against Her Majesty, in the Kingdom, under Pretence of pulling down Meeting Houses. 9 ANNÆ, 1710.

[At the Sessions-House in the Old-Bailey.]

Devina Regina vestris Willis.

Die Ferris Viginti die Aprilis Anno Domini & Regine gratulatio.

THE Court being refused, as in the Trial of Danvers, and the same Judges being present, Cler. of Arr. Middlesex Cryer, make Proclamation.

Cryer. O Yes, O Yes, You good Men of the County of Middlesex, summons'd to appear here this Day, to try between our Sovereign Lady the Queen, and the Prisoners that shall be at the Bar, answer to your Names as you shall be call'd, every Man at the first Call, upon Pain and Peril shall tall thereon.

Then the Jury that were return'd at the Panel, were all call'd over, and the Appearance of all these that answer'd to the Call, were recorded.

Cler. of Arr. Set Francis Willis to the Bar.

(Which was done).

Cler. of Arr. Francis Willis, hold up thy Head.

(Which he did).

Cler. of Arr. You the Prisoner at the Bar, these good Men, whom you shall hear call'd, and do now personally appear, are to put between our Sovereign Lady the Queen and you, upon Trial of your Life and Death. If therefore you will challenge them, or any of them, your Time is to speak to them as they come to the Book to be Sworn, and before they be Sworn.

Willis. My Lord, I desire that none of the Gentlemen that served upon the Jury Yesterday, may be sworn now.

L. C. J. You have a Right to challenge Five-and-Thirty peremptorily, without showing Cause; and as many more as you can show good Cause against. If any of the Jury that served Yesterday appear now, it will be a proper time to take the Exception.

Mr. Durnell. My Lord, I take it, the Prisoner's Intent by this Motion, is to fasten the Time of the Cause. He does not intend to make any Challenge, but to the Jury of Yesterday, whom he conceives, in force of course, to have declared their Opinions upon the Fact already; and therefore desires the Clerk may pass over their Names as they stand upon the Panel.

L. C. J. Let it be so.

Cler. of Arr. Thomas Nichol, Esq.

(Who appears'd).

Cler. of Arr. Hold Mr. Nichol the Book.

You shall well and truly Try, and true Deliverance make between our Vol. VIII.

Sovereign Lady the Queen, and the Prisoner at the Bar whom you shall have in Charge, and a true Verdict give according to your Evidence. So help you God.

Cler. of Arr. Joseph Spencer.

(He appear'd, and took Oath).

In like manner the other Ten Gentlemen appear'd, and were sworn, whose Names follow:

J U R Y.

Thomas Nichol, Esq.	William Breakspoor,
Joseph Spencer,	Charles Gardner,
John Perrens,	Richard Hazzard,
William Hargrave,	Samuel Brown,
John Ash,	Francis Higgins,
Thomas Phillips,	Donel Braine.

Cler. of Arr. Cryer, count these.

Thomas Nichol.

Cryer. One, and so of the rest.

Cler. of Arr. Daniel Danvers.

Cryer. Twelve good Men and true, stand together, and hear your Evidence.

Are you all sworn, Gentlemen?

Cler. of Arr. Cryer, make Proclamation.

Cryer. O Yes! If any one can inform my Lords the Queen's Justices, the Queen's Solicitor, the Queen's Attorney-General, or this Inquest now to be taken, of the High Treason of which the Prisoner at the Bar stands indicted, let them come forth, and they shall be heard, for now the Prisoner stands at the Bar upon his Deliverance, and all others that are bound by Recognition, to give Evidence against the Prisoner at the Bar, let them come forth, and give their Evidence, or else they forfeit their Recognition. And all Jurymen of Middlesex that have appear'd and are not sworn, may depart the Court for this Time, and give their Attendance here again To-morrow Morning.

Cler. of Arr. Francis Willis, hold up thy Hand.

(Which he did).

Gentlemen of the Jury, look upon the Prisoner, and hearken to his Cause. He stands indicted by the Name of Francis Willis, late of the Parish of St. Andrew, Holborn, in the County of Middlesex, Labourer, for that he on having the Fear of God before his Eyes, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the Devil, &c. (given as the Indictment, mutatis mutandis), against the Peace of our Sovereign Lady the Queen, he

H. Grece. No, I am not.

L. C. T. When you went to Neagate, the Man that you saw there, did you believe him to be the Person that you saw displaying the Colours?

H. Grece. Yes, I did.

L. C. T. How long was that after you saw him at the Fire?

H. Grece. About ten Days.

L. C. Bares. Pray, what makes you less knowing, or believing now, than you was then?

H. Grece. My Lord, his Cloaths are altered, and he has another Wig on.

Mr. Dorell. Pray tell us any one thing you had, to know this Man by?

H. Grece. No other Influence, but that he furnished the Colours.

Mr. Dorell. Do you know the Colour of his Coat?

H. Grece. I believe it was blue.

Mr. Dorell. Are you sure it was not green?

H. Grece. I am not sure.

Mr. Dorell. When you saw him in Neagate, what did you know him by?

H. Grece. By his Features, I thought he was the King's Man.

Mr. Dorell. Pray describe any one Feature, such as him by.

L. C. T. It is difficult to describe a Man's Face, and first to describe his Hand. If you were asked how you knew a Man? And if it would be difficult for you to describe it, how do you know a Man's Face in Court, unless you see him in the very particular in his Face; and yet that is something in the Composition of a Face, by which it is known, which none of you has a Power to describe.

Mr. Dorell. You say he is altered from what he was in Neagate?

H. Grece. He has quite another Dress, and another Wig, he had blue Cloaths then.

Mr. Dorell. And you say, you saw the Man that had the Colours had blue Cloaths?

H. Grece. Yes, indeed I saw them to be blue; but cannot be positive whether they were blue or not.

Mr. Dorell. Yes, but you say, in about a Month already, on your Examination, you have been several times asked if you know, you ought to consider what you have said before, and it is a mistake to think that the Man you saw in Neagate, was the same Man that furnished the Colours.

Mr. Dorell. I am sure, whether the Man that furnished the Colours had blue?

H. Grece. It was blue or green.

Mr. Dorell. You say, you saw the Man that furnished the Colours to be blue?

H. Grece. I am not sure.

ness, it may be disputed, whether he shall be convicted on that Evidence, because it is said, there must be two Witnesses on an Overt-Act. If they have no other Evidence but his Confession, there will be a proper Tent to make your Objection; but 'till then, there is no reason to object against what is now offered.

Mr. Darnell. It is expressly the Words of the Book, that Examination before a Magistrate shall be Evidence, which seems to imply the Negative, that others shall not be.

Mr. Sol. Gen. The Question was, Whether that Confession was sufficient to convict? And not, Whether it should be given in Evidence? Let us go on; if our Evidence is not sufficient, you will take Notice of it.

Mr. At. Gen. Mr. Darnell would stop the Witnesses as if there was something in that Act, or in the Law, that shall exclude you from bearing what the Man did confess of this Fact: No, surely, there is nothing that can hinder that Evidence. The Act don't hinder any thing in point of Evidence, when it says, you shall not convict a Man unless there be two Witnesses to the Fact: It don't say you shall hear no other Evidence. This indeed was mentioned in the Case of Capt. Smith: He had the French King's Commission, and it was left among other Papers: He was shown the Parchment, and own'd it, and that Confession of his, that he had such Commission, was given in Evidence.

Mr. Sol. Gen. According to this Objection, he would exclude all Confession from being Evidence. He applies not examining to the Confession of the Prisoner, before he knows what it was that he did confess. Now this Act was never intended to exclude all Evidence to Confessions; all that it requires, is to have two Witnesses to Overt-Acts. The Question is not now, Whether a Confession shall be an Evidence of an Overt-Act? But, Whether any Confession whatsoever may be given in Evidence? And surely it was agreed in the Case of Captain Smith, that his Confession, as to the Circumstances, was Evidence, but not as to the Overt-Act. On the Trial of Bell*, the Question was, Whether he was an Englishman? His Confession was Evidence to that Purpose, admitting it was not to the Overt-Act. We shall not call this Man to prove a Confession of an Overt-Act, but to prove his Confession in general, what was the Occasion of his being abroad that Night, and that a proper Evidence; for that Tameal must be either a Riot, or leaving War, according to the Intention of those that got together: What shall explain that Intention, but the Confession and Declaration of the People that were got together? So that we hope we are proper to examine to this Point.

Mr. Darnell. I remember the Case of Captain Smith: I remember they brought him that knew the Hand of the Admiral of France, to prove, that they saw his Hand to the Commission; but his Confession was not admitted as Evidence.

Mr. Justice Trench. I never knew it disputed, but a Man's Confession might be given in Evidence.

Mr. Darnell. The Act says, he shall not be tried, but on the Oaths of two Witnesses to an Overt-Act, unless the Party willingly, in open Court, confess the same, which shows what Confession it is that it is to be admitted of.

L. C. J. Then you say, no Confession shall be given in Evidence: Now, pray, What Words are there in the Act, that say no Confession shall be given in Evidence?

L. C. Baron. A Confession shall not supply the want of a Witness; there shall be two Witnesses to the Treason notwithstanding: But to say it shall not be given in Evidence, there is no ground for it.

Mr. At. Gen. Mr. Lord, pray tell us what was it that pass'd between you and the Prisoner?

Lord. All that he said to me, when he came before my Door, was that they made him Captain of a Party that Night; that he took a Piece of a Window-curtain, and made it a Colour; and we burnt the Clock in Holborn.

Mr. At. Gen. And is this the Man?—Lord. Yes.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Do you remember what Cloaths he had on?

Lord. I don't remember the Colour.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What is the Livery his Master gives?—Lord. A Blue.

Willis. Did I say I burnt it, or that the Company burnt it?

Lord. He said, We burnt.

Mr. At. Gen. That is, he and the rest of the Mob.

Mr. Darnell. You did not see him do any thing?

Lord. Nothing at all.

This Robert Caldwell was sworn.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Do you know Mr. Gross?—Caldwell. Yes.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Do you remember you went with him to see a Prisoner?

Caldwell. Yes.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What Prisoner did you see there?

Caldwell. The Prisoner at the Bar.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you see any other Persons but him?

Caldwell. Not We saw Dumoreux and Parish below, but no other above.

Mr. At. Gen. What Cloaths had he on then?

Caldwell. He had a blue Livery on.

This William Orrel was sworn.

Mr. At. Gen. Pray acquaint the Court and the Jury what you know of the Tameal which was the Fifth of March last, in those Parts where you was?

Mr. Orrel. I don't know any thing of the Prisoner at the Bar; but when I came to the End of Fetter-Lane, there was a Footman in a blue Livery, a cloven-hunged Man of his Side. I saw the Constable there, and said to him, Here is a great Riot, I am sorry you can't put a Stop to it: Says he, Here is such a Mob, we can't suppress it: Says he, There is a Footman there, I know him very well; I know whose Man he is. I can't tell who he was, but I saw a Footman there hurrying, and bidding them make haste. I went into the Meeting-House in Fetter-Lane, and saw the Timber pull'd down, and thrown into the Fire.

Mr. At. Gen. You was at that Meeting-House in Fetter-Lane; Was you at any other?

Mr. Orrel. I was at Mr. Burgess's and Mr. Earl's, and at that in Black-Friars; I went with the Guards thither.

Mr. At. Gen. Give an Account of that.

Mr. Orrel. When I was in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, the City was, To the City, to the Bank. When I came to the Guards, I led to the Captain, For God's Sake go into the City, for if they go to the Bank, we are undone; so there was a Report, that they were gone into the City. I asked several Palings as we went along, Where is the Mob? Am they gone into the City? At last I heard they were gone to the Meeting-House in Black-Friars, and were pulling it down. I went directly with the Guards up Fetter-Lane; I headed them in the Old-Bag, and ran before, and got the Guards open, and told them, the Queen's Guards were coming: I thrust'd them the way to the Meeting-House, and there they met the Mob pulling it down.

Mr. At. Gen. Do you know of any other Meeting-House that was pull'd down? Was you at Mr. Burgess's?

Mr. Orrel. I was in at four times: I saw it full of People; I saw the Galleries and Pulpit beaten in, and pulled down; and as I stood upon a Board, a Fellow was getting it up, and another, God damn that lazy Fellow, what does he do there?

Mr. At. Gen. You say you were there four times?

Mr. Orrel. Yes, I was in Mr. Burgess's four times, twice in Mr. Earl's, once in Mr. Burgess's, and at the Door of Black-Friars.

L. C. J. What was the Cry there?

Mr. Orrel. Nothing but in general, Damn them, we will have them all down. I heard Mr. Dimes's House enquired for, but they mistook my Lord Wharfedale, and St. James's, often; I believe I heard it call'd out a thousand times: And when I was at Mr. Earl's in Drury-Lane, I call'd out, Where is Jolly, the Waterman? because I wanted to know where he was: Some said, He is gone to St. James's, others, to my Lord Wharfedale; No, I said others, he is gone to the Back-door, so break it open.

Mr. Darnell. You say you saw a Footman at the Fire; pray, What time of Night was it?

Mr. Orrel. About Ten, or a little after. As I went from Fetter-Lane, I went along with them, as they carried the Wood to Hallam, (but went at a distance on the other side the way) I saw the Footman at the End of the Alley, as you come out of the Meeting.

Mr. Darnell. Was that before the Fire was lighted, or after?

Mr. Orrel. It was after the Fire was lighted.

Mr. Darnell. What was the Footman doing?

Mr. Orrel. He was looking and hurrying the Mob.

Mr. At. Gen. My Lord, we have done with our Evidence for the Queen, and submit it to your Lordship.

Mr. Darnell. My Lord, I am Counsel for the Prisoner, who stands accused of High-Treason, and the Instance is in leaving War against the Queen. To make this out, the Gentlemen of the other Side began with shewing, that there was an Intention to pull down Meeting-Houses in general, that was open'd. To make that out, the fell Willis, Topsy, says, That as he was going through the Yough, he heard a great Cry among the Mob, that they would go and pull down Mr. Burgess's Meeting-House; it don't appear, that there was any more named. I must agree, if the Design were to pull them down in general, and he acted in that Design, I can make no Question, but it would be High-Treason; but if the Design was only to pull down Mr. Burgess's, it was only a particular Injury to him, he might have his Remedy by Action for it, and the Government might prosecute him for a Riot, but if that be the Case alone, that can't be High-Treason: There must be a general Intention to pull down Houses, or Inclosures, and not to pull down any particular Man's House or Inclosure.

After he has given this Account, the other Witnesses give an Account, That at some of the Fires, there was a Discourse of going further, and pulling down all the Meeting-Houses about the Town; but the original Intention was only to pull down some. If, at that first Fire, they should take a new Resolution to pull down another, that would still be a particular Injury; and so if they should carry it sever in for that way, it would not be High-Treason, otherwise than as it is an Evidence of a general Intention: But if the Fact were particular, though they took that Resolution twenty times one after another, yet it would not amount to High-Treason. But to bring it home to the Prisoner, to show that he was concerned in the Design, we submit it, that there is not such Evidence as is required to fix it upon him. The first Witness to that Point is Grove: He says there was a Man in a Livery, whether blue or green he can't tell: Sometimes he said it was green, sometimes blue, but being ask'd, he is not sure the Prisoner is the Man that he saw with a Banner encouraging the Mob.

If he can't be certain as to the Man, his Evidence can't be confirm'd by Lord, who only says, he saw the Prisoner's Confession; for they did not intend to use that Confession to fix the Overt-Act. And if it is not so, then Grove's Evidence is out of the Case. They would endeavour to support it by the Officer of Nugate, who carried Grove to the Prisoner; he says there was no other Man in the Room, and therefore it must be the Prisoner who was shew'd to Grove; and then, says Grove, The Man I saw in Nugate, I believe to be the same I saw at the Fire; so that it is altogether uncertain, as to Grove's Evidence. Then they call Pitt; he says he saw a Footman carry some of the Timber, and throw it into the Fire; and that he saw the same Man talk to Lord; and Lord is to support that Evidence, by saying, that the Prisoner came and talk'd to him; but Lord don't pretend that he saw the Prisoner do any thing. It is scarce to be believed, that Pitt should take Notice of his Features, so as to know him again, especially seeing his are not very remarkable; and there was no Light, but the Light of the Fire: And after all, he can't tell us any one Feature that is remarkable, nor did he take Notice of his Cloaths, or any thing remarkable about him. The Description of a Person is a constant Evidence that you meet with, in Case of a Robbery, or the like, you have the Description of the Colour of the Horse, or the Man's Cloaths, or some such thing; but he don't pretend to say one Circumstance to induce him to believe he is the same Man, but only that he is satisfied, for Reasons he keeps to himself. These are the only two Persons who have the least Colour to lay as Witnesses to any Overt-Act, and without these he can't be confirm'd; and there are to be supported by Lord's

* Mr. Justice Peck in his Reports, p. 248, says, "I think Ferguson's is the Case cited in Willis's Trial by the Name of Bell's."

Evidence, that the Prisoner told him they had made him a Captain, and that he had made Colours of a Curtain, and that they had burnt the Clock. We think the Act is not sufficiently proved by two Witnesses, and therefore can't be supported by a Confession, which is but a dangerous way of Evidence in all Cases, and a Man is not to be found Guilty upon a Confession, and for that Reason, the Statute takes Care, that two shall be two Witnesses to an Overt-Act. We therefore dissent it, that this Evidence is not sufficient to convict the Prisoner.

But, my Lord, the Prisoner's Case, we apprehend, is such, as will, in a great measure, excuse him from any Guilt, and we hope to satisfy your Lordship and the Jury, that he was not concerned in this Design, or in doing a trifling thing that were added to it. The Prisoner is a Servant to one Madam Allen, who lives in Great Street, near Hotten-Garden; he has lived there two Years, and has been, all that Time, a diligent Servant, and behaved himself well in the Family; and I believe, all the Assistance he has to enable him to make his Point, is owing to their Charity, which we think is an Argument of his good Behaviour, that his Master and Mistress will interpose, and endeavour to bring him off in a Thing of this Kind. It was the Fifth of March last, when this Information was all over the Town, and they came to Hotten, and with the Materials of a Musket-Ball they made a great Fire near this Lady's House; I think, about half an Hour after tea was the first Notice that they had at this House that there was a Fire: The Lady of the House was going to Bed, and as her Chamber they say to great a Light, that they thought the Fire was near; they called to the Prisoner, and he was going to Bed; they ordered him to go in, learn where the Fire was, he they knew not what sort of it was it: Upon that he went to learn what the Condition of it was. Then they served him, as upon this Occasion it is, and every body, they made them very Obsequious, as they call it, and hullo, and throw up their Hats. It seems to be supposed a man is really learns what the Design was, and where they had the Materials. As soon as he had informed himself, I think as shall show, that he got out of the Window as fast as he could, and was going home to acquaint his Lady; that as he was going home, he was told there was another Fire in Hotten-Garden; and in thinking he did not pursue his Lady's Intimations without learning what this was, accordingly he struck over the Way, and went into Hotten-Garden, and there found it was the same Design, and the Materials of another Meeting-House were brought thither, and burning. As soon as he had thus informed himself, he came to his Lady, and advised her, that the Mob was up, that they were pulling down the Meeting-Houses, and that he had seen two Fires. After he had given this Account, they ordered the Doors to be shut up, and the Family went to Bed, and after that, he was not out of the House. Now, as to the Fifth of the Banner, there is any Evidence to fix it upon him; And if we show, that he went alone from Hotten, in such he believed, that it was some other Footman, in some other Livery; for if he was there Captain, and carried the Colours upon a Pole, it was not his Beliefs, nor would they have suffered him to leave them there in Hotten, when they were going to make another Fire. It is pretty extraordinary to suppose him, that he could get a Pole to carry a Banner of that Kind. But if he was coming home by himself, without any Mob with him, sure it is pretty extraordinary that the Captain of the Mob, so considerable a Man as he, would go in to procure a Banner. We will call our Witnesses, and hope the Evidence will make a plain, that he did nothing but according to the Commands of his Mistress.

Then Mrs. Briggs was sworn.

Mr. Darnell. Pray, Madam, acquaint my Lord and the Jury, whether the Prisoner has lived in any time, and how long, with Mrs. Allen.

Mrs. Briggs. He has lived there two Years next Mo.

Mr. Darnell. In all that Time, how has he behaved himself?

Mrs. Briggs. A very civil, useful Fellow.

Mr. Darnell. Did you ever know him guilty of drinking, or flaying out at Night?

Mrs. Briggs. He has always carried himself very civilly.

Mr. Darnell. Pray, at the Time of this Disturbance, Do you know the Occasion of his going out?

Mrs. Briggs. I was in my Mother's Chamber while she was going to Bed, and I saw a Fire, and heard a great Noise, I called to my Sister, who was below, and bid her find Frank to know what the Matter was.

Mr. Darnell. Did he go accordingly?

Mrs. Briggs. Yes.

Mr. Darnell. You say you both sent Frank; Who do you mean by that?

Mrs. Briggs. I mean the Prisoner at the Bar.

Then Mrs. Allen was sworn.

Mr. Darnell. Madam, you said what Mrs. Briggs said, that she desired you to find Frank, the Prisoner, to find what the Matter was. Did you send him?

Mrs. Allen. My sister called on me, and said, she believed there was a Fire in Hotten, and bid me find him to see, which I did.

Mr. Darnell. Pray what time was this?

Mrs. Allen. It was past Ten, the Clerk had struck before my Mother went up.

Mr. Darnell. How much after Ten might it be?

Mrs. Allen. Indeed I can't tell; but I am sure it was past Ten.

Mr. Darnell. What Time was it before he came back?

Mrs. Allen. I believe the Clock had not struck Twelve, to the bell of my Mother.

Mr. Darnell. What Account did he give you when he came back?

Mrs. Allen. I did not see him that Night.

Mr. Darnell. What did he say next Day?

Mrs. Allen. He said they had burnt the Meetings; I asked him if he had done any thing? He said, nothing to harm him.

Mr. Darnell. Where is Mrs. Allen's House?

Mrs. Allen. In Great Street, the Back of our House looks into Parliament Street.

Mr. Darnell. Had not you the Curiosity to know what Account he brought?

Mrs. Allen. I was not below, my Sister was.

Mr. Darnell. How came you to ask him, Whether he had done any thing?

Mrs. Allen. Because next Day he had Notice given him, that I was intended to swear against him: At Supper I saw both look very dull, and having heard of this in the House, I asked him if he had done any thing to occasion it? He said, No, indeed.

Vol. VIII.

Mr. Darnell. How long was it before he was taken up?

Mrs. Allen. It was Twelve or Night.

Mr. Darnell. I would ask Mrs. Briggs, Pray what Account did he give you?

Mrs. Briggs. I can't be particular as to that; but only that they had burnt the Meeting-Houses, but he did not say that he had helped to do it.

Mr. Darnell. About what o'Clock was it when he came home?

Mrs. Briggs. To the best of my Knowledge, the Clock had not struck Twelve.

Mr. Darnell. Was not you impatient at his staying so long out?

Mrs. Briggs. It was not full two Hours.

Mr. Darnell. Did you not ask him why he staid so long?

Mrs. Briggs. I was angry that he staid so long: I think he said, he never saw a Mob in London before, and to my Knowledge he was not in any of the Mob before.

Mr. Darnell. Did he give no Account what was done there?

Mrs. Briggs. I don't remember he did.

Mr. Darnell. Did he give you any Account of the Captain he carried?

Mrs. Briggs. I don't remember any thing, my Lord.

Mr. Darnell. That is a pretty remarkable Thing.

Mrs. Briggs. I heard afterwards of a Captain.

Mr. Darnell. When did you hear of it?

Mrs. Briggs. When he was before the Justice.

Mr. Darnell. Did you see any more Fires than one, when you went him out?

Mrs. Briggs. No, my Lord.

Mr. Darnell. What was the Fire to be?

Mrs. Briggs. I thought it was in Hotten.

Mr. Darnell. Did you hear of any Fire in Hotten-Garden?

Mrs. Briggs. Yes, afterwards I did.

Mr. Darnell. But you did not know of any there when you sent him out?

Mrs. Briggs. No, my Lord.

Then Mary Hodges was sworn.

Mr. Darnell. Do you know the Prisoner at the Bar?

Hodges. My Lord, he is my Fellow-Servant.

Mr. Darnell. What time of Night was it when your Mistress sent him out?

Hodges. It was past Ten.

Mr. Darnell. What was he sent for?

Hodges. It was to see if there was a Fire in Hotten.

Mr. Darnell. Then the Fire was burning before he went out?

Hodges. Yes, my Lord.

Mr. Darnell. How long had it been burning?

Hodges. I can't tell; my Mistress was going to Bed about Ten, and one of the young Ladies saw the Fire, and call'd out to him to go and see what it was.

Mr. Darnell. Was you there when he came back?

Hodges. I was not there; for I had a Relation that was ill, and my Mistress gave me Leave to go and sit up with her.

Then Elizabeth Elliot was sworn.

Mr. Darnell. Do you know the Prisoner at the Bar?

Elliot. Yes.

Mr. Darnell. Do you remember the Night the Fire was in Hotten?

Elliot. It was St. David's Day.

Mr. Darnell. Was he sent out that Night?

Elliot. He was sent to see the Fire at Hotten; my Lady sent him to see if there was a Fire.

Mr. Darnell. Did he go out for that?

Elliot. Yes.

Mr. Darnell. Was you there when he came back?

Elliot. Yes; I let him in.

Mr. Darnell. When he came back, what did he do? Did he go to Bed?

Elliot. Yes.

Mr. Darnell. What Account did he bring of the Fire?

Elliot. I don't know what Account he brought of it.

Mr. Darnell. Was you up when he came home?

Elliot. Yes.

Mr. Darnell. What o'Clock was it?

Elliot. The Clock had not struck Twelve.

Mr. Darnell. You can't remember, it may be, the whole Account he gave when he came back; but do you remember nothing of it?

Elliot. No.

Mr. Darnell. Not a Word?

Elliot. No.

Mr. Darnell. Was he not asked how he came to stay so long?

Elliot. No, not in my Hearing.

Mr. Darnell. Were your young Mistresses going to bed, as well as the old one?

Elliot. No; they staid up till he came in.

Mr. Darnell. But were they designing to go to Bed before he went out?

Elliot. Yes; we were going to Bed presently.

Mr. Darnell. Well then, When you had staid up so long as Twelve, were there no Questions asked how he came to keep you up so long?

Elliot. The Ladies asked him, what made him stay? He said, he never saw a Mob before.

Mr. Darnell. But I suppose he told you what Diversions he had had there?

Elliot. No; I did not hear him say any thing of it.

Mr. Darnell. He told you nothing of the Fire, or the Colours?

Elliot. No; nothing.

Mr. Darnell. Did not the Ladies ask what that Fire was?

Elliot. Not as my Hearing.

Mr. Darnell. Was it strange he should be sent out to enquire about the Fire, and not be asked any thing about it. Was no Enquiry made of the Mob and he was sent about?

Elliot. Not in my Hearing.

Mr. Darnell. Had you no Discourse with him?

Elliot. No.

Mr. Darnell. Did you talk nothing of it the next Day?

Elliot. No.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did he give no Account the next Day, or at any Time after, of what passed?

Eliz. No, not in any Hearing.

L. C. J. What Cloaths was he in that Night?

Eliz. He was in his Livery.

L. C. J. What is his Livery?

Eliz. It is blue, with black Buttons, and trimmed with black.

Then Mr. Pryor was sworn.

Mr. Darnell. Pray acquaint my Lord and the Jury, whether you saw the Prisoner at the Bar, any Time at the Fire in Holborn, and before that in Hatton-Garden?

Pryor. As I was coming down Holborn, I had been at Wyblyngier; I came to Leather-Lane End, and there I light of the Prisoner at the Bar.

Mr. Darnell. Where was you going?

Pryor. I was going Home to Chickwell: I saw Willis in Holborn: He came out, Who comes there, Mr. Pryor?

Mr. Darnell. Where was Willis?

Pryor. He stood at the End of Leather-Lane, and he and I walked down together along Leather-Lane, to Grosvell-Street. He told me he lived there with Mrs. Moll. I asked him, Shall we drink a Mug of Beer? With all my Heart, says he; but my Lady has written out to let what the Master is. So we walked talking together, as far as Brook-Market; and there were a great many People hallooing for High-Church and Brookwell; so we parted there, and did not go on to drink, because there was a great Mob about.

Mr. Darnell. You say he parted from you to go Home; Was any body with him?

Pryor. No.

Mr. Darnell. Was there any Curtain, or Colours, or Stick?

Pryor. No.

Mr. Darnell. Was there any body, or any Mob, that claimed him as their Captain?

Pryor. No; I saw Nobody speak to him.

Mr. Darnell. Did you afterwards go to the Fire in Hatton-Garden?

Pryor. They were just going to light it.

Mr. Darnell. What were they doing at the Meeting-House in Leather-Lane?

Pryor. They were pulling it down, and carrying it to Hatton-Garden.

Mr. Darnell. Did the Prisoner carry any of it?

Pryor. I did not let him carry any.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What Time of Night was this?

Pryor. It was Eleven, or thereabouts, I can't tell whether it was over or under.

Mr. Sol. Gen. At which End of Leather-Lane did you see him?

Pryor. In Holborn.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was not the Way you walked with him, as well the Way to Hatton-Garden, as to Grosvell-Street?

Pryor. It was his Way as well to the one as the other.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you leave him standing in the Street, or how did you part?

Pryor. We shook Hands, and he said, I must go and tell my Lady how it is.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What Time of Night was it?

Pryor. As nigh as I can guess, Eleven o'Clock.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Where did you part?

Pryor. Directly over-against Brook-Market.

L. C. J. Where did you tell him?

Pryor. At Holborn, at Leather-Lane End.

L. C. J. Where was the Fire?

Pryor. Almost over-against the End of the Lane.

L. C. J. What was he doing?—Pryor. Nothing; only stood to look on.

L. C. J. Then you went with him up Leather-Lane?—Pryor. Yes.

L. C. J. Where did you part with him?

Pryor. At Brook-Market; we walked to far, and talked of drinking together; but when the Mob were hallooing, and making such a Noise, we did not go in to drink.

L. C. J. Where did you talk of going in to drink?

Pryor. He did not name any Place, and I was a Stranger there.

L. C. J. How came you to walk so far as Brook-Market?

Pryor. I don't know; we were talking of several Things in the Country.

L. C. J. How came you to be out so late?

Pryor. I had been carrying some Glass to Wyblyngier, and was going Home again.

L. C. J. How did he give you any Account of the Fire in Holborn?

Pryor. He talked nothing of the Fire.

L. C. J. How far was the Fire from the End of the Lane?

Pryor. Just at the End of it.

L. C. J. How did you see any Thing of the Fire?—Pryor. I did see it.

L. C. J. How did he say he had been there?

Pryor. No; but he said his Lady sent him to see where it was.

Mr. Tinsley. You said he was going Home, and afterwards you say you went to Brook-Market; is that between Leather-Lane and Grosvell-Street, or not beyond it?—Pryor. It is beyond it.

Mr. Tinsley. How came he then to go beyond Grosvell-Street, in order to go Home to his Mistress?

Pryor. We are talking of Country Affairs.

Mr. Darnell. We shall call a Witness to prove, that after Grew had been at Norgate to see the Prisoner, he declared he did not believe him to be the same Man.

Then Stephen Fletcher was sworn.

Mr. Darnell. Had you any Discourse with Grew after he had seen the Prisoner in Norgate?

Fletcher. Winn came from Norgate on Good-Friday at Night, and had been to see the Prisoner; I asked him what he said to him? Nothing, says he; for he was not the Man that carried the Curtain; for the Man that carried the Curtain had a green Coat and brass Buttons.

Mr. Sol. Gen. At a year's Acquaintance, did Winn?

Fletcher. Yes; I live in the same House.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was Grew at Norgate at Night, after he had been at Norgate, that he told you this?—Fletcher. Yes.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you see him any farther about the Prisoner, or did he tell you of himself?

Fletcher. He told me he had been at Norgate to see Willis; Winn I asked if he said any Thing? He said no; that is not the young Man that I live with the Curtain.

Mr. Darnell. The Account I have of Grew, is, that he was a Tradesman, and broke, and now lives by Gaming.

L. C. J. If you have any Thing to examine to his Reputation, you will do well to call your Witnesses to it. Grew, what do you say to this? Grew. When I came from Norgate, I thought it was the Man; and I told him so, such Things; I told every body I spoke with, that I believed it was the Man.

L. C. J. Did you tell him that you believed the Man that had the Curtain was a green Coat?—Grew. No, not that Night.

Mr. Darnell. Did you tell him so at any Time?

Grew. Yes; but that was the Wednesday Night; but when I went to Norgate, he had a blue Coat, but I always believed him to be the same Man.

L. C. J. Did he tell you he had a green Coat on that Night he had been at Norgate, or before?—Fletcher. It was before.

L. C. J. I understood you, that when he came back from Norgate, he told you he had nothing to say to this Man, for that the Man that had the Curtain had a green Coat and brass Buttons?

Fletcher. He said he could not be positive, for that Mis had a green Coat and brass Buttons.

L. C. J. Did he tell you that Night that he had a green Coat and brass Buttons?

Fletcher. I can't tell whether it was that Night.

Mr. Darnell. You say once he told you he had a green Coat and brass Buttons: What did he say when he came from Norgate?

Fletcher. He said he could not be positive, for that it had a blue Coat on.

Mr. Justice Tinsley. Did you, after you came from Norgate, say, you could not be positive he was the Man?

Grew. I did tell him I could not be positive.

Mr. Tinsley. Did you tell him you believed him to be the Man?

Grew. Yes, I said I did believe it, but I would not swear it was he.

Then Hylgate was sworn.

Mr. Darnell. We call him, to show that at the Fire there was a Man in a green Livery, who was very active there: Pray tell us, Was you at the Fire in Holborn, and who did you observe there?

Hylgate. My Lord, about half an Hour after Ten I was at a Neighbour's House; I heard there was a Mob, and the Meeting-Houses were burning; upon that I went from thence to my Wife, and told her the Meeting-Houses were pulled down, and burnt in Holborn; if you will go, I will let what they are doing. There I saw a great many Boys breaking Wood and Boards, and throwing them into the Fire: And at the Fire I saw a Footman in a green Livery and red Buttons, and red Stockings; I saw him jumping, and very jolly. I will not be positive that he is our Neighbour's Footman that is gone off; but I did see a Footman in a green Livery at the Fire in Holborn, at Leather-Lane End.

Mr. Darnell. What did you see him do?

Hylgate. I saw him jumping and waving his Hat.

Mr. Darnell. What Sort of Man was he?

Hylgate. Much such a Sort of Man as the Prisoner.

Mr. Darnell. Did you know the Footman that is gone off?

Hylgate. Yes.

Mr. Darnell. Did you see the Prisoner at the Fire?

Hylgate. No; I am sure I should have known him, if I had seen him.

Mr. Darnell. Did you say any more at the Fire in Holborn?

Hylgate. I did not say two Moments, but went up to Hatton-Garden, and there I saw a great many with their Clubs and Staves, crying out Brookwell; one gave me a Stroke on the Head, and asked me, Why I did not pull off my Hat?

L. C. J. Why should you know the Prisoner at the Bar, if he had been there, and not know the Man in Green, who was your Acquaintance too?

Hylgate. My Lord, I was at a Distance.

L. C. J. Would not the same Distance have hindered you from knowing the other?

Mr. Darnell. My Lord, I desire to call a Witness or two to the Manner of Life of this Grew.

Then Thomas Clark was sworn.

Mr. Darnell. Do you know Mr. Grew?

Clark. I have known him many Years.

Mr. Darnell. What was he to Clark? He kept a Baker's Shop.

Mr. Darnell. What became of him?—Clark. He broke.

Mr. Darnell. What became of him afterwards?

Clark. He went forthwith down to the Water-side, to some Place, but what it is I don't know.

Mr. Darnell. What does he do now?

Clark. I can't tell, but they say he works with his Uncle: I know nothing of him; but he never had a good Character in his Life.

Mr. Darnell. How does he employ himself?

Clark. He is given to playing, as I have heard say.

Mr. Darnell. Do you know any Thing about Willis?

Clark. No, indeed, I never took much Notice of him: But for the Prisoner, I have known him two Years, and never saw any more of him in my Life.

Then Ward was sworn.

Mr. Darnell. Do you know this Grew?—Ward. Yes.

Mr. Darnell. What do you know of him?

Ward. He was a Baker in Hatton-Garden; I know him several Years: I know him to be a Gambler.

Mr. Darnell. What Influence can you give of his Gaming?

Ward. He has played with me two Years.

Mr. Darnell. How often?—Ward. Not very often.

Mr. Darnell. What do you know of his Play? Does he live by it?

Ward. I can't tell whether he lives by it or no; but he has been by relation a great Gambler.

Mr. Darrell. Do you know of any body's Servant that suffer'd by him?

Ward. No.

Mr. Darrell. What Sort of Games did he play at?

Ward. At Dice.

Mr. At. Gen. Do you reckon yourself a Gamester?—Ward. No.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you ever know that Man play with any but yourself?

Ward. Yes, at the Bell Tavern in Gray's-Inn-Lane.

At. At. Gen. How often did you know him play there?

Ward. But once.

Mr. At. Gen. How long ago was that?

Ward. I can't tell how long; another time he play'd at our House in Hatfield-Garden.

Mr. At. Gen. How long ago was that?—Ward. I can't jolly tell.

Mr. Darrell. Do you know the Professor?—Ward. Yes.

Mr. Darrell. How long have you known him?—Ward. Two Years.

Mr. Darrell. How has he behaved himself?

Ward. A very honest young Man as can come into a House, by all relations that I ever heard of him.

This Examination was over.

Mr. Darrell. Do you know the Professor?—Farrington. Yes.

Mr. Darrell. How long have you known him?

Farrington. I know him when he lived in Chancery-Lane.

Mr. Darrell. What do you know of his Behaviour?

Farrington. A very civil young Man, he used to fetch Drink at my House; I never heard him swear, or knew him guilty of any ill.

The Mr. Miles was sworn.

Mr. Darrell. Pray, Sir, what Account do you give of the Prisoner?

Mr. Miles. He has lived in our Family two Years: He has always behaved himself well, and soberly, and was addicted to no ill.

Mr. At. Gen. Was you at home that Night?

Mr. Miles. No, I was out of Town.

Mr. At. Gen. When did you return?

Miles. The Sunday following.

Mr. Darrell. My Lord, we will not trouble your Lordship with any more Witnesses; we hope we have well accounted for the Time he was out of his Master's House, for that seems to be all that sticks upon him, that he being out to long might give room for him to be concerned in this Tumbrel: But by the Witnesses it appears, that the Conspiracy of raising a Mob, which he had never seen before, might take up some Part of his Time; and the two Years being so near, that he could not go from one, without seeing the other, engaged him to go in to them both. I here use a round way that met him, such when he walk'd up and down the Street in Henry, but we think it throws that he was a Ring-leader, or sower of sedition in pulling down the Meeting-House, for that we see says, they were then carrying the Materials, and the Fire was lighting, at the Time when they were together; and that he perked with him, in order to go home, but his Conscience carried him so far that Fire that was then lighting, that he might carry an Account of it.

But upon the main Question, we must humbly insist, that there is no Evidence to fix it upon the Prisoner. There are not two Witnesses to any Overt-Act for the same Treason, nor do those Witnesses ascertain it to be the Prisoner's for that time it appears a hole plank, that his first Charge was against a Footman in a green Livery: He declared it was a Footman in Green with Black Buttons; and when he came to Negate to be this Man, he believes him to be the same Man; that is the most of his Evidence, but when he came back then to his Conscience, that he lived in the House with, he believed it was not the same Man, and he could not swear it was the same Man, because he had a blue Coat; and now he would carry his Belief so far as to believe, that he then had a blue Coat, with black Buttons; and surely, Nobody could mistake a blue Coat with black Buttons, for a green Coat with black Buttons: Whatever may be supposed of the Colour of Blue by Fire-light, altering by that Light towards a Green, yet it can't turn Black Buttons into Blue ones.

Supposing the Person whom Greve pretends to accuse were here, yet there are not two Witnesses to any Overt-Act, for it is only confirmed by the Confession which is proved by Law; but we hope the Prisoner is not the Person that had the Colours, and therefore there is no Evidence to fix it on him guilty. We can't differ from the Reflection in the Books in Mr. Rogers's Case, much less with your Lordship's Reflection Yesterday; but the Case is entirely different between the Waterman and this Man, for there it did appear that he earned the Branch, and threw it into the Fire, then at that place, he balloted, and led a Party, and offered to be their Captain, to destroy Law, and in that manner he took upon him to lead them, and did lead them; but there is not any one Instance of that Nature here, there is not any one Witness that proves him to be in a Meeting-House, or to have done any thing there, or to have gone from one to another. It is not as if he had join'd with them at the Bell Tavern, and gone to work there in what they were doing, yet we must insist, that it could not make him Guilty of High-Treason. In the Case in King Charles the Second's Time, we saw against them were all in the Design, the Verdict is made that they assembled, that they arm'd themselves, that they chose a Captain; that when the Government thought fit to interfere to suppress them, they Arm'd at the Church, threw Stones at the Captain of the Guards, against their Relations of going to the Court, and there's what their Intent was; but no Design is proved against this Man, and nothing to make it agree with that Case: But these Persons that were by all the Judges acquitted from that Treason; we think the Evidence was much stronger against them, than what is offered against this Man: For in the Case of Reade, he was proved to be among them, and when the Officer persued him, he turn'd about, and cry'd to the People to face about, and not to leave him: And though it appear'd he was in the Design, and call'd to the rest to assist in his Defence, yet he was agreed not to be guilty of High-Treason, because he was not aiding in pulling down the Houses; which in those Matters wherein the Judges gave their Opinions, made it High-Treason. But as to Greve in the full special Verdict, and Reade, they agreed, the Verdict was not full enough to convict them.

L. C. J. The Jury found the Evidence, but did not find the Facts which might have arose from that Evidence; but if they had found, as the Conscience of that Evidence, that they were doing and aiding, they would have been Guilty. And though the Court thought there was Reason for the Jury to have said so, yet they not having said so, the Court could not say it for them.

Mr. Darrell. My Lord, we say there is no Intention proved against him, nor aiding in doing that which is the Crime, as pulling down the second Meeting-House: And as for the first, that was well known, and burning, before he came, so that he could not assist in that.

Ward. I desire Law may be asked, if he saw me carry any thing to the Fire?

Law. I did not see him carry any thing.

Ward. Did he see any of the Mob take Notice of me?

Law. There was Nobody with him, and that took Notice of him. He went from the Fire, after he had spoke those Words, very quietly.

L. C. J. Father. Was you by Mr. Law when you saw the Prisoner carry the Timber?

Father. He was within the Shop, I believe.

L. C. J. You told us, that you saw several People in the Meeting, breaking it down: Did you see the Prisoner there?

Father. No, I did not.

L. C. J. Pray, whence did he bring that Timber that you saw upon his shoulders?

Father. I can't tell that.

L. C. J. You did not see him bring it out of the Meeting-House, did you?

Father. No, I did not.

Mr. At. Gen. Mr. Law, Was Father by you when the Prisoner spoke to you?

Law. He stood lower than me; We fill'd up the Door-way: My Hand was on the Side of the Door. Every now and then the Mob would strike at me, as they went by, and were carrying the Wood from the Meeting to the Fire; they would Huzzas, and cry, You Dog, who are you for?

Mr. Father and I stood to about half an Hour: I stood there before the Fire was lighted, and till the Grass was cut.

Mr. At. Gen. How often did you see the Prisoner during that time?

Law. But once, and that was when he spoke those Words to me.

Mr. At. Gen. Was Father by you then?

Law. Yes, of the Side of me.

Mr. At. Gen. Then sit up Father again. Pray Sir, about this Timber: You say you saw him with some Timber on his Back; Who was by at that Time? Was Law by?

Father. I don't know whether he was at the Door, or in the Shop.

Mr. Thynne. Was he coming that Way from the Meeting with the Timber?—Father. Yes.

Mr. Darrell. Can you take it on your Oath, that the Man that spoke to Mr. Law was the Man that carried the Timber?

Father. No, I can't.

Mr. At. Gen. My Lord, we think the Proof is sufficient; and notwithstanding any thing that has been said by the Counsel for the Defendant, it stands unimpaired, and it is clear, that the Prisoner is Guilty of this Treason.

The Evidence of both Sides makes it appear, that upon this Day there was an Infurrection of the People, in order to pull down the Meeting-House, and that they executed their Design by pulling down several at that Time. Mr. Darrell don't deny but that, in point of Law, all those People were gathered together, to execute this Design, and equally Guilty of High-Treason: So that the Question is only, Whether this Prisoner was one of those People that were gathered together? That which he insists upon is, that though this Man was there, yet no Proof is made that he was aiding towards the carrying on this Design; therefore we think what our Witnesses say is sufficient, and not impeach'd by what was said of the other Side.

The first Witness that we call'd, though he was not acquainted with the Prisoner, yet he says, there was a Man in a blue Livery, that he could not but take Notice of it, and that when he went to Negate, to tell the Prisoner, he took him to be the same Man that carried the Colours; and though he can't be so positive as to swear directly, yet he says he met it in the same Man, though he can't be so positive.

I am sure I should be very far from proving any thing similar to the Nature of the Evidence will bear, therefore I hope I don't misrepresent what he says: Therefore it leaves it somewhat uncertain yet, whether the Prisoner as the Bar was the Man that carried those Colours? But that which puts this out of Dispute, and makes it clear that this is the Man, is Law's Evidence, who now appears not to be an Enemy to the Prisoner. He tells you, that last Night the Prisoner told him, that they had made him Captain of a Party that Night; that he had made Colours of a Curtain, and that he had burnt the Clock. Now it is very strange, that if he was not concerned in carrying this Curtain, that he should talk of a Curtain and Colours, and say, that he had made Colours of a Curtain. If he was not the Man, it is unchangeable he should, when as how after he was observed by our Witnesses, say, that he was the Man they had chosen, and that he had made a Colours of a Curtain; and that they had burnt the Clock. It is not to be imagined he would have said such a thing, if he had not been the Man that the others saw carrying it; therefore, putting these two Witnesses together, (who are Persons that no ways appear to be concerned to bring this Man to Justice more than any other) and it makes it plain and clear, that this is the Man that burnt the Colours. It is, then it is plain this is one Evidence, and I agree, it is necessary that there should be another Witness to prove this Fact, and the Testimony of our Witnesses will not be enough, therefore we have produced Father, that previously knew this Man. He says, he saw him with a Piece of Timber on his Shoulders; that he saw him throw it into the Fire; and that he saw that Man go afterwards and speak to Law, and Law told him who he was.

It is of Consequence to all Governments, to make every Body, that is any ways adid in these Disorders, equally guilty; for it is impossible to say who begins in these Cases: You may know who carries on these Things, but you can't tell who begins them; therefore it will not be sufficient for them to say on, that he was sent by his Mistress at that time, for that it all that was proved, that he was sent out for where the Fire was, and his being sent out for that Purpose will not make him the less Guilty, if he did join with them, and aid them in what was done: For if Men are met together to do an unlawful Act, and those that don't know it join with them, they are Guilty; therefore whether he knew of that Meeting, or was only sent by his Mistress, yet if it is proved that he did join, and aid and assist those that were engaged in that Treason, he is equally Guilty. As to what was said by Prier, who was his Companion, that appears to be just as having been sent out by his Mistress to enquire: He told this Man, that he was sent out to get Intelligence, but you see, that though he was asked to stay and drink with this Man, he would not, but left him, and what he did then, he could not tell, it is therefore likely that he afterwards went to this Bedchamber that he was afterwards unhappily engaged in.

As to what they insist on, that they have called Witnesses to invalidate the Testimony of Grove, that he made some Mistake about the Colour of his Cloaths, that is no great Matter to be relied on, for blue and green, by Candle-light, are pretty much of the same Colour, especially at a distance View; but you for the View he had was sufficient to know his Face, but the Light of the Fire occasioned another Cast upon his Cloaths, therefore his thinking it to be green when it was Blue, will make no Difference: And though he don't speak positively, but speaks with Caution, and not as a Man would do that was produced, and came to take away a Man's Life: Though he says he can't positively say this is the Man, yet he says he does really think it is. As to the Witnesses that prove he had a Menstruant, and broke, that may be many an honest Man's Misfortune to fall in a Way of Trade: I don't find that they do impeach his Credit at all: Though they talk of his playings, I don't find but one Man that has seen him play, and most People do some time or other: I don't find that he has swerved, or done any thing foul; but we must believe the Matter of Fact to the Consideration of the Jury: I believe the Matter of Law is agreed. I believe there was a Noncon in the World, that it was only a Riot, for which they might be fined, and the like, but the Law is now agreed; and as to the Fact, we must submit it to your Lordship's Direction.

Mr. Ser. Gen. I think Mr. Danell does agree that if there was a general Intention to pull down Meeting-Houses, it would be Rebellion and High-Treason. I take it, that it was so, as is fully proved as it possible, by having so many pulled down, and by such a Multitude of People as were got together for that Purpose: For it can't be thought, that the People that were at one House intended to pull down that one, and those that were at the other Houses intended to pull down them only; but it must be a general Intention to pull down Meeting-Houses in general; we think, therefore, the general Intention is proved, therefore what Talbot says don't confute it: For though he says, what they declared was only in regard to Mr. Burges's Meeting-House, yet that don't take off from the Evidence of what pulled the next Day, when the several Meeting-Houses were pulled down, and the Fact, without that Evidence, shows the particular Intention; and the Mob that were at Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, afterwards, damn them, they would have them all down, and accordingly they went away to another, and pulled that down; therefore, that there was a general Intention, is sufficiently proved, and that this Man did act in that Intention. We think it is sufficiently proved, that he was at two of them; but if it had been but one, it had been the same Fact. But they object, that this is not a legal Evidence; for, say they, the Statute requires it, and says, that no Confession can be given in Evidence, and the Evidence of Last, without it, will not do; and Grove's not swearing positively to the Man, without the Help of Last, will not be a legal Evidence, so as to prove an Overt-Act. This is the Strength of the Objection in Point of Law, and God forbid that we should insist on any thing but what is legal Evidence: It is Justice to him, not to offer any such thing, as it is to the Crown, to insist on what is legal Evidence, to bring him to Punishment. The Words of the Act are, That no Person shall be indicted, tried, or attainted of High-Treason, whereby Corruption of Blood may be made, or of Misdemeanor of such Treason, but by the Oaths and Testimonies of two lawful Witnesses, either both at the time Overt-Act, or one to one, and the other to another Overt-Act of the same Treason, unless the Party willingly, in open Court, confess the same, &c. Now in this Case, here are two lawful Witnesses. Grove is a lawful Witness, he is capable of being a Witness; whether what he says is sufficient for the Proof of the Facts, must be left to the Consideration of the Jury. If there are two legal Witnesses, to which there are no legal Objections, it is sufficient; whether what they swear is sufficient to prove the Fact, is of another Consideration; but there is no such Word in the Act to restrain a Confession from being given in Evidence: He shall not be convicted on a Trial, without two lawful Witnesses; that is the Thing that is provided for, and it was to exclude a Precedent that had been settled in Yew's Case, in my Lord Chief-Justice Kings's Reports, as Evidence of Confession only, that was proved by two Witnesses, and that was the Occasion of making this Law, that his Confession alone should not be sufficient, without an Overt-Act. This was the Reason and Ground of making that Act in Parliament, but it was not designed to exclude all Confession. That was Evidence at Law, and always must be: That Evidence that comes out of a Man's own Mouth, was always allowed. The Design of the Act was to exclude Confessions from having the Force of a Conviction, unless it were in a Court of Record, and to prevent a Confession proved by two Witnesses, from being a sufficient Ground for a Conviction. A Confession is a considerable Evidence, and in many Cases clears a Thing beyond Contradiction; and in this Case it shows how necessary it is, for where Things are transacted in the Dark, and it is impossible for Strangers to see, the Declaration of a Person is nearly the Confession of a Man himself, and must have a great Weight in the World, and the most Satisfaction. I mention here a lawful Witness, and not clear of that Objection: How can two Witnesses be at the time of the Evidence of Last is not necessary, but two Witnesses at the time of the Evidence of Last is necessary.

This being the State of the Matter, How stands it then? It is agreed he was at the Bedchamber in Halifax, he was sent out for that Purpose: The Fire was seen at his Mistress's House, and he was sent out to enquire about the Matter. That there was a Man there in a blue Livery, is proved by several People, and it is proved that he had a blue Livery. Grove saw a Man, he can't tell whether he was in blue or green, with a Menstruant, in Halifax: He says, he don't know whether it was in blue or green, but he took him so he was at that Size, and he supposes him to be the Man. But here is a Doubt, whether this is the Man that created the Standstill, and how it was cleared? Now this, with a Menstruant, is cleared by the Man himself, if that be Evidence, which we must upon it do. This Declaration is true, that he had made Colours of a Coat, and that he was chief Captain of a Party, that does explain it, and is not answered by any thing they have offered to the contrary. As to his being in the Tunnel in Leather-Lane, F. de fears, that he saw him with a Piece of Timber on his Shoulder, and that he carried it, and threw it into the Fire, Last, as to every thing he speaks, is clear: He proves that he spoke some Words to him; and as to what Talbot says, he is as clear, that he had the Wood, and threw it in. Two only Questions then will be, Where he had this Wood? Whether he had the Wood which he threw into the Fire, made of the Materials of the Meeting House, from any other Place? They give you some Evidence, that he was going home quietly, and that they carried about Elizabetta at Bristol's House; that it is plain, he did not go home 'till 'till Twelve, for so all the Family agree; in that that Time is to be accounted for, that he might have spent at this Bedchamber, and in the Tunnel. There is another Man to answer the Belief of what they call the High Church Standard: He says, there was a Man in a green Livery which he saw, and thought he knew him, but could not be positive, because he was at a Distance; but if it had been this Man, he believes he should have known him; but there is a little Reason for him to know the one or the other. The Man in the green Livery, he says, is a raw boy, but he says nothing as to the Hair Barrow; and it is easy to mistake between green and blue.

I shall not urge the Evidence further than it is reasonable; there are Circumstances which will be under the Consideration of the Jury. But supposing the Man to be concerned in this Manner, adding as the Queen's Evidence have proved, it will be High-Treason within the Gate in my Lord Kings's Reports, and is not diminished by what Mr. Danell offered. He says, there was leading and arming, and they struck at the Guards; so here was leading, for Nobody denies but they had a Standard: The only Question is, Whether the Prisoner carried it? And is the other Mob in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, they were led, and hallooed away to Leather-Lane, and as to the Gate of Black's, which he would swear it so, there was no Act that was done by him; besides, the Verdict was defective, in not finding the aiding and assisting; for though they found the Facts, yet they did not draw the Conclusion from those Facts. As to what has been said to the Reputation of Grove, I don't find it any ways affects him; it is not proved that he has charged, or that he is a common Gambler, or that he Eves by that Way. As to the Reputation of the Prisoner, there may be many honest Men that might think they did Service at this time, and he might be desired among the rest; but that is an Argument why he should not be concerned in the Fact: Whether he was or not, is what we must submit to the Consideration of the Jury.

Mr. Thynne, My Lord, as to the Matter of Law, it has been fully spoken on, and that the Intention was general, is proved; the only Question is, Whether the Prisoner was aiding, and so proved in a legal Manner? I will only say how much Overt-Act is proved: The first Act is his going with a Piece of Wood on his Shoulder, and throwing it into the Fire. That F. de swears positively, I said, Whether he was coming with it as from the Meeting-House? and he said he was. As to that, it is plainly sworn upon him as to the Man.

The other Overt-Act is from Grove; there is indeed some Uncertainty as to the Person, Grove was not indeed very positive; he did observe a Man at the Fire, he could not say whether he had on a blue Livery or green, but when he went to Ninny to see the Prisoner, he did say he believed him to be the Man. Indeed they pretend that he said something contrary to his Companion, but all he said then was, that he could not be positive, but he did say, he believed him to be the Man. Now there being this Uncertainty, what do we call Last is his Confession? If we call him to prove the Overt-Act by his Confession only, there might be some Colour to object to it: But the Fact is proved to be done by Grove, and we call Last only as to the Identity of the Person. He only explains what Grove had sworn before: He swears the Colours were displayed, and the Confession is only as to the Identity of the Person. As to the Reputation of Grove, they did endeavour to aspers him, but I think they could not make any thing out: They don't pretend to prove any Matter in him; say, he is the rather to be credible, because he will not be positive. If he had said any Mistake, he would have sworn positively, but you see he will not be positive.

Something was mentioned that there was a Man in a green Livery there, from whence they would infer, that he was the Man that was this Instrumental, and that it was not the Man in the blue Livery; but that can't be, because he had red Buttons and Struckings; in that that seems not to have much in it. They pretend to account for him as if he was not there, when Prier says he met him at Eleven, but he did not go home 'till Twelve: So that we think having thus proved by Prier positively, by Grove thus circumstantiated in this Manner; the Man's Con-

effion coming afterwards by East, which does him to be the Man that did the Fact, we think it brings it home to the Prisoner. But we submit it to your Lordship and the Jury.

Mr. Greville. My Lord, as to the Matter of the Confession, I think what Mr. Sallis has Generalized, by way of Answer, will lay aside the Statute of King William, for it is, in Effect, to say, that if the two Witnesses to an Overt-Act are uncertain as to the Person, his Confession must fix it upon him. If two Witnesses will swear that a Man in a blue Coat did commit High-Treason, but are uncertain as to the Man, it shall be brought home to any Man in a blue Coat, if he shall come and say that he did the Fact; so that the Confession is entirely the Evidence, for the other Evidence could not convict him without it.

L. C. J. Do you apprehend that Grace's Evidence is not to be considered by the Jury? Is it only, that some Man or other did display the Colours? Does not his Evidence go further? He says he went to see the Man in Wigmore, and he believes, that Man that he saw there was the same: Now how far will weigh with the Jury, if of another Confession: And as to the Case of Beards, the Fact was found there, but the Jury not finding that he was aiding and assisting, the Court could not supply it for them.

L. C. Baron. You have laid a Stress upon that which is found in the special Verdict. See what the Judgment of the Judges was. But as to Grace's in the first special Verdict, and Beards in the third special Verdict, we all agreed, that the Verdict was not full enough, as to them, for us to judge of Treason in them, because the Verdict only finds that they were present, and finds no particular Act of Force committed by them, and does not find that they were aiding and assisting to the rest: And it is possible one may be present among such a Rabble, only out of Curiosity to see, and without any view of aiding and assisting in Matters of Fact, which ought to be expressly found by the Jury, and not be left to us, upon any colourable Implication; and accordingly these two were discharged.

L. C. J. Gentlemen of the Jury, Francis Webb, the Prisoner at the Bar, stands indicted before you, for that he, upon the first Day of March last, with a great Number of others, did levy publick War against her Majesty. The Proof that has been offered by Mr. Attorney, and the Counsel for the Queen, has tended to show, that there was a general Design of pulling down all the Meeting-Houses; and that this Prisoner did assist in it, did carry Colours in it, and did other Acts that gave Assistance in it: This is what they proposed to make out against him.

The Evidence was, first Taylor, who says, that the Day before he was going through the Temple, and there was a great Mob that attended Dr. Southwell from his Trial, and among them he heard a Discourse of pulling down Mr. Borel's Meeting-House; he heard no other mention of it, some were for pulling it down there; others were for leaving it till the next Night, and others till the Event of Dr. Southwell's Trial. What Determination they came to, he don't know, for he went away; so that his Evidence goes no further than proving a Design to pull down one Meeting-House.

The next Witness is Green; he gives an Account of two Meeting-Houses pulled down, and from made from the Materials, one in Habers, the other in Hotten-Gardens: That at that Fire in Habers, he saw a Man with a Curtain on a Pole, and he called it High Church Standard, and was active among the People, first Couchers, and took Money from those that were in them, and made them cry as he did. As for the Prisoner, he can't say the Prisoner is he. He says he took notice of him, he was in a Livery; and that he went to Wigmore, and saw one, who, he can't be positive, but he believes to be the same that he saw carrying the Curtain: But whether it is the Prisoner at the Bar, that he can't say: For he says he has not the same Cloaths, nor Wig on, and that makes him doubtful. Being asked, What Colour his Coat was, he is not sure whether it was blue or green; but he said, he rather believed it was blue.

This not being enough to bring it home to the Prisoner, they call another Witness, who was Hill, who showed him the Prisoner. And they brought Galsworthy, who went with him, and they tell you, that the Man they showed to him in Wigmore, was the Prisoner at the Bar; and their being led together, it amounts to the same Thing as if he had sworn against the Prisoner, as he did against the Man in Wigmore; that is, that he believed him to be the same Person that carried the Colours.

The next is Fisher; he says, that after the Fire at Habers, they came to Leather-Lane, that they got into the Meeting-House there, and work'd hard to pull it down, but he don't say the Prisoner was in the Meeting-House: But the Fire they made was in Hotten-Gardens, and there he saw the Prisoner carrying a Piece of Wood, and throwing it into the Fire, and making as Naazra. He don't say where he had that Wood; he don't say that he saw him bring it out of the Meeting-House, and he don't know him at that Time, but he says his Eye upon him; and not long after, because by Mr. Leach's Door, and the Prisoner spoke to Leach: What he said, he can't tell, but he said Leach he knew him: Leach told him he did, and when he was come to Leach, he does take upon him to say, that he remembers his Face, and he takes him to be the same Person. He was asked as to his Features, but he don't go about to distinguish them; and it is difficult for a Man to describe their Particulars, by which a Man distinguishes one from another.

Then Leach is called, and he confesses, that the Prisoner was at the Fire at the same time that Fisher was at his Door; that it was Eleven at Night, and that the Prisoner spoke to him; that his Boy said Leach, What, Leach, are you one of them? And thereupon he said, They have made me a Captain of a Party; I took a Window-Curtain, and made it Colours; and we burnt the Clock. This they would apply to clear that which Green says he burnt the Clock. This they would apply to clear that he believes him to be the same Person as he saw in Wigmore.

The next Witness is Orral, and he can't charge any thing upon the Prisoner, but gives an Account of the pulling down the several Meeting-Houses, and the several Mobs that were in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, Drury-Lane, Habers, and Black-Priory, and their making general Declarations, that they would have them all down. And thus far his Evidence is material, that there was a Design to pull them all down. It was solemnly declared, and put in Execution, as far as they did T. One A. and declare the Intentions; for when it breaks out into Action, then the Design appears. He did something further, which is, that he saw a Footman in a blue Livery, that was busy at the Fire, and encouraging the People to throw the Wood in. He says he was a well-made Man, much of the Size of the Prisoner. This is the Evidence produced against the Prisoner; and upon that you will take notice it is made out, that there was a general Design put in Execution, of pulling down the Meeting-Houses, and that he was at one Fire in Hotten-Gardens, and there is only the Belief of the Witness to strengthen it as to his being at the other.

On the other Hand, the Prisoner in his Defence tells you, that he is Servant to a Gentlewoman in Green-Street; that the Family being going to Bed about Ten o'Clock, and seeing a Light in the Street, ordered him to see what was the Matter: This was after the Clock had struck Ten. He went into Habers, and saw the Fire; he saw his friends, did not come near it, and then he came back to his Mistress's House; yet to themselves, that they have given an Account of the whole Time he was out. The first Witness they produced was Mrs. Boyls, who was the Daughter of his Mistress; she tells you the Occasion of sending him out, that she observed a Light, and directed him to go, and tells you the Time, that he came back before the Clock had struck Twelve, and that she did expect her Anger for his staying so long. Mrs. Adis confirms the same, and being asked what Account he gave when he came back, both they and the Maids say, he gave no Account of the Fire; but she hearing that Leach had something to say against him, and taking notice that he was dressed, said him, If he had done any thing. And he said, Nothing to harm him. He says upon his going out, but not of his returning. Taylor says, she let him in, but did not believe him say any thing at all about the Fire; but the says he was a blue Livery. Then they call Piper, and he tells you, he was coming from Wigmore to Clowkenby, he saw the Fire in Habers, and at the End of Leather-Lane he saw the Prisoner looking on, but doing nothing, none of the Mob with him, that the Prisoner and he walked along Leather-Lane, and it was whispered, that they should stick together, but they walking together, observed a Fire making in Hotten-Gardens; that they walk'd by the Street where his Mistress lived, as far as Brook-Market, and there they parted, and the Prisoner turn'd towards his Mistress's House, and, as he thought, went home. Then they produce Fisher, and he speaks as to Grace's Evidence. And to take off from that Count that Green has said, Taylor would have said, he says that Green, Friday Night, he told him the Prisoner was not the Man, for the Prisoner he saw had a green Livery, and Black Buttons; so he said at last: but upon Enquiry a little more particularly, he did not tell him at that Time that it was a green Livery, but first Time before: And Green being call'd again, does own the same; and that he said he could not be positive, and that is what he now says, and only says, he believes him to be the same, and that he told the Witness so at that Time. Adis says, that about half an Hour after Ten he heard of the Mob, and went to see it; that he went to the Fire in Habers, and there he saw a Footman in Green, but he had red Buttons, and the Prisoner's Livery was Blue with a band with Black, and Black Buttons: But he says he saw a Footman there as Green, which is offered, is let you see that there might be another Person that Green did really see. Then Clark is brought to give some Account of Green, he says he kept a Shop, and broker, and never had a very good Character. Ward says the same; and that he was a Gamester; and that it was reported he used to get his Living that way: And he tells you, the Prisoner is of a good Reputation; and those of the Family say as much of him.

This is the Substance of the Evidence on both Sides. The Use that the Counsel for the Prisoner would make of their Evidence, is first, to show that they have given an Account of his Time; that he was otherwise employed than in the Matter the Witnesses for the Queen have given an Account of. Now it is certain, they have not; for they give an Account only of a Walk from Habers to Brook-Market, whereas his own Witness says he was out at least an Hour and an half, so that there was Time enough for him to be present: And though that Witness has been going home, and not to the Fire, yet it is certain, he did not go home then, and that he was at the Fire, because two Witnesses swear he was at the Fire; and it does appear that he was at both the Fires. Before I say that, give me leave to say, that there is a full Proof of a general Design put in Execution, of pulling down the Meeting-Houses, in any sort that is siding in that, is guilty of High-Treason, though he was not party to the first Design, for in High-Treason there is no such thing as Accessory; all that are Actors are equally guilty, and that was the Case of the Lord Essex: He went with some Forces to remove some evil Counsellors, and came to this City to desire Assistance; then Forces he had assembled in his own House; others joined him in the City; it was adjudged they were all guilty of High-Treason, though they did not know of his Design, and that that were accidentally there, and did deny it, it was so, were entitled to his Majesty's Grace, but it is not that they were Not Guilty. So was the Case of the Bloody-Hankers; yet it is not said, that any of them were the Persons that formed the Design of pulling them down.

You are therefore to consider, that it is not enough to charge the Prisoner, that he was at the two Fires: It is not enough that there was Time for him to do what he is charged with, but you are to consider what is proved on him that he did. You observe what is objected as to Green, that there is a great Uncertainty as to his Evidence, and that his Credit is not fair: He don't charge the Prisoner positively, nor ever did. He is offered as to the Colour of his Cloaths. And there it is rightly observed, that Blue and Green are not easily distinguished by the Light of the Fire, yet that is not the Objection; the Objection is, that the Witness at first declared, he believed it to be Green, and now he has told you, that he believes it to be Blue, and that is not consistent, and does therefore a little concern his Credit in this Matter, that he has changed his Evidence. Thus they say, that he did not see him at the Meeting-House:

He saw somebody carrying Colours, and believed this to be the Man; but he says, he was not near enough to distinguish his Cloaths, so he might not be able to distinguish his Face. But then they bring some Witnells to show he is not a Man of so clear a Credit, but they don't charge any great Matter upon him. As for his having broke, that may be a Mistake; that may attend any Man: But then they would support this by the Confession he made to Lord, who swears, that he said he made Colours of a Curtain. Now that may seem to give some Colour to it; but I ought to take notice of the other Part of his Confession, that he had made him Captain of a Party, which don't appear to be likely; for as he was moving from one Party to another, it would be very unusual for the Captain to have his Mob with him, but it is plain he was unattended in going from one Fire to another. When he was at that Fire in Hatton-Garden, he went away alone, as Laur says: And they don't say that he did encourage the Mob. He did throw down a Piece of Wood, and huzzas, but he did not much encourage others. As to the Piece of Wood, one of the Witnells did not see it, and the other that did see it, did not see him in the Meeting-House, so that it is not proved he was at either of the Meeting-Houses, though he was at the Wines. And you may consider another Circumstance, and that is, that this Witnell, Fisher, did not know him before, nor did he know what Cloaths he had on; and if he had not come nearer to him, to Laur's Door, in Probability, he had not known him again; but he says he saw him throw a Piece of Wood into the Fire; and he says he kept his Eye upon that Man, and saw him come up, and speak to Laur. Now you will consider, whether such a Man might not, in a Crowd, slip out of his Eye, and he might take another for him; for Laur, that knew him, says, he did not see him leave any Timber at all.

These are the Objections that I apprehend, may be most proper for me to make to you. As for the Laws, if you take it that he is the Man that had the Colours in Hatton, and afterwards came to the other Fire, and threw the Piece of Timber in there, he is undoubtedly Guilty of High-Treason: Therefore you must consider, first, how far you believe he is the same that carried the Colours in Hatton, and how far you take him to be concerned in pulling down the Meeting-House in Lancaster-Lane. I should take notice of another Thing, that there was a Footman in Green, at the Fire in Hatton, who was very shire, and that Man could not mistake the Colour of Blue and Green, because he knew the Prisoner: Now that being so, it does appear there was a Footman in Blue, and another in Green, that was active at the Fire in Hatton, and one of these two, perhaps, had the Colours; the Question is Which? Greaves says, the Man that had the Colours was in Green, and then he says he was in Blue. Now if the first be right, that he was in Green, it does appear there was such an one in Green: If you believe he was the Person that did make use of these Colours, and that he was assisting in pulling down the Meeting-House in Hatton-Garden, then you are to find him Guilty: If you think he was not the Person, you will acquit him.

Then the Jury withdrew, and the Court adjourn'd till Five o'Clock, when the Jury brought in their Verdict.

Clk. of Arr. Francis Mills, hold up thy Hand. Look upon the Prisoner. How far is he? Is he Guilty of the High-Treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Not Guilty.

Clk. of Arr. Did he fly for it?

Foreman. Not that we know of.

LVIII. The Trial of GEORGE PURCHASE, for High-Treason, in levying War against Her Majesty, in the Kingdom, under pretence of pulling down Meeting-Houses. 9 Annæ, 1710.

[At the Sessions-House in the Old-Bailey.]

Domina Regina versus Purchase.

Die Sabbaui Pinesius Primi die Aprilis Anno Domini 1710 Regina proditit.

THE Court being released, as in the Trial of Francis Mills, and the same Judges being present.

Clk. of Arr. Milesius Cryes, make Proclamation.
Cryes. O Yes; You good Men of the County of Middlesex, summon'd to appear this Day, to try between our Sovereign Lady the Queen, and the Prisoner that shall be at the Bar, answer to your Names as you shall be call'd, every Man at the first Call, upon Pain and Peril shall therein.

Then the Jury that were return'd at the Panel were all call'd over, and the Appearance of all those that answer'd to the Call were recorded.

Clk. of Arr. Set George Purchase at the Bar. (Which was done.)
Clk. of Arr. George Purchase, hold up thy Hand. (Which he did.)
Clk. of Arr. You the Prisoner at the Bar, these good Men, whom you shall hear call'd, and do now personally appear, are to pass between our Sovereign Lady the Queen and you, upon Trial of your Life and Death. If therefore you will challenge them, or any of them, your Time is to speak to them as they come to the Book to be sworn, and before they be sworn.

Clk. of Arr. Thomas Sutton, Esq. (Who appear'd.)
Clk. of Arr. Hold Mr. Sutton the Book.
You shall well and truly Try, and true Deliverance make between our Sovereign Lady the Queen, and the Prisoner at the Bar, whom you shall have in Charge, and a true Verdict give according to your Evidence. So help you God.

Clk. of Arr. John Farwell. (He appear'd, and was sworn.)
In like manner the other Ten Gentlemen appear'd, and were sworn, whose Names follow:

JURY.

Thomas Sutton, Esq.	William Harcourt,	Richard Rumbold,
John Farwell,	John Mordaunt,	Richard Hennard,
John Parsons,	Edward Baskett,	Francis Higgins,
Joseph Parsons,	Robert Beckett,	Hamphrey Newman.

Clk. of Arr. Cryes, count these.
Thomas Sutton.
Cryes. One, and so of the rest.
Clk. of Arr. Hamphrey Newman.
Cryes. Twelve, good Men and true, stand together, and bear your Evidence.

Are you all Sworn, Gentlemen?
Cryes. O Yes. I say one can inform my Lords the Queen's Justice, the Queen's Sergeant, the Queen's Attorney-General, or thus inquest now to be taken, of the High-Treason of which the Prisoner at the Bar stands indicted, let them come forth, and they shall be heard, for now the Prisoner stands at the Bar upon his Deliverance; and all others that are bound by Recognizance to give Evidence against the Prisoner at the Bar, let them come forth, and give their Evidence, or else they forfeit their Recognizance. And all Jurymen of Middlesex that have appear'd, and are not sworn, may depart the Court.

Clk. of Arr. George Purchase, hold up thy Hand. (Which he did.)
Gentlemen of the Jury, look upon the Prisoner, and hearken to his Cause. He stands indicted by the Name of George Purchase, late of the Parish of St. Andrew, Hatton, in the County of Middlesex, Labourer, for that he not having the Fear of God before his Eyes, but being moved by the Impulse of the Devil, did, (as in the Indictment, recitatur manifestum,) against the Peace of our Sovereign Lady the Queen, her Grace and Dignity, and against the Form of the Statute in that Case made and provided. Upon this Indictment he has been arraign'd, and therewith hath pleaded Not Guilty, and for his Trial hath put himself upon God and his Country, which Country you are. Your Charge is to enquire whether he be Guilty of the High-Treason whereof he stands indicted, in Manner and Form as he stands indicted, or Not Guilty. If you find him Guilty, you are to enquire what Goods and Chattels, Lands and Tenements he had at the time of the High-Treason committed, or at any time thence. If you find him Not Guilty, you are to enquire whether he be for it: If you find that he be for it, you are to enquire of his Goods and Chattels, Lands and Tenements, as if you had found him Guilty. If you find him Not Guilty, nor that he be for it, you are to say so, and no more, and bear your Evidence.

Mr. Thomas. May it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, George Purchase, the Prisoner at the Bar, stands indicted, for that he, not having the Fear of God before his Eyes, but being moved by the Impulse of the Devil, and desirous to withdraw the cordial Love and natural Obedience, which true and faithful Subjects of our Sovereign Lady the Queen do and ought to bear towards Her, and intending to disturb the Peace and common Tranquillity of this Kingdom, on the First of March last, in the Parish of St. George, Dew, in the County of Middlesex, traitorously compass'd and imagin'd to levy War, and stir up Rebellion and Insurrection against our said Lady the Queen within this Kingdom: And that he might accomplish his said traitorous Imaginations and Designs, on the said First of March, and in the said Parish being assembled, with a Multitude and great Number of People, armed and arrayed in a warlike Manner, he did then and there unlawfully and traitorously levy War against our said Lady the Queen, contrary to the Duty of his Allegiance, against the Peace of our said Lady the Queen her Crown and Dignity.

To this Indictment he has pleaded Not Guilty.
Gentlemen, we shall call the Evidence for the Queen, and if they prove the Charge, as laid in the Indictment, we doubt not but you will find him Guilty.

Mr. At. Gen. My Lord, the Prisoner at the Bar stands charged with an Indictment of High-Treason. The Species of High-Treason has been open'd by the Gentlemen that open'd the Record: We shall prove it by calling Witnells to show, that he was one of those wicked Persons that did assemble themselves in Dew-Lane: We shall show, that this rebellious Assembly was got together to do Right, as they call'd it, to a Gentleman who was under a Protection of the House of Commons; his Name is known, I mean Dr. Saunders: they resolved, that to do him Justice, they would be revenged on the Meeting-Houses of the Dissenters, and therefore they resolved to pull them all down: That this Design was framed in that Assembly that did attend Dr. Saunders and to from his Trial, it was then resolved to pull down the Meeting-Houses in several Places in this County, and the City: That the Prisoner was among those that assembled in Dew-Lane; that he was with his Sword drawn; that when the Guards were come (for they were too many to be withstood by the Civil Government) the Constables and Watch were too few to withstand that Assembly, therefore it was necessary, for the Preservation of all honest Men's Lives and Estates, for to send the Guards to suppress this Tumult, and it was great Grace in Her Majesty to have that Regard to her

People

People. When they came, they told them with more Tenderness than they need have done; they spoke to this Man to put up his Sword, and he gone! No, he came with a Resolution, and till that was done, he would not put it up. They came the second Time, and asked him, Do you know that you are defying Authority, in opposing the Queen's Guards? You are opposing the Queen's Person, therefore pray be gone: No, he persisted in it, and had the Courage, or Impudence, to affront the Officer that was at the Head of the Guards, and would have killed him, if one of the Guards had not, by a lucky Stroke, beat his Sword down. He was so devoted to the Cause, that he declared he would lose his Life in the Cause; and what was this Cause? It was opposing a just and necessary Prosecution, that was carrying on by the Commons of England, before the greatest Court in England, and, perhaps, in Europe; and they thought fit to find him guilty of the Charge that was laid against him. Thus gave these People Occasion to exercise their Revenge on all the Meeting-Houses. We have had the Determination of the Courts oftentimes, that this is a loving War within the Statute of 25 Edw. III. When we have made this appear, we don't doubt but the Jury will find him guilty.

Mr. S^r. G^o. My Lord, we will call our Witnesses, and prove the Facts.

Then Thomas Telbey rose four.

Mr. At. G^o. Pray give an Account if you saw any Tumult, or Number of People, that attended Dr. Sacheverell; and what Discourse you heard among them; and what Resolution they came to.

Telbey. As I was passing through the Temple, on Tuesday Night, I saw a great Number of People that attended him; I there heard them tell upon demolishing Mr. Burgoyne's Meeting; some were for doing it then, others for leaving it till the next Night.

Mr. At. G^o. What Night was this?—Telbey. It was the Tuesday Night.

Mr. At. G^o. Was it before the first of March?—Telbey. Yes, it was.

Mr. At. G^o. Was it resolved by more than one?

Telbey. By a great many.

Mr. At. G^o. Then you take it to be general?—Telbey. Yes.

Parish. Did you see me there?—Telbey. No.

L. C. J. Did you fly there any Time?

Telbey. No, I only heard them discourse of it as I passed along.

Mr. Baron Bury. Did you say till they came to a Resolution? Or were they only talking of it?

Telbey. They came to that Resolution then.

Mr. Baron Bury. Did you say till they were agreed upon it?

Telbey. It was agreed to pull down the Meeting-Houses, though the Time was not fixed.

Mr. Baron Bury. Did you know any of them that this was agreed by?

Telbey. No, none of them.

Mr. Baron Bury. What did you hear them say?

Telbey. I heard them resolve on demolishing Mr. Burgoyne's Meeting.

Say they, Come Boys, we will demolish Dr. Burgoyne's Meeting; others said, No, we will defer it to the End of the Trial.

Then William Orrell rose four.

Orrell. My Lord, before I give my Evidence, I beg Leave to speak a few Words. Parbury's Wife has been in my Neighbourhood, and offered Money to several People to come and swear against me, to take away my Reputation: And Yesterday a Person came into Mr. Leonard's Coffee-house, and said publicly, That I was perjured; that when I swore against Will I was perjured; that the Jury would not believe me; and that I was reprimanded by the Court and the Queen's Council. My Lord, I desire I may clear myself.

Mr. At. G^o. There is an Information laid before me, which I shall take Notice of in a proper Place; for it is an insolent Thing, in any Government, that when we are proceeding in a judicial Way; if the when People have the Benefit of the Law that was made for them, a Copy of the Indictment and of the Panel, Liberty to examine Witnesses, and ask what Questions they think proper; and they cannot say, but that there has been a Tenderness in us, that are the Prosecutors, not to push Things further than the natural Impulse of them; yet that such Practices should be used to disfigure the Queen's Evidence. I have an Account, that John Roberts, a Mathematical Instrument-maker, has, at Leonard's Coffee-house, affirmed, that the Queen's Witness was a perjured, infamous Villain, in giving his Evidence here. I shall, in a proper Time, endeavour to bring him to Justice for it.

L. C. J. It was not improper for him to mention it here. I was far from repeating him, or thinking his Evidence false; that I never heard of a Trial opposed one Word he said.

Mr. At. G^o. Mr. Orrell, pray consider you are now upon your Oath; therefore, without Regard to Threats, you must speak the Truth, and all the Truth, and God forbid you should be afraid of it.

Mr. At. G^o. Was you abroad on Wednesday the first of March? What did you observe of the pulling down any Meeting-Houses? Give an Account of all the Places you were at, and what Concern the Prisoner had in it.

Orrell. About ten o'Clock, or a little before, I went to Leonard's Coffee-house, and hearing that they were pulling down several Meeting-Houses, I went with another Gentleman, Mr. Abingdon, directed to Henry. When I came there, I saw Abundance of People, a great Mob, carrying the Materials from Mr. Bradbury's Meeting-house into Henry. I asked the People where they carried them? They all said to Henry. When I had stood there a little Time, I says I to my Friend, Let us go into the Meeting-house; I will see; it may be, I may know formerly there. I went through a dark Passage, and narrow Entry: When I came in, Lord have Mercy upon me, said I, it is all down: I turned back to my Friend, Mr. Bradbury. This is destroyed, said I, let us go for where they burn it. We went to Henry, and all the Way we saw Abundance carrying Wood quite from the Meeting-house to the Fire in Henry. We made no Stay at the Fire, but immediately went through Turf, and down by Lincoln's-lane Gate-Wall, so the Fire there, which was made of Mr. Bradbury's Meeting-house, which I had been in two Hours before, I saw them pulling it down. When we had been there a little while, I said to my Friend, Let us go towards the other Part of the Town, and see what is doing there. We went along that Side of Leonard's-lane-House, where Mr. Child's House is: When we came to the Corner, by my Lord Chancellor's, at my Lord's Door, there stood a Chance; said I, I believe there is somebody from Court, I hope there will be a Power, by-and-by we shall have the Guards. We made no Halt there, but went softly towards the Arch: Before we came to it, I saw a pretty tall Man leading a Body of the Mob through the Fields; about the Middle they made a Halt, and became a bigger Number; we walked softly to meet them: I kept my Eye on the tall Man, which proved to be Dennison: Some of them were for going up Queen-street, and some were for going through the Arch. When they came near the Corner, he struck three off, and went over the Rail; just after the Wall, about the middle Way between Pratt House and the Arch, and there they called a Council: Says I, There's a Council of Mob; there I saw Dennison. Said they, Where shall we go now? To Derry-Lane, or Wild-street? No, said some, to Derry-Lane, huzzas! Wild-street is a Hen-Roost, the other is worth ten of it. Dennison huzzas! huzzas! Come along, Boys, we will have them all down, and they carried it by the Majority. I went under the Piazza at Pratt House, into Queen-street: When he was in Queen-street, he made ten or twelve Halls, and turned about, huzzas! High-Church and Sacheverell! God damn all his Enemies, we will have all the Meetings down to-night, follow me, Why don't you come along? And this he many times repeated, and then he headed them till he came to Derry-Lane; there some of the Boys ran to find the Meeting-house Door, but they missed the Door, and went to some of the Neighbours Houses; but they soon found out the Door, and there came a little Fellow, with a Pick-Ax, to break down the Door. A Woman that belonged to the Place came crying, that her Sister was in the House, and would be killed: Do not be afraid, Mother, said I, I will endeavour to pacify them, if I can: But at last came another Man with a Hatchet, and struck through the Door the second or third Time. God damn you, says he, don't you know how to break down a Meeting-house Door? That Fellow cannot be found. I went in with them, and there I was assaulted by a Soldier; and when I was there, they would have me go up Stairs with them. Pray, says I, don't go up, there is only a poor Woman's Room, that holds up the Place. What will it signify, if you should burn an old Devil's? God damn you, says he, are you against Sacheverell? Says I, I have the Queen's Commission: Upon that he cried out, The Church, the Church, God damn you, you shall go up. That Man, I suppose, was a Soldier; he was in a loose Waistcoat and white Stockings. I went up with them, and it proved to be Mr. Earl's own Lodging; and there they took up a great many Papers, Manuscripts, which I suppose might be Noises. As soon as I came out, I saw the Clock and the Cullion thrown down into the Kennel in Derry-Lane; and they were the two first Things that were brought out, as I observed. I asked, indeed, Why they came to complain, and give me ill Language? Says I, Where is Toby, the Watchman? Oh damn you, says one, he is gone with a Party to St. James's: Another said, he was gone to my Lord North's; and others said, he was gone to the Back-Door to break it open, but I saw him no more after that. When I came out, I went to the Man that keeps the Griffe and Parrot, and told him, I was sorry to see these Things; and my Friend went to his Brother's House, which was hard by. After my Friend was come again, Well, said I, I will go into the City, to Leonard's Coffee-house, and give an Account to our Friends of what has happened, for they will stay for us, and will not go to Bed, if I don't go back to Night. We agreed to go home; but my Friend asked, Where was the Meeting-house in Wild-street? Says I, I know Wild-street; but I believe it was the old Will House: So we went through Wild-street, and as we came to the Arch, we saw the Detachment of the Guard coming on a full Trot. Says I, Gentlemen, I pray make haste, they are pulling down the Meeting in Derry-Lane. I put out my Hand to the Captain, This is the best Way, said I, through Wild-street: And another Detachment went another Way. As soon as they came (I was near the Officer), he commanded them to file off, and disperse the Mob; and they rode among them to disperse them. While I was there, I saw a Man with his Sword drawn, near the Griffe and Parrot, who was the Prisoner at the Bar: I went over the Way, and spoke to him.

Parbury. What Time of Night was this?

Orrell. It was about half an Hour after Eleven. Several of the House rode up to him, and then he retired under the Balke, and pulled with his Sword at several of them; and some of them thrust at him with the Pikes of these Swords. Says I to my Friend, I wonder they don't cut him to Pieces. I went to him; Pray, says I, what are you doing? Pray go home. He earned his Back, and I thought he had been gone. In a Minute's Time, the Guards had rode round the Fire, and dispersed the Mob a little: In a Minute or two, I saw the Prisoner with his Sword drawn, hallooing and flourishing his Sword in the Middle of the Street, just by the Kennel in Derry-Lane, and frowning the Guards. I came to him, and laid my Hands upon him, and pulled him back, What are you doing? Two Foot-Soldiers came to me, and said, What do you do? He is drunk; he is an honest Gentleman, says I, Take him away then, if he is your Friend. Says I to him, Do you know what you do, in opposing the Guards? You oppose the Queen's Person. Says he, God damn you, are you against Sacheverell? I am for High-Church, I will be for High-Church and Sacheverell; I will lose my Life in the Cause; and this many Times repeated. I went over the Way, and he advanced with his Sword, and ran at the Officer, just at the left Flank: At that, I saw a Gentleman's Horse spring forward, and he struck his Sword down. I went back, thinking there would then be firing, and I might be killed.

L. C. J. Pray repeat the Words again, which he spoke to you, when you told him, that telling the Guards was opposing the Queen.

Orrell.

Seabright. I can't be positive of that.

Mr. Anger. Did you observe him poke at any Horses?

Seabright. No; I saw no such Thing.

Free George Richardson was seized,

Mr. Anger. What Troop of Guards are you of?

Richardson. The third Troop.

Mr. Anger. Look on the Prisoner, and tell us whether you remember him.

Richardson. I know him well, for we were always together in Flanders.

He was in the First Troop of Guards when I was in the Third.

Mr. Anger. Now did you see him among the Mob the Evening of March at Night?

Richardson. I was upon the Guard that Night, and something after Ten or Eleven o'clock, as it is, that the Mob was up. We were ordered to maintain it to mount, and at first the Foot pulled us to St. Peter's.

Ball. Wherever came most Londoners to the Ball, we left the Foot, and made to Drury-Lane, when we were there, the Officer commanded us to fall off, and disperse the Mob, which we did. I was riding among the mob, they fled off, not hurt together, but singly, and when I came back to a hundred the Fire, I saw the Mr. Parsons, and my Officer, Captain Hay, was talking to him; what he said, I don't know, but he pulled him, Parsons made a Thrust at him, but I beat down his Point.

Mr. Anger. Who did he thrust at?

Richardson. My Officer, Captain Honourable.

Mr. Anger. Where he is? Richardson. To the Country.

Mr. Anger. Then you say you beat down his Point.

Richardson. I went to cut at him; Yes, You said, have you a mind to kill my Officer? I went to cut at him, but I had some hand against a Bulk, and I hit the Parsons with my Point, and my blade broke to pieces.

Mr. Darnall. You say you saw him talking with the Captain; had he any word drawn at that Time? Richardson. Yes.

Mr. Darnall. Were there any Mob about him then?

Richardson. They were very close about us at every Side; we were dispersed thus as well as we could.

Mr. J. J. Did the Prisoner know Captain Honourable?

Richardson. I believe he did; for he was almost with us at the first Time when Captain Honourable was there.

Mr. Anger. At the Mob, we have done with our Evidence.

Mr. Darnall. I am of Counsel with the Prisoner, and my Lord, I shall make to Defence, but as the Gentlemen on the other Side say, there was a great tumultuous Assembly, that was gathered together with an intention to pull down the Meeting-Houses; And I shall make an Oath but it was High-Treason in all that was guilty of that Intention, or assisted thereof that were so. But on the other Side, we must beg Leave to say, that any Person that was going along the Street, and fell into the Company of those that had that Design, though they might use some Expressions that were Evidences of the Intention; yet if they were out of the Intention, nor did any thing that was assisting in the Execution of it, they will not be guilty of High-Treason.

They have offered Evidence to show there was such an Intention. The first Witness is only to show, there was a general Intention. And I must take Notice, that when he says there was such a general Intention as is necessary to make this High-Treason; For he says, as he went through the Temple, he heard some People say, they would go and pull down the St. Peter's Meeting-House; others testified it: Some were for going that Night, and others for deferring it till the Trial was over. Now in they came to no other Resolutions, than that some were for going that Night, and others after the Trial was over; then the Action which happened the next Night, and before the Trial was over, could not be an Execution of that Intention; nor can they say that any one of those that were at the Temple was at this Execution. And therefore, if there be no other Evidence to show a general Intention, then this Affair was done without any previous Intent, and only he is a sudden Execution of a Design.

The first Witness in the Fall is Orrell. And I must beg Leave to take Notice of the Introduction to his Evidence, which he would make use of as a Rebellion on the Prisoner; but I believe the Gentlemen of the Jury will not think that he had any Hand in it. There may be wicked People enough to say such Things; and no doubt Mr. Darnall will take care that they shall be justified according to their Defences. And I would take this Opportunity to say, that I don't for but he is free from any such Charge.

I let no Inconsistency between his Evidence, and that which was given for the Prisoner. But as to that Suggestion, that the Prisoner's Wife has been about in his Neighbourhood, I don't for any thing of that proved.

As to the Fall, he says, he came up Down-Lane half an Hour past Eleven; that there he saw the Prisoner from the other Side the Way, with his Sword drawn; that he was hallooing and waving his Sword; that the Guards coming on, he retired toward the Bulk; and that he pushed at the Guards. The next Place he saw him at was a little from the place among the Horse-Guards; there he was waving his Sword, and crying, Down all Sweden's Enemies; I will fight them all; I will sell my Life in the Cause; Come on, Boys; and to that Purpose. And that he did push at the Captain of the Guards. I think these Expressions carry a Face of Madness, or great Drunkenness; nobody in his right Senses would think himself fit to fight all his Enemies, and call to them to fall on, when at the same time he fled himself, and there were none to fall on.

Mr. J. J. He did not say there were none: He said they were not dispersed.

Mr. Darnall. I asked whether any body was near the Prisoner when he used that Expression, he said they were dispersed.

Mr. J. J. Call him again, and let if he said so. What say you, Did he stand single and alone, and all the rest at a Distance?

Orrell. No; I saw him at the Head of a smaller Body just at the Kennel in Lang-Down. I went and spoke to him, and pushed him back; and then there was a greater Number.

Mr. Darnall. I ask, When he pushed at the Captain, was there any body close to him?

Orrell. There were some before him, but they did not keep so close to him.

Mr. J. J. Where was it that you say he called to them to fall on?

Orrell. At the End of Lang-Down.

Mr. J. J. Now were there any other persons up, or following him?

Orrell. A great many were close to him then; but he addressed rather than they would follow him.

Mr. Darnall. Yes, Lord, I say, this Expression did speak a Murder, as in a Moment of Time, as in Drink, but the Substance at what he said was only, That it was for Sweden, and would turn the Cause. Orrell, one of the Horse-Guards, says, he saw him there again; so said;

and that he got in behind, and was between the Horses; so that he must be in among the Horses by Accident; if he had been among the Guards, doubtless he would have been at the Head of them, and not have gone in between them. So that he could not be then assisting them, but came there for Shelter, rather than to assist them. The third Seabright:

He says, he saw the Prisoner hallooing for Sweden, and a little time lost Sight of him, and he saw afterwards at the End of Lang-Down; and that Nobody was then with him. Richardson says, he knew him, and saw him talk to the Captain of the Guards; and it would have been proper to have produced the Captain, to give an Account what passed between them, to know whether he was encouraging the Mob, or defending the Guards. The Defence that passed between them, we think, would have been material: But we think it is an Evidence, in that it was a witness is repeated; for if it had been such a Discovery, the Captain would have ordered him to be secured: Therefore we think it looks as if the Captain did not take him to be concerned in the Murder. They do not pretend to show that he was at any of the Meeting-Houses; that he was influenced in pulling them down; that he had any Part of the Intention; that he had any Hangers or Bladders: But the first Account they give of him was about Half an Hour after Eleven; and then said, if not, all the Mischief was over. So that all they can say is, That he came in at the Letter End of the Cafe.

As to our Case, we will show that the Prisoner is in his Employment as a Bell-boy, at the Time that is mentioned, we have a good Account to give of him all the Day long: In the Morning about Nine, he had Drifted to across one, and sent for one Ann French, so leitch Marshall's Court went to visit the Man in Hunter-Garden: About Eleven the Plaintiff and Defendant met together at the Crown in Chancery-Lane, to call that Matter:

At Twelve he went from there to the Savoy, after that he went to one

Green's, a great Beer, in Brandy-Shop; and thence of his Employment, great numbers were seen at the Liberty in drinking; and there he found a whole

Company of men at the High-Street Tavern; and then returned to the Bras-

Shop again. About Nine he went to his own House, when he came thither, there was other Bell-boys required him to go about, for Mr.

Bread the Bell-boy had sent for him to the Tavern in Great Garden; and there he found half Eleven. He was to much in Drink, that as he was going home to Bed, he was met in the Street, and offered a Chair: But before he got into the Chair, the Mob were got together, and they being him so much in Drink, made sport with him; and he did express himself for Sweden, as every body was forced to see. After that he had said him that, they put him in a Chair, and carried him home. He was in such a Condition with Drink, that it was apprehended he would be so, if he was not taken care of; and he was carried to a Physician, who examined him, and he was found to be in such a Condition, as before Twelve o'clock: And he continued thus till all the next Day.

This will show that he was not in the original Intention, but he came accidentally at Eleven, or half an Hour after; and then the whole High- Street was over. And however he might behave himself through a

Excess of Drink, yet they must offer some Evidence that he was in the Intention or Execution of that Design; for the Affair made on the Guards is barely an Assault, and can't be High-Treason. If he did no more when he met the Guards, but drew his Sword to defend himself against the Mob, that were coming to near him, if he did retire, and only push at the Mob, that will be no Manner of Offence, if he did misbehave himself, by Reason of the Excess of Drink, and offer to push at a Mob, if he had killed him, it had been Murder; but it could not have been High-Treason.

When we have proved our Case, we will leave it to your Lordship and the Jury, and hope there will be no Evidence to contrail us.

Mr. J. J. I would ask where that Captain is?

Richardson. He is in the Country. He married a young Lady lately, and is gone into the Country.

Mr. J. J. When did you see him?

Richardson. Not the Fortnight.

Mr. Anger. Not the Fortnight, the Officer which the Prisoner stands charged with a great Offence, to help them High-Treason, in Excess Ward Ward her Majesty; the Prisoner, if guilty, will be the most I ever met; I there we hope the Gentlemen of the Jury will expect, plain, just, and swift Proof, and will not be misled by private Opinion, Prejudice, or Probability. My Lord, I beg Leave to conclude now for the Evidence given will assist the Prisoner, as to the Crime he is charged with. The Treason they have given Evidence of is an Intention to pull down Meeting-

Houses in general. It is not pretended that the Prisoner was concerned in that, or was at any of the Meeting-Houses, but only they would prove him guilty, by adding and assisting those Persons that were concerned in that. Now it will not be pretended, that all that were present when those Mob were, are guilty of this Crime: Many were there out of Curiosity, many by Accident, many passing along on their Occasions, which we say was the Case of the Prisoner. It cannot be imagined that such Persons that appeared there single were engaged in the Design. We say,

There was no Resistance made by him to the Guards; that he defended nobody, but what passed don't appear. If this Fall had happened at any other Place where he had planned to meet the Guards, and he had assisted them; that Fall in itself, confided, would not have amounted to High-Treason. As to the Place, that it was near where the Mob was gathered too, that will be accounted for, because it was in his Way home, and near the Place where he lived. They take Notice of several Expressions he made use of at that Time of offering to fight the Guards, and denouncing Scotchmen's enemies, and the like; we think there are such Expressions as might be expected from a drunken Man, a Man on the Commission he was in, and it don't appear to be an Aid and Abettment of that Fall, which tumultuous Persons were about. It don't appear that he was only to go, and the Matter was over before he came. We shall give an Account of his coming to the Place where the Guards were; that he was not among the People, but coming in his Way home. And if it appears not to be done in Aid of that traitorous Deed, and of those Persons that were concerned in it, it will not be Treason. For a Man to be singly furnishing his sword when he was in the Power of the Guards, it shows the Action of a Man not in his Sense, and that is a more probable Account of the Matter, than that he did it in Aid of those traitorous Persons. So that if that be only doubtful, and the Fall is not a levying War, if it be only doubtful, and is capable of being construed the one way or the other; yet in the Case of Life the Jury will, in favour of Life, incline rather to acquit than condemn. We will call our Witnesses, and hope to give you Satisfaction that he is not guilty of this Crime.

Tom Amos With our Jurors.

Mr. Darnell. Give an Account to my Lord, and the Jury, Whether you remember Mr. Purchase any where, the Fifth of March last? And when you last him felt?

Witness. He call'd on me, between Eight and Nine in the Morning, to go with him, to receive a Writ: I went with him, and we took the Prisoner.

L. C. J. I will not hinder you from taking your own Method, if you think it will be of any Use to them where he was all Day.

Mr. Darnell. It may be interr'd from that Evidence, that he was not concerned in the Deeds.

L. C. J. Then you would make use of it to show, that he was not in the Ditch all the Day, but to make his coming there accidental? I don't find that the Queen's Counsel say he was at any Consultation.

Mr. Darnell. Pray give an Account, when he fell came to you, and when you parted.

Witness. I came to me in St. John's-Lane, to go with him to execute a Writ; and it was between Eleven and Twelve when they paid the Money, and then he went away with the Plaintiff.

Mr. At. Gen. Are you acquainted with the Prisoner?

Witness. Yes, very well.

At. At Gen. What Profession is he of?

Witness. He is an Officer in the High Bailiff of Westminster.

Mr. At. Gen. Who is he an Officer to?—Witness. To Mr. Higgins.

Thomas Cornelius Johnstone with Jurors.

Mr. Darnell. What Time of Day did you see Purchase upon the Fifth of March last?—Witness. I was with him between Eleven and Twelve, at the Green in Chancery-Lane.

Mr. Darnell. How long did you stay?—Witness. From thence we went upon the Strand, and I parted with him at the Step.

Mr. Darnell. What Time of Day?

Witness. About half an Hour after Eleven.

Mr. Darnell. Who was he going to at the Step?

Witness. I don't know to whom.

Thomas Benjamin Holden with Jurors.

Mr. Darnell. Pray give an Account when Time you was with the Prisoner on the Fifth of March last.

Witness. Mr. Purchase was going towards Whitehall, so we went all three together; and Mr. Purchase called on one that owed him some Money, but he was not at home; but, I will find him out; but he did not meet the Man, so we went to drink a Pint of Wine, and we agreed to dine together, at Two o'Clock, in Chancery-Lane, which we did; and after Dinner, says I to Purchase, Here is a full Nostril and Root, no Business it is to be done, let us sit, and smoke a Pipe; for we lost 'till Four o'Clock. Says I, Where are you going? I am going home, says he; but instead of that, he went to Goat's Brandy-Shop, at Long-Away; there he went and drank.

L. C. J. Did you go with him?

Witness. No, but he said he would go there.

L. C. J. How do you know what he drank?

Witness. Goat's Man told me so.

L. C. J. What time did you meet him again after you had parted with him on the Fifth of March last?—Witness. It was about Two.

L. C. J. And what time did you part with him to go there?

Witness. It was nigh Twelve o'Clock.

Mr. At. Gen. About Four, you say, you asked him to smoke a Pipe; When did you say to him?

Witness. Says I, There is a great Noise about, there is no doing Business.

Mr. At. Gen. What did you mean by that great Noise?—Witness. I meant about Dr. Lawson's, there was a great Noise about the Temple.

Mr. At. Gen. Was the Mob up then?—Witness. No.

Mr. At. Gen. But he would not stay with you?

Witness. No, he said he would go home.

Thomas John Lane with Jurors.

Mr. Darnell. Do you live at Goat's?—Witness. Yes.

Mr. Darnell. What time of Day did Purchase come to your House?

Witness. A little before Four o'Clock; and he drank with my Master 'till past Five. My Master gave him a Bottle to send a Gentleman, and then they went to the Haystack's Tavern, and had three till Eight; then he came back again, and drank with us, and was very drunk.

L. C. J. Where he went to the Tavern, how long did he stay there?

Witness. Two Hours.

L. C. J. How do you know?

Witness. I am sure of it; the Land of the House will witness it.

Mr. Darnell. How long did he stay at your House?

Witness. He said there, and about the Door, till half an Hour after Eight.

Mr. Darnell. Where did he go then?

Witness. He went towards, I suppose.

L. C. J. What did he do about the Door?

Witness. He went to the Door, and drank there with some Men.

L. C. J. Who were they?

Witness. One Allen, and George, two Officers.

Thomas Dupper with Jurors.

Mr. Darnell. Do you remember that the Prisoner came to your House the Fifth of March last, with Mr. Goat?—Witness. Yes.

Mr. Darnell. How long did he stay?

Witness. I believe he was there about two Hours.

Mr. Darnell. What time did they come in?

Witness. In my Opinion, it was about Five or Six o'Clock.

Mr. Darnell. How long did they stay?—Witness. They went away a little before Eight, to the left of my Knowledge.

Mr. Darnell. Were they three all that while?

Witness. Yes, they were, upon my Oath.

Mr. Darnell. Did the Prisoner and Goat go away together?

Witness. Upon my Oath, they did.

L. C. J. What time did the Mob begin that Night?

Witness. I did not mind.

Thomas Sarah Ross with Jurors.

Mr. Darnell. Did you see the Prisoner at Mr. Goat's?

Witness. I was at Mr. Goat's, when Mr. Forbes and he came back from the Tavern; I saw him in Drink, and I did not go home. I was half an Hour in the Shop, when he was there, he was very much in Drink, and at last he went home along with me. When he came home, he sent for two Pots of Ale, and was at home half an Hour, and then came a Porter from a Tavern in Goat's Green, to tell him know somebody wanted him there, and he took Coach to go there.

Mr. Darnell. What Time was that?

Witness. It was about half an Hour after Nine.

Mr. Darnell. You say he went in a Coach, Was he in Drink then?

Witness. Yes.

Mr. Darnell. Did any body go with him?—Witness. Yes, Mr. Lovely.

Mr. Darnell. Why did he go with him?

Witness. His Wife desired Mr. Lovely to go along with him, because he was so much in Drink, and to bring him home again.

Thomas Thomas Lovelady with Jurors.

Mr. Darnell. Give us an Account when you saw the Prisoner that Night.

Witness. I went home with him about Nine o'Clock, and he sent for two Pots of Drink, and I sent we were drinking them. Mr. Broad sent for him to a Tavern in Goat's Green. His Wife, at first, would not have had him go, but I said, it may be Mr. Broad had Business with him; so he desired me to call a Coach, and to go with him, and so he left Mr. Broad was there; so I went with him to the Tavern, and left him there, and came home.

Thomas Jacob Broad with Jurors.

Mr. Darnell. Did you find for the Prisoner that Night that the Mob was?

Witness. I have known him some Years: I happened to have occasion to have some Goods appraised, which I had taken in Execution: I sent for Mr. Arnold and Mr. Hellway to appraise them; and when they had appraised them, I desired them to go to some House, and give me an Inventory; then we agreed to go to the Griff-King Tavern; this was about half an Hour after Seven. I left them there, making up their Inventory, and went to a Coffee House hard by: There I heard of a Gentleman, that was to be in the Tavern, when I had a Warrant against for two Hundred Pounds: I had Nobody with me; I went to the Tavern, and then it was half an Hour after Eight, says I, I have Nobody with me; I will send for Purchase: He came to me in a Coach, much in Drink; says I, What do you come to me for, I said? You are not fit to go about Business: I will not go with you, says he, unless you will give me a Coach, and a Pint of Wine. I said, it was needless, I had rather give him a Bottle another Time; but I did give him a Pint, and he said 'till between Nine and Ten, Mr. Arnold had occasion to go away, and he left the rest of us. He was much in Drink, and I could not get him out of the Room. When he is sober, he is a very civil Fellow, but when he is drunk, he is quite mad. About Ten, I took my Leave of Hellway, and went over Lovely's Garden with him; he hang upon me, and was very troublesome. I had him say a Coach; says he, it is a madding Night, I will see you home: Says I, You shall not see me home: Says he, I will call a Chair for you, for you are drunk; though I was as sober as I am now. He call'd a Chair, and to humour him, I went into it; Now, says I to him, pay do you go home: Now by that time, I believe it was within a Quarter of Eleven, or thereabout. After I left him, I had not been at home above an Hour, but I had News brought me that he was beaten, and fled very ill, and carried home very bad; and thus is all I know of the Matter.

Mr. At. Gen. Where did you part with him?

Witness. I was in Bridge-Street.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you see when he was sent?

Witness. I did not see for which Way he was sent, but it was about Eleven o'Clock, and he told me, he would go directly home.

L. C. J. Was the Mob up in Goat's-Lane, when he came to you?

Witness. When we were in the Tavern, the Master of the House came and told us, that Mr. Burgess's Meeting-House was pulled down, and burning; and that they had begun to pull down another. This was about Ten o'Clock.

L. C. J. Where was his House?

Witness. In Drury-Lane, a little way from Long-Away.

L. C. J. Then after you parted with him, he must go through the Mob. Now you, who were as sober as ever you were in your Life, and sensible how bad he was, must have taken so much Care to go to a Coach, which way he was to go home: How comes it to pass, you did not see him home?

3

Broad

Broad. My Lord, I would have sent him home, but I am not a Man that engage myself in Mob, for those of my Employment generally suffer in Mob; I avoid them if I can; and if I must them, I give them all the good Language I can.

L. C. J. But there is another way you might have secured him from the Mob, for I suppose he was well disposed to have staid longer at the Tavern.

Broad. Yes; but I did guess, that at Eleven o'Clock these Mob were generally out; and before we came out of the House, we heard the Guards were abroad, and I guess'd he might go home safely the Way he was to go.

L. C. J. You have given another Reason why you should take care of him, because he was troublesome in Drank, and was a Baitiff, and liable to be affronted; therefore you should have taken care of him.

Broad. I believe it had been another Night, I might; but if I had gone with him, then I might have been in the same Condition with him; I don't know but I might have been forced to say something or other, so have myself from the Mob.

Paraph. My Lord, the Meeting-House is as near my House as it is from hence to your Lordship; at a back Window I can hear them preaching.

Then Mr. Bemburgh was sworn.

Mr. Darnell. Pray give an Account of what you saw and observed of the Prisoner, that Night that the Mob was up.

Mr. Bemburgh. My Lord, I was at an Old-Shop, at Long-Acre End, with several others, about Eleven o'Clock, when the Guards came and dispersed the Mob that were there. When they had been there a Quarter of an Hour, or thereabout, the Prisoner came to the End of Long-Acre, and stood there by himself, and Nobody near him. Our ride up to him, and talk'd to him for some time; they had not talk'd long, before two more rode up, and fell upon him, and drove him a few Doors; he retired, and there they left him.

L. C. J. Who were the others that were with you in the House?

Mr. Bemb. There was one Jeffrey, who lives in Blenheim-Square, and a Watchman in Gray's Inn Passage, and one Mr. Cherry: There was another Gentleman of the Temple, but I don't know his Name.

L. C. J. What was your Business there?

Mr. Bemb. I was going home, and the Mob was there, and I got in for Shelter.

L. C. J. Who did you see at the Fire, besides the Prisoner?

Mr. Bemb. There was Nobody there, then.

L. C. J. When did you see the Prisoner first?

Mr. Bemb. It was about Eleven.

L. C. J. Were the Guards there then?

Mr. Bemb. Yes; and they had dispersed the Mob.

L. C. J. What do you mean by the Mob being dispersed? Was the Street clear? Or were they at the Sides of the Street?

Mr. Bemb. Some of the Guards rode one way, and some another; and they drove the Mob before them.

L. C. J. Were there none of the Mob in the Street?

Mr. Bemb. I saw none nearer than where the Guards had drove them on.

L. C. J. You say you saw the Prisoner there; What was he doing?

Mr. Bemb. Nothing at all.

L. C. J. Had he his Sword drawn?—Mr. Bemb. No.

L. C. J. When the Gentlemen came up single to him, and they talk'd to him, had he his Sword drawn?—Mr. Bemb. No.

L. C. J. How long after that, before the other Gentlemen came up?

Mr. Bemb. Instantly.

L. C. J. When they came to him, what said?

Mr. Bemb. They struck at him.

L. C. J. What did he do?

Mr. Bemb. I saw him do nothing, but retire back towards Long-Acre.

Mr. Major. Was any Resistance made by him to the Guards?

Mr. Bemb. No.

Then Henry Avery was sworn.

Mr. Darnell. Pray give an Account what you know of the Prisoner, the First of March last; where you saw him, and in what Condition he was.

Mr. Avery. I had been appraising some Goods for Mr Broad, and after we had done, he call'd on. Where we would go to make up the Inventory? Says I, To the Coffee-House in Green-Garden. When we had made our Inventory, Mr Broad came in, and said, He wanted Paraph. He sent for him, and he came very drunk: Soon after, I was call'd out, and left them. All I know of him is, that he was very drunk. He came to a Coach.

Then John Hollaway was sworn.

Mr. Darnell. Were you at the Tavern, when Paraph came in?

Mr. Hollaway. I was one of the Appraisers; we went afterwards to the Coffee-House, to make our Inventory.

Mr. Darn. What Condition was he in?

Mr. Hollaway. Very drunk.

Mr. Darn. How long did he stay?

Mr. Hollaway. He took part of a Quart of Wine.

Mr. Darn. What time was it?

Mr. Hollaway. It was after Nine, when he came in; and I believe it was after Ten, when he went: We came all away together.

L. C. J. Where did you go?—Mr. Hollaway. Home.

L. C. J. Where do you live?—Mr. Hollaway. I live in St. Ann's.

L. C. J. Where does Broad live?—Mr. Hollaway. He lives in St. Clement's.

Then James Blinfield was sworn.

Mr. Darnell. Did you see Paraph that Night? And at what Time?

Mr. Blinfield. About a Quarter after Eleven, I saw him come up Drury-Lane, towards the Fire, when the Guards were drawn up, and the Mob were gone.

Mr. Darn. Were the Mob gone, when he came to the Fire?

Mr. Blinfield. Yes; except some old Women and Children, that were not concern'd.

Mr. Darn. Who was with him?

Mr. Blinfield. There was Nobody with him; but he came to the End of Long-Acre, and had not time to stand there long, till our party came to him, and then he seem'd to lift up his Hand, to keep off the Mob; and presently, another struck at him, but he retired towards Long-Acre, and I could see no more of him.

Mr. Darn. Was he holding up his Hand, in your Opinion, any thing more than to defend himself from the Mob?

Mr. Blinfield. I believe he had no Design, but to defend himself from the Mob, and the Blow.

Mr. At. Gen. You say there was no Mob when you were there?

Mr. Blinfield. No.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you see his Sword drawn?

Mr. Blinfield. No: He lifted up his Hand, with his Sword in his Hand, but it was not drawn.

Mr. Th. Jus. What Time was this?

Mr. Blinfield. Between Eleven and Twelve o'Clock.

Mr. Th. Jus. How much after Eleven?

Mr. Blinfield. I believe, about a Quarter, or half an Hour.

Mr. Th. Jus. You say, the Guards were there, but no Mob.

Mr. Blinfield. Yes, a few Women.

Mr. Th. Jus. What did the Guards do, if there was no Mob there?

Mr. Blinfield. They rode about to disperse the Women, and other People that were there.

Mr. Th. Jus. You say, they dispers'd the Women, and the other People there. Who, other People do you mean?

Mr. Blinfield. People that I suppose were staring on: The chief Mob were gone.

Mr. Th. Jus. When you saw Paraph there, there were some other People besides the Women? Was he not among those other People, as you call them?

Mr. Blinfield. He came up by himself, and Nobody with him.

Mr. Th. Jus. Did he stand in the Street alone? Or did he join those other People?

Mr. Blinfield. There were no others to join with him.

Mr. Th. Jus. I have plain contradictoriness here.

Then Thomas Street was sworn.

Mr. Major. Did you see the Prisoner this Night the Mob was up?

T. Street. I am the Watchman that belongs to that Part: I had gone my Round at Eleven, and coming into Long-Acre, I saw two or three Gentlemen riding after the Prisoner; I stop'd over the way, to see what the Matter was, and I saw one coming at him; and he went to face the Blow, but his Sword was not drawn, but he fell against a Bulk of a Horse, at the End of Red-Lane-Court; so says one of the Gentlemen to me, Watchman, go and knock him down; so I ran after him, and overtook him: Who are you? Says I, says he, Street, it is I, I am drunk, the Guards have abused me, and cut at me: And so I saw him drunk, I let him go.

Mr. Major. What Condition was he in?

T. Street. Very drunk, that he could neither stand nor go.

Mr. Darn. Then you did not see any Reason to knock him down?

T. Street. No.

Mr. Darn. And being a Housekeeper, you let him go.

Mr. Major. Was he heading the Mob?

T. Street. No; I saw a great many of the Mob bring a great deal of the Wood to the Fire, has almost all the Mob was gone before he appear'd.

Mr. At. Gen. You say he was so drunk, he could neither stand nor go; and yet you say he went into Red-Lane-Court; How far is that from Long-Acre?

T. Street. A little way. He was very drunk.

Mr. At. Gen. I find he was not so drunk, but he knew you.

T. Street. Yes; but he could say very much.

Mr. Major. What became of him afterwards?

T. Street. I don't know indeed.

L. C. J. Does he live within your Walk?—T. Street. Yes.

L. C. J. Why did you not see him home?

T. Street. I was a little short in that.

L. C. J. When you fell back Notice of the Mob, what did you do?

T. Street. I got up, and went my Round, at Eleven o'Clock.

L. C. J. Your ordinary Round, as you used to do; but took no Notice of the Mob, did you?—T. Street. No.

L. C. J. Did you not go among them, so persuade them to go home, or complain to the Constable?

T. Street. There were Constables there present.

L. C. J. Did you see any among the Mob you knew?

T. Street. No, not one.

Mr. At. Gen. You knew Paraph, did you not?—T. Street. Yes.

Mr. At. Gen. And is he the only Man you know there?

T. Street. Yes, to my Knowledge.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you take up any body that Night?

T. Street. I assisted our Constable, who took up several.

L. C. J. What did you do with them?

T. Street. We carried Seven to the Watch-House.

L. C. J. What Time was that?

T. Street. About Two or Three o'Clock in the Morning.

Then John Cheekly was sworn.

Mr. Major. Did you see the Prisoner that Night the Mob was in Drury-Lane? And in what Condition was he?

J. Cheekly. My Lord, I had been at the Horse Tavern, and going up Drury Lane, near the Coffee-House, I met a great many of the Mob: They had just been pulling down a Meeting-House near Long-Acre, and presently I saw the Guards coming down very fast. When the Mob were dispers'd, I saw the Prisoner coming, with his Sword on his Arm; presently, an Officer rode up to him, and the Prisoner fell up his Sword on the Scabbard so keep off the Mob, and Elbow from him. The Gentleman rode up to him again, and then the Prisoner did the same again. With that another rode up to him, and then he went off towards Long-Acre.

Mr. Th. Jus. What was he doing, that made the Captain ride up to him?

J. Cheekly.

J. Clerkly. He was standing in a rising Place, very drunk: When they drove him to the Bull, it was as much as he could do to keep himself up.

Mr. Trench. But the Question is, What he did that made him ride up to him?—J. Clerkly. He did nothing at all.

Mr. Trench. Did you not see him running, or bounding with his Sword? J. Clerkly. No.

Tarynen. What o'Clock was it then? J. Clerkly. A few Minutes before I came there, I said the Watchman, What o'Clock it was? And he told me, it was half an Hour past Eleven.

L. C. J. Where do you live?—J. Clerkly. In Suffolk-Street.

L. C. J. What are you? J. Clerkly. I belong to the Sea; I have been in the Queen's Service.

L. C. J. What Ship do you belong to? J. Clerkly. I was paid off last October, and am now waiting for Preference.

I have been a Volunteer, with the Queen's Letter, seven Years, and a Midship-man.

Then Plaxton was sworn.

Mr. Darvall. What do you know of the Prisoner at the Bar, that Night the Mob was? Was you sent for to him?

Plaxton. I was sent for out of my Bed, between Twelve and One, to let him bleed; he was not very well: He had been abroad, and came home in Drink; and his Wife happened he had had some Flux, and sent to me to bleed him, for fear of any Mischance.

Then John Brooks was sworn.

Mr. Darvall. What do you know of the Prisoner that Night?

J. Brady. My Lord, I know nothing of this Business, but I never knew any thing, but that he believed himself very well, while I knew him.

Mr. Darvall. My Lord, we have a great many Witnesses to his Reputation, but we will not trouble your Lordship with them. We have done with our Evidence.

Tarynen. My Lord, we desire to ask a Question or two of Raffell and Richardson.

Then Richard Raffell was called again.

Tarynen. You was speaking of the Prisoner's coming down with his Sword flourishing. What Time was that?

Raffell. It was soon after we came to Derry-Lane.

Tarynen. How soon was it after you came?

Raffell. It was immediately. We had rode but once round the Fire, and he came as if he came from Habern-walls.

Tarynen. Was the Mob all gone away at that time?

Raffell. No.

Tarynen. How long was it before they were dispersed?

Raffell. It was about a Quarter of an Hour.

Tarynen. Can you judge what Time it was?

Raffell. It must be about Eleven, as near as I can guess.

Mr. At. Gen. Are you sure he had his Sword drawn?

Raffell. Yes, he should've it, and made several Pusses at us.

L. C. J. When he came in this manner, were you marching? Or did you stand with your Horses drawn up to the Wall?

Raffell. We were standing with our Horses drawn back to the Wall.

Mr. At. Gen. Which way did he come from?

Raffell. He came the way from St. Giles's.

Mr. At. Gen. Then he came from Habern-walls. That clears it. The other time, when he came up the Lane, was after they were dispersed.

L. C. J. Were you between him and Habern-walls, or between him and the Strand?

Raffell. He came from St. Giles's, and we were between him and the Strand.

Mr. Trench. How long did you for him first, before the Mob were dispersed?

Raffell. About a Quarter of an Hour.

L. C. J. You say you march'd round the Fire, and as you went of one Side of the Fire, they went of the other.

Raffell. Yes, my Lord. And afterwards we were drawn up of one Side of the Fire, and the Guards of the other.

L. C. J. When they were quite dispersed, where did you march then?

Raffell. To St. Giles's, and so to Habern-walls.

Then George Richardson was called again.

L. C. J. What Time was it that he thrust at the Officer?

Richardson. It might be about Eleven o'Clock, but I can't tell positively.

L. C. J. How soon was it after you came to the Fire?

Richardson. It was presently after I came up.

Mr. At. Gen. What Time did you come from Whitehall?

Richardson. Something past Ten, and we could not march fast, because we had the Foot before us.

L. C. J. Did you for him as soon as you came?

Richardson. No, there was a great Crowd of People; I rode among them, and as I came back, I saw him of the other Side: Captain Henderson spoke something to him, but what I know not; and then he made a Pass at the Captain, and I broke down his Point.

Parish. I desire to know which Hand I had my Sword in?

Richardson. I can't tell that.

Mr. At. Gen. Are you sure you saw his Sword drawn, and the Thrust made at the Captain?

Richardson. Yes, I am.

Then Southward was called again.

L. C. J. Can you tell about what Time it was that he was flourishing his Sword?

Southward. It was half an Hour after Ten, when we came from Whitehall; and, by the best Calculation I can make, it was about half an Hour after Eleven, when I saw him flourishing his Sword. I ask'd him, Are you encouraging the Mob? He answered me, Are you against Southward? And then I lifted up my Hand at him.

L. C. J. Where was he then?

Southward. This was above the Fire, and I saw him afterwards below the Fire. As I went to Captain Harley for Orders, I cast my Eye to the Corner of Long-Acre, and there I saw him again, in the Lane Portico.

L. C. J. Are you sure he had his Sword drawn in both Places?

Southward. I am sure of it.

L. C. J. How long might it be between the two Times you met him?

Southward. A very little Time.

Parish. Which hand was his Sword in?

Southward. In your Left Hand.

Mr. Trench. Was it immediately upon your coming into Derry-Lane, that you spoke to him?

Southward. Not immediately upon our coming there.

Mr. Trench. How long did you stay at that Fire, before you dispersed the Mob?

Southward. It might be more than a Quarter of an Hour.

Mr. Darvall. We have done with our Evidence on both Sides. I beg Leave to make a few Observations upon the Evidence in Behalf of the Prisoner.

We think, my Lord, though he is a Bailiff, (for there seems to be some Reflection cast upon him for that Reason) yet we doubt not, but he will have the same Justice done him here, as if he were a Man of the best Estate: For whatever is determined as to this Man, may be the Case of any other who may happen into the like Circumstances.

Therefore I beg leave to observe, how far any thing is proved against him, that may make him guilty of High-Treason. We think we have given a full Answer to all the Prosecution, that he was engaged in the original Intention of pulling down the Meeting-Houses, or that he was aiding in the Execution of that original Intention. We think the Evidence on both Sides agree in this, That the Prisoner was not concerned in the original Intention; and that he was not with the Mob that pulled Dr. Southward to Whitehall, and brought him back in Triumph, and then were to pull down the Meeting-Houses: But the only Thing that is proved against him is, that after they were pull'd down, and after they were burnt, when the Guards were come, and they were dispersing the Mob, then the Prisoner is so unfortunate to be found with his Sword drawn, hallooing, and attempting the Right of Dr. Southward, and that he would stand by him, and encouraging the People to do so.

This is the most of the Evidence that can be against him: Then the Question is, Whether this, singly, can make him guilty of High-Treason? For if in Part in the general Intention be out of the Case, as it must be if he came after the Fact was committed, then the Question will be, Whether a Man that comes in afterwards, by saying the worst he can say, shall make himself guilty of High-Treason?

My Lord, we hope the Evidence on Behalf of the Queen is irreconcilable with the Evidence for the Prisoner; and that the Evidence for the Prisoner shall be believed, that he only defended himself against the Guards that rode up against him: For Richardson says, he did not see him when the Guards first came there, and that agree with the Account that Yves gave, for he says he heard the Guard were marching before they came out of the Tavern. Blackfield agrees with the Evidence that Yves gave: Says he, The Mob were dispersed under the Eaves of the Houses. Says Blackfield, At the Time the Guards broke him, there were People under the Houses: But I don't look upon them to be the chief Mob, but only some Women and People looking on. And then the Question is not, Whether his sword was drawn or not, but on what Occasion, and what his Design was in drawing it? Our Witnesses say, that when the Guards break at him, he only held up his Hand to defend himself, and that might fright the Horse, and he being angry at it, spurred up and broke him.

It is natural to think the Guards should not up to those that were standing in the Street, and enquire who they were. I don't depend on the Circumstance of his being in Drink, that it is any Excuse, for then if a Man has such a Design as this, he may easily pretend himself to be in Drink, and he will give himself Credit enough to encourage himself to do so before an Act: But the use we make of it is to show, that he had not any Intention on this. He had drank himself too far to have a Design of joining with any Party, or to do any particular Thing. And my Lord Cole, in his Plea of the Crown, where he is giving his Opinion what is saying War against the Queen, says, that the Act alone is not sufficient to convict the Party; but the Mind is to concur in it. It is not barely doing an Act that is sufficient to convict a Man; for he must do it with that Design. Indeed if a drunken Man does another, it is blunder because Mulder is happened where such a Fact is done. But in Case of High-Treason there must be an Intention proved in the Party that doth the Fact. If he was in that Condition at the Time he came out of the Tavern, and did any thing by way of encouraging them, we hope it is not such an Evidence against him as will make him guilty of any Part of the Intention, if his Mind did not concur in it.

Mr. Just. Fry. My Lord Cole says, in the Case of Olden, where he was forced, and did the Fact pro nomine, that such an Act could not make him guilty.

Mr. Major. My Lord, we hope the Evidence is not sufficient to induce the Jury to believe he was concerned in the general Intention to pull down the Meeting-Houses; there is no Proof offered that he had any Intention or Part in that Intention; nor does it appear that he was pro nomine. We have shown where he was till the Time he was met by the Guards. As for what was done by him then, it will not be pretended, that barely assisting the Guards in levelling War; but it must be confined to be an aiding and assisting those Persons at that Intention to pull down the Meeting-Houses. As for that, it doesn't appear he had any Part in it, but it was done before he came to them. Nay, he could not be assisting to the Mob; for before he came to them, the Guards were come down, and the Mob were soon after dispersed. The first Time that any Account is given of him is, when he came behind the Grenadiers. Now can it be supposed that any Man that stands to head the Mob would come among the Houses, and that singly? Whatever he did, his Curling and swearing that will not make him criminal in this Case. It appears to be a thing that was accidental and done on a sudden, and was the Effect of his Drink, and that which a Man that had no Intention of joining in the general Design might be guilty of.

Mr. Mr. Geo. May it pleases your Lordship, and Gentlemen of the Jury, we think that, notwithstanding any Thing that has been said by the Witnesses, or implied on by the Counsel, in a plain Case that the Prisoner is guilty of the Crime laid to his Charge. They have called a great Number of Witnesses; and I believe their Intention in that is, that you should take them by Tale, and not by weighing the Evidence and the Force of it, for I will be bold to say, as to all the Witnesses that have been produced to prove him drunk, nothing which they have said as to that Point can make any Alteration in the Case. As to the Witnesses produced for the Queen, I don't find they pretend to say any Thing in Disposition of the Credit of them; nor can they say that any one of them is likely to be misled, or to be under a Mistake; only one of them that took him to be a Country Gentleman, when he proved to be a Bailiff. As Mr. Daniel says, God forbid that any one should have better Knowledge than he is a Bailiff, but that he should have the same Justice as any other Man; but I think for, in an easy Mistake to take him for a Gentleman, when it appears by the Evidence, that one Bailiff can go to the Tavern in his Coach, and the other go from thence in his Chair. The Counsel for the Prisoner have insisted, that our Evidence don't maintain the Charge; for they say this Rising is not High-Treason, if there were not a general Intent to pull down Meeting-Houses. And we don't bring it home, to make it appear that he was privy or consenting to this Design; but we desire they will consider, the full Witnes give an Account that a Resolution was taken on Tuesday to pull down Bury's Meeting: By whom was that taken? It was by the Friends of Saunders that came hallooing with him. Who is it afterwards that pulled them down? That is the halloo and cry out for High-Church and Saunders. What did the Prisoner say when he was among them? Does then, he was for High-Church and Saunders, he would lose his Life in the Cause. It is certain their Meeting-Houses were pulled down, and that by their People thus assembled, and who cried out for Saunders, and were the Friends of Saunders, and declared they would oppose all that were Enemies to him, and this Man cried out as loud as any of them. But we don't take it that it is necessary to prove, that every Man that was concerned in this Matter was originally in the Consult and first Design; but the Evidence gives an Account, that he joined with them, he assisted them. If drawing his Sword; if flourishing it, and telling out to them to resist the Guards, and pulling at the Office of the Guards, is resisting, that is sufficient Proof against him. If a rebellious Number of his People are got together, and a Man, that knows not of it at all, will join with them, and act with them, and that which they are doing is Treason, as though he came in late of the Day, he must deserve the same Reward as those that came in early in the Day.

There is one Thing observable in this Case, that this Meeting-House was not so soon destroyed as Dr. Bury's; for the Fire was almost out there, when the Waterman, who is convicted, hallooed them to this Meeting; it was then burnt full, and then they came to this Fire, and that was much later. It appears he lives in the Neighbourhood of this Meeting-House; for he says he can hear them lose his House: Now a Man that had been in the Neighbourhood of such a Place, and had been a good Subject, if there had been a tumultuous Design to pull down Part of his Neighbourhood, instead of joining with those People, he would have endeavoured to have hindered them from doing Mischief, but instead of endeavouring to prevent it, you find he joins with them, he draws and flourishes his sword, and acts in it more than any other Person I have had an Account of. The other Witnesses are to give an Account where he was till Five in the Afternoon, and thence till Eight at Night; and afterwards he is sent for by Mr. Broad, and with him he stays till this Matter is transacted. The Place he has been at before, are the Ale-House, the Brandy-Shop, and the Tavern: Are not these the proper Places to prepare those that are to engage in their Sort of Things? For whenever People go to these Antennas, it is necessary to furnish them, either by strong Waters, and strong Liquors, as he does. The Witnesses that saw him there, and give an Account of his, found of them say, he only held up his Hand; others say, he had a Sword in his Hand, but it was not drawn, and he held it up only to save himself from the Assault of the Guards. Now the Account you have is, that the Guards struck with the Flats of their Swords, and you hear of Nobody killed, nor any great Harm done to any body; therefore it is not to be thought they should, without Provocation, fall upon this Man, and attack him. As to the Evidence of Time, there is little Weight to be laid on it, for the whole Transaction don't take up above the Compass of two Hours. The Guards come out about half an hour after Ten, and before Twelve the halloo is dispersed. But that which will take into Consideration will be the Series of the Facts, and see how they stand. Over says, he saw the Prisoner with his Sword drawn, and flourishing it, and when the Guards came, he assaulted them in the Manner you have heard of; and they have said nothing to impeach our Evidence; what they say makes it appear he was there, and thus acting among them.

Mr. Ser. Geo. May Lord, the Evidence given by the Prisoner, and the Defence made on his Behalf, is so far from giving any Answer to our Evidence, that it renders the Fact more probable than it was before: For they have proved, that he is a Man likely to be concerned in such an Affair; that he had been drinking all Day, and fit to engage in such a Matter; and that he is troublesome in his Drink; which are Circumstances that drive the Inclination of the Man, and make it probable that he should engage in this Matter. The Facts we take to be High-Treason.

They say on the other Side, it is not so, because we must prove a general Intent to pull down all Meeting-Houses, and the pulling down a single one is not sufficient. I will not now dispute that point with them; for that there was such an Intention appears most plainly by what passed that Night, by the several Meeting-Houses that were pulled down. It was a general Intention, or else they could not have gone through so many in so short a Time: And it is not necessary to prove any previous Consult, for the Act itself is Treason. Where the Intention is the Treason, there the Act itself be proved that shows it. So it is in the Case of counterfeiting the Coin, Nobody will say there is any need to prove any Design: That there was such an Intention is plain, by what was concerted; and any one that joins with such a Number of People who are committing Treason, is equally guilty with them. If he knew nothing of it till he saw them, yet if he joins with them in an Action that is Treason, he will be equally guilty with them. They say he had his sword drawn; that he was going home; and he only lifted up his Hand, with his Sword in his Scabbard, as deposed himself. But that Evidence don't interfere with what is offered on Behalf of the Queen; or if it did, yet we think our Evidence is of greater Credit and Weight than what they offer: For they that encounter a Man who has his Sword drawn, can never be mistaken, but deserve more Credit than those that are only pulling by, and have no Danger from, or Concern with him; but this is all consistent, for Rogel, and those who say he was drawn, say, he came from St. Gilo's way, the others say, it was after the Mob was dispersed; and that he came up the Lane; and that he went off by Long-acre, and they fear him no more. Now, since Nobody for him home, he might go that Way, and afterwards come down and join the Mob, in the Manner the Soldiers have told you, and then he might be driven off, and come some way round again, with his Sword in his Scabbard: And these must certainly be different Times, for those who speak of his sword being drawn, say, it was when he came from Holborn; and they that say his Sword was in his Scabbard, say, it was when he came from the other way, and then there can be no Contradiction between the Evidence. And we take it, the Law is so plain as the Fact, and that is High-Treason.

Mr. Thynne My Lord, I would state the Objection in the utmost Latitude, and yet, with Submission, the Facts proved on the Prisoner make him guilty of High-Treason. They have insisted, that there was no previous Intention in this Man to pull down these Meeting-Houses; that at that Time he was in Drink, and not capable to have any Intention of doing any particular Act whatever, and that to the aiding and assisting Moss must be res; and that he came when the Meeting-House (the Materials of which made the Fire in Drury-Lane) was pulled down, and all was over, and to neither in the first Design, nor assisting at the Execution of it. They, my Lord, I take to be the Strength of their Objections. As to the previous Intention, that is not necessary to be proved, and has been so long decerned, that I need not trouble your Lordship to repeat any Thing about it. I shall only say, my Understanding of this Kind of case is general, though he comes by Accident, it must be him a Principal in this Matter. Then they would make use of his Drunkenness, to excuse him from his assisting in the Design; they say, if he had not his Sword, he could have no Intention even to aid or assist any Design. Those Gentlemen know very well, that Drunkenness is no Excuse for any Act whatever: If a man does deprive himself of his Senses, and commits a Fact that would be a Crime in a Man not in Drink, it shall be construed to be his Act, as much as if he had his Senses. Reverdy's Case, in the 4th Report, is express in that Point. Then they say, the Meeting-House was pulled down before, and he came when all was over. My Lord, I appeal to the Memory of your Lordship, and the Jury, whether they were not mistaken in that Fact, for the Fire was burning when he came, and the Mob about it, they were then burning the House of that Meeting-House which they had pulled down; and if they had not been dispersed, as all Probability would have gone on with their Design; and he was then when the Guards were endeavouring to disperse them, and prevent their going on to do further Mischief, and to assist them. They say, there was no Resolution made by the Mob, they were quiet; but this Man did resist, he pulled at the Horses, and at the Men, if you will give Credit to the Witnesses; and he did it as much as was in his Power to animate and encourage the Mob to resist. By his Encouragement, and his assistance, he endeavoured to hinder the dispersing of that Mob, who were executing a treasonable Design. That is the aiding and assisting of them, which is his Crime. Then they say, he was there accidentally, and fell in as he was going home quietly. I take that to be otherwise on the Evidence; for however he might be left by Mr. Broad, he was seen coming down St. Gilo's, whereas his Way home was the other Way. We must submit it, my Lord, whether his aiding and assisting in this Manner, does not make him guilty of Treason, as well as those who were executing the treasonable Design.

L. C. J. Gentlemen of the Jury, George Partridge stands indicted, for that he, with a great multitude of other Persons named, did, the first of March last, levy open War against her Majesty. The Evidence that has been given by the Queen's Counsel, tends to shew a Design to pull down the Meeting-Houses about this Town, and that Design executed on a great many of them: The Guards coming to disperse those that were employed, and the Prisoner resisting the Guards, joining with the Mob, and assisting them. To prove this, they produce Toby to give an Account of a Discourse, rather beginning thus finished, of a Design of pulling down Mr. Bury's Meeting-House; some were for pulling it down immediately, others were for deferring it till the Morrow, and others for letting it alone till the Trial was over: And as they were thus talking, he left them. He calls it a Reluctance of pulling them down, because Nobody did oppose it, only differed about the Time, but he did not tell them they were to pull down these Meeting-Houses. The next Witness is Gerald, who gives you a very particular History of this Action: He tells you, in Long-acre's Coffee-House he had heard that they were pulling down St. Gilo's Meeting-House; that he went into that Meeting-House to see to see how they were pulling it down, and thence they went to Drury-Lane; that they had almost finished the Work there, he found almost every thing there down, and they were carrying the Materials to Holborn, and burning them: Thence they went to Leicester-fen-Field, and there they found a Fire, where they were burning the Materials of Mr. Langley's Meeting-House. He tells you what Quizzes there were there, some of them called them to Drury-Lane, and a Consult that was, Whether they should go thither, or to West-Smith: That some that headed the Mob, swore they would have all the Meeting-Houses down, and called them along, and led them to Druy-Law; that when he came there, he found them breaking down the Door of that Meeting-House. He tells you what pass'd there; that he went afterwards, and met the Guards, conducted them to Druy-Law, and ran before them; that the Horse were commanded to disperse the Mob; that he saw one with a Sword, that was threatening himself under the Houses, and there he push'd at the Horse with his Sword. His Expression is, that he poked; he did not make a regular Push, but poked at them; that several of them struck at him, and drove him from among them; that afterwards he saw him stand at the End of Lang-Arr; that he went to him, and persuaded him to go home, but he did not think fit to go home; but when the Guards came up, he resisted them: Says the Witness to him, Do you consider what you do in opposing the Guards? You, in effect, oppose the Queen: What is his Answer? It was, Damsy you, Are you against Sunderland? Thereupon, he cries out, High-Church and Sunderland? He would fight the Guards, and he would lose his Life in the Cause, with such like Expressions, which he repeated several times, and shewn how volatile he was in the Matter. He tells you, that he secretly made a full Pail at one of the Officers, as he was partly push'd by him, pointing towards his Flank; and he apprehends he must have run him through, but that another Soldier threw down his Point; that then the Soldier struck at him, and the Witness apprehending it might produce more Blood, and that there might be firing, he thought fit to retire: That he went down the Street, and the Mob were forced by them that way, and he heard some of them declaring, We will be even with them To-morrow Night, for they dare not see upon us. He gives you an Account of the Place where he fell saw this Mob, which was over-against the Provost's, at the Corner of Queen's-Street, which is between Lang-Arr and St. Gild's.

The next Witness is Raghd, who is one of the Horse-Grenadiers, and one of the first Body that came into the Lane. He says, they were commanded to disperse the Mob, and to take Care to place themselves to against the Houses that Nobody should come behind them; and that they should hinder any body from passing before them. That Direction was prudent and necessary; for if they had stood so, that the Mob might have come behind them, they would soon have had them off their Horses. He tells you, that the Prisoner came down towards St. Gild's, as they were drawn up in this Manner, with the Horse Tail to the Wall. He tells you, this man did not think fit to pass before the Horse in the open Street, but had a Mind to get in behind the Horse, and did get past one of them, but the Witness's Horse being drawn back between two Balles, he could go no further, and the Witness beat him out: That afterwards he came at the Head of the Mob, and flourish'd his Sword, and swore, Damsy you, who are you for? Are you against Sunderland? He takes Notice, that as they dispersed the Mob of one Side, they gather'd on the other for a while; and it was about a Quarter of an Hour before they had quite dispersed them.

The next is Sunderland. He tells you, that he saw him several Times; that he drew up his Grenadier at the End of Queen's-Street, and he commanded them to draw back, so that none might come behind them; that he saw the Prisoner flourishing his Sword, and held out the Point to him, but did not make a Push; then, he says, he left him for a while, but afterwards, when the grenadier Part were dispersed, he saw him standing over-against Lang-Arr, with his Sword in his Hand, and told the Captain he had been troublesome to him before, and the Captain, thereupon, bid him cut him to Pieces, as his Expression was; that they rode up to him, but the Prisoner made his Escape into Lang-Arr.

The next is Richardson: He is a Trooper in the Third Troop of Guards: He tells you, that he remembers the Prisoner, when he rode in the First Troop; and that he knew him abroad, and here. He gives you an Account in what Manner they march'd; that at the Corner of the Street, Captain Haythorpe, (whom he believes the Prisoner must know, because he was in the Guards at the same Time) spoke to him, but what he said the Witness don't know; but as he pass'd by him, the Prisoner thrust at him, and the Witness apprehending he intended to kill the Captain, he beat down the Point of his Sword, and struck at him with his Sword, but the Prisoner hitting against the Point-house, his Blade broke in Pieces. This is the Substance of the Evidence for the Queen, and, if there be no Answer made to it, proves him to be afflicting this Mob, and opposing the Guards, and attempting to kill the Captain, and taking the best Advantage so to do, as he pass'd by him.

On the Prisoner's Side, they have produced several Witnesses, a great many in Number. They begin with him the Morning, and gave an Account, That in the Morning he came to Starr-Lane to execute a Writ, and about Twelve the Money was paid, and then they parted.

The next Witness is Jacobine, he says, they parted at half an Hour after Eleven; so that there two differ in their Accounts about half an Hour; for one says they parted at Twelve, and the other says, at half an Hour after Eleven: This I take Notice of only to shew an Uncertainty as to the Time.

Benjamin Holden is the next; he says he went with the last Witness, and the Prisoner, to the Army; and they parted at Twelve, and not again at Two. One says they make of this Evidence to have, that he was not in any Cabal that Day, for they knew how he employed his Time: But you will observe, there are two Hours, from Twelve till Two, which they give no Account of; though they pretend to shew where he was all the Day. This Witness says, they parted about Four or Five o'Clock, and then the Prisoner went to Green's Brandy-Shop: Low says, he drank at his Mother's House till past Five, and then they went to the Hero's Tavern, and came back to the Brandy-Shop about Eight, and continued drinking there about an Hour.

The next Witness is Dapper, who keeps the Tavern; he says, they came to his House about Five or Six o'Clock, and went before Nine; and finishes you, that during all that time they were in his House: Rock went home with him from Green's. I should take Notice, that all these say he was drunk. She says, she got him home, but then he was sent for by Mr. Brady: He was much in Drink, and they got a Coach, and another went with him to let him there. Low says, he was in Drink; and when it was proposed for him to go to Mr. Brady, there said, it was not fit for him to go, because he was in Drink; and this Witness went with him, to let him live there. Mr. Brady tell you the Occasion of being at the Tavern; some Goods were taken in Execution, and as they were making an Inventory, a Warrant was brought to him against a Gentleman, and he sent to the Prisoner for his Assistance, but he was so drunk he did not think him fit for himself, and bid him go home again; which he would not do, unless he would give him a Pint of Wine. When they came away, he told Mr. Brady it was a noisome Night, and he would let him home, and finished he was drunk, and would make him go into a Chair, and then the Prisoner went towards Druy-Law in order to go home.

The next is Rembridge, he first, he was at an Old-Shop, at Lang-Arr End, that about Eleven the Guards dispersed the Mob; that afterwards the Prisoner flock'd at the End of Lang-Arr, and an Officer rode up to him, that the Mob was then dispersed, and the Officer having spoke to him, some others struck at him, and forced him away; he saw no Sword at all that the Prisoner had. Army says, he was with Brady when the Prisoner came in, and says he was drunk. Halway, the Appraiser, says, the Prisoner was drunk, and that he went away with Mr. Brady and him; and tells you, it was after Ten when they parted. Then Stratton tells you, he saw him a quarter after Eleven come up the Lane towards the Fire; that he came all alone; that one of the Guards pass'd up to him, and some of them struck at him, but he did not strike at them, but seem'd to lift up his Hand to prevent the Horse from coming upon him. The Watchman tells you, it was a quarter after Eleven; that the Guards struck at him, but he got up the Court, and they sent the Watchman after him to knock him down, but he knowing him, did not think fit to do it. Choddy says, That at the Coffin Tavern he met the Mob, and some of the Guards rode up to the Prisoner, but the Mob was gone a quarter of an Hour before; and says, that the Prisoner had no Sword. Plumers only says, that he was sent for that Night to let him blood: And Brady gives Brady Account of his Behaviour.

The Matter will be now for you to compare these two Evidences together; and to consider, first, whether these things are true which are told by the Queen's Witnesses, or whether they are answered by the Witnesses for the Prisoner; and then what Stark is to be laid upon his being in Drink: And as there is no Objection made to the Witnesses of either Side, you are to take what they have said to be true, abating the little Mistake a Man may fall into as to the Exactness of Time, and the like. As to what they would pretend, of his going straight home from the Tavern, you will observe there is time enough for him to have done all that he is charged with, for it all happened in a quarter of an Hour, or a little more. If he parted from the Tavern about Ten; from that time till a quarter or half an Hour after Eleven is time enough to do all that has been spoken of. I think there is little Stark, so he laid upon the Time, because there is a Series of Facts: The first thing done by him, before the Mob was dispersed, was his coming behind the Horse, and you will find the Reason for that Command of the Officer to let some come behind him: But he, as drunk as he was, knew there was no hurting the Guards, unless they could get behind them. He had been in the Guards himself, and you must consider what Design he had in getting behind them, when the Street was open for him to go in. But if he had a Design to get behind them, that the Mob might pull them off from their Horses, he acted very rationally, though he was drunk. This Fact was proved by Orwell and Raghd. Another Fact was, when they were drawn up above the Fire near St. Gild's, he was then coming down from St. Gild's: So that this is plain; not the Time that the Witnesses speak of when he was coming up the Lane. Then this was only when the Horse-Grenadiers were there; and the other was when the Horse-Guards came, when they were drawn up below Lang-Arr; and there they threw he made a Push at Captain Haythorpe: And Raghd tells you, that as he sheltered himself under the Houses, his Sword struck against the Point-house, and broke to pieces. Sunderland speaks of another time when he was at the Corner of Lang-Arr, and then indeed he was doing nothing: And that is the time when he told the Captain that he had been troublesome to the Grenadiers; thereupon the Captain bid him go and cut him to pieces: He did go, and then the Prisoner made off: But this was when the Mob was in a great measure dispersed. Now when do his Witnesses speak of? They speak of a time when he came up the Lane. That finally is not the time that either of these Witnesses speak of: They say he fled quiet, and a Soldier rode up to him, and struck him. You will consider whether that was not the time that Sunderland speaks of. So that you will consider whether the Evidence of both Sides is not reconcilable; whether after he parted from Brady, he might not join the Mob, come down from towards St. Gild's, get behind the Horse, and afterwards make a Push at the Captain, and then be driven down with the Mob towards the lower End of the Street: If so, it was natural, when they were driven down the Lane, for them to go home; and as his home was up the Lane, he must come back alone. If you believe he was guilty of resisting the Guards in this manner, when he was afterwards what the Consequence was, what he, instead of making an Answer, only says, Are you an Enemy to Sunderland? and answers that the Mob to follow him; you are to consider how far this will make him guilty with the rest: For the Council for the Prisoner, though they object to the Evidence of what pass'd in the Temple, yet they agree this Tumult was a rebellious Tumult; and the Fact shews there was such a Design. Indeed they did not pull down all the Meeting-Houses; but the Reason was, because the Guards dispersed them. They admit therefore this was keeping War in the Parish concerned in it, but they would excuse him, that he came late and very drunk, and did nothing, but was beat by the Guards; and that his Drunkenness disabled him from having a Share in the Design; and therefore he can't be guilty. It is insisted, that it is necessary he should be engaged in the original Design. But there is no need of that; for that is the Last of Edgar's Cafe: It is there adjudged, that any good Service; by defraying him, Money is it necessary to those who Embrace we have to give to you, and tell you what Preparation (in comes out) that this fellow made; and it is very proper, because that person all through this day of the Poor once whereby to show a Dull at your Eye, to extenuate the Crime, that he had such like a Madman; he had a mind and volatile Idiot, and used all proper Means to effect it.

Gentlemen, though he should be a wicked Man, void of Reason, you will have little Reason to think he should be a Madman.

My Lord, that to give to him from Rome, every wicked Man may be said to be a Madman, but I hope that Bull was thrown all that is ill, and first and every other from Parliament.

My Lord, the Morning time supposed he went to the House of one See &c, and had a Quarter of a Pound of Powder, and a Pistol of black, and the Pistol directed them to No. 2, and gave him that Box which was a larger box than he used to have; and it seems he is a Marksmen, as you will hear; it was always his Business to aim at the Head.

He had the Powder and the Box; and that Morning he was at his own, who hearing him discharge his Gun, asked what he had been doing, what he had killed, as you will hear from one of the Witnesses. Says he, I only did it to discharge my Gun. Gentlemen, this is to show that the Pistol was fired in him, and he would meet with no Disappointment, but that he Purge it might take it.

You know, a Gun that hath been charged some Time, and had by, some Wet or Damp may happen to be so prevent its going off, or one is so hinder that he will discharge his Gun, and then loads again, that he might be secure of its going off.

And after he had this paid off himself, the next Thing was to be appointed which was my Lord was going, which Way the Dogs went: He was asked the Reason, Are you going a hunting? He tells out into a Rage, that my Lord Ogle was an Enemy to his Country; and if he could meet him, he would shoot him. Within a few Minutes afterwards this Noble Lord with his Company, as I have mentioned, came by. The Man being prepared, discharged his Gun, and executed his wicked Design. My Lord, this is the Nature of the Thing, and this coming to his Master's Ear, he could not but be concerned that those who appeared eminent and great in his Service should meet with such Treatment.

Therefore he immediately took Directions to see his own servants appointed in the City, to be at his Right hand; And if we make use to this to be a Thing, that is a No. 1 of blackness or Foulness of Words to settle you, we shall have a Thing to work up your Passions, or to speak to do Rage between the King and the Prisoner, which is all we want.

Mr. Sergeant Whistler. May I please your Lordship, and you, Gentlemen of the Jury, I am Counsel in this Case for the King; and though we have the Honour to serve the King, yet we desire nothing but according to the rules of Justice. If the Evidence finally say, that the Prisoner, this Man, is guilty, then we expect you find him so, if it is not sufficient, nothing said by in these witnesses, you do not know.

Therefore whether the Man is guilty, and a Piece of it is the Matter which is to be laid before you, we won't say my Manner of Persecution one Way or other, but plainly lay the Fact before you.

Gentlemen, this Man is indicted upon an Act of Parliament passed the last Session, and this Act of Parliament every body thinks a necessary Act, and is so, it is a just and good Act, and if it be just and good, it is fit it should be put in Execution when it is transgressed. Gentlemen, I shall take up little more of your Time than only to state one or two Facts, which we shall farther lay before you.

When the Wound was given to this Noble Lord, there was some Discourse with him about it, and among the rest one Gentleman, you will observe, who was in Company, and riding by my Lord Ogle, asked him, How came it to pass, he had not that time? Sir, says he, you are an ignorant Man. This we make use of to their two Purposes: The one to show that he had particular Malice against my Lord Ogle, upon what Occasion hath been opened by my Brother, and I shall not repeat it: The other, to show that this was done with great Deliberation, and done against this Noble Lord. Gentlemen, then farther, when it comes to be inquired of him afterwards, when he seemed to be cool, How came you to do that? and, it's said he should be guilty of such an Act, he says, How can I concern for me; I shall answer for it. Gentlemen, this Thing shows that he had no Manner of Remorse, not the least. One would have thought, in case of Pardon and Revenge, when People had wronged their Masters, they would come to repent, and be concerned, but instead of that, it appears, by his Discourse afterwards, he had not the least Concern or Remorse.

Then as to his Preparation for this Fact, it had all the Deliberation in it as could be: He goes to a Shop where he used to buy his Powder and Shot; but they happen not to provide him with so large a Shot as he expected; he at that Time asked for the largest Shot; the Master of the House was not within, but the Mistress was; says he, Go and fetch
 No. 2, which proved not to be so large as he would have had. No 2 is looked out for him, and he buys a Quarter of a Pound of Powder and a Pound of this Shot.

This Evidence we shall give, and add to what hath been opened already, and then we shall leave it to your Conferences and your Judgment; whether we have not sufficiently proved the Charge in the Indictment;
 and if we have, we shall appeal to your Judgment, and to your Con-sciences, what Verdict to bring in.

Mr. Sergeant Whistler. My Lord, we shall beg leave to call our Witnesses.
 Mr. Fletcher joins.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. Sir, will you tell my Lord and the Jury—Give an Account of what passed when this Fact was committed.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Did the Prisoner come up.
 King's Counsel. We desire he may.

Mr. Justice Tracy. (To the Prisoner.) As all the Witnesses come, if you have any Question to ask, put it to me, and I will ask your Question for you; I will give you all the Assistance that lies in my Power.

Mr. Fletcher. As we were coming back from Hunting with my Lord Ogle, we came into a narrow Lane, a sandy Lane near Gainsford, and

Lord Ogle was on my right Hand, I was even with him; I saw a Man coming, up towards us, this Man, the Prisoner, and I saw he had his Gun cocked, he was near.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. Did you say any Thing to him?

Mr. Fletcher. When he came to my Lord's Head, his Countenance changed pale; then I asked him, why he carried his Gun so that Manner? He made no Answer, but immediately turned short, and shot my Lord.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. In what Place was it? What is the Name of the Place?

Mr. Fletcher. I don't know the Name of the Lane, it is near Katherine's Hill.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. In what Parish is it?

Mr. Fletcher. St. Nicholas's Parish.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. What was the Effect of his Shooting?

Mr. Fletcher. My Lord Ogle fell off his Horse on his Face; my Lord started at the Gun going off; but as soon as I could turn him, and come up, I saw the Blood come; and I said, My Lord, I will go to Gainsford, and get some Surgeons; and accordingly I went.

Mr. Fletcher. What became of the Prisoner?

Mr. Fletcher. He walked up the sandy Way; but I can't tell what became of him, because I was gone for the Surgeon.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. Would you ask this Witness any Question?

Mr. Justice Tracy. But to what you tell me what Question you would have asked, I will ask it.

Mr. Fletcher. I don't know. Ask him yourself, if you have a Mind to it.
 I don't know, I said to go that Way every Day. I am sorry for what is done, and I can't think how I came to take that Way.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. The Deed walked with him, stood at his right Hand, and directed him.

Mr. Fletcher joins.

Mr. Serj. Whistler. Mr. Fletcher, pray give an Account of what happened on this 21st of August, as you was returning from Hunting with my Lord Ogle.

Mr. Fletcher. We met the Prisoner at the Bar, Edward Arnold.

Mr. Serj. Whistler. Was you near my Lord?

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. How did you meet?

Mr. Fletcher. I was behind him, Fletcher.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. You were pretty near together?

Mr. Fletcher. Yes, very near.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. What did you observe?

Mr. Fletcher. We met this Man coming up the Lane. I saw him perform his Piece, he took Aim, and shot my Lord. My Lord fell off from his Horse.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. What did you do?

Mr. Fletcher. I went to see whether my Lord was dead: I saw he was not dead; and the Prisoner made off.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. In what Manner did the Prisoner make off? Did he walk or run?

Mr. Fletcher. He did not run. I rid after him, and rode him against the Bank: You William, said I, you have killed my Lord: you will be hanged for it. You won't hang me to day, will you? says he. No, not to day, but you will be hanged.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. How was his Countenance?

Mr. Fletcher. Very pale and confused.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. Did he surrender himself to you, or make any Resistance?

Mr. Fletcher. He told me, he would charge again; No, says I, you shall not. Then I added out to another Man to ride him, one Green: When he came, I said, This William hath shot my Lord Ogle.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Did the Prisoner Arnold say he would charge again?

Mr. Fletcher. He said he would charge again; but he could not, for he had no Time.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. How far was the Prisoner got from the Place where he shot my Lord?

Mr. Fletcher. About thirty Yards.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. What did you do?

Mr. Fletcher. I brought him back to my Lord.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. What happened then when you brought him to my Lord?

Mr. Fletcher. When I brought him in Sight of my Lord, says my Lord,
 You William, you have killed me.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. What did he say to—Mr. Fletcher. He said nothing.
 Mr. Serj. Chelyer. Did he seem to struggle?

Mr. Fletcher. He did seem to struggle, so firm to come at my Lord, as I thought.

Mr. Justice Tracy. What did you think?

Mr. Fletcher. When he was brought by my Lord, he struggled, and seemed to strive to come at him. Says I, Mr. Green, take him away, for he is coming at my Lord again: I thought so.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Had he his Gun?

Mr. Fletcher. His Gun was taken away from him.

Mr. Fletcher. You say you rid behind Mr. Fletcher and my Lord; what Distance was there between you and them?

Mr. Fletcher. My Lord and Mr. Fletcher rode abreast; I was behind, I believe, about two or three Yards.

Mr. Fletcher. If I understood you right, you say you saw the Prisoner aim at my Lord; did you see him aim at my Lord Ogle?

Mr. Fletcher. I see him aim at my Lord Ogle.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. In what Manner did he seem to level? Towards his Head, or how?—Mr. Fletcher. I thought it was towards his Head.
 Mr. Serj. Chelyer. Where did he shoot him?

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. In the left Shoulder.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. Pray now, will you ask this Witness any Question?

Prisoner. I don't know what to say to him.

Mr. John Fawkes joins.

Mr. Serj. Chelyer. Sir, will you tell my Lord and the Jury, while you was in Company, and attending my Lord Ogle from Hunting, what happened when this tragical Fact was committed.

Mr.

Mr. Faulstich. My Lord, returning from Hunting with my Lord Oxley, coming down this Lane where this Accident happened, I signed Mr. Arnold at some Distance before any of the rest did; I said to Mr. Parsons, Here is Mr. Arnold coming up the Lane; I will be hanged if he looks not a mind to shoot me. Mr. Arnold passed by my Lord with a short Look upon him; I was in the Road; then Mr. Parsons was on the right Side of my Lord, and I was in the Lane road with my Lord, behind him about four or five Yards. He passed my Lord Oxley, and comes up almost over-against me, rather beyond me; I see him look sternly on my Lord Oxley and on me; he had his Piece so as they commonly carry them when they shoot a-bird; He comes up with his Piece and shoots my Lord Oxley in his Shoulder: My Lord dropped by Degrees upon the Ground. I got off my Horse, and turn'd my Lord's Face from the Ground, for fear he should be scratched with the Duck, which was like Pounce or fire sand: So I turned him as soon as I could, and drew him to the Bank: I laid down, and my Lord laid down upon me upon my Shoulder. I did, Take care of the Villain, seize the Villain, he had killed my Lord: I went out to seize him, as well to secure him, as for fear the Villain should turn and shoot again.

Mr. Justice Tracy. You say you saw him coming down the Lane?
Mr. Faulstich. Yes, my Lord.
Mr. Justice Tracy. You say you followed my Lord Oxley in the Lane Track?
Mr. Faulstich. Yes, my Lord, I did.
Mr. Justice Tracy. How far was you from my Lord?
Mr. Faulstich. I believe I might be in the Lane Track, about four or five Yards from him.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Then you was after my Lord?—Mr. Faulstich. Yes, my Lord.
Mr. Justice Tracy. My Lord must be between you and the Prisoner, how came you to take Notice of him?
Mr. Faulstich. My Lord, this Prisoner did away with my Horse a Week or a fortnight before. I called at my Taylor's, and put my Horse at the Door, in the same Time I went in; and when I came to take my Horse again, my Horse was gone: So I run out in a Surprise, and seeing Nobody, a Man that was by told me, Ned Arnold had run away with your Horse. I coming out into the Street, could see into the Middle of the Town; where I saw my Horse thro' four Streets Throw off, and be walking him up the Town; I made haste—

Mr. Justice Tracy. I ask you, you say you saw him at a Distance, and you was behind my Lord?
Mr. Faulstich. Yes, I was so.
Mr. Justice Tracy. Then consequently my Lord was between you and the Prisoner.

Mr. Faulstich. Yes, the Way we came.
Mr. Justice Tracy. You say my Lord was between you and the Prisoner; how could you distinguish the Prisoner from my Lord?

Mr. Faulstich. Because he was in the Foot-way, and we were in the Horse-way.

Mr. Justice Tracy. He was in a different Track?
Mr. Faulstich. Yes, my Lord; he comes up the Foot-way and the Way we were in was the Horse-way.

Mr. Justice Tracy. As you was riding, could you perfectly distinguish the Man?—Mr. Faulstich. Yes, I could.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Yes, I could. Then you say, when he had passed by my Lord Oxley he turned back; what did he do at that Time?

Mr. Faulstich. He gives a Look upon my Lord; still kept on, and gave a Look, and went a little farther; then immediately turns round, and mounts his Gun; he had his Piece as usually Men have when they shoot a-bird; and before I could speak my Lord Oxley dropped.

Mr. Justice Tracy. When he mounted his Gun, did he take Aim or Level?
Mr. Faulstich. Yes, he made a Level as if he would shoot at his Head.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Which was nearer, you or my Lord?

Mr. Faulstich. I rather I was nearer my Lord than he was.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Prisoner, will you ask this Witness any Question?
Mr. Justice Tracy. I desire to ask this Witness one other Question. Had you any Discourse with the Prisoner afterwards?

Mr. Faulstich. Afterwards, Sir, what?

Mr. Justice Tracy. After, what he was in Custody for this Fact.

Mr. Faulstich. Yes, when I went to him in the Martingale, I did ask him, why he shot my Lord Oxley, and not me; because when he had run away with my Horse, when I met him afterwards, says I, Mr. Arnold, why did you do such a Thing as to take my Horse away? You don't know the Consequence of it; you are guilty of Felony. He said, I was a good Man; my Lord Oxley was not.

Mr. Justice Tracy. I desire to ask one Question. You say you were behind my Lord riding in the Lane Track, the same Way as my Lord was in; was that when the Prisoner passed by?

Mr. Faulstich. He was in the Foot-path, and turned back.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Did you then for him aim his Gun?

Mr. Faulstich. I did. I can't say I saw him till he was past; but he had his Gun as they commonly carry them when they shoot a-bird; and he presently mounted his Gun and fired.

Sir, for the Prisoner. We beg Leave to know from the Witness for the King, whether this Prisoner was in Diligence?

Mr. Justice Tracy. No.

Sir, I beg Leave to ask them one other Question; Whether these Gentlemen that give Evidence for the King, whether they don't believe the Prisoner to be a Lunatic?

Mr. Justice Tracy. Will you ask this Man any Question?

Prisoner. I have nothing to say any more; I don't know what more Questions to ask.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Mr. Faulstich, Whether did you take this Man to be a Lunatic?

Mr. Faulstich. Most People that lived at Gayfield have known him, that he was always a ferly, morose-temper'd Man: As to his being lunatick, I know nothing of that; I am not a Judge of that.

Mr. Parsons and Mr. Parsons said again.

Mr. Justice Tracy. How long have you known the Man?

Mr. Parsons. Twenty Years.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Do you take him to be a Madman, or no?

Mr. Parsons. No; I took him for a rascall, ill-natured Man.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. What is his Behaviour?

Mr. Parsons. He is a fallen sort of a Man, a daggd Fellow.

Mr. Sej. Whitaker. How did he use to live?

Mr. Parsons. I don't know; he had a House.

Mr. Sej. Whitaker. How did he live?

Mr. Parsons. He used to go a-fishing and a-shooting.

Mr. Sej. Whitaker. Did ever any Body reclaim him from the Use of a Gun, as being a Madman?

Mr. Parsons. I never heard they did.

Prisoner. I have had my Gun go off several Times in my Hand; but never, till now, had this Accident.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. He never before shot a Lord in the Shoulder. He can ask better Question when he holds up his Head; but if his Guilt makes him hold it down, I can't help it.

Mr. Sej. Whitaker. How long have you known him?

Mr. Parsons. I have known him several Years.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. Do you remember, that in August last—and tell us when he came to your Shop? And for what Purpose?

Mr. Smith. Yes, I do know him.

Mr. Sej. Whitaker. How long have you known him?

Mr. Smith. I have known him several Years.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. Do you remember, that in August last—and tell us when he came to your Shop? And for what Purpose?

Mr. Smith. Yes, I was ironing; my Daughter was at one End of the Table, my Face was next the Door, my Door stood open; and Mr. Arnold comes in, and said, Mrs. Smith, I want a quarter of a Pound of Powder, and a Pound of Shot; I told my Daughter to serve him; my Daughter serv'd him; and as it is usual to ask what Size, my Daughter asked him, What Size? Mr. Arnold said, For the biggest you have; and so my Daughter took the Key, and went to the Drawer where the Shot was; Mother, says she, there is none of the biggest Shot in the Drawer; says I, Some folk sort at them; and my Daughter serv'd the second Size; and when she had serv'd him, he took up the Quarter of a Pound of Powder, and the Shot, and laid down Five-pence, and said, There is your Money.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. When was this?

Mr. Smith. The Day that my Lord Oxley was shot. I believe it was about an Hour after that, People came running up by my Door: I ask'd my Daughter the Meaning of that Noise! My Daughter said, My Lord Oxley is shot.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. Had you sold him Shot before?

Mr. Smith. Yes; he was a pretty good Customer.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. For how long?

Mr. Smith. I can't tell how many Winters; I believe, two or three Years.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. Did you look upon him to be a Madman, and furnish him with Powder and Shot?

Mr. Smith. He used to ask for Half a Pound of Powder, and three Pounds of Shot, and had down a Shilling for it; which was the Price I sold it for.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. Did you at any of these Times, for the Space of three Years you have furnish'd him, take him to be a Madman?

Mr. Smith. No.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. Would you have done this if you had look'd upon him to be mad?

Mr. Smith. No; I look'd upon him as sensible as any Customer I had.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. All that Time?—Mr. Smith. Yes, all that Time.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. And the last Time?

Mr. Smith. Yes, the last Time.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. At the Time when he came last, in what manner did he describe the Shot?

Mr. Smith. When he came to the Door, at first he ask'd for a Quarter of a Pound of Powder, and a Pound of Shot; And, as is usual, I ask'd him, What Size? And he said, The biggest Size.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. Did he use to buy the biggest Size?

Mr. Smith. He never had any of the biggest Size before.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. He never had any of that Size before; Did he ever use to come for a Pound of Shot? You say, He usually came for three Pounds.

Mr. Smith. He usually came for three Pounds.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. When he paid for it, how did he pay for it?

Mr. Smith. He paid Five-pence in Half-pence.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. Had he the Change ready?

Mr. Smith. It was ready changed.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. Five-pence changed; Is that the common Price?

Mr. Smith. Yes, Three-pence the Powder, and Two-pence the Shot.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. But that the Price of the biggest Sort?

Mr. Smith. Yes.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. But he never had any of the biggest before?

Mr. Smith. No.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. He says it was Robb'd Shot.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. I believe it was, because he could get no bigger.

Mr. Justice Tracy. (To the Prisoner.) Will you ask that Witness any Question?

(The Prisoner made no Answer.)

Mr. Justice Tracy. Sir, since you have been here, it hath been desired you might be ask'd, Whether the Prisoner is a Madman: You have known him some Time before this.

Mr. Parsons. I never was in his Company.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. But you have known him; You have known there was such a Person.—Mr. Parsons. Yes.

Mr. Sej. Chabryre. Did you ever see, or hear that he was reputed a Madman?

Acquaintance there, and his Place provided by him, equipped him with Coats, and sent him down: He came Back again. Nothing was to be got would give him, he seemed to like a Madman. When my Father did, he left him Five Pounds a Quarter. He would live under Barns, Hay-Ricks: He have caught him under my own Hay-Rick as a Morning, when he might have lain in his own Bed. He had a House in the Neighbourhood; but he had never a Stool, or a Pan, nor anything at all in it. I don't know whether he had a Chair, but there was no Bed. We could not persuade him off this: We would let him live Money.

Mr. Justice Tracy. He would live by himself.
Mr. Arnold. He lived by himself; and he hath known when Quarter-Day hath come, because People have danced for Money, this Philip the Taylor, Street the Alchemist-Keeper. And as soon as I come, and he had Notice, he would dart down the Hill to me, where I have been pursued by his Looks: Sometimes I gave him good Words, sometimes bad; sometimes I gave him a little Drink, sometimes none, for fear: He appeared as much like a Madman as ever any body did.

Mr. Serj. Copley. You are his Brother, and you would give him from hanging, it is natural, and I don't discommend you. You are upon your Oath, and Justice must be done. Sir, let me ask you, Whether you looked upon yourself to be a Madman in treating him in this Manner?

Mr. Arnold. No, I never did.
Mr. Serj. Copley. You say this Man had his Memory return very quick every Quarter-Day, as often as that came, he would come to you for his Money: Did you ever refuse it him, because he was mad, and not fit to be entreated with it?

Mr. Arnold. No, I never did.
Mr. Serj. Copley. At the several times he was put Apprentice, like an untoward Boy, he would run away; did you look on that as a Sign of Madness? When he was put to a Barber, did the Person you treated with, or you, look on him so to be a Madman?

Mr. Arnold. I did understand that he thought him disordered in his Brain.

Mr. Serj. Copley. As every untoward Boy is; when you sent a Letter to one Tordoff's wife, and not Person with him to take Care of him, would you, if you had thought him disordered, have sent him alone to provide for himself?

Mr. Arnold. We did not find him alone, but we sent him on Ship-board; I sent down to a Person to take Care of him when he came there; I did not think him so much a Madman as to be chained.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Would you take it to be proper, you that are his Brother, to send him on Ship-board into a Country he had never been in before, only on a Recommendation of a Letter, if you had thought him so mad as not to be able to provide for, and govern himself?

Mr. Arnold. I sent him to one that was my Customer.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Did you observe in those Letters that he was mad?

Mr. Arnold. No, I did not.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Then in these several Passages that he was too sharp for you, in that a Sign of a Madman? Are there your fair Reasons, because he acted like a naughty Man, that he was a Madman?

Mr. Serj. Fitzwater. If he was disordered, why did you not let him be confined?

Mr. Arnold. I did not think him so much a Madman as to confine him.

Mr. Serj. Fitzwater. I would ask you, on your own Knowledge, Can you give an Account of any thing that he hath done, but as a fallen or cruel Man?

Mr. Arnold. You don't look upon him so mad as to be chained?

Mr. Arnold. No, I did not.

Mr. Serj. Fitzwater. Did you put him under the Care of any Person?

Mr. Arnold. No, I did not; he lived at large.

Mr. Serj. Fitzwater. Did he ever let you with you?

Mr. Arnold. Yes, he did.

Mr. Serj. Fitzwater. How did he behave himself then?

Mr. Arnold. Very oddly.

Mr. Serj. Fitzwater. As how?

Mr. Arnold. As a Madman, I thought.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Whether or no did he use to carry a Gun?

Mr. Arnold. Yes, often in his Father's Time.

Mr. Serj. Copley. He used to use a Gun?

Mr. Arnold. He used a Gun in my Father's Time.

Mr. Justice Tracy. And hath he been in Court?

Mr. Arnold. Yes, several Times; and I have seen him with one several Times since.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Why did not you take it from him, as he was a Madman?

Mr. Arnold. He was my Brother, and I did not care to oppress him.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Now you would have prevented him from doing this Mischief, if you had done so. Did you ever farm any Land?

Mr. Arnold. I have.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Did you ever employ him?

Mr. Arnold. I have employed him in raking of Hay or Barley.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Did you find he brought it together, or scattered it about?

Mr. Arnold. He brought it together, but in such a manner, not right as a Workman ought to do.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Ay, he was a naughty untoward Boy from his Youth.

William Arnold swears.

The Prisoner at the Bar is my Brother, I believe him to be a Madman.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Give your Reasons.

Mr. Justice Tracy. What, is he a Lunatick?

Mr. Arnold. He is not perfect in his Senses; he did not know what he did at some certain Times: I can't say he was always so.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Go on, and give your Reasons.

Mr. Arnold. In my Father's Time I have heard him curse him, and call him wicked and abominable Names, without any Provocation; I have heard him talk to himself, sometimes catch at his Words, sometimes break out into Passions of Curious and Swearing, without any Provocation; After this I have observed him to burst out into a foolish Laughter, and grin like any Madman: If you asked him what he talked of, sometimes he would give an Answer to, sometimes not. That I have at several Times, as in the parish of Tower, I cannot say for it; but this, as to the general, that I sometimes have observed him. Sometimes he would be very rational, and act like other Men.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Do you take that for the Sign of a Madman, to do a very wicked Thing?

Mr. Arnold. Madmen do very wicked Things.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Do you take him to be a Madman that would do wicked Things?

Mr. Arnold. Some do, some do not, for the sake of Profit and Gain.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Was you one that paid him any Share of this Allowance?

Mr. Arnold. I am ashamed. My Father left a small Money to my Brother and me, or just half Five Pounds a Quarter; and my Brother commonly put him. I have heard him tell his son that, and he said, the Prisoner would run in brain, and then he would damn him.

Mr. Serj. Copley. How do you like him?

Mr. Arnold. I do not like him better for this.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Then you know he is mad, but what your Brother told you?

Mr. Arnold. I know my Brother loved Money.

Mr. Serj. Copley. That I suppose is true.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Mr. Arnold, when you paid him his Quarter-Day, did he ever give you a Receipt?

Mr. Arnold. I always wait the Receipt, and he does not.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Did you not read it over to him, or let him read it?

Mr. Arnold. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Copley. As Quarter-Day he would be pretty well in his Senses?

Mr. Arnold. Yes, because he was named for his Money.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Did he not send you any Letters?

Mr. Arnold. Never in my Days, as I know of.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Can he write?

Mr. Justice Tracy. (To Mr. William Arnold) Did you ever write to him?

Mr. Arnold. I don't know; it is a great while ago if I did.

Mr. Serj. Copley. As to what you were speaking when he was a Scooter, did they take to put him in mind of his Passage?

Mr. Arnold. Those Persons he used to go to would damn him.

Mr. Serj. Copley. And when they did damn him, did you apprehend he knew what they meant by it?

Mr. Arnold. Yes, he might.

Mr. Serj. Copley. When he was told Quarter-Day was at hand, what would he do?

Mr. Arnold. I can't say, but he hath damned my Brother for Money.

Mr. Serj. Copley. When?

Mr. Arnold. When he hath wanted, and had not Money in his Pocket.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Did he never tell you that he had Dukes to pay?

Mr. Arnold. Yes, he hath.

Mr. Serj. Copley. What do you mean when you say, He was ferocious in his Senses, and sometimes not, Loss of his wits these latter, is?

Mr. Arnold. I can't say it.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Did you never observe some Men of Discretion act indelicately?

Mr. Arnold. Yes, very often; I may be sure it is my self.

Mr. Justice Tracy. How long ago is this?

Mr. Arnold. The Tenth of July last. I then asked him, why he was so concerned about my Lord Ogleby; for my Lord knew you I say he, I don't know that he hath: When did you see my Lord? Says he, I don't know; not this great while. Why are you so disturbed, then, about my Lord? Have you been shooting at my Lord's Manor? No, says I, I say he say; don't disturb yourself with these wild Notions; pray be easy. I then gave him some good Words, and I gave him something to eat, and made him promise to return home, and be easy; which if I would give him Money to return home, he would do, as he did promise me he would: And then was the last Time I saw him before this unhappy Accident of my Lord Ogleby's.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Did he give you any other Reason of his coming to Town?

Mr. Arnold. I don't remember he did. After some Reflection, and a very wild Look, he said, I am come to be free, I thank.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Give my Lord an Account, whether or no, when he was talking wildly against my Lord Ogleby, did he tell you who put him upon that?

Mr. Arnold. If you please, I have asked him these Questions: How come you to do this wicked Act? Did any body put you upon it? No, says he, I am sure you have done this wicked Act; and he said, my Lord Ogleby was my Provocation? Or any body for you to do it? Says he, My Lord Ogleby hath bewitched me, was always a Plague to me, and was the Plague of the whole Country; and several Things to the same Purpose.

Mr. Serj. Copley. You talk you gave him Money and Drink, I suppose you gave him both.

Mr. Arnold. I gave him Victuals and Drink, and Money in his Pocket, provided he returned home, which he promised me he would do.

Mr. Serj. Copley. If you looked upon him as a Madman, why would you give him Money, and be furnished with a Promise that he would return home?

Mr. Arnold. I never knew that he attempted to do any body Mischief.

Mr. Serj. Copley. How did you know but he might do you or himself a Mischief? Pray answer the Question, and be confident; you have said, you looked upon him as a Madman, and that he could not give any to reclaim him: He talked to him, but at last, he declared, he ought to be put into some Mad-House.

Mr. Serj. Chigden. When was this?
Mrs. Arnold. About five Years ago.
Mr. Serj. Whit. Was there any Discourse of applying to a Physician, or? You say a Minister made use of Means to reclaim him, I don't hear of any Physician consulted.

Mrs. Arnold. He never had any Physician, to my Knowledge.
Mr. Serj. Whit. Had he ever any Physician, or any Care taken of him, so if he was a Madman?

Mrs. Arnold. No.
Mr. Justice Tracy. He hath struck you?

Mrs. Arnold. No, not me, it was another Sister.
Mr. Serj. Darnall. Did you apprehend from any of these Circumstances, that he was like to do Mischief?

Mrs. Arnold. Sometimes I have been afraid of it: He would make a great Noise, and shut the Door, and keep us out.

Mr. Serj. Darnall. You have seen him take live Coals, and throw them into his Father's Fire?

Mrs. Arnold. I did.
Mr. Serj. Darnall. Was you not afraid he would have set the House on Fire? Had he not Sense enough to do that?

Mrs. Arnold. I believe he had done it, if he had not been prevented.

Mr. Serj. Darnall. You did not think him so mad, as that it was necessary to confine him.

Mrs. Arnold. I did, in my Conscience, think so.
Mr. Serj. Darnall. And you did not confine him?

Mrs. Arnold. It was not in my Power.
Mr. Serj. Whit. How long have you lived at Gainsford?

Mrs. Arnold. Three years at Gainsford.
Mr. Serj. Whit. You can't but have observed him then often out of Order?

Mrs. Arnold. Often so, by Fire.
Mr. Serj. Whit. One of your Brothers says, he used to be wife in Spring and Fall. Did you ever find for any Physician?

Mrs. Arnold. No.
Mr. Serj. Whit. He was so in Spring and Fall, a little bleeding would have done him good.

Mrs. Arnold. I don't know but it might.
Mr. Serj. Whit. Did you ever send to your Surgeon to bleed him?

Mrs. Arnold. No.
Mr. Serj. Darnall. Was it the opinion of the Family, that he should be sent abroad for a Soldier?

Mrs. Arnold. It was the Opinion of many of his Friends; but that is eleven Years ago.

Mr. Serj. Darnall. But he used to have his framed Trucks then?

Mr. Serj. Darnall. Yes.
Mr. Serj. Darnall. Whether did you look upon it, that sending him for a Soldier would reclaim him, or cure him of his Madnes?

Mrs. Arnold. Some were of Opinion it would.

Mr. Serj. Darnall. What! cure a Madman?

Mr. Serj. Whit. Pray, how long hath your Father been dead?

Mrs. Arnold. Five Years, last October.
Mr. Serj. Whit. How long before his Death was this firing the Coals on his Fire?

Mrs. Arnold. I don't know, but I believe it's more than seven Years ago.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know any thing that should give him this Turn of Mind?

Mrs. Arnold. No.
Mr. Serj. Whit. Would you have lived at Gainsford, had it not been known and heard, that he went a shooting with a Gun?

Mrs. Arnold. Yes, frequently.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Did you ever caution any body against letting him have a Gun, or Ammunition?

Mrs. Arnold. No, I never did.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Was he under any body's Impediment, or Cure?

Mrs. Arnold. No.
Mr. Serj. Whit. Did he not kill Rabbits, and sell them?

Mrs. Arnold. I don't know.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Hath he not taken Fish, and sold them?

Mrs. Arnold. I don't know.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Did you ever apprehend any Danger from his using his Gun?

Mrs. Arnold. Sometimes we have.

Mr. Serj. Whit. How comes it you have not taken it from him?

Elizabeth Arnold sworn.

Mrs. Arnold. My Lord, I have lived with him some Years, and for more than seven Years I have observed him to be mad at some Times, though not so mad then as he hath been since: He was so very mad sometimes, that I was very apprehensive of being distressed by him, he would have Pibels and Guns, but I have taken them all away from him. Sometimes he would let off his Gun in the Kitchen, and give no Warning: A great many Times he would sit and talk to himself, and forever and what I have heard my body in their Seales do. About a Month before my Lord Ogle was shut, I observed, as I could by his Eyes tell when his Fit was coming, I observed him to look more wild than ever I saw him in my Life before. The twentieth of last August, he came into the Parish Church of St. Nicholas, stood in the Front of the Congregation, with his Face over his Breast, and his Hair in such a dismal manner, that I was several look at him, and they told me, when I came out of the Church, that my Brother look'd so frightful, that they would not meet him for ever so much. On the twenty-eighth of August I left my

Mr. Justice Aldon, and we said to him, if he did not think him distressed, he said, He is a great deal so, and he appears to be an Enemy to all Mankind, that he would give him no Account why he did this Action, but desired him several Times to shoot him through the Brains. As to myself, the Relation my Sister, Mary Arnold, hath given of it, is true, he had so Provocation from me; so far from that, I was afraid of him, and I said, Don't throw the Stick at me; but as soon as my Back was turn'd, he took up the Stick, and threw it at me, and afterwards laugh'd at it.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Where did he live, when you was afraid of the Danger of his Pibels and Guns?

Mrs. Arnold. He lived in my Father's House at Katherine Hill, where I lived.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Then, I find, when you was in the Family, it seems you were afraid of his Guns and Pibels; how long have you lived at Gainsford?

Mrs. Arnold. More than three Years. I have left off House-keeping five Years.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Have you not known him have his Gun at his Command, and that he used to go frequently a shooting?

Mrs. Arnold. I did not know it of myself, but I believe he did: He had no Gun of his own, but he used to borrow one. When I left off House-keeping, I sold my Gun, and would not let him have one.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Why should you take so much Care when you lived together in the Family, and take no Care afterward?

Mrs. Arnold. I can give no Account of that; but my Father hath been advised several Times to put him into a Mad-House, but Mr. Ward had the Mind of the Parish; and Mr. Ward had advised his Father, in my Hearing, to put him into a Mad-House; for his said he was mad, and something else would do him good.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Mrs. Arnold. No; I don't know that ever I saw him in my Life before; I do not know him. When I first heard that he had taken this body, he was mad.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know that Mr. Serj. Whit?

Fright about the Prisoner; that I believed him much worse than ever I see him; and much feared he would do himself a Mischief.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. What Answer did he make?

Mrs. Giffings. My Mother's Brother feared surprised.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Did not he say, Mind your own Business, you have nothing to do with it, or so that I forgot?

Mrs. Giffings. No, I know nothing of it that he said so. I have a great deal more to say, my Lord. My Mother and I coming from Church one Day, some time before he shot my Lord Ogilvie, and coming from Church, a Shower of Rain drove my Mother into the House of her Landlady; I was with her; The Landlady came, and my Mother asked where the Prisoner was? She said he was within: My Mother told her that she was very angry with him, and did not desire to see him; she was very angry that he should go away with Mr. Fowler's Horse. His Landlady told my Mother, He is certainly mad, and it was not to be minded what he said or did.

Mr. Serj. Chibbye. What you have heard goes for nothing.

Mrs. Giffings. I went to see the Prisoner in the Goal in Southwark the 23d of last Month, being the first time I ever saw him since he shot my Lord Ogilvie. I found him in great Disorder then, and I asked him how he came to do such a wicked thing? He gave me no Answer, or none that I could make any thing of. I asked him if any Body had bid him to do it? and he told me it was one Sweeney and Thomas Farmer; which I knew to be two little Boys: I wondered at his Answer. I asked him how he did, and told him the Time drew near for his Trial: He took no Notice of that; he said there was a great Plague in the World; and also that he knew not how it came; but repeated it, God take his Soul, if he knew any thing of the Plague come, or any thing about it: But abundance of times these Words were repeated.

Mr. Serj. Chibbye. What Words?

Mrs. Giffings. God take his Soul, if he knew how the Plague in the World come. I enquired what he meant by it? He told me the Wickedness of wicked People had occasioned it, and there would be great Mourning in all the World. I enquired what he thought would become of him if he was to be tried and condemned? He told me he should have a Fore-night's Time to go where he would, and do what he would: That every Body would be easy, and all would be at Peace. This was on Saturday last; and he repeated the Words, God take his Soul, if he knew any thing of the Plague in the World, or any thing about it.

Mary Martin swears.

Mr. Edward Arnold was in my House, which People said was mad: Ned Arnold, and Ned Arnold. People would give him that Report: so crazy Ned Arnold. Ned Arnold was in my House, and accordingly called for a Mug of Beer. And please you, I keep a Publick House. When I had fetched him a Mug of Beer, he sat himself down by the Fire; he fell a swearing and cursing, and swore that my Lord Ogilvie was in his Belly. Says I, Ned, what makes you swear, and curse my Lord Ogilvie for? It is Pity, Ned, but my Lord should know it, if he knew he was in your Belly, he would quickly come out of it. Says I, If you will leave, Ned, a Charon, you and I will go to him. Then we concluded what time to go, which was about eight or nine o'clock the next Morning, to go to my Lord Ogilvie's, and tell him he was in his Belly. Accordingly he got out of his Chair, and took a Knife, and swore he would carry that with him. I tell you nothing but what is true. So then comes in Harry —, Harry's Man that belongs to the Horse. He comes in with a Whop in his Hand. I said, Harry, will you go and fetch Ned and I to my Lord Ogilvie's, and tell my Lord that he is in Ned's Belly? Then several came in, several came to drink at my House: And this same Man fell a laughing heartily. I said, Harry, will you go? Yes, says he. But, says I, Ned Arnold talks of carrying a Knife. No, says he, if you carry a Knife, we may carry you there, but my Lord will take Care of us, and send us to the House of Correction. Ay, says I, and hang you too. He had been in my House twice before. I will leave nothing that I can remember.

Sally for the Prisoner. I desire the may be asked, whether he did not open his Bosom, and let her feel for my Lord Ogilvie?

Mrs. Martin. Some time before he came to our House, and sat scratching his Bosom, and feeling and looking down into his Bosom, cursing and swearing, and he told my Lord Ogilvie was in his Bosom, and had such a Influence over him, that he could neither eat, nor drink, nor sleep, or be at Ease for him.

Mr. Serj. Gwyn. You spoke of carrying a Knife, Did you ask him the Reason why he would carry the Knife?

Mrs. Martin. No, I did not.

Mr. Serj. Gwyn. Did you apprehend that he designed any Mischief?

Mrs. Martin. No, I had no Thoughts about it; I only talked in a joking Way. And it please you, my Lord, he was there looking in his Bosom. One time he comes, says he, There is Sally Sweeney, my Lord Ogilvie is got into Sally Sweeney's Belly. I did not know there was such a Gentlewoman. Says he, He is such a Plague to her, that she cannot eat, drink, or sleep. Says my Daughter, about eighteen or nineteen, one twenty Years old, Can't you sit? Because he had said he could not eat or drink. If I this, says he, it won't sink like another Man's Turd. My Lord, it is true. I think I have something more to say.

Sweeney swears.

I took him to be a crazy Set of a Fellow, not to be in his Senses at all Times. He would say he was plagued with the Buggs and Bollies, that he could not rest a Night; he was fain to flap his ears with the Ruggs, or he could not sleep. In the Morning sometimes he hath asked me whether I could rest? I told him, Very well. I asked him, How he rested? Says he, I am plagued with the Buggs and Bollies. He lodged at my House three Months.

Mr. Justice Tindal. How long ago is it since he lodged at your House?

Sweeney. He lived there till that Accident happened.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Did not you lend him a Gun?

Sweeney. Not at that Time: I did not to lend him a Gun in the Winter, to Roost Sparrows, &c. but I did not lend him at that Time that this happened.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Why did not you take the Gun away from him?

This very Gun that he shot my Lord Ogilvie with, did not you lend him the Gun to go with?

Sweeney. I did not lend it him at that Time. I did say he might have the Gun to go with.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. You gave him Leave to have this Gun; then I ask you, Would you lend a Madman your Gun?

Sweeney. I take him to be worse sometimes than others, as in Spring and Fall.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Did you take him to be fit to be at that Time?

Sweeney. He is more fit to be in the Water.

Sally for the Prisoner. My Lord, I desire he may be asked, Whether he did not hear him say any thing of my Lord Ogilvie; that my Lord Ogilvie had been there with his Wife? Or what he used to tell between this Man's Wife and my Lord Ogilvie?

Sweeney. He said, My Lord Ogilvie had brought a Hamper of Wine into the Kitchen, and put it on the Dresser over Night, and when he rose in the Morning, the Wine was drank out of the Hamper, and the empty Bottle were upon the Dresser. When I have come home, it is true, says he, my Lord hath been forgetting here, and my Lord keeps Company with your Wife, and your House is disturbed, they keep dancing above Stairs, that I can't rest. I have opened the Kitchen Door, to show him that it was not so; that there was no Hamper nor Boddies there.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Pray, give an Account when he had your Gun at first?

Sweeney. Sit, I can't do it.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Ask you, where your Gun was at that Time?

Sweeney. It was at my House.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. What Gun had he when he shot my Lord Ogilvie?

Sweeney. It hath been reported that it was my Gun.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. How came he by that Gun?

Sweeney. I will tell you how he might come to have the Gun: I was at Mr. Ward's, house of Tarapots, before this happened; says Mr. Ward, Can you catch my Coney? Says I, I believe I can do it better than I: Says he, I will give Sixpence a Coney to any Body for catching of them. When I came home, I happened to drop a Word about it; my Boy was by; says he, Ned, shall you and I go and catch Conies? Says he, I have never a Gun: Says he, You may take my Father's Gun; and, says the Boy, We will go Halven.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Then you left the Gun, as he might take it?

Sweeney. I did not lock it up.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. How came you to let a Gun be in the Way, as he might come to it, if you apprehended him to be a Madman?

Sweeney. In former Times he did carry a Gun, and he came of a good Family: I thought I might let him have a Gun, when I see him in his Senses.

Mr. Serj. Gwyn. You say this Difficultie about giving Sixpence to kill Conies, gave occasion that he had your Gun? — Sweeney. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Gwyn. Did he hear you speak it, that such a one would give Sixpence, &c.

Sweeney. Not to my Knowledge; but my Boy took it up, and told him his next Day.

Mr. Serj. Chibbye. Pray, This Story you tell us about a Hamper of Wine, when was it?

Sweeney. A pretty while before this happened.

Mr. Serj. Chibbye. What do you call a pretty while?

Sweeney. I believe it might be half a Year.

Mr. Serj. Chibbye. Did not he use to have the Key of your House to go in and out as he pleased?

Sweeney. We had two Keys; he had a Key, but we could bolt the Door, and keep him out of the Kitchen: I was afraid he would fire the House.

Mr. Serj. Chibbye. He might come in and out when he would?

Sweeney. We did not trust him with that Liberty to go into the Kitchen.

Mr. Serj. Dwyer. Did you trust a Man in your House, that you was afraid would fire it?

Sweeney. He could not come to that Place where the Fire was.

Mr. Serj. Dwyer. You was often frightened lest such a Thing should happen?

Sweeney. I was going to tell him out: I told my Wife, This Fellow is so mad, that we can't keep him any longer; he is fit to go to Bolton.

Mr. Serj. Gwyn. Did you hear him speak of my Lord Ogilvie?

Sweeney. He hath been saying some Time. When my Boy was alone with him, he asked my Boy for my Hog-Knife; the Boy shod him, what he would do with it? And he said, He would kill himself.

Mr. Serj. Gwyn. Did you hear this?

Sweeney. I did not hear him say it, but my Boy told me when I came home.

Mr. Serj. Gwyn. Did you ever hear him speak by way of threatening my Lord Ogilvie?

Sweeney. Sometimes he would halloo as an Owl doth; sometimes he would fly Cuckoo.

Mr. Serj. Gwyn. Have you ever heard him threaten my Lord Ogilvie?

Sweeney. I have heard him curse and damn my Lord Ogilvie.

Mr. Serj. Gwyn. Have you ever heard him threaten him?

Sweeney. One Time, about a Twelve-month ago, he said he would shoot my Lord Ogilvie at the Horse-Race, and looked very wild.

Mr. Serj. What Horse-Race? Goodford Horse-Race?

Sweeney. I took it to be so.

Mr. Serj. Did he say he would shoot him at the next Horse-Race?

Or he would have shot him at the former Horse-Race?

Sweeney. I took no further Notice of it, for I took him to be a crazy Fellow.

Mr. Serj. But what did he say?

Sweeney. He said he would shoot my Lord Ogilvie at the Horse-Race.

Mr.

Mr. Morph. When was this? Before the Horse-Race?
Sweeney. It was in May was Twelvemonth; I have was one Horse-Race pulled; I never heard he did mention it.
 Mr. Morph. You say this was May was Twelvemonth; How often had he had the Use of your Gun since?
Sweeney. I don't know how often, because I did not mind; He never did so harm.

Mr. Morph. Hath he had it several Times?
Sweeney. He hath had it several Times.
 Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Had he not the Gun whenever he would?
Sweeney. No; I used to carry it to Whedridge, to shoot Sparrows.
 Mr. Morph. Did not you bring the Gun Home again?—Sweeney. Yes, Sweeney for the Professor. My Lord, as to the Time of his taking the Gun, to go to shoot Mr. Wain's Conies, Whether it was not the same Morning that my Lord Oxley was first?
 Mr. Justice Tracy. He tells you he was not at Home.
 Mr. Justice Tracy. According to his Information, whether it was not at that Time?
 Mr. Justice Tracy. He said he did not load him his Gun then, but he had it then.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Whether the Lane, in which this Fact was committed, doth not lead to Mr. Wain's Turnip-field, where the Conies were?
Sweeney. It lays the same Way, and my Wife thought he went, because my Wife for him, and had lent him Money to buy the Shot to shoot the Conies with.

John Dedman sworn.

Mr. Justice Tracy. What do you know of this Man?
Dedman. I know him to be a Madman.
 Mr. Justice Tracy. Why?
Dedman. By reason my Lord Oxley was always in his Mind; he was always troubled with my Lord Oxley; he could never take no Ball, the Devils and Buggs troubled him so. In the next Place, he rented a House, he had neither Good, nor Beds, nor Chairs, either to lie down upon; he had nothing to be down upon. He would come to the House, and he would beat himself out of the House; I have been called from my Work, to make Peace among them.

Mr. Justice Tracy. What House? To whom was this?
Dedman. To his Friends, and to his Sisters.
 Mr. Justice Tracy. How long ago is this?
Dedman. About five or six Years ago.

Richard Wheatley sworn.

Mr. Justice Tracy. How often have you seen him, and he hath come into the Shop sometimes to that I have been afraid to have him; Sometimes he would come in, and go out again, and hath spoken never a Word.
 Mr. Justice Tracy. Why have you been afraid?

Mr. Justice Tracy. Because he hath fustled all the Time I have been showing him. Sweeney for the Professor. My Lord, I desire he may be asked, Whether he did not wish to desire him to cut his Throat?
 Mr. Justice Tracy. One Time, as I was having of him, he said, Damme, cut my Throat.

Mr. Serj. Glynne. I suppose, at that Time, you had given him a Nick; Jack you, What he said, Cut my Throat? Or, You will cut my Throat?
 Mr. Justice Tracy. He said, Damme you cut my Throat.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. What Answer did you make?
Witness. None; I was afraid.
 Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Did you take every Man for a Madman, that swore when you cut him?

Tyler sworn.

Mr. Justice Tracy. I have known Edward Arnold for several Years; and I never knew but that he was a crazy Sort of a Man.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. What do you mean by a crazy Man?
 Mr. Justice Tracy. He had several foolish Expressions.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Did you take him to be a distracted Man?
 Mr. Justice Tracy. I could not take him to be otherwise.

Sweeney for the Professor. My Lord, I desire he may be asked, Whether he heard him express himself about the Buggs, and Ballers? Or, Whether he proposed to take his Gun, and shoot himself?

Mr. Justice Tracy. Did you hear him talk about the Buggs?
 Mr. Justice Tracy. I heard him say, that the Ballers, and the Plagues plagued him so, that he could not take his Rest at Night.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Whether he desired that he might take his Gun, and shoot himself?
 Mr. Justice Tracy. I have seen him several Times.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Did he say he would take his Gun, and shoot himself?
 Mr. Justice Tracy. I can't say that; I don't know it, I never heard of it; I have heard him sit, and rail, and swear, and dance to himself.

Mr. Justice Tracy. I desire he may be asked, if he hath ever heard him say any Thing about any Transgression with my Lord Oxley and this Sweeney's Wife?

Mr. Justice Tracy. I have heard him say, that my Lord Oxley was there one Night there, at Sweeney's House, and he drank out a Hammer of Wine there; and they had Puddles, and danced; and he said, one Sweeney played to them; And when he came down in the Morning, there was the empty Bottles upon the Table.

Thomas Poulter sworn.

Mr. Justice Tracy. I ever took the Man to be not as another Man; he was always out of his Mind.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. How long have you known him?
 Mr. Justice Tracy. I have known him these Nine Years. One Time he came in a Pailson where I was, and said he would kill me.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. What was the Reason?
 Mr. Justice Tracy. I know some at all; but a pailson over, and he never did me any harm, or any Wrong. About a Fortnight before this was done, I was working in the Field, and he came to me, and looked much melancholy; he wore and cursed, and he said at last, Damme Tem Oxley; and I asked, how my Lord Oxley had hurt him? He said, he had bewitched him four or five Years ago, and he had had nothing else through him ever since, and he should never be able to go up Ady Hill. This was about a Fortnight before this Accident happened.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Where do you live?—Witness. At Godalming.
 Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Did you give any of his Relations Notice of this?
Witness. A great many People knew of this; He said, he wished he could see him to scratch him to each blood of him, because he had bewitched him, and he would go to the King, and know the Reason, why my Lord Oxley plagued him so.

Mary Martin sworn.

Mr. Justice Tracy. I have known him almost these Five Years; I always thought him mad, by his mad Actions, as I have seen him; he hath often come into his Sister's House, and hath sat himself down, and hath talked to himself, and hath sworn, and cursed, and talked of the Plague, and would look one Way and another, and talked to himself; He would sit to his floor together, and then he hath got up, and gone away, when his Sister hath not been at Home. On the Saturday before he shot my Lord Oxley, he came and asked for some Small Beer; my Mistress was not at Home; I fetched him some, he sat himself down, grinned his Teeth, and had such Actions; looked one Way and another, and without any Provocation cursed and swore, and talked of Plagues; I was so frightened, I called my Fellow-Servant into the Room; I was afraid to stay with him.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Did he show any Marks of Rage?

Mr. Justice Tracy. Yes, my Lord.

Mr. Justice Tracy. What did he do, besides grinning his Teeth?

Mr. Justice Tracy. He did not say much; he looked about, and talked to himself.

Mr. Justice Tracy. How did he talk?

Mr. Justice Tracy. He talked to himself.

Mr. Justice Tracy. How?

Mr. Justice Tracy. Oh! very wildly, with his Eyes looking one Way and another, Mr. Serj. Glynne. Was he cursing at any body in particular?
Witness. Not as I know. I did not hear him mention any body's Name.
 Mr. Serj. Glynne. My Lord, I desire this Witness may be asked, What Transgression did he see in the Man, and what Directions he received from the Keeper, in the House of Correction?

Mr. Justice Tracy. I carried him Victuals every Day, while he was there; He said very little to me, but behaved himself much as he used to do. The Gaol-Keeper, Mr. Fisher, and John Patten told me, that my Mistress should not carry him Victuals with Flowers, nor they would not let him have a Knife, they were afraid he would make away with himself; they brought the Meat off from the Bords, before they gave it him; The good Woman of the House where he lodged, and the Boy went with me to see him; says he, Yes, how do you do? Do the Plagues and Bibles plague your Soul as they used to do when I was there? And the Boy laughed at it.

Stephen Patten sworn.

Mr. Justice Tracy. My Lord, I desire he may be asked, Whether he hath not found him mad in a Lodge all Night as the Air?

Mr. Justice Tracy. My Lord, I found him in Loggy-Lodge, and there he was when I went to work upon a Place, where there is some best wood Timber.

Mr. Justice Tracy. When did you find him there?

Mr. Justice Tracy. I can't remember the Time.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Was it Night or Day?

Mr. Justice Tracy. It was in the Morning.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Had he been there all Night?

Mr. Justice Tracy. As far as I know, he had.

Mr. Serj. Glynne. How long ago is this?

Mr. Justice Tracy. About two Years ago.

Mr. Serj. Glynne. What Time was it?

Mr. Justice Tracy. It was in the Morning about seven o'Clock; we went to mend the Tiling of the Lodge; I can't tell the Time of the Year it was.

Mr. Serj. Glynne. About what Work were you about?

Mr. Justice Tracy. Mending the Tiling of the Lodge. It was the Spring of the Year.

Mr. Serj. Glynne. About Lady-Day?

Mr. Justice Tracy. It was then about.

Mr. Serj. Glynne. Did you ask whether he had been there all Night?

Mr. Justice Tracy. No; I did not find him at first, but he popped his Head out; When I found that, I looked up, and heard a Man cry, Don't meddle with my Tobacco; I was surprised at it.

Mr. Serj. Glynne. Who brought you here?—Witness. I was brought by Mr. Serj. Glynne. Who brought you here?—Witness. Mr. Arnold.

Mr. Serj. Glynne. Which of them was it?

Mr. Justice Tracy. I don't know both; Mr. Arnold, of Katherine's Hall.

Mr. Serj. Glynne. Had you any Private of any Money, or any Thing else, if you could swear him a Madman?—Witness. No, my Lord.

Mr. Serj. Glynne. Were you not told, it should be worth Thirty or Forty Shillings to you, if you could prove him a Madman?

Mr. Justice Tracy. I had nothing presented me.

Mr. Serj. Glynne. I tell you, Whether they said, It should be worth to you?—Witness. No.

Mr. Serj. Glynne. Did Nobody say to you?—Witness. No.

Mr. Serj. Glynne. Have you not declared that this Arnold was a Rogue, and no Madman?

Mr. Justice Tracy. I believe he is a Lunatick Man.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. I ask you, Whether you have ever declared that you believed him a Rogue, and no Madman?

Mr. Justice Tracy. I believe always took him to be a Madman.

Mr. Serj. Dorell. Did you never say to any body, that it was your Opinion, that he was not mad, but a Rogue?

Mr. Justice Tracy. I never said any such Thing in my Days; No, indeed, I did not.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Did you not say to some Sweeney's?—Witness. No.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Had you no Discourse about it?

Mr. Justice Tracy. No, no.

Robert Dorell sworn.

Mr. Justice Tracy. My Lord, I have known him a great many Years; I lived near his Father; I never thought him any Thing but a crazy Man, seldom

Mr. Justice Tracy. His Father hath sent for me several Times, to desire him make good: for he would be ready to beat his Sisters and his Father out of Doors: I told him, if he would not be still, I would send him for a Soldier: Then when before a Justice of Peace, to frighten him, but he was as bad when he came home again.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Did you hear him threaten to turn his Father and Sisters out of Doors?

Dorothy. I did not hear him: He abused his Father, and I had him before a Justice of Peace; I was Confused.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Did you take this to be a Carriage to a Madman, or to a wicked Man, to seduce him?

Dorothy. I did not take him to be in his Senses.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Why did you carry him before a Justice? Was he not a wicked Rogue, an unsworn Boy? Was not the Reason why his Father sent him for a Soldier? Do you like to send Madmen or Soldiers?

Soll. for the Prisoner. This is the Wife of ——— Swetman.

Mr. Justice Tracy. What name you to lay? What is your Opinion of the Prisoner?

Swetman. I really think he is a Madman, and not in his right Senses.

Mr. Justice Tracy. He lodged at your House?

Swetman. He lodged at my House.

Mr. Justice Tracy. When? About this Time that this Accident happened?

Swetman. Yes, my Lord: Though when he came to my House, I took him to be a pretty sensible Man. After a little Time, he grew very mad; and one Sunday Morning he got up, and walked out with my Son up the Apple-Tree, and when he was upon the Hill, he said to my Son, Jo, I want to come to your House.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Was you there? ——— Swetman. My Son told me Jo.

Mr. Serj. Copley. That won't do.

Swetman. He said he would not come to my House any more: It rained that Night, but he did come, and went to Bed. The next Day he went a walking, but I don't know where: At Night he came home; I heard him come home: About Nine, I desired him to come in, and go to Bed, because my Husband was not at home: He said, He came in, he would not come in, I had got Regrets bid in the House; and I said, No, Mr. Arnold, or Edward, or Ned, I can't tell which; he heaped over the way with such a Fury, and said, He would not come in to-night, I thought he should not come in to frighten me, I locked the outside Door: He said a Key, for I had it, and I behind the outside Door, that when he got in at the outside Door, he should come no further. At Two o'Clock in the Morning he comes to the Door, and fat there till the Clock went: Then, when he came in, I finding him there, got up, and opened the middle Door, he went to Bed, said nothing to me, or to him, but looked out of Humour, in a wild, staring, distracted way: A little while after, my Husband came home, and as he sat by the Fire, he came to him; Stephen, says he, you are a punk-timed Man, but you have a bad Woman for your Wife, and he made me out as if I was naughty to my Husband; says he, She hath fack Racketings and foolish Doings here; he hath had Men above Stairs, fed them with Victuals, and I could not rest for them. He said, He came down one Morning, and he lay a Hammer and Head of Wire hanging upon the Clock, so my Lord Copley said I had drunk out, and he had been there forgetting, and I was in a Passion, and my Husband said, I was to blame to take Notice of him, for we took him for a Madman.

Sometimes I have desired him to read a Chapter in the Bible, when my Husband hath been abroad, to pass away the Time, till my Husband hath come home, which he did feebly, I desired him to read another, he did it very feebly. Another Time, as he was sitting down on the Couch, by the Fire-Side, I for him look very wild, and I came to him, and said, Come take the Bible, and read, and put all these abominable, wicked, distracted Things out of your Mind; he gave me no Answer, but took the Bible out of my Hand, and looked in it, and frown and railed, and said foul Things as I am sure could not be in the Bible, and he looked very wild and very mad.

Mr. Serj. Copley. How long was this before this Accident happened?

Swetman. I can't tell how long, it was within the Time he was at my House.

Soll. for the Prisoner. Please to ask her about the Rugs at her House.

Mr. Justice Tracy. What do you say relating to a Rug?

Swetman. One Morning, in a raging Condition, I heard him swear, that he had pulled my Rugs to pieces, and had stopped his Ears with it.

When he came down Stairs, he came raving, and pulling the Staff out of his Ears, and raving at the Bullies and Bolshaws, and I know not what, and said, The Bullies plagued him, and he thought my Lord Copley plagued him.

Soll. for the Prisoner. My Lord, I humbly beg the Favour, that the may be asked, relating to the Transgression that Morning, when this unhappy Accident happened, that the would give your Lordship an Account, if you please to ask her, whether she lay at home that Night, and what passed between her and her Son, relating to Mr. Arnold's Cones? And whether she did use words, that Mr. Arnold would give Satisfaction for every Cony she caught, because they eat his Turnips?

Mr. Justice Tracy. You would have me to ask these Questions? Did he lay at home that Night?

Swetman. My Lord, he did not lay at home that Night; I never heard nor he him till about Six o'Clock; he took a Basket of mine, and went to Goodfellow, and bought a Lamb; in the mean Time, I got up, and he, to the bell of my Knowledge, asked me, Whether I had seen or heard any thing of the Fox-Hounds? and I said, No, don't trouble me, I have something else to mind: That was in the Morning, after he came from Goodfellow.

Soll. D. Did you hear him say any thing about Arnold's Cones?

Swetman. Yes, after he came home, he asked me if I had heard or seen any thing of the Fox-Hounds; and he looked ill-will and indifferent. He went out of Doors, and came in again; sat down, and got up again, and was very untoward. My little Boy came in, and asked him, Whether he would go and shoot Mr. Arnold's Cones? But my Boy said Mr. Arnold should shoot them, and he would bring them to him; and Mr. Arnold said, he had no Powder nor Shot, nor Money to buy any. And my Child said, I will go with you, and ask my Mother. So Mr. Arnold asked me to lend him a Shilling; and I did lend him a 3d. thing's worth of Halfpence; and my Child wanted to go with him to Goodfellow to buy this Powder and Shot: I said, he should not go, but he should go to School; and Mr. Arnold was to go to Goodfellow and back again.

Soll. Did he borrow it to buy Powder and Shot?

Swetman. He borrowed it to buy Powder and Shot, to shoot the Cones, so far as I know.

Soll. Did he give that as a Reason?

Swetman. Yes, my Child was to go with him; and he was employed that he way to go with him to the Cones.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Then he went away, and came home again?

Swetman. Yes.

Mr. Justice Tracy. How far do you live from Goodfellow?

Swetman. About half a Mile. After he had got Powder and Shot, I see the Gun flashing in our Corner in the Kitchen. At last I thought he had not a Mind to go and shoot the Cones. He was gone out of the Door; a Man and a Woman came and desired me to stand at my Door, there was a Horse and a Hammer coming by; I said to buy Fifth of them as they went by. I desired Mr. Arnold to stand at the Door, while I went up to dress. I took it he would stand at the Door while this Horse and Hammer went by. To the bell of my Knowledge, he said he would. I went up, Arnold came, and said, Are you coming down? I said, No. But I said, If you want to go, you may go. I thought him a truly Scurd. So he went away. I looked to see which way he went. He went up the Lane towards Mr. Arnold's Turnep-field. Then I went away to dress my Head. I was not far gone, but I heard the Gun go off. I think it, this Man hath lost something in the Lane. When I looked, I saw some Gentlemen, and some Horse, and Nobody upon them. Then I thought he might have frightened the Horse, that they had thrown the Gentlemen. Immediately one came to me, and said, Dame, bring a Chair; Which I did. And I saw a Gentleman was foot: He was wounded and bloody. Somebody said, Here you got some good Brandy, or fair Water? I went and fetched both. When I came again, I did not know that this was my Lord Copley.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Had you heard him say any thing that Day, or before, threatening my Lord Copley?

Swetman. Yes; I have heard him say, he would kill my Lord Copley.

Soll. for the Prisoner. And Nobody else?

Swetman. He hath said he would kill me, and he hath threatened to kill Swetman; and he hath threatened to kill my Child; for you are plagued, and I am plagued, and your Child is bewitched, he said.

Mr. Serj. Where did this Gun stand?

Swetman. It stood sometimes in one Place, and sometimes in another.

Soll. for the Prisoner. I beg leave to examine a Witness or two, to confirm this Witness's Evidence.

Mr. Justice Tracy. Did you hear what this Witness said?

Edward Arnold. Yes, he related the same thing to me.

Mr. Justice Tracy. How long ago?

Edward Arnold. About a Fortnight ago.

Mr. Arnold. And the gave us the same Account.

Mr. Copley says.

My Lord, I was with him on the Marble. I asked him, What could induce him to murder my Lord Copley? He made me little Answer as full; but at last he said, My Lord Copley had bewitched him, and if he had any Money in his Pocket, he could not spend it in any Quest; my Lord Copley troubled him, and run in his Head, that he was never easy, nor never quiet. I asked him, Whether any body had got him upon this Adieu. And he believed pretty much of it, and afterwards he said, No, nobody had put him upon it. I went afterwards once more to him on the Marble, and I asked him again, Whether any body had got him upon this barbarous Adieu? And he said, That my Lord Copley (the People had said) was the Occasion of all the Troubles in the Nation, he said, that he could not have any Peace nor Quiet in himself in his own Mind; and he was in a great deal of Confusion. I could not tell what to make of it, that I could not but judge he was besides himself, and I thought.

Mr. Darby says.

My Lord, by Command of my Lord Copley, I several Times called this Man to Examination.

Mr. Serj. Copley. My Lord, I submit it to your Lordship, Whether this Evidence ought to be permitted in this Case, as to this Man's Behaviour subsequent to the Fact, the Evidence antecedent to the Fact is very proper, but the subsequent, it is very likely, may be unaccountable.

Mr. Justice Tracy. It must be submitted in the Jury, as it appears to them, both before and after.

Mr. Darby. My Lord, by Command from my Lord Copley, I called this Prisoner several Times, to examine him, so far as I could find the true Cause why he did this Action. I have been with him by myself, with his Friends and his Brothers, but I could never get any tolerable Answer. He said, my Lord Copley had bewitched him, and was a trouble to him.

Soll. for the Prisoner. We have ———

Mr. Justice Tracy. You have had an Indulgence, the greatest that ever was given before, but I would not stop you.

Soll. My Lord, I humbly submit it.

Mr. Serj. Copley. Will your Lordship please to favour me, by way of Reply, to take Notice of something?

Mr. Justice Tracy. You hinted something, I think, by a Question. You had one of the Witnesses asked, Whether this Man was a Delusé?

Do you believe there is any thing in that? If you assure me that Mr. Hangerford tells you there is any thing in that Matter, I will bear him.

1

Mr.

My Lord, we shall show full this Man's Examination, notwithstanding he was afterwards fallen; and as he expresses it, What doth my Lord find his Fools after me?

What is put down in Writing is what we shall say before your Lordship, falsified by his own Mouth: Notwithstanding they would have said that he is entirely deprived of Reason, your Lordship will find some Letters written by himself, taking Notice of the Difficulties he was under, that the People took his Clauses from him; it was easier for him to die, rather than live in such unhappy Circumstances; and desires to be brought to his Trial: This was during his Confinement, and is very proper for your Consideration, and for these People to come to swear he is a Madman, and the Man to look for too, is very surprising. We will say this Master before you, together with a Witness or two, and shall submit the whole to your Lordship's Direction.

Mr. Serj. Whistler. My Lord, I beg one Word by way of Reply. They have given some Account of his Behaviour since his Confinement. Grazebrook, I cannot but take Notice of his Behaviour at the Bar, when this Man hath been spoke to, whether he hath not behaved himself as a Man of Sense would do that had done an Injury; and when he was asked what he had to say, whether he did not give a rational and sensible Answer? As I take it, he had he was sorry for the ill Act he had done.

What can the most rational Man, if he hath been in an ill Act, say, after he hath done it, but he is sorry for it? I believe every Man that has done an ill Act, and is sorry for it, is a rational Man.

Then, my Lord, they give an Account how he behaved himself after this Fact; and there hath nothing been proved of any Remorse but a full Behaviour. When Mr. Aile was with him, his Behaviour was full; that agrees with all Accounts that have been given. Then we shall call one Witness, who will give you an Account of his Behaviour in the Marshalsea, which is introductory to two or three Papers, which we shall give in Evidence: What said my Lord to find his Fools after me, &c. For a Man to do this, and then to say he is of his Sense!

As to what Mr. Dearly says, that the Man was always fallen when he came to talk with him; if this be a Proof of his Insanity, it is rather a Proof that he understood himself very well, and had his Senses: There is no Reason to say that this Man was a Madman, and the Law will excuse him from being a Criminal. Thus as I shall trouble your Lordship with: We will call our Witnesses, and then submit it to your Lordship's Direction.

Mr. Serj. Gaynes. If your Lordship please to indulge me a very short Word relating to the Contradiction of this Act of Parliament; there is no Foundation of any Doubt on the Contradiction of this Act, and the Intention and Design of it.

Mr. Justice Trow. Another thing more material; It was adjudged to be the King's Bench, and to entirely given up; that there was not the least Doubt.

Mr. Serj. Gaynes. My Lord, therefore the thing to be considered in the Evidence is, Whether it is a Proof of any Offence within the Words of this Act of Parliament? If this unhappy Attempt had went so far as the Noble Lord had died, I believe it is hardly to be imagined that any Evidence given here would have been thought sufficient Ground to have excused the Person guilty from the Punishment of the Law.

Thus in case (as now) he recovers of those Wounds, that create a Sort of Tenderness and Compassion, where the Consequence is not altogether so dismal; and that may suppose the Person to be regarded with more Tenderness than in another Case: But the Case is the same in one as in the other Case; and therefore he that doth the Act willfully and maliciously, &c. is guilty within this Act of Parliament. If a Person have no Mind, he can be capable of no malicious Design: Therefore we humbly submit that must be the Evidence to excuse the Person, That he had no Malice or Design in the Attempt made on this Noble Lord: But if upon the Evidence it appears, that he acted with Design, with Deliberation, with Sedulity, and a long, fixed, and settled Malice, and that in Evidence of Insanity that can show he had no Malice to excuse him; then he is guilty within this Act.

Mr. Serj. Dervick. My Lord, I am very unwilling to take up any more of your Lordship's Time: I apprehend, the Insanity of the Man must be reckoned at the Time he doth the Fact; if he hath Intervals, and kills a Man in those Intervals, he is as much subject to the Law as any other Man; therefore taking it all to be true, that the Man is sometimes out of his Senses, it will then fall under this Consideration, Whether at the Time that he did this Fact, it was not in his Intervals? And if so, he must suffer the Law. My Lord, the Evidence hath made it manifest, that he was in a Capacity of doing that Morning, employed by his Shot, employed to do a Work to get Money; he doth say, Sir, I shall submit the Sort of Shot, a bigger Sort than ordinary. In the Morning of that Day, the People thought him capable to be entrusted with Money, and to be employed, &c. from the People that then employed and entrusted him, looked upon him that Day to be in his right Understanding: Taking that for granted, if at that Time he was really in his Senses, he is subject to the Law. My Lord, it is very odd to hear so many Relations come into Court, and confess themselves guilty of the wickedest Practice; they say, they apprehended he would let the House on Fire, do Mischief, and yet suffered him to go abroad. Some say, they did not fear him, but they looked upon him as a Madman, therefore not to secure him, it is Matter of Confusion to all those Relations, to look upon him to be mad, and yet take no Care to confine him, or to cure him. I don't find one single Instance to shew him with any Care for a Cure; therefore we hope, on the Representation of the Relations, this Man is not such a Person as to be excused from the Law. I think it is very much to be weighed in the Breast of the Jury, whether this Man is not a Warning to every wicked Person, and a Caution to Relations, that they should have Regard to such a Person.

It is a very sorry Account to be given, when a near Relation is under these Circumstances, to say, It is our Relation hath done it, pray don't condemn him, though we have let him go abroad in the World, though we knew he was out of his Senses: This strikes deep in their own Conscience, whatever be the Event of this Trial. But I think there is sufficient Proof, that this Man should be brought in in the same Manner as every Body else is, that is in his Sense.

Mr. Marsh. This Trial hath held too long for me to add any thing to take up more of your Lordship's Time; I only beg Leave to take Notice, that I think it is very extraordinary in these Relations, that they should not take Care, when they apprehended him to be mad, to secure him; I don't apprehend that he was at a Distance from any of them; but as to two of the Sisters, that lived in the Town where this Man every Day came, in the Neighbourhood of Guildford, they say, they lived there three Years, and gave free Influence of his Insanity: It don't appear they ever sent any Person to him to let him Blood, or to give him any Advice, or Physick; that doth not only make these blame-worthy, but, I apprehend, makes the Evidence they have given of his Insanity incredible, as coming from them, because it is hardly credible he should be so, and they not take that Care of him as they ought. They own that they knew he said to go out a shooting, and had desperate Weapons; they never sent any Body that went after him. Some of the Witnesses go to represent him as incapable of any sensible Action, for a great many Years, and therefore he is fit at the Bar in a Manner different from the rest of Mankind. But even here, when they talk of the Picture of his carrying his Gun, he says upon that, he hath often had his Gun go off in his Hand, but never had the Accident before. This Man they are setting to the Jury as a Man of Folly, of Compassion, capable of Compassion. Another Time he said, his Shot was Rabbit-shot. The Behaviour of him, notwithstanding he is fit, and put in that Form, will not have that Influence upon, but that if you are furnished he hath done the Fact, you will find him guilty.

Mr. Serj. Cloyne. I beg your Lordship's Leave to call a Witness or two: There is one remarkable Passage your Lordship will hear from the Witness: This was designed as a Recognition of this Fact, with respect to my Lord Ogleby, when it was handled, they had thrown the Ink upon it, instead of the Sord; says he, It is an ugly Accident, it must be writ over again, you had better stay till it be writ over again. I only offered it as a Paper signed with these Circumstances, to show his Behaviour.

Barwell Smith turns.

Mr. Serj. Cloyne. Did you see him sign that Paper?

Mr. Smith. Yes, I see him sign it.

Mr. Serj. Cloyne. Who wrote it?—Mr. Smith. I writ it.

Mr. Serj. Cloyne. I'd ask you, did he dictate to you, as you writ it?

Mr. Smith. I took it from his Mouth, as neatly as could.

Mr. Serj. Cloyne. What is the Import of it?

Mr. Smith. It is a State of the Case of what he had done to my Lord Ogleby, and how he came to do it.

Mr. Serj. Cloyne. You read it fairly from his Mouth?

Mr. Smith. I did it; it was read to him twice, and he read it afterwards.

Mr. Serj. Cloyne. Did he sign it?—Mr. Smith. Yes.

Mr. Serj. Cloyne. You observe some Ink fallen upon it?

Mr. Smith. After he had signed it, I went to put some Sand upon it, and in Mistake, I took up the Ink, and turned it up instead of the Sand.

Mr. Serj. Cloyne. What did he say?

Mr. Smith. As soon as I had done it, he said, Why you have blotted it so that it cannot be read, it must be writ over again! No, Sir, I believe not, if you think it will signify; he then said, Pray do all you are in your Power, use your Endeavour with my Lord Ogleby, to have his Fetters taken off, for they were very grievous to him. There was one of the Keepers in the Room, and I desired him to take Notice, it was his own voluntary Deed.

Mr. Serj. Cloyne. Look upon these Papers.

Mr. Smith. He wrote that Letter, and I gave it to my Lord Ogleby: I saw by him, and for him write.

Mr. Serj. Cloyne. Look upon that other Letter.

Mr. Smith. I did not for him write this.

Mr. Serj. Cloyne. You take it to be his Hand-writing?

Mr. Smith. Yes, I take it to be his Hand-writing.

(The blotted Paper read.)

Clark reads. Edward Arnold, now in the Marshalsea, &c.

Mr. Justice Trow. Did he put his Name so himself?

Mr. Smith. Yes, he did, he signed he might: It was read over to him, and he said, I must sign it; yes, if you will, but do not sign it, if there is any thing in it that is not right.

(The Letter produced, dated January 25, 1723.)

Mr. Smith. This I see him write; he writ it himself, without my saying one Word to him.

Clark reads.—To the Reverend the Lord Ogleby, &c.

Mr. Justice Trow. My Prayer to your Honour, that you would read or write Words, which may be of Use.

Mr. Serj. Cloyne. Su, will you give my Lord and the Jury an Account, whether you was with him while he was a Prisoner at any Time during his Confinement? And what passed between you? What Discourse? and how you apprehended him to be by his Behaviour? Whether he had the Use of his Understanding, for a Man under such a Load of Guilt?

Mr. Cor. I went, the Day he committed the Fact, to see him, at the House of Correction: I had been up to see my Lord Ogleby, and then I went to see him.

Mr. Justice Trow. What Time was it?

Mr. Cor. About Ten or Eleven o'Clock: Then, my Lord, he sat quite double, and did not speak a Word. I went the next Day, and he was brought into a Room; he seemed under a Confusion, but not Lornick; under a Horror of Guilt, but no Remorse; says I, What could induce you to do that Fact? Says he, My Lord Ogleby is the Plague, the Occasion of all the Plagues and Troubles in the Country: Who told you so? A hundred People say so, the very Boys in the Street cry out of my Lord Ogleby. I asked him Questions several Times, but it was very difficult to get Things out of him: he spoke low to himself, and you ask several Times, before you get an Answer, and when he did answer, it was always rational. He would rail at my Lord Ogilvie, and that he was the Occasion of all our Plagues and Troubles, and a Man of evil Devices. Says I, Are you not afraid to suffer Death? Says he, It is better to die, than to live miserably. I went to see him the next Day: I ask'd him, Did you intend to kill my Lord Ogilvie? He had a dreaining way of speaking; Yes, to be sure. I said, Where did you intend to hit my Lord? Says he, When I shoot at a Rabbit, I always aim at his Head.

Mr. Serj. Ogilvie. Did he desire you to say any thing to my Lord? Mr. Serj. I was afterwards to see him, when he was in the Marshall's; he was very ill, I ask'd for him, and the Man in the Bed brought him to me: I ask'd him if he could drink some White-wine; Says he, The White-wine here is too strong for my Stomach; then I call'd for some Sack, and he had it. I ask'd him how he did, and he told down his Head, and said, In a bad Condition. I said to his Keeper, I believe he would die, he should have some Care taken of him; his Keeper said, It was common. The Prisoner said, These Irons are very heavy and troublesome, and fat down in a Chair, very ill. He desired me to speak to my Lord, and tell him how he was us'd, and they said him. I did speak to my Lord, and afterwards came to see him again, which was on the Twenty-ninth of October, my Lord Mayor's Day: I remember the Day, because I see my Lord Mayor, and the Companies, going to Woolwich by Water. I told him really, it is a hard Case, that a Man of such a good Family should suffer for, you ought to declare all that you know, it is an odd I hang to have a Man's enterprise; if you know any body that let you upon this, you ought to declare who it is, but have a Care you don't accuse the innocent; But he never did name any body to me, but he told me, I have sign'd a Paper, what is in that Paper is true: I press'd him to tell me the Truth, but he said at last, if my Lord Ogilvie will come here himself, let him, but let him send no more of his Fools after me.

Mr. Serj. Ogilvie. Have you any Reason to believe that he wanted the Use of his Understanding?

Mr. Serj. No; I went to School with him; we were in the same Class together: He was a frange, fullen Boy, such a Boy I never saw the like of him before, which made me, when I left School, that I never look'd to him since, till about two Years ago, and I was going up one Hill, I for him have a Penny by the Tail; I ask'd him, what he would have for it, he ask'd a Shilling for it; I told him, I would give him Sixpence, and a Pint of Ale; No, says he, it is hardly worth a Shilling, and a Shilling I will have.

Mr. Serj. Ogilvie. How long ago is this?

Mr. Serj. Christmas was two Years.

Mr. Serj. Ogilvie. You form'd a Notion of him from a School-boy, that he was a mischievous, faulty Fellow?

Mr. Serj. I did; I really thought, such a Temper as he set out with, must produce such a Man as he appears to be.

Mr. Justice Tray. He did behave himself last Night, when he pleaded, calmly, and as much in his Senses as any body.

Gentlemen of the Jury.

This Edward David, this unhappy Person, is indicted for a great Offence: The Law, on which the Indictment is grounded, is an Act of Parliament that pass'd the last Session of Parliament, and is entitled, An Act, &c. which is conformable to the ancient Law of this Kingdom, but that Law had been discontinued; if any Man did assault another, though Death did not ensue, it was made Felony, by the ancient Law of the Kingdom; but the Law is since altered, and it was not so, till this Act of Parliament was made. That is to show you, that though it is a new Law, it is just, and he that bath not if the Reason of Law: All Laws are of equal Force, still repeal'd, have the same Power, but when they are repeal'd it has no further to be considered. There can't be a more bold and wicked Thing intended in the Design of it, than maliciously to shoot a Man.

To prove this Indictment, they have called a great many Witnesses: The first Witness they call is Mr. Flower. This happen'd to be done on the Twentieth of August last, in the Parish of St. Nicholas, near Katharine-Hill, as he was coming from Hunting with my Lord Ogilvie. When they came into a narrow Lane, near Katharine-Hill, he saw this Man coming towards them, to meet them, with his Gun in his Hand, and he observed his Gun was cock'd, and he said he look'd upon him, and his Countenance was changed, and he look'd pale. Like a Man that had some great Concern upon him; he observed and ask'd him the Reason of his carrying his Gun in that Manner, but he made no Answer, went on, carrying as he went, and when he pass'd them, he immediately turn'd short, shot my Lord Ogilvie, knock'd him off his Horse, and he fell from his Horse upon his Face. This is the Description he gives of the Fall. He is then ask'd, Whether ever the Prisoner was reputed a Madman, or distracted, or lunatick? For you see to understand, that was the main Point in this Case, and what the Prisoner hath for his Defence: And the Witness says, he never heard of his being mad, or his being reputed to be mad, or out of his Senses, notwithstanding he lives at Guildford, and this Prisoner lives very near him. At the same Time he says, that he knew very little of him, so that what he says, as to that, is not of great Weight. I told the Prisoner, as any Witness came to be examin'd, if he would have them ask'd any Questions, I would ask them for him. Instead of asking the Witness a Question, he said, He said that Way every Day, and he was forty six what was done.

Mr. Justice Tray. The next Witness he says he was very near my Lord Ogilvie when this Accident happen'd. He gives you much the same Account as the other Witness did, only adds, that he preferred his Piece, took Aim, and shot at my Lord Ogilvie: The Event of the Shooting, he describes in the same Manner as the other Witness does, so upon that, the Man went on, and he follow'd him; the Witness follow'd him, and told him, he had kill'd my Lord Ogilvie, and he would be hang'd for it; What, says he, I shall not be hang'd to Day, and he would have charged again; with what Intreat you are to judge of upon the Circumstances of the Case. The Prisoner was brought back to my Lord, and on Sight of him, my Lord said, You Villain, you have kill'd me. This Witness brought he had a Design to fall on my Lord Ogilvie again, that is uncertain; his Gun was taken from him, but he apprehended something of that kind, and that he intended some further Mischief against my Lord Ogilvie. He said, When he shot, he aim'd at my Lord's Head, but the Wound was only in his Shoulder: And the Prisoner being ask'd, if he had any Questions to ask this Witness, said, He did not know what to say. This Gentleman says, he never took the Prisoner to be a Madman, but a fullen, rascally Fellow, and he said to go a Shooting, and a Filibustering.

Another Witness is Mr. French; he says, he was with my Lord Ogilvie, and saw the Prisoner coming up, and he told Mr. French, that he believed he had some Design against him, for, not long before, he had taken away his Horse, in the manner he describes. It is not material to run through all the Particulars, and he did not know, but he had a Design upon him; he look'd very stern, and after he had pass'd my Lord, he immediately turn'd round, and shot, as you have heard. He was ask'd, How he could see at that Distance, when he was behind my Lord, in the same Track? so that my Lord must be between him and the Prisoner. He said, my Lord and he were in the Horse Track, and the Prisoner was in the Foot Way, which was a different Track. This Witness is ask'd, Whether he took him for a Madman, or a Lunatick? Gentlemen, he says likewise the same as the other Witness. That he always was a fairly, a rascally Fellow, and did not care to talk, but he did not take him to be a Madman: The Prisoner then said, He had often had his Gun go off in his Head, but never had such an Accident before. When this Witness ask'd the Prisoner, Why he did not shoot him, because he had talk'd to him about running away with his Horse, rather than my Lord Ogilvie? He said, You are an innocent Man.

The next Witness is one Mrs. Smith: She says, she came to her Shop that Morning as my Lord Ogilvie was shot, so by Fire Powder and Shot, and when her Daughter came and asked him what Size Shot he would have, he said, The biggest they had, but the Daughter came and told her they had none of that in the Drawer: then she bid her give the second Size, No. 2, which he did, and he paid her for it. This Witness tells you, he had been a very good Customer; and that the Shot he usually had was another Sort; and he never ask'd for, or had, this big Sort before. That shows, Gentlemen, and from whence they would infer, and it is fit for you to consider, whether he had not some more than ordinary Design, greater than what was usual when he went to kill Rabbits, which is a thing much relied upon in the Course of this Trial. When he is asked if he will ask this Witness any Question? He says he hath several times bought Shot of her; and he is asked whether she took him for a Madman? She says she always took him to be as sensible, by his Dealings with her upon the Account of what he bought, as any body, and that he never had any of the biggest Shot before: She tells you he paid for it as he used to do. And this Prisoner on this Occasion swears, that he had often bought of her Powder and Shot frequently.

The next Witness is John Smith: He says he met the Prisoner, and the Prisoner asked him if my Lord Ogilvie went a Fox-Hunting. This Witness was ask'd whether he looked upon him to be distracted? He said, No, he never did. Sometimes he went out a fishing with him; sometimes he would talk very well, and sometimes not give him a Word; that he was a rascally, fullen Man: He says he was a great Follower, but his Tackle was wrong, a coarse gaming Sort of Tackle; he was no great Attill at it; and that he often shot Rabbits.

The next Witness is John Smith: He says he saw the Prisoner the same Day, and he asked him if my Lord Ogilvie's Hounds were out a hunting? He told him he did not know; he was curious and a damning my Lord Ogilvie, and said, If he saw him he would shoot him. This was about two Stones Throw from the Place where this Accident happen'd. He said he hath several times been in a Boating with a Gun, very often. He was asked whether he took him to be a Madman? He said he never talked much Sense, and he would often rail, and swear, and swear to himself; Then the Prisoner said himself he never swore; the Prisoner observed it upon that Occasion, that he never swore; and the Witness says that he took him that Morning to be in Drink; and when he was asked, Whether he took him to be distracted? he said, He did not see him to be sober, he was not right in his Senses, he would talk and swear to much to himself.

The next Witness is John Smith: He says he saw the Prisoner that Day; he says he heard his Gun go off, and he came afterwards into the Publick House where he was, and the Witness asked the Prisoner if he had shot a Rabbit? He told him he had shot nothing; it was only in discharge his Gun: From whence they make an Observation for the King, Why should he discharge his Gun, unless it was that he might be more sure of its going off when he charged it again, for it might be wet and damp by lying by? That shows his Reason and his Judgment, if he did this, it shows it was not the Effect of sudden Rage and Distraction, but a premeditated thing, laid with Design and Artifice, and that he had the Use of his Sense and his Reason: if that was the Cause of his discharging his Gun, though no Reason is given for it; And what Reason could it be? for they do not offer any Reason, unless it was so secure it, that the Gun should go off for it having remained charged some time before, it may be moist, and so would not go off: Whether he discharged it for that Reason, I must leave that to you; he only said he had discharged it. This Witness says, he was at that time in a very fierce Temper, and he never took him to be mad or distracted: He was cunning in all his Dealings with him. This Witness was a Taylor, and had Dealings with him as a Taylor for some time; he said he paid him very honestly and well, but he was always very hard: He says when he was once with the Prisoner before this Accident, and the Prisoner asked him what Sort of a Man my Lord Ogilvie was, and what my Lady Ogilvie was, the Witness gave them both a good Character, and speaking of my Lady that she was a good Woman, says the Prisoner, Why don't she cut my Lord Ogilvie's Throat? He says he used to shoot Rabbits, and afterwards he went to see him when he was in the House of Correction, and he ask'd him what the People said; and he said the Vogue of the People at Guildford was, that

The next is Mary Adonis: She says she always thought him to be mad by his mad Actions: she says he would curse and swear, and that the Guards before he shot my Lord Ogleby he came to their House, and called in, and looked in wildly, that he was frightened: When he was in Prison he earned him Vitale, and the Guards told her being no Bones, nor Knives, for they were afraid he would do himself a Mischief; then he asked a Boy that was with her, whether they were played with the Bolles and Buggs, as formerly!

The next is Stephen Fache: He says they found him in Leagly Lodge, lying only upon the Wood, in a Morning, about two Years since, in the Spring of the Year, about Seven o'Clock in the Morning.

The next Witness is Robert Dandy: and he says he always thought him a crazy Man, feldom in his Senses; he says he hath threatened to beat his Father.

The next is Mary Samsom, the Wife of ——— Samsom, where he lodged, as hath been observed, for a matter of fifteen Months, and at that Time, she says, she thought him a Madman, not in his right Senses. Once they could not prevail upon him to come into the House, because he had said, there were Rogues hid, and he did lie out that Night. She gives you the same Story, about the Hammer of Wine; and that the Prisoner talked to her Husband, that there was too great Familiarity between her and my Lord Ogleby. Sometimes he would pretend to read in the Bible: Once he read in the Bible two or three Chapters very well. Another Time, being wroth, he gave him the Bible, and asked him to read, he pretended to read, but appeared much fitter to sleep as ever was in the World: He then asked of my Lord Ogleby's playing him. She tells you, that he did not be at home that Night before this Accident happened, but was home from in the Morning; and he went out, and came back again, and then the Boy told him, that Mr. Wise wanted to have his Rabbits killed, and the Boy and he was to go Hawes, and the Murder did lend him a Shilling to buy Powder and Shot for that Purpose. Now it turns, the Place where Mr. Wise's Conies are, is near the Place where this Accident happened, so that they would have you think, that this Powder and Shot, which he bought, was to kill these Rabbits, and that he was going that Way in order to it. You will remember what was proved as you about the Shoe, that it was not the usual Shoe that he bought, but a bigger Shoe. He went up the Lane, the Witness tells you, towards the Place where Wise's Conies were: Soon after that, he heard a Gun go off, and the thought he had been killing some of the Rabbits; but soon after, the law several Horfes, and Nobody upon them, and some Gentlemen, and they came and asked her for some Water and Brandy, to relieve my Lord Ogleby under his Misfortune; and then she came to hear, that the Gun that went off, infixed of killing Rabbits, went off against my Lord Ogleby. She says, the faith heard him say, he would kill my Lord Ogleby: She says, he hath sometimes threatened to kill her, but yet did not do her any Harm. They think this Evidence to be very material, that they have produced two Witnesses, that tell you, that they heard this Mary Samsom say the very same Things to them, as she hath now given in Evidence.

The next is Mr. Capeland, he says, he was with the Prisoner in the Meeting, and then he asked him, What induced him to do so horrid a Fact? He said, My Lord Ogleby had bewitched him: He asked him, If any body had put him upon it? At first he hesitated, but afterwards he said, Nobody. He was very confused, and he thought him mad.

The next is Mr. Dwy, he said, He often examined him, could get no Answer from him, but said, My Lord Ogleby had bewitched him, and was a Trouble to him. This is the Evidence on behalf of the Prisoner, to show that the Prisoner is mad, and what he did, as such, is no Crime; and therefore no great Weight ought to be laid upon it.

But by way of Reply, they have read Papers under his own Hand. Mr. Barnell Swath, he was with him, and he hath proved them to be his Hand. One Paper is the State of his Cafe, and the Witness writ it, but he took it from his own Mouth, which is the same as if he had writ it himself, and the Prisoner signed it. It happened to be blessed; this is mentioned to show his Senses, and that he was a Man of Distinction; says he, You have blessed it, it can't be read, it must be writ over again: The Witness told him, No, it would do; Well, if it be so, I will be satisfied; and he desired the Witness to pray my Lord Ogleby, that his sins might be taken off, for they seem very grievous to him. The next Paper is (here are three) a Letter writ with his own Hand; and here is another Letter writ with his own Hand: Both books agree, that the Jury might have the Papers to peruse. In this Paper, he says, He was excused to this by ——— and the Refinement he expressed to my Lord Ogleby, proceeded from several Persons, persuading him, that my Lord Ogleby was the Occasion of all his Troubles, and several Persons came here, and took the Advantage of it, and told him, that he was the Occasion of all his Troubles: This he gives you as the Occasion of his great Refinement against my Lord Ogleby: This is as rational an Account as any mortal Man can give. Then there is this Letter, then he writes to my Lord Ogleby: It is directed, To the Reverend Lord Ogleby; but in the Letter it is, Please your Honour to take into your Consideration, &c. and the other Letter is much to the same Purpose: These you will have along with you.

Then you hear Mr. Cox, and he went to him the Day the Fact was committed, and at that Time he would say nothing to him: The next Day he went again, and then he said, My Lord Ogleby was the Occasion of all his Troubles. The third Day he went, and asked him, If he intended to kill my Lord Ogleby? And he said, Yes, to be sure: Where did you intend to hit him? Says he, When I shoot at a Rabbit, I always aim at his Head. He went to him again, when he was in the Meeting, and he was very ill, and he asked for some White-wine for him, but he said, The White-wine was too sharp for his Stomach; and then he called for some sack, which he had; and he held down his Head, and formed in a bad Condition. Then he professed him to know who set him on work; and he said, If my Lord will come here himself, let him, but let him not send any more of his Fools after me.—This Gentleman says, he was his School-Fellow; he was just of the same Nature then, a ragged, dogged, humorous Fellow, hardly cared to talk or speak to any body, he is just the same now, though he hath had no Conversation with him since; but about two Years ago, he fed him, and he had a Vile in his Hand to sell, and he asked to buy it, and offered him Sixpence for it. My says he, it is hardly worth a Shilling, and a Shilling I will have. This is mentioned, to show that he was a Man very sensible, made a very sensible Answer; no Man could make a proper Answer than this Man did.

This is the Evidence on both Sides. Now I have laid it before you, and you must consider of it; and the Showing my Lord Ogleby, which is the Fact for which this Prisoner is indicted, is proved beyond all manner of Contradiction; but whether this showing was malicious, that depends upon the Faculty of the Man. That he did, and that wilfully, but whether maliciously, that is the Thing: I have in the Question, Whether this Man hath the Use of his Reason and Senses? If he was under the Visitation of God, and could not distinguish between Good and Evil, and did not know what he did, though he committed the greatest Offence, yet he could not be guilty of any Offence against any Law whatsoever; for Guilt arises from the Mind, and the wicked Will and Intention of the Man. If a Man be deprived of his Reason, and consequently of his Intention, he cannot be guilty; and if that be the Case, though he had actually killed my Lord Ogleby, he is exempted from Punishment: Punishment is intended for Example, and to deter other Persons from wicked Delights; but the Punishment of a Madman, a Person that hath no Design, can have no Example. This is on one Side. On the other Side, we must be very cautious; it is not every fantastick and idle Humour of a Man, that will exempt him from Justice, and the Punishment of the Law. When a Man is guilty of a great Offence, it must be very plain and clear, before a Man is allowed such an Exemption; therefore it is not every kind of fantastick Humour, or something unreasonable in a Man's Action, that points him out to be such a Madman as is to be exempted from Punishment: It must be a Man that is totally deprived of his Understanding and Memory, and doth not know what he is doing, no more than an Infant, than a Liar, or a wild Beast, such a one is never the Object of Punishment; therefore I must leave it to your Consideration, whether the Condition this Man was in, so it is represented to you on one Side, or rather, both these a Man, who knew what he was doing, and was able to distinguish whether he was doing Good or Evil, and understood what he did; and it also be observed, they admit he was a Lunatick, and not an Idiot. A Man that is an Idiot, that is born so, never recovers, but a Lunatick may, and hath his Intervals; and they admit he was a Lunatick. You are to consider what he was at this Day, when he committed this Fact. There you have a great many Circumstances about the buying the Powder and the Shot; his going backward and forward: And if you believe he was sensible, and had the Use of his Reason, and understood what he did, then he is not within the Exemptions of the Law, but is as subject to Punishment as any other Person. Gentlemen, I must leave it to you.

Then the Jury withdrew to consider of their Verdict, and in a short Time returned again.

Cler. of the Ass. Gentlemen, answer to your Names.

Here, and so the rest.

Cler. of the Ass. Gentlemen, are you all agreed on your Verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Cler. of the Ass. What shall I say for you?

Jury. Our Verdict.

Cler. of the Ass. Edward Arnold, hold up thy Hand. (He holds it up.) Look upon the Prisoner, now lay you, is Edward Arnold guilty of the Felony whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Cler. of the Ass. What Goods or Chattels, Lands or Tenements?

Foreman. None, to our Knowledge.

Cler. of the Ass. Then hearken to your Verdict, as the Court hath recorded it. You say Edward Arnold is guilty of the Felony whereof he stands indicted; and that he had not any Goods or Chattels, Lands or Tenements at the Time of the Felony committed, or at any Time since, to your Knowledge, and so you say all.

Whereupon, he received Sentence of Death: But at the Intercession of the Right Honourable the Lord Ogleby, his Execution was refused, and he continued a Prisoner in the New Goal, Southwark, upwards of thirty Years, and there died.

N U M B E R I.

The Arraignment of Sir Thomas Wiat, Knight, at Westminster, xliiii Martii, Anno Primo Mar. R. 1554.*

THOU art Indicted, Sir Thomas Wiat, Knight, for that thou, on the 14th Day of February, last, at Brayfield, in the Countie of Middlesex, leavest Warre against our Sovereigne Ladie and Queene, her Crowne and Dignitie: How falsest those? Art thou Guiltie, or No?

Wiat. My Lordes, if I should please Guiltie, should I not be then excluded afterwards to use crasse Thinges that I have to say?

Cornu. You shall, Mr. Wiat, have Leave to say and be heard what you can.

Wiat. Then, my Lordes, most I confesse Guiltie, as in the said Trowthe most enforce me to say?

I must acknowledge this to be a just Plague for my Sinnes, which I most grievously have committed against God, who hath suffered me to fall into this heathen Brutishenes, and horrible Offence of Treason.

And for in me the like, and as farbe, who amongst like Esop perle from the Beginning: For perle the Chronicles shew, and you shall read, that never Rebellion against their natural Prince and Countie, from the Beginning, prospered: Howe the Illith was but a Rebel, for to make I call him; he continued not long, but at the said default, it fell into the right Lyne againe: and the Usurpation revealed in his Blood: For the Love of God, all you Gentlemen that be here, remember, and be taught by Examples past, as also by thys my present Infelicite, and most heinous Offence.

O most miserable, mischevous, and bestidde, furious Imagination of mine: For I thought, that by the Marriage of the Prince of Spain, the second Parson of this Realme should have bene in Danger.

And I who have lived a Freeman borne, should together with my Countie have bene brought to Bondage and Servitude by Aliens and Strangers; which brutish Brutities then seemed Reason, and wrought so fast, and to such Effect, as it led me to the Use and Practice of this committed Treason: But now, acknowledging the great Commendation, Honor, and Service, which this Realme shall receive by this Marriage, if it shall please the Queene to be mercifull unto me, therein no Man living that shall more truelie and more faithfullie serve her Highnes, whatsoever the Quarrell be: I serve the Queene's Highnes against the Duke of Northumberland, as my Lord of Arundell can witness: My Grandfather was upon the Rache for her Majesties Grandfather: My Father served King Henry the Villth, and I served him likewise, as also her Grace's Brother, and in Wunche of my Blood left in the Fesche, I carie a Mayme. I alledge not all this, either to Merit or Advancement, for by this heathen Brutishenes, to which most miserable I am fallen, and I have not onely accused my owne Deathe, but overthrow my House and Name, and delaced all my Father's Well-doings, if ever there were any.

I will not justify my self in any thing, neither can I alledge any Excuse of my Offences, but most humble submit my self to the Queene's Majesties Mercie and Pardon.

Drinking your, my Lord of Suffolk, and your Mr. Hoffier, with all the rest, to you a Meane to the Queene's Highnes for Mercie; for Pettie is the greatest Treasure that ever God gave to Man, and it is that which he especially haile chaste to himself, which if her Highnes will vouchsafed on her Merit to believe it so him who that he most glad to serve her Highnes, and readied to die in her Grace's Cause: For I groweth before the Judge of all Judges, I never more Hurte against her Highnes Person.

The Queens Answer. Mr. Wiat, you have great Cause to be sorry and repentant for the Fault whereby you have not onely annoyed yourself, but also Numbers of other Gentlemen, who being true Men, might have served their Countie. Yet, if you had gone no further, it might the better have bene borne withall: Not to contented, you procured the Duke of Suffolk, a Man fore trained to your Purpoise, and his two Brethren also, by which, without the Queene's Mercie, you have overthrow the noble House: Yet not to stand, you attempted the second Parson of this Realme, who should have bene all our Comfort, whereby her Honor is brought in question, or what End it will come unto, God knoweth, and this are you the Author of.

Wiat. Good Mr. Attorney, as I will not in any thing justify my self, for being in Decree to much, overcharge me not with more Mischiefe, and make or shew to be that I was not: I am loathe to touch any Man openlie, but that for myne owne Discharge, I am driven far to do: And as I have given in Confession, so I affirm, that my Lord of Drumme sent Sir Edwarde Rogers for me to come to my House, and when I came, he brake the whole Treason unto me; he said, that he himself would go, and I cannot tell, but he said he would doe many Thinges: This proves I was not the faultie.

The Queens Solicitors. As Mr. Attorney hath moved you, that is, to repent your Offence, so I, for my Parte, wille you the same: But what were you furtie, when you said, to write to my Ladie Elizabeth's Grace, that she should remove further from the Queene, and also that my Lord of Norfolke's Men held from him at Reynolds Bridge to you, as a joyful Newes you sent to my Ladie Elizabeth of your good Success, and the againe sent your Thanks: Is not this true?

Wiat. What I have written, I confesse, and it is true.

The Master of the Harp's Answer. Mr. Wiat, we are not thies yours Writtes, and as such Terms, when Mr. Grosvenor and I were sent unto you from the Queene, you answered us, that the Queene should goe to the Tower, and you to have her Parson with the Tower in keeping, also the Tresant, and furtie of the Councilors as you would require; for you said you had rather be trusted than trust.

Solicitor. This had be ever called Wiat's Rebellion, as the Rebellion of West Tyle was called West Tyle's.

Attorney. Mr. Wiat, were you not privie howe the Queene should have bene flane, as she did walke? I do not burden you to consent to this; for thus muche must I say, you wilked it.

Wiat. My Attorney, I furtie opened this, coming to my Remembrance when I heard William Teme would have flane himselfe, for it was his Device, and he brake in this way to Sir Michell de Seile, Yf the Queene were killed, quoth he, all weare wile, and then he doo it a Man to doe it as Jane Fitzwilliam. Sir Nicholas Arundell tolde it Sir James Croft, and he tolde it Jane Fitzwilliam, and Jane Fitzwilliam tolde it me, and thus at the 4th Hand I heard it. Then made I a Cattel with a whole Beest in it, with a whole Iron and half a Yard of ——— in it, and sought Jane Fitzwilliam a whole Day, and could not finde him. The next Day, I sent the Cattel by my Man, and told him both him well, for the Kneave it but a spee, and to utter it he durst not, and therefore be heald to beate him? Then my Man carried the Cattel thre Days, to have beaten him: By this it was apparent, how much I abhorred that Practice.

Then was the Letter showed which be wrote to the Duke of Suffolk, Mr. Wiat being then in Southwark, that he should meet him at Kingsbridge, and to go to London with him, althowhe he came with the Flower Company. Wiat at the furtie remembered so fath Letter; but when it was showed him, he confessed his Hande.

It was demanded of him, what he ment to referre to my Ladie Elizabeth; and after his Pardon offered, to refuse also the Countess of the Queene to my Ladie Elizabeth's Grace, among other things befidde sent.

Wiat. My Lordes, as my Fault is most vile and heinous, for the which I alke God Mercie, and next him our Sovereigne Ladie and Queene, whom I most grievously have offended, appealing whole to her Mercie, without which I cannot challenge any thinge I have committed. I have served her Highnes in such force and degree as I either could or am able; for I have uttered what I knowe in all thinges, whereby I might deliver her Highnes from further after Perill as the Concealment of Trators or Treason might prejudice or harme: I have done this for her Highnes Service, as I am bounde therto by Duty and Trowth, which truly I have declared; for I think and earnestly believe, she is as careful for this Realme as of shes a cherefull Jewell: I must confesse that of all the Services I have bene in, there was never a more deperat Journe taken in hande, and in the said continued most deperat. And whens it was asked how I related the Queene's Highnes Pardon offered, unspoke Man, what said I?

When I was once entered in that desolable Deperatnes, there was no waie but to wade through with it that I had taken in hande; for I thoughte others had bene so forward as I my selfe; and following the *Esop*rice, used all goodli meanes that might endure the force, as writing to my Ladie Elizabeth, and making the Proclamation in Southwark. Well, their selfe now in the Queene's Highnes, either of Justice by Death, which justice I have deferred with West Tyle, to make me an open Example to the Worlds Eyes; or els of her Mercie to save me, and use my Service in furtie force as her Highnes thinkes me meet and humble to doe: And albeit that her Grace hath this my Request in Writing, yet I most humble beseeke you to be a meane to the Queene's Highnes for her Mercie and Pardon, which is my laste Hope and onlie Refuge: And I beseech God that the Queene may be so mercifull unto me, as I meane to serve her Majestie faithfullie and true. God's Will be done on me. Yf ther be but two true Men, I will be the one to die at her Grace's Foote: And so ended.

The Lordes proceeded to be a meane for him; his Countenance was dolefull, and Teares gushed out continually.

He was afterwards executed.

bayeur mais elle ne pas vouloir au pair de la Maladye, chose que Royce en reconnaissance bien à plus (le dit-elle) vous dire à Montf. de Bodol que je ne vais jamais le Roy que Royce n'y est & voyait tout ce que je fais. Ann. La Royne lui dit, Paris ballez vous de revenir car je ne bougerai d'ici, jusqu'à un Temps que m'avez rapporté la Religieuse.

Etant led. Paris arrivé à Lifsbury, trouva led. de Bodol en son Logis à l'Abbay, lequel lui dit, Ma Paris, tu es le bien venu. Montf. dit il vous des Lettres que la Royne vous envoie & aussi à Montf. de Lifsbury, vous priant de les lui dévaler, & que je vous va parler ensemble pour vous rendre sages de faire & exécuter tout accordez ensemble, car bien dit il, car j'y ai couru jusqu'à la nuit, & la Chambre vous Hagnum. Le lendemain led. Paris dit qu'il vint au Logis de Bodol par trois fois le chercher, à 3, 4 & 5 heures & ne le trouva jamais, mais à la fin Paris le trouva lui dit qu'il était cherché, à la haute Ville que par aventure il le trouva, en quelque lieu & l'après cherché il peut venir un Troupe de Gens de vers le Kirk de Fild, la ou étoit led. Sieur de Bodol & Montf. Jacques Balfour chez la colle ensemble lesquels s'en allèrent dîner au Logis dudit Montf. Jacques. Led. Paris pria Montf. de Bodol de le despatcher vers la Royne, après dîner de lui le ferry, & quant il retourna qu'on le despatche après dîner il trouva le Sieur de Bodol led. M. Jacques lui dit, Telle est une Chambre, & led. Sieur de Bodol qui étoit de la propre Montf. & après avoir bu, il dit à Paris, voyez la Religieuse retourne l'en à la Chambre, & me reconduisez bien humblement à la bonne Grâce, & lui dit-elle que tout va bien, car Montf. Jacques Balfour, & moi nous avons donné toute la nuit, sans nous en aller en toute & nous appeler le Logis, & fins à la Royne que je lui envoie ce disant que tu lui porteras, & que je l'ai aussi mon Cœur je le jure enverrai très volontiers, mais je ne l'ai pas moi. Va t'en à Montf. de Lifsbury, & lui demandes s'il ne veut aller à la Royne, ce que led. Paris fit & le trouva à la Chambre des Comptes, & lui demanda s'il plaidait contre la Religieuse aux Lettres de la Royne, que de Bodol lui avait baillé. Oui [dit-il] & la dessus il prit du Papier nécessaire & écrivit, & quant fait, led. Paris lui dit que la Royne l'aurait commandé de lui demander lequel de deux Logis ferait le meilleur pour le Roy, car elle ne bougera de la jusqu'à ce qu'il l'aurait rapporté la Religieuse & led. Lifsbury lui répondit que le Kirk de Fild ferait bon, & led. Sieur de Bodol & lui avaient avisé ensemble la dessus. Alors led. Paris partit pour s'en à Glasgow vers la Royne & étant de retour à Lifsbury & avec lui son Médail qui lui eût donné dudit Seig. de brèche la Royne lui demanda, s'il avait vu parler Montf. de Bodol & Lifsbury ensemble dudit que non, mais que Montf. de Bodol lui avait dit qu'il se devait parler de bon Village ensemble, & que led. Sieur de Lifsbury étoit du tour à lui & que le Logis étoit prêt.

Ann. Comme elle retournoit de Glasgow vers Lifsbury avec le Roy & Katharine s'adressa au Hecce de Montf. Bodol aud. Paris & lui bailla une Lettre pour la présenter à la Royne, ce qu'il fit, laquelle lui demanda si l'Homme étoit sûr, je pense dit il Madame qu'il ne lui vaudrait pas envoyer un Homme qui ne fait sûr; la dessus en allant, elle relut une Lettre & y mit dedans un Anneau & la lui bailla, pour la bailla aud. Homme porter, chose qu'il fit, pour la rapporter aud. Seig. de Bodol. Après la Royne & le Roy étoient à Lifsbury, elle dit au Paris que elle voulait mettre Gilbert Curt Valet de Chambre chez le Roy pour ce qu'il étoit de bon Esprit à fin de voir ce qu'il feroit, car elle ne se feroit point à Sando Darwin. Dudit Paris Jehan Hoy par elle despatche vers Montf. de Bodol, auquel elle mit elle alors l'en, & après aussi Paris avecques deux Brillollets aud. Sieur Bodol. Led. Paris arrivant à Lifsbury lui bailla les Brillollets, lequel Brillollet eût à monter à Cheval pour à aller trouver le Roy & la Royne, avecques lequel led. Paris alla au devant le Roy, lequel ils conduisirent jusqu'à son Logis à Kirk & Fild.

Interrogé si il faisoit aucune prière entre la Royne & Bodol durant le Temps que le Roy étoit à Kirk & Fild. Répondit, que Montf. Bodol lui avait dit que toutes les nuits Joan Hepburn feroit le grand soula les Galènes à Sando Darwin, cependant que Lady Katharine étoit bien tard le querir pour l'amener à la Chambre de la Royne, lui déclinant aller à Paris fur la Vir de ne dire que la Femme étoit avecques lui.

Interrogé si faisoit de l'Entree de meistre du Roy depuis son Arrivement à Kirk & Fild jusqu'à un jour de l'Exécution. Répondit, que non autrement ce que qu'il en a déjà depose en la Deposition soude le 2^e de ce mois, en adjoutant que le jour que Montf. de Bodol lui avait commandé le fait de mourir du Roy qui fut le même jour que la Royne couchait au Logis du Roy à Kirk & Fild (ainsi comme il en souvenait bon bien) & comme led. Paris voulait dire le fait de la Royne en la Chambre qui étoit d'ordres sous la Chambre du Roy, après que Montf. de Bodol lui avait commandé l'en qu'il parle avecques lui au tour la ou il se défaisoit pour lui fin Affaires, led. Sieur de Bodol défendit aud. Paris de ne dire le fait de la Royne d'ordres sous le fait du Roy car je ne suis pas de dire le fait de la Royne en ce fait il ce me fait la sages que je fis au même en droit la ou il me fait défendre par led. de Bodol, la Royne me dit, Soit que tu es, je ne vaux pas que mon fils soit en ce fait & de fait le fait soit, par lesquels paroles j'y apperçus à mon Esprit qu'elle étoit Conscience du fait, la dessus, je pris la Harde de lui dire, Madame, Montf. de Bodol m'a commandé de lui porter les clefs de votre Chambre & qu'il a envie d'y faire quelque chose, c'est de faire faire le Roy en l'air, par Posteur que il y fera mettre, ne me parle point de cela & de la honte, en dit elle sans en ce que tu vois. La dessus je ne cessai parler plus avant: A ces paroles je commençai à confondre, que j'étais employé en ce fait méchant. Apprenant par paroles couvertes de desgrais, étant enveillé de Glasgow vers Montf. de Bodol pour bailler lequel des Logis étoient le meilleur, & par ce aussi qu'il me rendait alors quant il me renvoyait vers la Royne, vous la dites si elle vous demand ce que j'y fais que je veuille venir cette nuit & Montf. Jacques Balfour pour appeler le Logis du Roy.

Vol. VIII.

Etant interrogé, si la Royne passait plus entre elle & lui au Kirk & Fild, dit qu'elle n'en, mais le Posteur après plus fort que jamais, & par là elle du propos de Montf. de Bodol de la Femme & des autres choses & étant couché ne dormoit point toute la nuit, ainsi étoient des Lettres à Montf. de Bodol & les envoie par led. Paris au Sieur de Bodol en son l'ence à deux heures de nuit, mais rien de créance. Et ayant dévalé cette Lettre aud. Paris de Bodol lui refusa d'aller au fait, & ne baillait la Religieuse aud. Paris, il lui dit, donne à la Royne que je ne dormirai point que je ne sois avecques mon Entree, quant je déboursai trayer la Pique toute ma Vir pour l'Amour d'elle.

Etant de retour vers le Roy Fendry au Matin, lui ayant reconquis en même Parole que lui avoit donné Montf. de Bodol, & bien Paris ce dit elle (en tant) il n'en viendrait jamais si Dieu plait & ce point lui, & se dit-elle étant au fait. Et comme elle s'habillait led. Paris prend les deux clefs de la Chambre de la Royne selon de Commandement dudit Montf. de Bodol & les lui apporta, lequel ayant fait sortir tout le Monde de la Chambre prend la clef d'une Coffre qu'il avoit en la Pechem, & après avoir ouverte le dit Coffre entre des autres clefs confédérées sous seules en en regardant les autres après des autres, dit à Paris, tu as eues toutes bien, après celles là & il remette les confédérées dans la Coffre.

Etant interrogé, si l'écrouille qu'elle faisoit & baillait les clefs confédérées aud. Sieur de Bodol. Répondit, qu'elle n'en faisoit rien & ne dit. Sieur de Bodol, lui dit, qu'il avoit toutes les clefs dans la Porte de ce Logis là, & que lui & Maître Jacques Balfour avoient été toute une nuit pour chercher la fenêtre la meilleur Entree, comme il a déjà dit, mais cependant que led. Paris étoit absent avecques les clefs, Archieve Balfour Hedder demand les clefs, pour laisser entrer la Royne au Matin & ce point lui, & ne pouvant trouver la Royne en fait fautive & dit tout brutalement Paris à son amant, Paris pourquoy avez vous emporté les clefs de ma Chambre, lequel ne lui répondait mot sur l'heure, mais après la trouvant à part lui, lui Madame pourquoi m'avez vous ditte devant le Monde que j'ai pris les clefs de votre Chambre, voyant que vous faisois bien le marquage, & ba se ditte elle Paris c'est tout un: Ne te fâche, ne te fâche, & d'autant qu'il en pourroit avoir bon Souvenance comme il dit qu'il ce Fendry, la nuit la Royne coucha en son Logis du Roy, & lui renvoy à de seches paroles des Lettres au Sieur de Bodol.

Interrogé, si l'avoit rien entendu de ce propos le Sunday au Matin. Répondit, que non, ly n'en que la Royne dit en Préface de ce point de la Chambre qu'il y avait en quelque Querelle entre le Roy & Montf. de Bodol Grav lequel avoit bien moyen à cette heure la de voir le Roy car il n'y avait en la Chambre alors qu'elle pour les départir. Et dit outre, qu'après dîner led. Sieur de Bodol lui commanda de prendre la clef de la Chambre de la Royne, chose qu'il ne s'eût enve de faire, mais comme la Royne feroit de la Chambre, elle le regarda & lui commanda de prendre la clef. Et au fait la Royne étoit à l'Abbay elle envoie led. Paris vers Montf. de Bodol, lui commanda lui dire de bouche aller vous en à Montf. de Bodol, & lui dit-elle qu'il me semble qu'il feroit le mieux que Montf. de St. Gravis, avecques Gilbert Maistre aillent à la Chambre du Roy faire ce que led. de Bodol fait, & qu'il parle à Montf. de St. Gravis touchant ce Purpos car il feroit mieux ainsi qu'autrement; & pour ce ne feroit qu'un peu Prisoner dehors le Château; après avoir led. Paris reconquit ses clefs à Montf. de Bodol, il lui dit, je parlais à Montf. de Santo Grav, & puis j'ai tant parler avecques moi-même à la Royne. Led. Paris n'a pas de Souvenance d'ailleurs chose que ce soit ou point lui; mais elle dit content en la première Deposition, jusqu'à ce que par la Royne arriva en l'Abbay, & Montf. de Bodol s'étoit aussi retiré en la Chambre, avecques led. Paris s'arrivant Montf. de Hoddy en Compagnie de deux ou trois Servants, & ce par le chemin derrière l'Abbay, qui menait droit au Logis de son Montf. de Bodol; & après qu'il avoit passé en l'ouïe ensemble, comme Montf. de Bodol avoit déjà commencé de changer les Habillures, le dit Bodol dit après au dit Paris, que Montf. de Hoddy c'étoit effrayé d'aller avecques lui, mais qu'il ne le voyoit mentir, quant & lui, & après que Montf. de Hoddy ce fut partie pour aller coucher, led. de Bodol prit le Tailor & Paris avecques lui, comme il est dit en la première Deposition à cette Marque &c. Le Lady main entre aussi & dix heures led. Paris dit qu'il entra dans la Chambre de la Royne la quelle étoit bien close, & son fils tendu du tour, enve de Dani, & de la Chandelle allumée dedans la ruelle, ou Madame de Briev lui donna à déjeuner avec. Out là, ou aussi Montf. de Bodol survint & parla à elle secretement sous la Couronne. Ce jour la Lady ce passa aussi, sans le que led. Paris parla à elle Mardy au Matin elle le lea, & le dit Paris étoit avec en la Chambre, la Royne lui demanda (Paris qu'il n'y) Hela ce dit il je n'en que chacun me regarde de colle, ne te chaille, dit elle, je te ferai bon Village, Peur ne t'obéis de mort cependant, elle se luy dit chose de Conséquence jusqu'à ce qu'elle aille à Sene, alors, elle luy commanda de prendre une Coffre ou il y avait une Chambre & que le Theatiner luy avoit apporté de Paris pour la porter à la Chambre de Montf. de Bodol, qui étoit à cette heure la haute dedans le Palais, au dessus de la Chambre la ou étoit le Coffre & puis après lui commanda de prendre son Coffre des Bagues, & les faire porter au Château, & le dévaler entre le mains de Sieur de Shirley qui son Capitaine sous Montf. de Bodol, chose qu'il fit, en après elle voyant led. Paris tout enve, elle prit-elle feroit feroit de faire Service à Montf. de Bodol, ce qu'il n'avoit enve de faire ainsi demandant feroit son Corps & voyant cela, à la fin elle luy dit, Paris allez vous confier avec Montf. Jacques Balfour, & en avec Homme d'Esprit je moy ferois confier par plusieurs Jours & ne confie de Paris.

Ann. Interrogé du première privauté qu'il a cognoscue entre la Royne & Montf. de Bodol.

Répondit, que c'étoit alors que led. de Bodol conduisoit la Royne vers Glasgow, quant elle alloit querir le Roy à Katharine après souper avec led. Lady Royce vint à la Chambre de Montf. de Bodol & voya

NUMBER IV.

The bringing Sir WALTER RALEIGH to Execution.*

SIR Walter Raleigh, by Virtue of His Majesty's Writ of Habeas Corpus, was brought to the King's Bench Bar, at Windsor, where he was proceeded against, as follows.

First, the Writ, delivered to the Judges by Sir Walter Aspley, was read, purporting, That whereas Sir Walter being long before, in the Presence of divers noble Personages, legally convicted of High-Treason, at Windsor, was then and there adjudged to be hanged, drawn, and quartered. After the reading of this Writ, Adv. Attorney, Mr. Henry Yarranton, spoke, in Edith, thus:

My Lords, Sir Walter Raleigh, the Prisoner at the Bar, was, Fifteen Years since, convicted of High-Treason, by him committed against the Person of His Majesty, and the State of this Kingdom, and then received the Judgment of Death, to be hang'd, drawn, and quarter'd: His Majesty, of his abundant Grace, hath been pleas'd to shew Mercy upon him till now, that Justice calls unto him for Execution.

Sir Walter Raleigh hath been a Statesman, and a Man, who, in Regard of his Parts and Quality, is to be pitied: He hath been as a Star, at which the World hath gaz'd; but Stars may fall, say, they must fall, when they trouble the Sphere wherein they abide. It is therefore His Majesty's Pleasure now to call for Execution of the former Judgment, and I now require Order for the same.

Then Mr. Forbes, Clerk of the Crown, read the Record of the Conviction and Judgment, and called to the Prisoner, so hold up his Hand, which he did. Then was the Prisoner asked, What he could say for himself, why Execution should not be awarded against him?

Sir Walter Raleigh, My Lords, my Voice is grown weak, by reason of my late Sickness, and an Ague, which I now have; for I was even now brought hither out of a.

Lord Chief Justice. Sir Walter, your Voice is audible enough.

Sir Walter. Then, My Lord, all that I can say is this; That the Judgment which I received to die is long since, I hope it cannot now be threatened to take away my Life: for that hence it was His Majesty's Pleasure to grant me a Commission to proceed in a Voyage beyond the Seas, wherein I had Power, as Marshal, on the Life and Death of others, to, under Favour, I profess I am discharged of that Judgment. First, by that Commission, I departed the Land, and undertook a Journey, to honour my Sovereign, and to enrich his Kingdom with Gold, of the Ore whereof this Hand hath found and taken in Guiana; but the Voyage, notwithstanding my Endeavour, had no other Success, but what was fatal to me, the Loss of my Son, and wasting of my whole Estate.

Being about to proceed, he was, by the Lord Chief Justice, interrupted, who spoke.

Lord Chief Justice. Sir Walter Raleigh, this which you now speak, touching your Voyage, is not to the Purpose, neither can your Commission any Way help you; by that you are not pardon'd, for by Words of a special Nature, in Case of Treason, you may be pardon'd, and not specially. There was no Word tending to Pardon in all your Commission, and therefore you must say something else to the Purpose; otherwise, we must proceed to give Execution.

Sir Walter Raleigh. If your Opinion be so, My Lord, I am satisfied, and so put myself on the Mercy of the King, who I know is gracious; and, under Favour, I must say I hope he will be pleas'd to take Consideration upon me. As concerning that Judgment which is so long past, and which, I think, here we come could witness, say, his Majesty was of Opinion, that I had had blame due thereon.

Lord Chief Justice. Sir Walter Raleigh, you must remember yourself; you had an honourable Trial, and so were justly convicted; and it were Wilful in you now to flatter yourself, and to confess your Offence did justly draw upon you that Judgment which was then pronounced against you; wherefore I pray you attend what I shall say unto you. I am here called to grant Execution upon the Judgment given your Fifteen Years since; at which Time you have been as a dead Man in the Law, and you shew at any Minute been cut off, but the King in Mercy spared you. You might think it heavy, if this were done in cold Blood, to call you to Execution, but it is not so; for new Offences have fired up his Majesty's Justice, to remember to revive what the Law hath formerly call upon you.

I know you have been valiant and wife, and I doubt not but you retain both these Virtues, for now you shall have Occasion to use them. Your Faith hath heretofore been questioned, but I am reforesaid you are a good Christian, for your Book, which is an admirable Work, doth testify as much. I would give you Counsel, but I know you can apply unto yourself far better than I am able to give you; yet will I, with the good Neighbour in the Gospel, who finding one in the Way, wounded and distressed, poured Oil into his Wounds, and refreshed him,

I give unto you the Oil of Comfort; though, in respect that I am a Minister of the Law, mixed with Vinegar. Sorrow will not comfort in some Kind: For, were you painful, Sorrow would not ease you; were you afflicted, Sorrow would not relieve you; were you tormented, Sorrow could not content you; and yet, the Sorrow for your Sin would be an everlasting Comfort to you. You must do as that valiant Captain did, who perceiving himself in Danger, said, in Defiance of Death, Drink, thus earnestly not, but, merrily thy Spirit, I expect thee. Fear not Death too much, nor fear not Death too little; not too much, lest you fall in your Slips; not too little, lest you die presumptuously. And here I will conclude with my Prayers to God for us, and that he would have Mercy on your Soul. And so the Lord Chief Justice ended with these Words, Execution is granted.

Sir Walter Raleigh. My Lord, I desire thus much Favour, that I may not be cut off suddenly; for I have something to do in Discharge of my Conscience, and something to satisfy his Majesty in, something to satisfy the World in, and I desire I may be heard at the Day of my Death. And here I take God to be my Judge, before whom I shall shortly appear, I was never disloyal to his Majesty, which I will justify where I shall not fear the Face of any King on Earth: And so I beseech you all to pray for me.

De Warranto speciali pro declaratione Walteri Raleigh, Mitici.

A.D. 1618. Rex's JAMES, by the Grace of God, King of England, Ireland, &c. Raisonné, France, and Ireland, Defender of the faith, &c. 17. Faithe, &c. To our right Trusty and Well-beloved Counsellor Francis Lord Verulam, our Chancellor of England, Greeting.

Whereas Sir Walter Raleigh, Knight, late of the Parish of Saint Martin in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex, with others, hath been indicted of divers High-Treasons by him committed against Us, and thereupon hath been tried, and found Guilty of the same, before our dear Counsellors and Counsellors, Thomas Earle of Suffolk, then Chamberlain of Our Household,

Colinet late Earle of Straburgh, Charles late Earle of Devon, Henry Lord Hunsard,

Robert Lord Croll, of Essex, then Our Principal Secretary, Edward Lord Writton, then Our Controllor of our Household,

And other our Justices of Oyer and Terminer, at our City of Windsor, in our County of Southampton, concerning Treasons, and other Offences, lately assigned; which said Sir Walter Raleigh was, for the same his Treasons, by them adjudged to be drawn, hanged, and quartered, according to the Lawes and Customs of this our Realm of England, in that Case provided; which said Commission, with the said Judgment, Indictment, and the Tryall and Proceedings thereupon, were read, and doe remayne in our said Court of Pleas, before Us to be heard; and although the said Sir Walter Raleigh be adjudged to die as aforesaid; yet We, minding to dispence with that Manner of Execution of Judgment, doe therefore, by their Privileges, pardon, remit, and release the said Sir Walter Raleigh, of and from such Execution of his Judgment to be drawn, hanged, and quartered, as aforesaid, and instead thereof, our Pleasure is to have the Head only of the said Sir Walter Raleigh cut off, at, or within our Palace of Windsor, in, or upon some fit and convenient Place, or Sea-side, to be provided in that Behalf, and that in such Sort, and Order, as in such Case have been heretofore done; the said Judgment to be drawn, hanged, and quartered, or any Law, or other Thing, or Matter whatsoever, to the contrary notwithstanding: Willing charging, and hereby expressly commanding our said Chancellor, That, upon Receipt hereof, you do forthwith direct, under our Great Seal of England, Two several Writs, one to the Lieutenant of our Tower of London, or his Deputy there, for the Delivery of the said Walter Raleigh to the Sheriff of Middlesex, at, or within our said Palace of Windsor aforesaid; and another Writ to the said Sheriff of Middlesex, for the receiving of the said Sir Walter Raleigh of and from the Hands of our said Lieutenant, or his Deputy, and for the executing of him there, at some fit and convenient Place, to be then, by our said Sheriff, certified and provided for that Purpose, as in such Manner and Form as in such Case hath heretofore been done, or to be done; and their Privileges shall be your Warrant and Discharge for the same, against us, our Heirs and Successors for ever.

Witness Our Self, at Westminster, the Eight-and-twentieth Day of October.

Per Breve de Privato Sigillo.

* People have often wondered how an old Sentence, that had lain dormant so long, could have been put in Execution; especially, as Sir Walter, by the King's Patent, had Power of Life and Death over the King's Subjects: And as what is printed in Vol. 2. pag. 219. is a very short and imperfect Account of the Proceedings against that Great Man, before Sentence, we hope the Account which we have procured from authentic MSS. will be acceptable; together with the Warrant of the Execution, from Rex's Indorse.

Compass of this Law, in regard of the manner of Trial, but such only who are excepted out of it by special Privilege. Now Irish Peers are none of these Peers excepted, and I shall prove anon.

That these Words, any Peer or Peers, extend to Peers as well as Commons, where there is no Exception of Peers, is undeniable.

First, because a Peer is a Peer, though of a higher Rank or Degree than an ordinary Commoner, or Freeman, and one kind of Peer is a Law, therefore it is thus these Words, any Peer or Peers.

Secondly, because general Laws, made for the common Good, Safety of the Realm, and Punishment of the great Crime of High Treason, are like to God himself (c), no Respecters of Persons, but bind and punish all alike. Therefore any Peer or Peers, in such a publick Law as this, made for the common Good, Safety, and Punishment of the greatest Treasons, Exits, must necessarily include all Peers, Subjects, which rank, and except none, especially the greatest, whole Examples and Officers in all publick Acts whatsoever, these Words, any Peer or Peers, extend to Peers as well as Commons, and I know no one Precedent to the contrary.

To instance some few Acts, instead of many. In the Statutes of 26 H. VIII. c. 13, and 5 E. VI. c. 11, concerning Treason, any Peer or Peers, or of the King's Subjects, Deniers, or others, that shall commit or practise Treason out of the Limits of this Realm, as any outward Peer, extend to Peers as well as Commons, therefore, in this Act of the same Nature. So in the Statutes of 1 Ed. VI. c. 1, 2, and 3 E. VI. c. 1, 2, and 6 E. VI. c. 1, 2, and 2 Ed. c. 2, if any Peer or Peers shall depose or revoke the most blessed Sacrament, or the Oath of the Common Prayer, &c. In the Statute of 1 Ed. cap. 1, and also of 5 Ed. cap. 1, if any Peer or Peers, Sec. shall commit, Sec. also Power to the Bishop of Rome, or his Legate, &c. In the Statute of 1 Ed. VI. c. 1, 2, and 3 E. VI. c. 1, 2, and 6 E. VI. c. 1, 2, and 2 Ed. c. 2, if any Peer or Peers shall be in, or put in any Jail from the Bishop of Rome, Agnus Dei, Pelicans, &c. In the Statute of 23 Ed. c. 2, if any Peer or Peers shall with a malicious Intent, seek any false or fictitious News of the Queen, &c. In 23 Ed. c. 2, if any Peer or Peers shall be in, or commit any Mischance in the Maintenance of any Justice, Prebend, &c. In all these Acts (so numerous (d) many others), the Words, any Peer or Peers, extend to Peers as well as Commons, as is referred in the Bodies and Provisions of all these Acts: Yea, in the Statute of 25 E. III. c. 2, of Treasons (though a small Penal Law), the Words are only, if a Man do treason or attempt the Death of the King, if a Man do lay or attempt to lay on his Realm, Sec. If a Man move against the King's Honour or Privilege, or his Money, Sec. Yet it hath been rehearsed without Dispute in all Times, and so signed by Sir Edward Coke, Justice 3. p. 45. 5. that this Word, a Man, extends to both Sexes alike, including Women as well as Men, Peers as well as Commons, Lords as well as Peasants; yea, all Ranks, Callings, Conditions of Men who are subjects; and that this Word Man, in the singular Number only, extends to many Men, to any Number of Men committing any of these Treasons jointly, as well as to a single Man, or Traitor, because it is a general Law, made for the Safety of the King's Person, and the Realm.

Most note then must any Peer or Peers, in this Statute, being both in the singular and plural Number (to be understood by these Words, a Man, in 25 E. III. c. 2, extend equally to single Men, Sexes, and Degrees of Men, as well as to, and to Peers as much as to, and to Peers as well as to Commons, as it doth in the Statute of 25 H. VIII. c. 22, 26 H. VIII. c. 13, 27 H. VIII. c. 3, 33 H. VIII. c. 12, and 30. 5 E. VI. c. 13, 1 Mar. c. 6, and 2 Phil. 5 Mar. c. 9, 10, 11, 5 Ed. c. 1, 13 Ed. c. 2, 18 Ed. c. 1, 23 Ed. c. 1, 37 Ed. c. 2, 3 Jac. c. 4, concerning Treasons.

Secondly, My second Argument to prove Irish Peers within this Statute, is, because Irish Commons are within its verge, even when Treasons committed in Ireland, as hath been adjudged in the fore-cited Cases of Ormond, Sir John Davis, and Mr. Malone. For Laws and Law-givers being no Respecters of Persons, where the Offences be the same, and there being no Clause, Word, or Syllable in this Statute extending to Irish Commons Treasons, but which death, may, and ought, by the full-borne Justice, Reason, and Equity, to extend to the Treasons of Irish Peers, (this Statute making no Distinction between the one and the other) and the Commons of Ireland having as absolute a Right and Liberties in their native Privilege of being tried by their Peers in Ireland (which yet is taken away by this Act in Case of Treason), as the Peers of England, we cannot, when the Law itself makes no Distinction. Therefore, since the Irish Commons are undoubtedly within the Words and Scope of this Act, to be tried at this Bar by a Middlesex Jury, the Irish Peers (which we will judge with Respect of Persons, and not a Distinction not warranted by this Act) must be also tried in the like-borne Manner. The Law is the same, the Crime is the same, both in Malone's and in Mr. Malone's Cases; therefore the Trial, and Judgment too, must, in Law and Reason, be the same in both.

Thirdly, it will be granted me, without Dispute, That if as Irish Peers commit Treason in any Foreign Parts, out of England and Ireland, as in Spain, France, Flanders, Italy or Germany, he shall be tried in this Court by an ordinary Jury. Nay, if he commit Treason in Ireland, and fly into England, he may, and shall be tried for that way Treason, by an ordinary Jury, at this Bar (e); because by flying his Country, and a legal Trial there, he hath ousted himself of the Benefit of his Peers. Therefore it extends to Irish Peers, even for Treasons done in Ireland, else they could not be triable here in any of these Cases, which are granted on all Hands to be Law.

Fourthly, It is evident by the Preamble in this Act, that English Peers committing any manner of Treason out of this Realm, are triable for it in England, by virtue of this Law, as well as English Commons, though they were not so by the Common Law. Therefore Irish Peers committing Treason shall be triable in likewise, and it is triable here as well as Irish Commons, else they should be in far better Condition than English or Scotch Peers, and quite exempted out of this Act. Now the same Words that bring English Peers within this Law, need of No further hook in Irish Peers, or, those being no Clause which excludes or includes the one more than the other.

Fifthly, The very Letter, Intent, and Scope of this Act (as appears by the Body of it, and likewise by the Statutes of 26 H. VIII. c. 13, and 5 E. VI. c. 12, to the same Effect) was, to make all Treasons done or committed out of England, by any Person or Persons whatsoever, triable in England, either before the Justices in this Court, or (d) before special Commissioners in some other Counties; but to be triable within this Realm, as the Words (d) any manner of Treason hereafter to be done, perpetrated, or committed by any Person or Persons out of the Realm of England, shall be deemed to be committed, of, done, and determined before the King's Justices of the Bench, Sec. clearly intreat in direct Terms: Therefore to make the Treasons of Irish Peers committed in Ireland, or elsewhere, triable here in England, as well as the Treasons of English Peers, or Irish Commons. And to send them back into Ireland, to be there tried by their Peers, when once they are here in Prison, and indicted in this Court, by exempting them out of this Act, contrary to the very Letter and Intent of the Law, is to run Post-black against the very Word and Meaning of this Law, and the Law-makers: Therefore be it, by this Act, be tried at this Bar, and that by an ordinary Jury only, as I shall prove anon.

Sixthly, The very Scope and sole Purpose of this Act is not to make new Treasons, or Treasons, which were not before, but to bring real Treason only, the Treasons (formerly made, or hereafter to be made and declared Treasons by the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, to exemplary Punishment in this Kingdom, for the Peace and Preservation of the King, Realm, and the better Execution of Justice (the very Life of Law) upon Delinquents out of the highest Rank, for the most transgressive Crimes of High Treasons, or Misdemeanors, or Corruptions of Treasons, not for Felonies, or Petit Treasons, which Consistencies must necessarily induce us, for the common Good, to put it in the largest, fullest, and most equitable Construction that may be.

That the Judges, in former Times, have always interpreted it, as appears by Dyer, f. 123, 258, Coke's 2d. Inst. c. 6, f. 23, and his 3d. Institut. on Litchin, f. 25, his 3d. Institut. p. 24, and in Ormond's Case, wherein the Judges resolved, First, That the Statute of 1 Mar. 2d. 1, repealing all former Treasons, has those within 25 E. III. and of 1 Mar. 2d. 1, and 2d. Mar. c. 10, enacting, That all Treasons hereafter to be done for any Treason, shall be held and adjudged only according to the due Course of the Common Law of this Realm, and not otherwise, extends not to the taking away of foreign Treason, by their Trials, by this Law. And in Ormond's Case, they extended it by Equity beyond, and in last sort, against the Letter of the Law itself, for by Building issue, and refusing his Trial, was there upon condemned and executed for a Treason committed by him in Ireland, though the Words of the Statute are, The Treason shall be enquired of, heard, and determined before the Justices of the King's Bench, by grand and lawful Men of the Court there, when the Just Bench shall sit; and the Act speaks nothing at all of Building issue. But this being a publick Law for the common Good, to bring Traitors only to their Trial and just Punishment, his Refusal to put himself upon his Trial, was adjudged to be a Determination and Conviction of his Treason within the Act, else any Traitor, by flouting issue, might evade and frustrate this good Law. If then this Statute may thus be construed by Equity, and extend beyond the Words, in out who has made issue, let a Traitor done in Ireland; much more may he be convicted on a Traitor by an Irish Peer, as I shall within the Words and Intent of it, as I have already manifested: And it would be a most pernicious Gloze which should either close or nullify this beneficial publick Law.

Seventhly, It is clearly rehearsed in and by our Parliaments, 1 E. I. Proem. 13 E. I. of Statute Merchants, 24 E. III. 1st. Parl. a. 67, in the Statute of 5 H. V. ch. 6, and in divers of our Laws, (e) That Acts of Parliament made in England, whereas Ireland is also specially named, or generally and necessarily included, do and shall be binding, as Commons or Peers alike. This therefore being such a Law, extending to and binding those in Ireland, as hath been rehearsed in the fore-cited Cases, it must certainly bind both the Peers and Commons of Ireland to a Trial at this Bar, for Treasons done in Ireland, when the King and Kingdom deem it necessary or expedient to try them here in England.

Eighthly, The Preamble in this Act for Trial of Treasons done out of this Realm, by Peers within the same, extends only in positive Terms to Peers of this Realm of England, because they only are Peers within England, and is only triable by their Peers, for foreign Treasons within the same; not to Peers of Ireland, who are no Peers, as I shall, nor triable by their Peers within this Realm of England; therefore this Preamble extending only to Peers of this Realm, excludes all other foreign Peers, whether Irish or Scots, from any Trial by their Peers in England, for Treasons acted out of it.

Ninthly, There is very great Reason why natural Irish Peers and Bishops should be within the Compass of this Law as well as Commons, and rather than any other foreign Peers, because, as our (f) Historians, the Irish Annals, Statutes, and our Records do tell us, ever since their Conquest by King Henry the Second, and Submission to the Kings of England, they have frequently (almost every Year) in small Kings, NUMBER VI.

The Dying Speech of Mr. Peter Vowell (a), executed July 10, 1654.

Gentlemen,

AT this casualty Day, from them that pretend to have a great Measure of Sanctity, I had but Measure: But to that Bar I am now going, the Bar of Heaven, where I shall have Justice, yes, one Day Justice against them, except they water their Beds and Couches with Tears and Repentance.

The Court gave severe and rash Judgment on my Body; and sent a pious Fellow (but pitiable) that gave a Judgment on my soul: that that precious Jewell none of them could touch to hurt. The Souls under the Altar cried for Vengeance, Lord, long ago: How many more of late Years have been added to them to help the Cry! The Cry is loud of these lately, whose Blood hath been unlawfully spilt. But Vengeance is God's, and I will leave it to him.

The Court at my Trial said I was confident, and held it as a Fault. He also whom they sent to the Tower (I know not of to stay me) under pretence to comfort my Soul, told me also I was confident. I say the same, and the same Confidence bring with me now, and by God's Assistance, I hope, shall carry me out of this World with my Innocence.

Gentlemen, I believe, Amongst the sweetest and most savage sort of Heavens they laid a Law, one every three, six, or twelve Months, to offer up a Sacrificed human Blood to their God; and that their God was a Devil. Ask me of it, whether Heavens or not you build know, of late Years, we have had a fatal Custom, once in three, six, or twelve Months, to make not only a Sacrifice, but many Sacrifices of human (human Blood! Our dearth hath reeked and smoked with so choicest Sort of Blood; but unto what God, do you judge. What God is he that dights in the Blood of a Man? Alas, the God of Abrahams, Beelshazars, the God of Fools.

Amongst the Primitive Christians, that lived nearest the Time of our Saviour Christ, the greatest Tyrants and Persecutors of the Christians lived. The Persecution was great, and yet the Courage of these persecuted Christians was great, that it exceeded the Joy of the Persecutors; that they came in faster to be killed, than they could kill: They offered their Bodies and Throats to stick unto the slaughter, that the Hands of the Tyrants were weary with killing, and yet Sanguis Martyrum est Semen Christianum: And many Heavens came in with the Christians, and died Christians, and died with them; the Christians still increased the more.

Of late Years there hath been a great Persecution in this Nation; and yet our Differences have been so many, and preferred themselves so thick, in the Visitation of their King, Country, and Laws, that they flattered the very Enemy himself, their Conscience to great, that the Eyes of their Judges dream Toss; whether or no, or true, let the Judge of Judges Judge: They still thus smothered in their Conscience; though they exceed the old Heavens, are not weary of killing.

Oh Soldiers! how many of you have been brought up, and led on by blind Principles, wrapped in your Education, or seduced by your indifferent, headless, and hasty Teachers? How many of you, young, have for loose small Discontent departed from your loving Mothers, dear Friends, or tender Parents, and fled into the Army? How many of you driven by tyrannous Oppression, Poverty, or Cruelty, have left your dear Wives and Children? And some for Novelty or Wantonness adhered to this Employment, not considering the great Danger of spilling innocent Blood. How many of you have drawn your Swords, you do not know for what? How many of you keep drawn your Swords, you do not know for what?

You have put to death a pious and just King; and in his blood have reaped up even another Jerusalem, that makes itself to sin: What his Guiltless it, you best know.

You have put down a good old Law, and raised up another of your own to judge the People by. For my calling for the Benefit of the poor, and for the Equity even of your own Law, I am in part condemned here to die. Be you Judge of the Proceedings.

How many of you have had a hand in pulling down the ancient true Church, and raised up in your own Imaginations a new one? But, alas! you know not what you do: If you did, you would grieve to see what a glorious Church you have raised; you would never have pulled up the Rodgers, and broken down the Fences, that the wild Beasts of the Forests should come in; that the little Fowls should devour, and the wild Boar root out so fitly a Vine.

When the Jews were led into Captivity, their goodly and magnificent Temple was burnt: But in process of Time they obtained Favour amongst the Heathen Kings they dwelt amongst, and had Liberty wherewith to rebuild. Rebuild they did, and finished a Second Temple; at which Sight all the young Men rejoiced, to see so gallant a Temple, but the old Men wept, to see how far different and short the Second Temple was from the Glory of the First. So you, young Men, rejoice at your magnificent Church; but the old Men, methinks I see some weep. Oh! weep not so me! weep for your Country! weep to see Religion, Liberty, and Laws taken from you! weep to see so many good Men scratched away, but indeed from the Miserics to come! and weep for what Miserics you unhappy selves will suffer!

Soldiers, However you flourish for a time, and perhaps many of you may rejoice at our Deaths, believe it, as Sangis pulled the Heads of the Pharisees down, when he fell; so shall we give you and your Cause a greater Blow by our Deaths, that living we possibly could have done. You may for a time flourish; but remember what our Saviour said: 'All that take up the Sword, shall perish by the Sword.' You shall be cut down like the Grass, and wither away like the green Herbs.

But do you behold yonder glorious Place! Do you behold the spangled Heavens, where the holy Angels dwell, where God himself is surrounded with Thrones, Principals, Powers, and the celestial Spirits of just Men? When the Trump shall blow, when the Dead shall rise at the dreadful Day of Judgment, how will you answer all your Rages and Murders? Do you think that your Hands, which have been bathed in the Blood of your King, the Blood of so many of your eminent Countrymen, so unjustly; that have been bathed in the Blood of many of your Friends, your Kindred, perhaps your Parents, ever reach yonder glorious Place, without Repentance? Oh! no. Repent now, therefore, it is not too late: Shake off your bloody Precious; release your unkind Laws; and call in your Royal young Prince, whom you have long enough wronged. Make your Addresses to the great Protector of Heaven and Earth; and desire him, as I now do for myself, for a Pardon, for a Pardon for all your former and present Transgressions.

I die an obedient Son of the Church of England, and with a dutiful Heart to the King, and desire that zone present that loves them would be dissuaded by my Death, but continue faithful to the End.

And so farewell, I forgive all the World.

NUMBER VII.

A true and impartial Relation of the Death (and Dying Speech) of Mr. John Gerard, who was beheaded on Tower-Hill, July 10, 1654 (b).

[Published by his Friends.]

IT was thought needful by the Friends of Mr. Gerard, to declare any thing concerning his Sufferings to the World more than in their Sight, but the benevolent Malice of the last weekly Pamphlet thrown some brains upon his Name, and so incited them to a Visitation as proud as his Death was. 'Tis most certain, that there can no Blood stick upon true Honour, which such weak Fools endeavour against it: There are cursed Beasts, but their Honors are short; legual-cour Dogs, that creep up Graves, and violate the Dead, and are fierce and ravenous; but yet Dogs still. And all worthy People will call their Raile, Praise, and what they intend a barking Infamy, the growling Merit. Yet because every Understanding is out of the Lane, Brightest, and their proud Libels may, by ill Chance, fall into some innocent Hand besides (and yet few such Vermin should be endured long), therefore let wise and good Men pardon him that hath undertaken this Justice for that Gentleman, and be pleased to read this Del Story, not for their Satisfaction sake, but their Sorrows: To may dry up a friendly Tear, perhaps, and still a murmuring Groom, to fix the comely Profile of his Puffins, how well all was carried by him, and how honourably; and the honest Circumstances may not reproachfully take off from the Sadness. Why should I grieve that Death which had such a living Glory in it, or discommend that Blood with feeble Tears, which was shed like the holy Martyrs? All that knew this Person, cannot but witness his general Resolution, and whether his great Courage fell less than itself (as the Viper's doth), or did not rather rise greater now, when the Christian was twined with the Gentileman, let this faithful Relation witness: In which, though all Terms and Syllables may not be exactly the same, yet if there be a maternal Falshood, or a wilful Flattery, may his Neck that wrote it feel a viler Dainty than Axes are, or Halberds. Amicus Gerardus, sed magis Amicus Patria.

From the first Day of his Imprisonment he showed the heavy Sentence hovering upon him, and therefore gave all Diligence to secure himself against it, that however he underwent a temporal Contumacious, he might escape an eternal. But after that God's Doom was pronounced, then he bestowed himself unshaken, and made double Haile for Heaven: It was for his Life, and therefore he would be no Murmur, but the same Night gave Directions to a dear Friend for a Minister (whom he knew to have long honoured his Family) to be

" I fear be lost his Kingdom by such Practices; but whether it would recover them so, is a Question: God hath better Ways, when it shall be good in his Sight to plead his Cause.

" I was lately in France, but on mine own Score; for I have commanded there, and probably might again.

" For my past Life, it hath been but a troublesome one, but now I hope I shall rest! Since I was any thing, I have served the King, as I was bound; and I wish all that did to have done it as faithfully: He was condemned for a Tyrant, but God—

" For my Religion, though a Soldier, I am able to profess I am a Christian Soldier, a true Son of the Church of England, as constituted under Queen Elizabeth, King James, and King Charles, of blessed Memory: Her Doctrine and Government I embrace, her Truth and Peace I pray God to restore.

" I humbly give Thanks to God Almighty, for providing me the Comfort of a Minister, on whose Fidelity I might repose my Soul.

" And I pray God to bless the poor faithful Ministers of this Church, and give you Hearts to cherish them; the Want whereof is no small Cause of our Misery.

" My Days have been few and evil, yet, God be blessed, in all the Vanities and Folly of Youth, I have been far from Atheism, or Contempt of God's Worship; I had always awful Impositions of God's Honour and Service, which is now my Comfort.

" And now, dear Countrymen, fare you well! I pray God bless you all, and this whole Nation.

" Alas, poor England! When will these black Days be over? When will there be blood enough? I wish mine may fill up the Measure.—

" I forgive all.

" Christ more, fare you well! Commend me to all my Friends, pray for me.

" I pray God make you as faithful and loyal as I have lived, and as happy as I shall be by-and-by, when I am dead.

" Come, Lord Jesus! come quickly!

" Father of Mercies, have Mercy on me!

" Saviour of the World, Love my Soul!

" O Lamb of God, that takes away the Sin of the World, hear my Prayers!

" Into thy Hands, O Lord, I commend my Spirit!

" Lord Jesus! receive my Soul!"

The Trials, Behaviour, and Dying Speeches of Col. Okey, Col. Barkstead, and Miles Corbet, Esq.
April, 1662^d.

[Published by their Friends.]

C^{OL}ONEL Okey, Colonel Barkstead, and Miles Corbet, Esquire, being involved in one and the same Danger, did, since the King's coming in, thrust themselves for Malice, after many great Difficulties and Hazards. Two of them, viz. Col. Barkstead, and Col. Okey, after a short Stay in Holland, travelled up higher into the Country, and at length settled themselves at a Town called Hove, in High Germany, where, by their good Carriage and obliging Conversation, they obtained the Favour and Privilege to be enrolled Free Burgers of the said Town. They continued there for many Months, in good Esteem with the Inhabitants, and with great Endeavour Affections to each other, some urgent Occasions pressing Col. Barkstead to return for Holland, Col. Okey, out of mere Kindness and Respect to his Friend, resolved to accompany him; and in both of them took their fifth Consistory for Holland; having before received Encouragement to undertake the Voyage, from a Friend, whom they had employed to solicit the States General, that they might abide for a short Time within their Jurisdiction, un molested, to which, as their Friend informed them, they did most freely and willingly consented. Another also was more particularly engaged by Col. Okey, to accompany Sir George Downing (the King's Resident now in Holland), with their intention of coming (speedily into that Country in case they might, for a few Days, remain there in Safety, and that he had so Credit from the King his Master to secure them. Sir George did assure that Gentleman, that he had no Order from the King to apprehend or molest them; but that they might be as free and safe there as himself. Upon this last Encouragement they did very much depend, Col. Okey especially being confident that Sir George Downing had a particular Kindness for him, who gave him his first Breach in England. This generous and plausible Colonel (who took a Measure of all Men by himself) did, without the least Reflection, suppose a great deal of Trust and Confidence in one whom he had been instrumental to raise from the Dull. They had not been long in Holland, before their Occasions called them to Delft, whereto the famous knight had timely Notice by one of his Spies, employed for that Purpose, and having in Readiness a Warrant from the States General for the taking of them, the Knight, and his ruffian Crew, without the least Shade of Humanity or Honour, having certain Knowledge of their Arrival at Delft, did, the very same Night, proceed upon their Design, and took them at their Lodging, together with Mr. Corbet, who, upon Notice had that they were in Town, went only to give them a Visit, and it being late, was even ready to take his Leave of them. When they were all three thus seized, immediately they were hurried to Prison, and by the Procurement of Sir George Downing, were most basely used, having Shackles and Fetters put upon them, and he called into a nasty, smelly, and dark Dungeon, having nothing else but the damp Earth to repose upon, and there continued in Prison, all two of the Clock the next Day, in a very bad Condition; but afterwards, being treated a little more like Men, some of the States came to them into the Prison, bringing one of their chief Ministers with them, and between examining of them, and discoursing with them concerning the Fact for which they were seized, and the Cause in which they were formerly engaged in England, wherein Col. Barkstead especially gave them such Satisfaction, that all of them, and particularly the Minister, when they took their Leaves of them, seemed to have a better Opinion both of their Persons and their Cause, than they had before; and did without give them Assurance, that they should be delivered up, to be sent for England, until they had had a more publick Hearing of what they could say in their own Defence. But by the extreme Obstinacy of Sir George Downing, and his continued Solicitations, accompanied (as is reported) with strange Menaces, these Persons were soon after, (not only contrary to the particular Engagements of the Lords before-mentioned, but also against the very Laws of Nations, and of all human Society and Commerce, yet, against their own former Practices, in the Case of Restitus, who murdered the King of France,) by Order from the States General, at two of the Clock in the Morning, taken out of Prison, and being manacled with Wrist-Irons, Chains, and Locks, were thrust into a Vessel lying at Delft, and from thence conveyed into one of the King of England's Frigates, provided for the Purpose, and so in a few Days were brought for England. When they arrived at the Tower of London, they were forthwith disposed of, by Order of the Lieutenant, to their several Prison-Lodgings; and there continued until the Sixteenth of April, 1662, upon which Day they were carried up by Water to the King's Bench Bar, to receive Judgment, having been already, by Act of Parliament, attainted of High-Treason, for compassing the Death of the late King Charles the First. After a very short Debate, whether the Prisoners at the Bar were the Persons named in the forementioned Act of Attainder, yea or no? Witnesses being produced, who made full Proof in the Affirmative, and the Prisoners themselves confessing it, the Jury, without going from the Bar, gave in their Verdict, that they were the Persons named in the said Act, wherupon Judgment was given against them accordingly. After Sentence was given, they were ascended back to the Tower.

Colonel BARKSTEAD'S Behaviour.

THE Morning of his Execution being far spent in discoursing with his Friends, the Sledge, about eight of the Clock came into the Tower, which making a great Noise upon the Stones, he ran to the Window with a smiling Countenance to view them, and said, Oh! our Christi-ans were new! A little while after the Sledge came, the Gentleman Porter, or some other Officer in the Tower, came to acquaint him with it, desiring him to prepare for his Departure; to which he rejoicfully answered, That blessed be God, it was not then to do; and so, with much Cheerfulness, he committed his Wife into the Hands of the Lord God Almighty, relying upon his Promise, That he will be a Father to the Fatherless, and a Husband to the Widow. A little before his Departure, he desired his Wife to button on his Clock, which accordingly she did, and presently the Gentleman-Jailer, and a File of Soldiers came, by his Lieutenant's Order, and secured him; at which Time he parted with his Wife and Relations, as himself professed, with as much Joy as ever he received them. Now being brought by the Jailer to the Lieutenant's Door, that being the Place appointed for the Sledge to receive them; and although it was the Place and House on which he lived in Plenty and Honour, yet he had so much changed himself unto it, that he did not so much as call his Eye open at it; so no Wonder, if his Treasures were in Heaven, that his Heart was there also. He was appointed the first that should enter the Sledge, and so to be drawn the foremost of the three through the City. Having thus entered the Sledge, he sat down, and looking about him with a cheerful Countenance, and speaking comfortably Words to such Friends as went near him, after a while, the Sledges were ordered to be drawn away, which accordingly was performed; and coming down the Church-Hill, opposite to his Prison, (after his Palace), his Wife, with some other Friends, standing at the Window, took her Handkerchief out of her Pocket, and flung it at him, which he perceiving, took off his Hat, and several Times shaking it over his Head, cried out with an astonishing Cheerfulness, To Heaven, to Heaven, to Heaven, my Love, and welcome to the Sun! Thus riding along, he came to the Tower-Gate, where some reviled him in Words and Carriages, not only his Enemies, but his former intimate Friends, which he rather smiled than was troubled at. Near Hallowe there came a young Woman to him, being very earnest to speak to him, which the Officers permitted; all that she told him he had to say to him was this, That whosoever he did, he begged of him to go on cheerfully in so glorious a Cause. Several spoke to him in the same Manner. And though he met with some Revilers in the Way, yet the Number of his Friends, and of such as blessed him, and the rest in the Name of the Lord, far exceeded them. As he passed along, several Times, a Friend that accompanied him, asked him how he did? Who told him, He was now better in all his Life, and that he grew stronger and stronger every Moment. And going up Hallowe, being in Discourse with the same Friend, who, with a smiling Countenance, told him, That he evidently saw Jesus Christ coming down left to be an Incongruity, an Inconvenience, une Nécessité, (as was in the Case of Sir John Rolfe) all which were pre-occupied in an Issue in Law, as their Lordships well knew, so that there was a Confusion without Prejudice: Yet if it should please the Judges to over-rule it, he was contented (carrying himself with much Reverence and Respect unto the Court).

To which either the Attorney General, or some other, replied, That Mr. Corbet said Truth, as to ordinary Proceedings, but here it was extraordinary, viz. by Act of Parliament as a Bill of Attainder; and then cited a Book Cal'd one Sargant, who was thus proceeded against, detained and executed in Henry the Fifth's Time. To which Mr. Corbet replied again, he had nothing to say to that, but what the Authority of the Nation had made Law, he must submit to; and did acknowledge, as Things stood, they did proceed according to the Rules given them, and in that respect did what was just, according to the perfect Law. But did you not say the Fall, faith one, by your own Flight? It being a known Maxim, Non facis fortis sceleris formam. To which Col. Barkhead answered, That he, for his Part, felt for fear of an Arrêt, threaten'd against him for Twenty Thousand Pounds for having said a Impertinent. Mr. Corbet said, That he, for his Part, did not fear for Twelve Years together after the Fall done, and that any body who had a Mind to it, might easily have tried him, it being well known where he was all that time, and when he did fly, it was not prohibited, nor any way unlawful, as conceived, for himself, or others, in so-do; and now that he was return'd again, he knew not that he was an so-law'd Person, and if Occasion had been, could have been ready to have traversed any Suit concern'd against him. And as for what he had done in this Business, that there he stood secured for, he said, he was engaged in it by the Supreme Publick Authority of the Nation, the Lawfulness of which Authority, he said, at that Time, was every where acknowledged and reported to be, and that he did not do it to please for himself, he should then have thought, that what was done by himself and others, had been very wicked and abominable! But the Authority being, since that Time, changed, and new Laws made, by which, both the Fall, and the Pescar itself too, by virtue of which it was done, are both said to have been invalid, (though the Law-makers, at that Time, did not think so,) he had nothing further to add.

This is a true Relation of this Matter, as near as possibly can be, taken from his own Mouth; if any Mistake be in a Word ignorantly related, or Sentence misquod, the Reader is desired to pardon it.

This Col. Barkhead having been before-hand at Lincoln's Inn, and known to be a good Lawyer, and late Lord Chief Justice in France, and also much acquainted, by long Experience, with Affairs of State, as having been a Member in all the Parliaments that have bin since the Beginning of the late King's Regency, and being also further known to have been an ardent and long-experienced, found Christian, a Man of a very tender Conscience, and of an holy Life and Conversation, and that as well in his greatest Prosperity, as in his Adversity, it was the earnest Desire of many, even of all Parties that knew him, fully and clearly to understand from his own Mouth (especially now in this Time of his Adhesion) what inward Peace, Quiet, and Satisfaction he had in his own Conscience, touching that Act which he was condemn'd, and very shortly to die for, and which pulled under so many dreadful Names, of the most heinous, wicked, and unparliamentary Act that was ever done, of the black Murder, most execrable Rebellion, detestable and bloody Crime, that Men ever were guilty of, and like unto which none hath been found to have been ever perpetrated in this World before, except the putting of Christ himself to death.

His Answer to this Question was the more desired, because he being taken for so good a Christian, and so able and experienced a Lawyer and Statesman, as is before described, his Opinion therein would be the more considerable, and his Words be of the greater Weight, which side favour they should fall, whether to the Justification or the Condemnation of the Fall.

Now on this Question (which he said he had long before examined thoroughly, and very well digested,) he said he would make this true, faithful, and ingenuous Answer, and hoped he should stand to it, and maintain it to his last Breath. And although he did find (he said) some near Relations were not of his mind in it, yet for his own part he remained steady and unmovable therein; and before several Witnesses (which he said now left surviving) that heard him, declared as followeth:

1. He said, When he was named and appointed by the Parliament to be one of the Judges, he was not present in the House, nor did he at any time give his own personal Consent thereto, or Approbation of it, but rather fully resolved never to engage in that Business.

2. When the Bill came into the House, he spoke against it, and gave his Reasons; nor could he be drawn by any Arguments to appear in the High Court of Justice, or allow of their Proceedings.

3. Yet, 3. The State of Affairs being as then they were, and the Consequence on both sides (either of owning, or not owning and joining in that Act), being with much Prayer and Consideration well weighed by him, he at last came to a fixed Resolution in his Mind about these ensuing Particulars.

1. That the Supreme Authority of the Nation, as then it stood (notwithstanding the alterations made in it) being generally accepted and submitted to at home, and owned by foreign States abroad, without any Question made of it from the Body and Bulk of the People (though here and there some scrupled it, whose Inquiries he ever ready) was lawful and sufficient to warrant all that was or should be done in reference to the late King.

2. That the solemn Appeals made to God on both sides, both by the King on his side, and by the Parliament on their side, all the time of the War, and answered so distinctly and fully from Heaven, on behalf of the Parliament (as all Men then seem'd to judge) did further confirm him in the Warrantableness of their Undertakings, and Righteousness of the whole Cause.

3. That the Forelight of such miserable Changes, as by return of the Hierarchy, and the Concomitants and Effects thereof (which he saw was aim'd at, and did believe was intended by the late King, at least after some time) did greatly induce him to look into, and fully inform himself about the Matter of the Charge against the said late King.

4. That upon mature and long Deliberations of Parliament, and such as were authorized to search into the Charge of refusal, he found things fully proved; and moreover said, That the Majesty objected was of a very unusual and high Nature, not that which properly lay beyond him to do what he did; was the Blood of Isaiah, and the treasoning War against the Parliament, who were thereupon forced for their own Defence and the Safety of the People (by whom they were traitors, and whose they did reject), to take up Arms, and to assault their Will, to maintain a small colony, dangerous, and unnatural War.

5. That though he was now fully satisfied in his own Mind of the Lawfulness of the Fall, as well as of the Power by which it was done, and that it was his Duty no longer to stand out, but to join with the Brethren as an Actor in it, or else he might become guilty of Unlawfulness to the Cause of God and his Country, yet such was his holy and generous Spirit, that he kept back and would not appear in it, the rather, because he was much set upon by his Nephews, Sir Thomas Corbet (who then lived in the House with him) not to meddle at all, or have any hand in it. Now this Sir Thomas Corbet having a very considerable Estate, to which himself was next heir, and which (in case he should give up to his Mind in this Business) he had Power (by cutting off the Kent) to give away from him and his Children, he was loath to displease, for he was apparently which way his said Nephew was bent. Yet,

6. Notwithstanding this, his Conscience wrought much with him, and would not suffer him (he said) to be quiet Night or Day; for while, on the one hand, his eternal Fears and doubts did Thought, pulled him from his Duty (so he called it), yet, on the other hand, it pleased God more strongly to draw him to it, by often bringing and setting home upon his Heart that Scripture in Revel. xxi. 8. The Fearful and Unbelieving—shall bear their Part in the Lake that burneth with Fire and Brimstone. This Text did so work and work in his Mind, and so powerfully prevail with him, that though he had desired to appear at the High Court of Justice till the very last Day of the Trial, yet then he durst say no longer, but made haste to come in and sit among them, come what would of it in this World, till the aforesaid Punishment of the Fearful should hereafter for ever befall him. And when he said this (he said) he did it with a free and relieved Mind, and he blessed God that had conquered his cowardly Spirit, and enabled him at last (though late) to come in and do his Part, and in some measure to prove himself faithful and obedient to God's as well as the Nation's Call hereon. And further said, that upon it a Grounds before alleged, if all that had been done were to be asked again, he would do as he had done, and would not shun an Inch of it; which Words he spoke with the great Sobriety and Solemnity of Mind but the very Day before his Execution.

Lastly, As to the whole Business, he said he could and did appeal to God, the righteous Judge of all things, that what he did (as far as he could discern himself) was not out of any ill Spirit towards the late King's Person, nor out of any least Malice or Detraction to him, nor out of any unworthy End or Design of his own; far as as to the said King's Lands or Goods, or other publick Trust, he never desired nor endeavoured to get any of them, but always by good Providence kept himself free, that neither himself, nor any of his might grow rich, or make the least Advantage that way. And as for that necessary and publick Act of Justice (so he called it), he did never repent at all that he had a hand in it, nor, after all the Searchings of Heart about it, did he Cause to do so, when at any time he had the most fervent and calm Reflections upon it; though he did confess, as to the Circumstances of that Act (the Subtleties whereof he said he must always own), he had been compelled about many sinful Weaknesses and Infirmities in the managing of it, as he had before in part himself, which he hoped and believed were all washed away in the Blood of Christ.

MR. CORBET'S Behaviour.

ON the Day of his Execution, when he was finishing his Prayer, there was a noise at the Door, occasioned by some that desired to come in (not knowing what he was about), to tell him that he must prepare for the Sledge, but that he should be called for the last of the three.

In the mean while he stood himself for his Journey, and first brought himself of his Cap, saying, Alas! I can carry a Cap to the Gallows! and so looked out the hole he had. Pray (said he) I had almost forgot it, but it may be well enough, for I have not said it to any body.

Then he took his Belt, (which he girted to his back and gave to his Keeper when he should have done with it) and put it into his Pocket, to carry with him as his last and farewell Friend and Companion both to the Sledge and at the Gallows. Next, he put a little Bottle of Cardial into his Pocket for his Use by the Way, an Occasion should be; But I hope (said he) I shall find a better Cardial, as I know I shall find, for all that. The same, and his clean Linen put on, viz. Band and Collar, with his Clean clean linnen and fitted about him, and also a new Pair of Glove, put on, which his Wife had provided for him, and which he called his Wedding Glove, he was now in Readiness whenever he should be sent for, which a Friend taking notice of, put him in mind of a Speech which fell from him the Night before, saying, For you said last Night, the Bridgroom was ready, and the Marriage Supper was ready, and the Robes and Crowns were ready, but that you were not ready! methinks you are ready now! and a very trim and handsome Bride! To which he graciously replied, Am I not! The Lord make me so, blessed be God, I can say I am willing now, as I have good Reason, for I am sure in the best Bridgroom that ever was that I am going to. And you need not be ashamed to go, I wish my Friend, considering what Garments you are clothed with, and how you are decked (alluding to those Words in Job. li. 10.). To which he replied, Whatever we have of that kind, it is all of our Bridgroom's own Gift: He is not like other Bridgrooms, for he purchases his Robes, Malice either to Judge or Jury, but desire that the Lord would forgive them; as also those as Malice that first set on foot, contrary to what they did engage to my Friends: We will say nothing of them, but pray God that our Blood may not be laid to their Charge, nor to the Charge of any in England.

Then Colonel Barrett addressed himself to speak, as followeth:

Colonel BARRETT'S Speech

Mr. Sheriff,

I Shall, as near as I can, observe your Order, and not willingly do any Thing that shall give Offence. I must confess the Weakness of my Body is such, which hath not been of a Day, but of a long Time; that it will not give me Liberty to speak much, and I have had this Advantage, that my Brethren have spoken before me; and were I to speak at large, I must speak over the same Things which they have spoken already, and I am unwilling to trouble you with that, because you had your Time was spent, and therefore I shall only speak to the Cause as it was at first stated (and, I hope, without Offence, we may say something to you, so far as the Acts of Parliament have failed it up, or rather left it open). Truly therein I did engage very freely at the Beginning of the War for King and Parliament, and so the Place to which I was chosen, I bless the Lord he made me faithful to those I served: As to what hath been since that, I shall forbear to speak to, only in the general way, that before and since I came into this late Trouble, I have begged of the Lord to give me a Sight of all my Sins, and show me a Pardon in the Blood of Jesus Christ, which, through free Grace and Mercy, I can say the Lord hath done. I could not have stood with so much Comfort as I do now at this Time, if he had not given me an Assurance of the Pardon of all my Sins; and when he hath spoken Peace, there is none can speak War or Trouble. I consequently not proper to give you here an Account of my Faith; for if I should, I should go very little aside from my Brethren that have spoken before me: That which hath been my Judgment and my Practice, hath been the Congregational Way. I must own that, and do. I should much rejoice to see a Spirit assuaging that great Mercy that the Lord hath given to this Nation; I mean that great Mercy that he hath bestowed in giving them the Gospel, and that in such a Manner, as truly we, they have been ten hundreds and thousands of Miles among the Pagans abroad, yet I do not know it to be past as it is in this life, blessed be the Lord; and I hope to the Nation of England the Lord will give Hearts to walk accordingly.

And as to the Business of the Government of this Nation, as it now stands, I have prayed for it, and can pray for it, and shall, as long as I have Breath, pray for it; and do, from my Soul, desire that the Lord would bless the King, and give him a Heart to rule for him, and his Glory, and then I am sure the Lord will prosper him.

Indeed, as to those that fear the Lord in the Nation, I could wish that the Lord would settle them, and make them of one Mind; but that is the Work of the Lord, and it must lie there; and truly he will do it in his Time. I must confess, I speak the rather to that, because there hath formerly been something said to me towards Persons that were not of my Judgment, which I have now since was very bad; and I wish God I were here it, and have been here for it. And therefore I do desire, that all that fear the Lord, would seek their Work and their Business in love to love God, and to love one another, and to love the Nation wherein they live, and to give no Disturbance to it: For certainly, Sir, I should leave this, as that which the Lord hath suited upon my Heart; their Work is to be full, yes, their Strength is to be full, for the Lord will do his Work in his own Time; and when he comes to do the Work, there is none shall hinder. I think you have had all Experience of it in the late Wars which the Lord hath done; for I must own it is.

Indeed, Sir, I am sorry that my Weakness of Body doth prevent me from speaking more to you; yet I do bless God that I have this Opportunity. All I shall say further is, That there is a Truth (and I hope I may speak it without Offence) that is much upon my Spirit, and I am confident I shall speak it without any Offence at all. I think we are all here Christians, and there is none here (I think) but faith the Lord's Prayer, and says, Thy Kingdom come, thy Will be done in Earth, as it is in Heaven, &c. and I hope they go through the Prayer, and say why they do pray that Prayer; and also say, For thine is the Kingdom, the Power and the Glory, for ever and ever. Amen. God hath given the Kingdoms of the Earth to Jesus Christ, he shall reign; and happy and blessed is that King and Nation that hath him for their King. And certainly, for His Majesty that now is, to reign under Jesus Christ, is no Dishonour at all to him: For Christ doth, and shall rule over all the Kings, Princes, and Nations of the World. And therefore, indeed, this is that Kingdom that is most precious, and that we do desire, and all pray that it may come; and I do wish that all Persons would have a Tenderness, and not be at Enmity with, nor hate, nor, as much as they can, cut the Throats of those that own that Kingdom, and the Coming of that Kingdom.

As to other Things, there hath been so much said, that I shall forbear speaking; only this, as to the Business of the King, I bless God I can say it, I was no Actor or Contriver, either within or without. I was many Miles from this Place when that was done: I was put in by the Authority that then sat, and I was called and chosen to that Work; and truly, what I did, I did without any Malice, without any Contrivement in the least; and did, even to the very last, pray for him: And since His Majesty, that now is, came to the Throne, I have, as I have prayed for my own Soul, prayed for him, and that he may reign in Peace and Righteousness, to the Glory of God, and the Good of all the People of the Nation. I shall not trouble you with more, because I fear your Time is past, and my Weakness is such, that I am accelerated to break off.

Then Col. ORRY speaks further, as followeth.

Mr. Sheriff,

It is not only our Judgments now, but it was our Practice when we were beyond the Seas, we did thus say Disputes, we avoided Occasions of leaving our own Countries, because we would have nothing to do with the Affairs in England, but to pray for them, and to persuade to be quiet, and to be still; so that we may say, as Paul did in another Case, Thy willer stand as in the Temple disputing, or reasoning, or stirring up the People; only our Work was to pray for them.

Then Mr. Corbet said, "Now we have done speaking to Men, we may now speak unto our God; truly, he must help us, and give us his own Spirit: Men may say Prayers, and read them, but to pray in the Spirit, and to pray so, as to be accepted with God, requires much Strength and Assistance from him." Then Mr. Corbet addressed himself to Prayer, which was very long. The Conclusion was omitted, because of a building among the Hearers.

Then Col. Ormy addressed himself to Prayer.

Then Col. Barrett addressed himself to Prayer, having first spoken to the Sheriff these few Words following.

Mr. Sheriff,

"I do for your Time is spent, and we are drawn up into a very narrow Compass; and I hope you will take my Word now as before. I shall only speak a Word or two unto the Lord, and no more."

Then Col. Ormy spoke a few Words more, as followeth:

"I did break off Duty, because you desired it, and I would not be troublesome to you."

Then he very carefully expressed himself further, as followeth:

"O love the Lord, and hate all Things that are evil. I have found by Experience, more Evil in the least Sin, than Good in any Thing that the Lord can afford; therefore I beg it of all that are here, to love God, and to hate that that is evil. The Lord give you Peace and Truth! I hope our Religious shall not fare the worse for us, but that you will show them Kindness. And as to what my Brother said, I thank the Lord, I have the Assurance of his Love, and the Pardon of my Sins through the Riches of his Grace, and free Love in Jesus Christ."

After this, Col. Barrett called a young Man, who was known to him, and taking a Silver Box out of his Pocket, he charged him to give it to his Daughter.

Their Speeches and Prayers being ended, the Executioner cleared the Court of the rest of the People who were gotten up, and then pulled down their several Caps over their Eyes, and upon the lifting up their Hands, the Court was drawn away; at which Time, Col. Barrett especially was heard to say, Lord Jesus, receive our Souls! And after he had bargained for a little Space, he lifted up his Hand.

That which many did especially take Notice of, was, That there was not so much as the least Attentiveness by any to make a triumphant shout upon the drawing away of the Court, but there rather appeared the Symptoms of an universal Face of Sadness in that vast and generally tumultuous Assembly, who were the Spectators of their several Deaths.

They all hung near about a Quarter of an Hour: The first that was cut down was Col. Barrett, who was quartered according to the Sentence; the other Two hanging all the while. The next cut down was Col. Ormy, Mr. Corbet hanging still, who, after Col. Ormy was quartered, had the Execution done upon him also, according to the Sentence. Their several Quarters were brought back to Newgate, about Five of the Clock in the Afternoon, to be buried.

A brief Account of Col. ORRY'S Funeral.

WHEN Col. Ormy's Body was quartered, it pleased the King to send a Warrant to the Sheriff of London, to deliver the quartered Body to be buried where his Wife should think meet; which Thing being granted, without Petition or Application from her, or his Relations; and the Removal of his Funeral suddenly flying about the City, and the Place appointed at St. Sepulchre, (where his first Wife lieth in a fair Vault, which was purchased formerly for a Burial-Place for him and his Family,) there was a numerous Concourse of sober, judicious People assembled to Obey Church, to attend the Corps, and some Thousands more were coming thither to that Purpose; so that there were in View about Twenty Thousand People attending that Solemnity, and coming to the Place assigned, who in a solemn and peaceable Manner behaved themselves, as that Affair required: Yet it so pleased the King to revoke his first Grant to Mrs. Ormy, and by the Sheriff of London to dispossess and send Home again the Company attending the Funeral, which the Sheriff with much Hardiness, and many bitter Words, did his Work. The People, though much troubled at the Disappointment, yet, so soon as they understood the King's Pleasure, departed, and left the mangled Limbs to the Disposal of them that had devoted them to the Gravel and Ash: The Company left away a thousand Sighs to attend him to his third unknown Grave.

That Night the Body was carried to the Tower of London, and there, by Mr. Gougeon, Parson of Berkeley, was buried with the Service Book, solemnly mourning his bleeding Limbs thereby; but Rages are imputed only to the Reviver. Mr. Gougeon could not but say, that his Body was laid there, in sure and certain Hope of a joyful Resurrection. His Testimony was true, though a Port of their own. And now there he lies, and the Tower of London is his Tomb. His Epitaph he partly writ in the Hearts of Thousands at the Place of Execution.

NUMBER IX.

The Speech and Deportment of Colonel JAMES TURNER, at his Execution in Leadenhall-Street, January 21, 1663, who was condemn'd for Felony and Burglary, in breaking open the House, and robbing of Mr. FRANCIS TRYON, Merchant, living in Lime-Street, LONDON.*

Just Eliza's Clerk, Col. Turner (surround with Mr. Ordinary of Newgate, and another Magistrate) was drawn in a Cart to a Gallies erected on Leadenhall-Street, at Lime-Street End, where coming, Col. Turner call'd the Executioner to him, told him, that his Friends were desirous of all his Clothes, and that in Consequence thereof he gave him 50s. and 2s. 6d. in drink, and about 155. is the Sergeant and Turner, according to his bid Body and Clothes deliver'd to one Mr. Smith then. And speaking to the Cart, said as follows:

SIR, Richard Ford, and you, the other Mr. Sheriff, and all you Gentlemen: I am come higher to pay that Debt I owe, and that every Man owes to Nature; 'tis the just Hand of God upon me for my Sins, and there is no Man hath done me Wrong in it, and truly, it is my Sins, and the greatness of my Sins (and that I am very sensible of) hath brought me hither, and the greatest Sin that troubles me, and has upon me, (which I hope the Lord of JACOB CHURCH, says, I am confident, the Blood of JESUS CHRIST hath wash'd all my Sins away,) is that Sin which I was much addicted to, and that was the Sin of Prophaneness, of dishonouring God, of taking his Name in vain. It is true, I must not only accuse myself, but, in some Sorts, give you the Truth of my Conscience. I never heard any Man or Woman, or whatever they were, swear in my Life, but I did tremble to hear them: For keeping of Company with Gentlemen of Honour (they were Men of Quality, though that were an ill Quality in them) was the Occasion of it. I never kept Company with any poor, base, inferior People, with any Thief, or any such like base Persons, in all my Life, but fled from them, and avoided them, 'till this Accident. Truly, these poor Men engaged in it, I must free them, I brought them into this Business clearly and freely, and I beseech you, Mr. Sheriffs, as I am a living Man, that you will help these People in this Business; your Eliza's Men! As I was telling you, for that great Sin of Swearing: Keeping Company with Persons that did swear, I did get a Habit of Swearing, though I heard it and heard it, when I observed it in myself, and yet I was, it did slip in, forgetting suddenly and not observing, being of a hasty Nature. It was my Rashness, and my Inconsiderateness, that hath brought me hither. Gentlemen, it is excused by all the City, and by all the World, that knows me, that I should make some great and notorious Confessions: It is True, I must, and freely do here confess, as I did before, that 'tis my Sin in general, and that Sin of blaspheming God's Name, I do charge myself particularly with that, as the Occasion of bringing me hither: As for the Faith itself, I do tell you, it was my own AId, my own Contrivance, and the poor Souls that are yonder, knew nothing of it.

Good men, you will be wiser when I am gone: There is my two Sons; I here declare, as I expect Myself by-and-by, at the Hands of any Servant or my God, they are as innocent as at any Person that looks upon me. For the youngest, my Son Eliza, he never knew or heard of one Penny of the Money, or Benefits at all, as before he is clear; he was in his Bed that Night it was done, and in the Morning it was removed from my House: For the elder, he never knew of any Money, or any thing of it, only I told him, that was a Merchant's Money that was broke, and that I would secure it for his Wife and Children; so that he was clearly innocent of any thing the Part of the Richness of the House, he knew not that it was. My first Money, but did carry that Money with me to Tower-Hill, as I bid him, so that he is as innocent as the youngest. You understand me, Mr. Sheriffs, if you had your Servant take to much Money, carry it, and deliver it as you doubt him, What is it to him how y' came by that Money? So that I say, this elder Son, he is (I speak in the Public) as innocent as the other.

I do beg and beseech you, Mr. Sheriffs, in the Bowels of tender Mercy and Compassion, that you would go to the Lord-Mayor, to the Court of Aldermen, that out of two poor young Men may be discharged, let them be as free as the next Soldiers among Thieves and Murderers, for they will be innocent of them. They are a set of Men the Lord of good Parents; my Father was in a Court, I received Divine, a Pension within eleven Miles of Sir Thomas, a pious Minister, very old Eliza's Master of one Parish, my Mother was married to be, a Man of Charity, and for Peace, never talked of him as low; he was Justice of Peace amongst them, Master of them, no Poor wanted any thing, they came to him, he set them down, and set the Poor's Baskets, and composed the Difference with the Rich Men: I am the Son of that Father, enough an infamous Son. With one Gentlewoman's Daughter in Devonshire, her Mother had a great Person, and is yet living; they are of the Family of the Duke of the old King had of her Uncle, which was sent, they were Porters, or Quakers, I know, these Children, they came from the Train of good Persons. The I speak in reference that you will take that I say: Care, that the poor poor Boys may be turned out of Prison. These Children each wish to support them; suppose it your own. I do beg and beseech you, Mr. Sheriffs, to release your Children to Sir John Smith, for my sake, that God may be praised and glorified in the Truth of all Things. Will you promise it, Mr. Sheriffs, that you will never over-

Sir Richard Ford. I do, I have been ready at all Times to promise you any Thing which was in my Power to perform, but ask not that which is not in my Power to grant: You'd see they may be discharged I would.

Terror. That's but comparatively; as soon as possible.

Sir Richard Ford. I do promise you, that this true you have declared concerning your Sins, shall be communicated to the great Judges, and I will endeavour that they may be put out of our Good.

Sir Richard Ford. And I will use my Endeavour in the Thing.

Terror. Pray do, they know nothing of it; pray put them out, my Wife will wait them, the bath no Comfort left, and this will run her.

Sir Richard Ford. We will do our Endeavour; peace do on.

Terror. I have done, that's for the Children; then for William Turner, what he did, he did as my Infidelity, he asked this as my Infidelity, it was wholly by my Dishonesty, therefore let the poor Man be hanged, discharged, if there be nothing I hang against him but this Fault.

Sir Richard Ford. We will promise that we will take all Occasion to give an Intimation in the Lord Court Justice when you have declared, in consequence of his Cause, as he was a Minister of yours.

Terror. I have told you that it was my Sins that hath brought me hither;

and truly I must deal really with you, this Nation is very full of him, of crying Sin, of Sins, that (without God's wonderful Mercies) the Land will suddenly mourn by his Hand: I have every Year expects the Leaping Plague to come and take away two-thirds of the Nation for the Sins that lie upon us; and truly, notwithstanding the Ministers of God do preach, and call, and cry aloud, yet Nobody regards them. Truly, from the Magistrate to the very Peasant, there is abundance of Neglect to the true Service and Fear of God, that my Soul be led and guided within me, as I have gone up and down the Streets, and as I have lain in my Bed. And I must necessarily confess to you, that I have not one of these, nor a hundred Times, but a thousand Times, with myself dissatisfied, and in another World. I have been sick of it, not for any Want, but with the mere Trouble, the Difficult that did to & please me, to see the manner of Business in Tumults and Disorders, and Sin, and all manner of Wickedness; that truly I have had no Pleasure (heck, later Years) in the World, indeed I have not. I have (in my poor Wife) had many a hundred Times, Lord God, that thou wert in thy Grave, and I were not it not for these poor Children, truly, I could beg it of God, living all People are in Confusion, none too in Love and Amity. When I was a Boy, there was no such Doors, my Father, I told you, was a Minister, there was eight or ten Gentlemen, adjoining Families, who kept a House of Hospitality, having Feasting, Fencing, and Gaming;

but now there is no such thing in the World: It is a new World, a World of Malice and Difference; and 'tis to blame, that Brother do not hang together in Unity.

It is expected, that I should declare here, as a living Man, somewhat to free myself from these Allegations, Accusations, and Calumnies, that have been laid upon me; those Marks with black Coals that People have laid upon me; I do declare to you, there are a great many Scandals that lie upon me. I shall not justify myself at all, but rather accuse myself, that I am, as St. Paul says, The servant of Sinners. But for these Things that are laid upon me, I must clear my Family and my Reputation, as I can before God, and in Jesus Christ. It is laid upon me, that I should take 200 l. of Mr. Humphry's Lady, for to assist her in the helping her Husband, that was, in the getting him a Pension or Reprieve. To that I answer,

(I know not whether I should say, Mr. Sheriffs, my Lady's Certificates or no; I heard not of this Business 'till within these two Nights)

I never heard of her, nor her Husband, in such a manner; no, I would not have had that Sin mix'd with my Blood, nor let me Thousand Wounds, I should have thought, whenever it had enter'd into my Consciences, I should have thought myself equally lost: But about that, I first

Mr. Grey, of Black-Friars, who rode with my two Sons the other Night, he hath brought a Certificate under her Ladyship's Hand to the King which Certificate, if they will go to my Wife, they may have it, and peace. She writes, bearing it to the King's Most Excellent Majesty.

That he was inform'd, that James Turner, Gent., a Prisoner in Newgate, is accused for taking 200 l. of her towards the repaying of her Husband's debt declare the never knew him, nor heard of him, therefore the I behold in Conscience to free him; and to the humbly takes her Leave.

This is attested by that Gentleman, with an Affidavit under the Hand of Sir John Brampton, Knight. She got a Letter from Secretary Thruswell, who he writes, and sends him all the Business, that one Col. Houshold had 255 l. of my Lady's Receipt, to procure this Business, and that William Turner pretend, that he had given Charles a Hundred Pound of it to that Purpoze, if they will go to my Wife, they may have it, and peace. I have said, directly or indirectly, so that William was the Person clearly accused, and the first Mr. W. did, for a sum of for the Money, I so for that I hope I have satisfied myself before God and the World.

In the second Place, there is another Calumny thrown upon me, and that is, that I should exact or receive the King that sum of some Money, when I was beyond Sea with him; truly, it is well known to Thousands rid Piece of Treason, such as no honest Man ought to be and conceal one half Hour, therefore do not justify yourself, it seems not to any Pardon here, or in the World to come. If you are not guilty of the Malice, you have the more easy Access to Comfort hereafter; but that will not help you here on Earth; Pray find that little Time you have to some better Purpose than this; if you have any Thing to say that may become a modest Man to say, we are willing to hear it: If you can remember any Person that assisted you as correcting it, or otherwise were concerned in it, say it.

Yours. No Person assisted me, I corrected it not, it was carried out of my House to correct, and brought in corrected.

Mr. R. Ford. You shall not say that you are denied that Christian Liberty a dying Man ought to have; we are not to suffer any Reflections on the Bishops, you had a fair Trial. I say, we would not deprive you of the Liberty of speaking, but do not abuse that Liberty that is given you, by spending your Time impertinently, and fruitlessly; but if you have any thing further to offer to God, which is more for your Good, go so then.

Yours. I shall further to insist any farther, as to the Narration of that Matter; I shall be very unwilling and tender of reflecting any thing upon the King, or the Government, or give Offence to your Worships any way. Sir R. Ford. Nothing but that shall offend us.

Yours. I shall go to Prayer.

Mr. R. Ford. Do, do, we will join with you, and pray for you.

He continued to private Prayer on the Lord's day Time.

Mr. R. Ford. Executioner, do not turn him off, till he has given you a Sign.

Mr. Ordinary of Newgate. Mr. Yours, give a Sign to the Executioner, when you have done, you must not throw yourself off, you will be your own Executioner in this.

Yours. Executioner, when I give you the Sign, by pulling you by the Shoe, then turn me off.

Executioner. I will, I will, the Lord bless thy poor Soul.

Afterwards, the Executioner coming down, Mr. Yours told him, the Sign should be by moving his Foot.

Yours. O Lord, hear the Prayer of thy poor Slave, receive me into thy Arms. O Lord, in the Prison, receive my Spirit. Lord Jesus! be my Propitius be merciful to my Sins! O Lord, my Strength, and my Redeemer! O Lord, I beseech thee, receive me into the Arms of thy Mercy; let me have an Abundance with thee, to live with thee for ever, and then come, Lord! I feel thee quickly!

Then giving the Sign, the Executioner did his Office; and being cut down, his Head was severed from his Body, and his Body devolved into four Quarters, which are to be disposed of as the King shall assign; since which Time, his Head is placed near Ludgate, and his Quarters upon Aldgate, and other Gates of the City.

It will be here convenient to make Two Observations upon the Words of the Priests.

FIRST, he says, That the Priests were sent out of his House to be corrected, and brought back again corrected, and to not corrected by himself; which is not only contrary to what he formerly owned, as was made out by several Priests at his Trial, concerning his own counselling of it, but to his solemn Declaration at the Bar, avowing, that he knew nothing more of the Business than what he there delivered: For, supposing such a Confession, the next Question would infallibly have been, To whom was it carried? or, Who corrected it? as the readiest way to the Discovery of the Author.

Secondly, he says, That the Persons concerned (meaning Calvert, and her Maid) were neglected that whole Day, being at Home, and easy to be taken, which is disproved, both by his own Servants, and Mrs. Calvert's: And likewise proved, on the other Side, That if he himself would have ordered his Appearance to have look'd after the Maid (as he promised, and was directed), he had been there that very Morning; the Fellow meeting her in St. Bartholomew's Church, within a Quarter of an Hour after his Master was carried away, not knowing that he had any Concern in the Business. As to the Ministers herself, she is, at present, under Custody.

NUMBER XI.

The Earl of CLARENDON's Vindication of Himself against the Articles of Treason exhibited against him in Parliament.*

Mr. Seymour's SPEECH in the House of Lords.

My Lords,

THE Commons assembled in Parliament, having received Information of divers unreasonable Practices and Designs of a great Peer of this House, (Edward Earl of Clarendon) command me to recall the said Edward Earl of Clarendon of Treason, and other Crimes and Misdemeanors; and I do here in their Names, and in the Names of the Commons of England, accuse Edward Earl of Clarendon of Treason, and other high Crimes and Misdemeanors. I am further commanded by the House of Commons, to desire you Lordships, That the Earl of Clarendon may lawfully be frequented from Parliament, and be committed to safe Custody. They further command me to acquaint your Lordships, That they will in convenient Time exhibit the Articles of the Charge against him.

November 24, 1657. The Voice of the House of Lords.

Relieved, &c.

That the Lords have not implied with the Defects of the House of Commons, contrary to the Contract of the Earl of Clarendon, and supposing him to be innocent, because the House of Commons have only accused him of Treason in general, and have not assign'd or specified any particular Treason.

ARTICLES of Treason exhibited in Parliament against Edward Earl of Clarendon.

I. That the Earl of Clarendon hath designed a Standing Army to be raised, and to govern the Kingdom thereby; advising the King to dissolve the present Parliament; to lay aside all Thoughts of Parliaments for the future; to govern by Military Power, and to maintain the same by Free Quarter and Contribution.

II. That he hath, in hearing of many of his Majesty's Subjects, (specially and sedulously) said, the King was in his Heart a Popish, Popish, I ascribed, or Words to that Effect.

III. That he hath received great Sums of Money for passing the Country Patents, and other illegal Patents; and granting several Injunctions to stop Proceedings at Law against them, and other illegal Patents sometimes granted.

IV. That he hath advised and procured divers of his Majesty's Subjects to be imprisoned against Law, in remote Islands, Garisons, and other Places, thereby to prevent them from the Benefit of the Law; and to introduce Precedents for Imprisoning of others of his Majesty's Subjects in like Manner.

V. That he hath corruptly sold several Offices, contrary to Law.

VI. That he hath procured his Majesty's Customs to be farmed at under Rates, knowing the same; and great pretended Debts to be paid by his Majesty, so the Payment whereof his Majesty was not in Satisfaction.

He hath received great Sums of Money for procuring the same.

VII. That he hath received great Sums of Money from the Company of Vintners, or some of them, or their Agents, for changing the Prices of Wine, and for finding them from the Payment of legal Penalties which they had incurred.

VIII. That he hath in a short Time painted to himself a far greater Estate than can be imagined to be lawfully given in so short a Time: And contrary to his Oath, hath procured several Grants under the Great Seal from his Majesty, to himself and Relations, of several of his Majesty's Lands, Hereditaments, and Leases, to the Dispossession of his Majesty.

IX. That he introduced an arbitrary Government in his Majesty's foreign Plantations, and hath caused such as complained thereof, to lose his Majesty's Goodwill, to be long imprisoned for so doing.

X. That he did reject and frustrate a Proposal and Undertaking, approved by his Majesty, for the Preservation of Arms and St. Christopher's, and reducing the French Plantations to his Majesty's Obedience; after the Commissioners were drawn for that Purpose, which was the Occasion of such great Losses and Damages in those Parts.

XI. That he advised and effected the Sale of Dunkirk to the French King, being Part of his Majesty's Dominions, together with the Ammunition, Artillery, and all Sorts of Stores there, and for no greater Value than the said Ammunition, Artillery, and Stores were worth.

XII. That the said Earl did unduly cause his Majesty's Letters Patents under the Great Seal of England (to one Dr. Gougeon) to be altered, and the Invention thereof to be wholly removed.

XIII. That he hath, in an arbitrary Way, examined and drawn into Question divers of his Majesty's Subjects concerning their Lands, Tenements, Goods and Chattels, and Properties; determined thereof at the Council-Table, and stopped Proceedings at Law; and threatened some that pleaded the Statute of 17 Geo. I.

XIV. That he had caused Sir Warrin's to be forced out against the will of the Corporation of London by Act of Parliament, so the justice he might receive great Sums of Money from them for securing their Liberties, which when they consulted with him, he caused the said Sir Warrin's to be discharged, who complained thence to come.

XV. That he procured the Bills of Indemnity for the Island, and received great Sums of Money, for the same in a most corrupt and unlawful Manner.

XVI. That he hath divided his Majesty and the Nation, in all foreign Treaties and Negotiations relating to the late War.

XVII. That he was a principal Author of that fatal Council of dividing the Fleet, about June 1656.

THE fifth Charge, then, that a printed against me, is, That the Earl of Clarendon hath designed a standing Army to be raised, and to govern the Kingdom thereby.

* This Vindication should be read after the Proceedings against the Earl of Clarendon, in Vol. III. p. 350.

Manuscript, July 16, 1658.

As my self could be seen, regarding to me, one I thought to any Man else, than to find myself, after near Thirty Years Service of the Crown in the highest Trust; after having paid all the Time of his Majesty's Exile with him beyond the Seas, and in his service, and in which the noblest Noble Prince I took was notorious in many Kingdoms; and after I had the Honour and Happiness to return again with his Majesty into England, and to receive from him so many honourable Marks of his Favour, and to serve him near Eight Years after his Return, in the Place of the greatest Trust, without ever having discovered that his Majesty was affected with any, or, in Truth, that he had ever the least of such an Opinion I had ever given him; or that any Person of Honour and Reputation, or Interest in the Nation, had ever made the least Complaint against me, or had any Thought that the Misdemeanors for which I was charged were charged against me, or any Advice of mine. I say, I never then I could not be so willingly imposed, to find myself as a Soldier, when I had not the least Intimation of it, bereft of the King's Favour; and follow to far from his Kindness, as when I was once I was by, after his Majesty had vouchsafed to consult with me in my Affairs for the Death of my Wife, that he intended to take the Great Seal from me; so that I had no such Contact to me, to see and know, that very few Men of Honour or Reputation appeared to first for them to know their Opinions, Whether they thought what was proposed to be reasonable, and fit to be granted? And if so, why they did not concern themselves in it? They answered, That the Reason why they had not appeared in it was, because they should be Lovers by it, and therefore were not inclinable to obtain a Grant from his Majesty to their own Damage; and in enlarged upon the Nature of the Trade, their long Experience in it, and the Greatness of their Stock, which they should not be allowed to consent under any Regulation. But as they did not think themselves obliged to be solicitous for a Change, so they could not deny, being required by his Majesty to speak the Truth, but that the Proposition that was made was for the publick Good and Benefit of the Kingdom, and that they could conceive no other Way so proper to that Trade, and the Nation, from the Inconvenience which the Spaniards exercised upon us, supposing, that if his Majesty would consent to them, they would likewise consent, and put in carrying on the Service. To which his Majesty gave them gracious Answer, concerning what they depended on one Man, his Majesty remaining confirmed in the former Opinion he had of it. But there remained yet an Objection which was principally insisted upon by the Members of the Revenue, who alleged very reasonably, that this new-moulding of the Trade must produce great Alteration, and would meet fine Opposition from the Spaniards, which for the Time would lessen the Customs, and enable the Farmers to a Detraction. The Petition was therefore referred to the Farmers of the Customs, who were to attend the next Council Day: And being then called in, they acknowledged, that the Design proposed would prove very profitable to the Kingdom in many Respects, upon which they enlarged; and that as the End it would not be attended with any Detraction of the Customs, but for the profit, they said, they could not but expect that the Oldsmen and Contraband of the Spaniards would give leave a Step to Trade, at least for one Year, that if his Majesty did not think better for what should fall short in the Customs, they must look to be very great Losers; the Merchants, on the other Hand, offering to be bound, that if they did not the first Year being in as much as had been usually entered, they would make good what should be wanting to the Farmers upon a Motion; and his Majesty himself declared, that he would not, for a small Damage to himself, hinder the Kingdom from enjoying so great a Benefit; and thereupon he commended the Solicitor-General, who then attended the Board, to prepare such a Charter, as might provide for all their good Ends which were desired in the Petition, and which he did very largely relate. And, I believe, there was never a greater Concurrence of the Board in any Disposition.

Many Months passed before the Charter was drawn; in which Time I never heard of the said new Objection made against it, or that any Man was unsatisfied with it. After it was engrossed, and passed the King's Hand, it was brought to the Great Seal; and then the Lord-Mayor of London and the Court of Aldermen had entered a Consent, and I appeared a Day to hear Parties. The City alleged an Order made a Year or two before by the King in Council, upon a Complaint then exhibited by the Court of Aldermen against the Turkey Company, and other Corporations, in which they said, that if any many Merchants of the said Trade, and of all Estates in the City, who would never take out their Freedom of the City, and did refuse to bear any Charge or Office in it, so the very great Displeasure and Disrespect of the City, and of the Government thereof, they being by this Means compelled to call inferior Citizens to be Aldermen, before they had Estates to bear the Charge of it, whilst the greater and richer could not be compelled to take it, because they were not Freeman: Besides the Rules which the King gave upon the Difference then in Question, he was pleased to declare, and appointed it to be entered as an Order in the Council-Book, that Provision should be made, that in all Charters which he should hereafter grant to any Corporation, or Corporations within the City of London, that they should first make themselves Freeman of the City, if they were not so before; and therefore that this Charter should not pass the Seal, before several Members, who were named in it, had made themselves Freeman of the City, by which they might be made liable to the Charges of it. The Merchants could not deny, that many of them were not yet Freeman, nor relieved to them: They said, they had never heard of this Order: And I declared to them, that I could not seal the Charter before they had given Satisfaction in it; and they seemed as positive that they would rather be without their Charter, than submit to the other Inconvenience, and so they departed thence, but shortly after they agreed to the Obligation, and a Clause to that Purpose was entered in the Charter in the King's Presence, and he returned to me to have the Seal fixed to it.

There were, by this Time, several other new Complaints entered against it, all which I read, and told every one of them to their great Satisfaction. I said that there would be some Motions for the Slipping in in the House of Commons; and some Parliament-Men who served for the Western Boroughs came to me, and desired me that I would use for the Seal in it till they should be heard, since it would undo their Western Trade; and told me, in reference to move the House of Commons to put a stop to it. I informed them of the whole Progress it had had, and told them I believed that they would hardly be able to offer any good Reason against it. However, since it was known that the Parliament would be prorogued within ten or twelve Days, I would suspend the Sealing the Charter until our House sat, to the End that they might make any Objections against it they thought fit. But the Parliament rose shortly after, without further taking Notice of it; and did shake Parliament-Men, or any others, further debate me against the passing of it, and so I fixed the Great Seal to it according to my Duty. Thereupon the Company chose a Governor and other Officers, according to their Charter, and made their Orders and By-Laws as they thought fit, for the carrying on and Advancement of their Trade; which they might also when they found it convenient; and for the present they resolved upon a Joint-Stock, assigning to many Shares to particular Men. In this Composition and Distribution they happened some Difference between themselves, which could not be taken Notice of Abroad, and even some of them, who felt themselves, and were most solicitous to possess the Charter, did when they could to hinder the Effect of it, first privately to their Factors at the Governor to oppose any Orders which should be sent from the Governor and the Company; and that they should do all they could to incense the Spaniards against the Charter, promising that their Wives should be taken off in Spins of the Corporation: Whereupon, great Disorders did arise in the Governor between the English themselves; and by the Composition of the Spaniards with their few Friends who opposed the Charter, they proceeded so far as to send the principal Actors for the Company out of the Island to Spain, and to make a public Act by the Governor and Council there, that no Ship belonging to the Company should be suffered to come into the Harbour, or to take in any Lading from the Island: All which were transacted these many Months before it was known in England, and probably would have been prevented, or easily mended, if the breaking off of the Plague at London, and the War, had not retarded all English Shipping from going to the Governor for the Space almost of a full Year; which Intermittion likewise gave some Advantage here to the Merchants who opposed the Charter, by the no Return of their several Stocks within the Time promised by the Company.

When the King was at Oxford, and heard what had passed at the Governor, these Merchants appeared there to petition against the Charter, whereof there were some who were the first Petitioners for it: His Majesty appointed a Day for the solemn Hearing of it, in the Presence of his Privy-Council, the Governor being likewise summoned to be there. Upon opening all their Grievances, the Petitioners themselves said first, that they could not complain of the Charter; that it was a full and in itself very clear, and for the great Benefit of the Kingdom, though some private Men might for the present be Losers by it; that their Complaint was only against their Constitutions and By-Laws, and their severe Prosecution of them contrary to the Intention of the Charter itself, inflicting, among other Things, the very first Day limited by the Charter, after which they could not continue their Trade without being Members of the Corporation; and that Day was so soon after the Sealing of the Charter, that it was not possible for them to draw their Stock from thence in so short a Time. When they had finished all their Objections, the King observed to them, that they complained only of what themselves had done, and not of all the Charter, which gave them only Authority to elect a Governor, and make Constitutions and By-Laws, but directed not what these Constitutions and By-Laws should be, which were the Rules of their own Constitutions, in which the major Part must consent; and that that their Joint-stock was one, which, with the rest, they might alter again at their next Court, if the major Part were agreed with it: But because they had complained of these Particulars, in which they seemed to have Reason on their side, his Majesty expressed a Willingness to mediate and make an Agreement between them, and thereupon told the Governor and such and such Particulars, which seemed to have most of Justice, which he did very much at large, making it clearly appear that they had, in Truth, little Cause of Complaint, as to the first Day which was assigned to them for drawing away their Stock, which had the greatest semblance of Reason, he said they had no Reason to complain of Waste of Warning, for that the Day was well enough known to them long before the Sealing of the Charter, and might very well have been complied with; but that they knew likewise, that afterwards the Time was enlarged to a Day desired by themselves, that there might be no Cause of Discontent; and thereupon read the Order of the Court to that Purpose, which they could not deny in Conclusion; since it appeared that their Stock in it remained there, which in Justice belonged to them, whether by the Force of Discretion it had not been drawn over. I being present with the Governor, and his Associates, to give them such Satisfaction in that Particular and others, that before they retired from his Majesty's Presence, they were unanimously agreed upon all their Petitions; and though some of the Leeds, upon some Informations and Discourses they had heard, had believed the Company to be in the wrong, they were now fully convinced of the contrary, and believed the Charter to be founded upon great Reason of State, and that the Execution of it had been very justifiable, and with great Moderation; and it is to be observed, that the Parliament being then assembled at Oxford, there was not the least Complaint against that Charter, or Corporation.

This was the whole Progress of this Affair, and all that I know of the Proceeding in it, in which I will confess, though I had no Hand in the Composition, I was fully involved in the Justice and Integrity of it, and even in the Necessity to Revoke of State and Liberty, upon all the Address made to the King or Council in that whole Transaction, I did, it may be, appear somewhat too warm for the Dispute than other Men; and yet I never remember a further Concernance in the whole from that in this Advice; nor did my Inclination towards it proceed from any other Motive than that of the Publick Good, without the least Temptation, or Imagination of any Profit or Advantage to myself, to which I have never been thought to be ever inclined; and the Delays I said in the passing that Charter, after it came to be sealed, and my giving Time for the weighing all Objections, and so much opposing the Company, with reference to their being made Freeman of the City, that they departed from me with a Resolution to prosecute the Charter no farther, see no Signs that I had such a Mind to please them as a Man would have who was corrupted by them, or who was to have a Share in the Profit of his Patent. For the granting any Injunctions in Chancery to stop Proceedings in the Law, against that or any other Charter, I cannot comprehend the Meaning of that Charge; and do profess that I have never granted any Injunctions in that Court, but what was agreeable to the Course and Justice of it, and I am sure was always done in publick, and upon Debate in the Court.

The Fourth Article is, That I have advised and procured divers of his Majesty's Subjects to be imprisoned under Law, to run to Spain, Germany, and other Places, thereby to prevent them from the Benefit of the Law;

Let us, and to introduce Proceedings for imposing of order of his Majesty's Subsidies in the manner.

I know not what to answer to this Article, it being so general, and so particular Part in being named; but it is generally known, that I have never taken upon me to compose any Manuscript, but such who, by the Consent of the Council, for Matters of Commerce, are fully committed. It is probable that I have been present at the Council-Board when many Persons have been ordered to be committed, and whole Commissions hath, by the Wisdom of that Board, been thought just and necessary; and therefore I am not to answer apart for any thing done by them; only I may say, that I was frequently of Opinion that the Commissions were very just, and very necessary, and it is notoriously known, that by such Commissions a Rebellion hath been sometimes prevented, and that other Persons, who have been afterwards straitened and executed for High Treason, have, upon this Examination, and at their Death, confessed, that their Purpose had been to rise in Arms at such and such Times, at their Friends, upon whom they had principally relied, had not been then committed to Prison, and I well remember, that it was thought for the most of the Persons who stand animated for the March of the late King, his Majesty's Royal Father, should be removed out of the Tower, and dispersed into several Islands and Gaolards; and of any other Persons have been likewise treated other, I presume it was upon such Reasons, as, upon a due Examination thereof, will make it be thought very just.

The Fifth Article is, That I have errantly sold several Officers contrary to Law.

This Charge I utterly deny.

The Sixth Article is, That I have granted his Majesty's Customs to be forfeited under Rents, touching the same, and great pretences therein to be paid to his Majesty, in the Payment whereof his Majesty was in the said Rents, and he has received great Sums of Money for procuring the same.

I have never had any thing to do in disposing of his Majesty's Customs, or any other Part of his Revenue, only for some short Time after his Majesty's first Arrival in England; I, amongst others of my Lords of the Council, was a Commissioner of the Treasury; during which Time, if I am not very much mistaken, there was no Form let of any of the Revenue, and the Customs were put into the Hands of Commissioners, to the end that a Computation might be made as near as possible of the true Value of things, before they should be put into a Farm, which seems to me to be the best way to do, as was also the manner of the late King. While such was shortly after given to the Earl of Sandwich, and the Chancellorship of the Exchequer to the Lord Almon, I having then resigned it, and having been before present of it at the Time when the King returned into England; and from the Time that their two Officers of the Revenue were made, which determined the former Commission, I never intermeddled in the Customs, or any other Branch of the Revenue; except when the King commanded me to be present in some Consultations which he had with my Lord Treasurer, when there were other of my Lords likewise present, at that excellent Person always relating to the King, for his Direction in all Matters of the last Difficulty which occurred to him in the Administration of his Office; and respect the Lord Treasurer himself (with whom I had the Honour to have held a long and a free Fellowship) did desire to confer with me, as he sometimes did upon many Particulars of his Office, believing that I was not altogether ignorant of that Administration, with which I had been hitherto well acquainted; and that I presume might be the Reason why he did sometimes procure me to be present with him in References from the King, upon Matters wholly relating to his own Office. But I never suffered particular Applications to be made to me in those Cases, nor has ever any secret Conference with any Persons who were concerned in such Proceedings. What is now by my Lord Treasurer presented in such Proceedings, as under Rents, touching the same, and great pretences therein to be paid to his Majesty, to the Payment whereof his Majesty was in the said Rents, I cannot imagine, except it relates to the Payment of a Debt due from his late Majesty to some of the Farmers; in which, tho' I had no more to do than in giving Information, and my particular Advice to his Majesty, in the Presence of my Lord Treasurer, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and other of my Lords, and so am myself responsible for what his Majesty did thereupon, and he did nothing but with the Approbation and Consent of all the rest; yet I think myself obliged upon this Particular, which is so much concerns the Honour and Justice of the late King, and of his present Majesty, to his Majesty's Customs to be farmed to what their Majesties did, and what induced his present Majesty to do as he did of it. It is notoriously known, that before the late Troubles, and in the very first Entrance into them, his Majesty was necessitated to borrow very great Sums of Money from his then Farmers of his Customs, and to oblige them to stand personally bound for many other great Sums of Money which other Men lent to his Majesty upon their Secrecy. That thereupon, and for the Repayment of those Sums of Money which the Farmers had advanced, and for securing them from any Damage for those Monies which others had lent upon their Obligations, his Majesty, with the Advice of the then Lord Treasurer and Chancellor of the Exchequer, had granted a further Lease of his Customs to those Farmers for Three or Four Years to come, after the Expiration of their former Lease; with a Consent on his Majesty's Part, to pay the just Interest of Eighteen per Cent. on all such Monies as were advanced by them, or for which they should be bound; and likewise that they should, out of their growing Rent, deduct all such Sums of Money by the Year, as they had lent, or were bound for. It is well known, that after the Beginning of the Parliament in 1640, and before the Commencement of the second Lease, the House of Commons not only forced the said Farmers to pay a very great Sum of Money for their Preemption in receiving Customs and Impositions upon Merchandise in the former Years, when, as they pretended, such Payments were not due; but took also from them their new Lease granted to them by the King, and so left them without any Capacities of reimbursing themselves of the Money they had lent, and likewise in the Mercy of their Creditors.

to whom they stood bound; many of whom quickly began to exert, that Seventy towards them, that many of the poor Gentlemen had their Estates quickly extended upon Judgments and Recognizances, and their Persons taken in Execution, and committed to Prison, where I am of them who had been known to have great Estates, as Sir Paul Pindar, and others, were far from repaying their Debts. There were very few Creditors in the late King's Majesties, which gave him so much Trouble, of so much afflicted him, as the Senate had of the hard and unjust sufferings these poor Gentlemen underwent for him, and their Affection to his Service, which he often mentioned, and as often declared, that he held himself obliged to make them full Reparation, as soon as God should enable him. And after he had vouchsafed to make me his Chancellor of the Exchequer, he frequently spoke to me of it, of the very good Opinion he had of the Men, of the great Services they had done for him; and commanded me expressly, that whenever it should fall within my Power, I would do them all the Right I could. And of this I did often inform his Majesty during the Time he was Abroad, and after his Return, without any other Advice than his Father's Command, and his own Honour, having myself never had any Degree of Friendship with any of the Persons concerned, and a very ordinary Acquaintance with some of them. Upon his Majesty's happy Return, those Gentlemen who were alive of the old Farmers (which, as I remember, were Sir John Jacob, Sir John Helyar, Sir Nicholas Ogden, and Sir John Hervey) applied themselves to the King, having lent several Years, and then continuing in Execution in some Prison, and having had their Estates sold, upon the Prosecution of those Creditors to whom they were bound for Monies lent to his Majesty. As soon as Care was taken for collecting the Revenue, the Four Gentlemen named before, and Two others who had served his Majesty very well, were appointed by the Commissioners for the collecting the Customs and Duties, upon Trade, in which Collection they continued for about a Year, or thereabouts, during which Time many of their Creditors, who had generously forbore to prosecute them whilst they were in Prison and undone, began now to convince their Actions against them, persuading they were then, or would shortly be able to satisfy them: Whereupon his Majesty commanded my Lord Treasurer, and me, with some other Lords, as I remember, to send for those Creditors, and to declare to them, that his Majesty would, in a short Time, enable his Father to pay them their just Debts, which he well knew were contracted for his Service, and that he would take it very well from them, if they would for the present make no Objection to his Service, by the Prosecution of their Persons at Law, until such Time as they should be able to satisfy their Creditors. Whereupon they willingly desisted from that Prosecution; and many of them finding now, that by his Majesty's Favour they were like to receive their Debts, which before they thought desperate, they frankly returned the Whole, or Part of the Interest, that in Indignity of Law was due to them. His Majesty, shortly after, judging it best for his Profit to determine the Collection by Commission, and to let the Whole to Farm, gave Direction to the Lord Treasurer to confer and treat with any Persons who offered the same. Many Overtures were made by several Persons, and some applied themselves directly to his Majesty; upon which, and after a convenient Time to consider of all that was proposed, the King appointed a Day when he would be attended by my Lord Treasurer, and other of my Lords, and when all the Proposals should likewise be present, and he would then and there declare his own Judgment; having first declared to the Commissioners, whereof Four were old Farmers to whom so much Money was due, that whosoever should take the Farm, they should be obliged to pay them their just Debt at such Times, and by such Proportions as his Service could bear; but as to the Letting the Farm itself, he should neither consider the Debt he owed them, nor the Sufferings they had undergone, but only the Rent they should offer, which if as much as any Body else would give, he would give them their Period as long before others; but if any other fit Man would offer them that they thought fit to give, they should be his Farmers; and therefore he did then well to consider what they would propose to him. After two Days spent by his Majesty in Conference with several Pretenders apart, and finding that the Proposals made to him by the old Farmers, with whom the other Two were to be joined who had served with them as Commissioners, were at least as much, if not more for his Profit than any which had been made by the rest, he declared that the Farm should be let to those who had been his Commissioners. Which was at that Time understood to be to go from a good Bargain, that the Two Commissioners who were not concerned in the great Debt, should be obliged to meddle with the Farm at so great a Rent; the other Four publicly declaring at the same Time, that they would not give the Rent but in Contempt of their Debts, which they thought they should sooner and better receive, when it should be offered upon their own Collections, than when it should be charged upon new Farmers; but were Sunkers to his Majesty, that he would oblige the other Two (Sir John Widdowes and Sir John Skene) to be joint Farmers with them, which his Majesty did, by making them a gracious Promise, that if they should be Loafers he would repair them: And thereupon Directions were given to Mr. Attorney-General to prepare a Grant accordingly; and I do not know where was one dissenting Voice from what his Majesty inclined to do upon the whole Debate of that Matter, the same applying to every Man to be lost just and reasonable.

The Farm being thus settled, the old Farmers were directed to bring their Account to my Lord Treasurer, by which it should manifestly appear how much the late King was justly and truly indebted to them, and how those Debts were incurred; that is, upon a just Computation, such a Satisfaction might be made to them, as was consistent with the present State of his Majesty's Occasions. Many Men, if not a whole Year, were spent in the Examination of those Accounts before the Auditors; who, besides the Exceptions they took for want of some Formalities, in the Proof of some Monies paid, which after Twenty Years of Licence, in which all their Books and Papers had been taken, their Houses plundered, their Persons imprisoned, and in which so many Persons employed by the King to receive, and by them to deliver, were dead.

on other Parts of Trade, from which it had formerly yielded. The first Consideration that offered itself to the King, that related to the Plantations, was concerning the Barbadoes, which having been most deteriorated of since, and in which, with some Reflections upon one of Particular, and together, I think, is the first Place, for down all I know in that Affair, and how I came to it, in it.

Before the Beginning of the late Trouble, the King had granted the Island of the Barbadoes to the Earl of Carlisle and his three sons, upon a Surrender upon which had been first dissolved, perfused, and planted at his Charge; and the said Earl sent a Governor and People thither, and enjoyed it to his Death, and by his Will bequeathed it for the Payment of his Debt, which was very great. The Trouble falling out in a short Time after, the said Profit had been drawn from thence in respect of the Satisfaction of that Debt, viz. the Excavators and Trustees totally neglected the taking Care of it, or protecting the Plantation; but as and after the War, many Citizens, Merchants, and Gentlemen, who were willing to be forced to withdraw their Interest from England, incorporated themselves thither, and there planted, without asking any body's Leave, or without being opposed or interfered by any body. About the Year 1647, or thereabouts, the late Earl of Carlisle, Sir John and Henry of the latter Earl, in whose the Intestment of that Island being sold, treated with the late Lord William of Windsor for him, how that Island might be so altered, that the Plantation might be advanced, and Profit made by it, which would be still reason to justify when the Debt should be paid. The late King was then in the Hands of the Army, and with his Approbation and Consent, it was agreed between the said Earl and the said Lord, that a Lease should be made by the Earl of Carlisle to the Lord William, of all the Profits which should arise out of that Plantation for the Term of twenty-one Years, as I remember; a Majority of the whole Profits to be received by the Lord William, himself, for his own Use, and Recompense of his Charge and Pains, and the said Lord to receive a Commission from the said Earl, to be Governor of that Island, and the rest of the Caribbean Islands (all which were comprehended in the Charter granted by the King to the Earl of Carlisle), and that a Commission should likewise be received from the King, or the Prince of Wales, by which the said Lord William was to be constituted Governor of the said Island. About that Time the Fleet, then in the Deane, was used to their Obedience to the King, withdrawing themselves to the Coast of Holland, to offer their Service to the Prince of Wales, his Majesty that year; the Lord William coming himself over to them to him, to leave him in any Condition he pleased to employ him. I need not speak of the Disappointments of that Venture, and the Success of that Fleet, but that the Affairs being unravelled, and there being no present Employment for the Lord William, his son entered the Service of what had passed between the Earl of Carlisle and him, with his Father's Consent, which his Majesty had likewise given to the Earl of Carlisle, with his Majesty's Recommendation of the Lord William. I then sent attending upon the Prince in Holland, as one of the King's Council attended by him for that Service. Upon the understanding of this whole Case, the Prince, upon the assurance of Advice of the Council, thought fit to grant him a Commission of Governor of the Barbadoes and other Islands, as he desired; and he had the more Reason to desire it (notwithstanding the Earl of Carlisle's Grant and Commission), because the principal Planters upon the Barbadoes had been Officers in the King's Army, or of manifest Affection to him, or always looked upon as of his Party. With this Commission the Lord William had, at his great Charge and Expence, transported himself to the said Island, and was there received as Governor; and made a Contract with the Planters, that so much should be paid upon the Hundred to the Earl of Carlisle, to whom the Propriety of the Whole belonged. But before this Agreement could be well executed, or any Profit drawn from thence, the Island was reduced to the Service of the Parliament, and of Cromwell, and a Governor appointed by them; the Lord William being sent into England, where he remained till the King's Return, and had given unquestionable Evidence of his Affection to the King's Service, for which he had oft been commended to Prison before and after Cromwell's Death.

As soon as the King returned, the Lord William desired to him to send eight or nine Years to come of his Lease formerly granted to him by the Earl of Carlisle, who was then likewise in England, and ready to do any other Act to the Lord William's Advantage; resolved to return himself to the Barbadoes, and desired the King to renew his Commission to him for the Government, which his Majesty was very willing to do, as in a Person he esteemed very much, and who had spent very much of his own Fortune, as is commonly known, in that Service; but the Barbadoes and all those other Islands were now become of another Consideration and Value than they had been of before this Trouble; the Barbadoes itself was (by that Consideration and Respect thither as was mentioned before), so fully planted, that there was no Room for new Colonies, and there had not very many of that People in the other Islands to plant, many Citizens of London had raised very great Estates there, and every Year had a great Revenue thence; and the King's Colonies from that one Island came to a very great Sum of Money yearly. All these Men, who had entered upon that Plantation as a waste Place, and with very great Charge brought it to that Perfection, and, with great Trouble, began now to apprehend that they must depend upon the good Will of the Earl of Carlisle and Lord William for the Enjoyment of their Estates thence, which they looked upon as their own; all these Men joined together in an Appeal to the King, and humbly prayed his Protection; and that they might not be oppressed by these two Lords, they said, they were the King's Subjects; that they had remained thither as to a desolate Place, and had by their Industry obtained a Livelihood there, when they could see with a good Confidence they in England; that if they were now left to those Lords to remove thence, they would be impoverished their Estates, they must leave the Country, and that Plantation would be destroyed, which yielded his Majesty so great a Revenue; that they could defend themselves by Law against the Earl of Carlisle's Title, if his Majesty did not countenance it by a new Grant of the Government to the Lord William, and therefore were Suitors to his Majesty. They then by that Consideration. At the same Time, the Creditors of the late Earl of Carlisle (whose Debts were to be paid by the Profits of that Plantation, by the Will and Settlement of the late Earl) petitioned the King, that they might be first provided for; their principal Money due to them at the Death of the Earl amounted to no less than Fifty thousand Pounds, of which they had never just received one Penny; and therefore that the Profit which should arise ought to be the first place to be applied to them, then having been many Estates utterly ruined for want of their Money due to them. The King appointed to hear all the several Petitions at the Council-Board, where they all attended with their Counsel; and after his Majesty had spent three or four Days himself in hearing the several Allegations, and making new Considerations and Difficulties every Day as arise (which shall be mentioned anon), his Majesty appointed several of my Lords of the Council to consider of the whole Matter, and to confer with the several Parties, and it was profitable to make an End between them by their own Consent; otherwise to report the several Titles to his Majesty, with each Expression as to their Judgements they thought most likely to produce a general Satisfaction, without endangering the Plantation, the Preference whereof his Majesty took to Heart. I had the Honour to be one of that Committee, and took very much Pains in reading the Charters, Grants, and Letters, and many other Papers, and Disputes which concerned that Affair, and conferred with several of the Parties themselves, to the end that I might be the better advised what could be done, having never understood or heard any thing of the Matter, or that concerned that Plantation, otherwise it is what I have before set down upon the Dispatch of the Lord William in Holland; nor had I the least Inclination or Bias to any Party. Upon the hearing all the Allegations before my Lords, the several Petitions and Titles appeared to us to be such, which we afterwards reported to the King.

The Lord William showed in doing, from the King but his Commission to be Governor in the Year 1647, in the Year which had been granted to him by the Earl of Carlisle, to the end that he might receive the Majority of their Profits which should arise to the Earl, and which had been assigned to him with the Consent and Approbation of the late King, and his Majesty that now, upon which he had undertaken that Voyage, and spent so much of his Estate.

The Earl of Carlisle, while this Commission was depending, died, and by his Will devised his Estate to the Barbadoes to the Earl of Arundel, who likewise petitioned the King for the reviving his Right; but neither he, nor the Person under whom he claimed, had any Petition till all the Debts were satisfied, nor did the Earl of Arundel demand any thing till then, but he asked the Profit would be so ready to be so much, that the same would quickly be answered, and then the Whole would come to him.

There was another Title that preceded the Earl of Carlisle's, which was that of the Earl of Albany, who alleged and proved it to be true, that the Barbadoes and those adjacent Islands were first granted by the King to his Grandfather the Earl of Albany, then Lord High-Treasurer of England, before the Earl of Carlisle had any Petition thereunto; and that the Lord Treasurer had afterwards sold and that the same should be granted to the Earl of Carlisle upon a full Contract, that he should be paid for ever the Sum of Three hundred Pounds by the Year out of the Profits of the Plantations; which Sum of three hundred Pounds had not yet been paid, and therefore the Earl of Albany demanded, as he had so much Reason, to have Satisfaction for the Arrears, and that the growing Rent might be paid to him.

The Creditors were of two kinds. The first, and who had first petitioned the King, as was said before, had all consent made to them by the Executors and Trustees of the Earl of Carlisle upon his Will, and who, at his Death, asked them the full Sum of Fifty thousand Pounds, or thereabouts: I do not remember whether of several Tradesmen and Artificers, to whom the said Earl was indebted for Wares and Goods which had been delivered for his Use, and of several Servants for that Art and Wage; and all these had, during the late Troubles, exhibited their Bills to Chancery against the Executors and Trustees of the late Earl, and had obtained a Decree in that Court for their Satisfaction, out of the Profits of those Plantations; which Decree had been confirmed by the Acts of judicial Proceedings; and as I remember, their Debts amounted to Thirty thousand Pounds, or thereabouts: None of the Creditors in personal, or one of the other Sort, had ever received one Shilling from the Time that the Earl had fallen ill.

The Planters wished positively, that the Charter granted to the Earl of Carlisle by the King was void in Point of Law; for which their Counsel alleged many Reasons: And having spent much Time upon that Argumentation, they concluded upon some humble Propositions to the King, first, That his Majesty would give them Leave to prosecute in his Name in the Lawsuits, and at that soon Charge, to repeal that Grant to the Earl of Carlisle; by which they should be freed from the Arbitrary Power and Oppression which would be exerted upon them under the Colour of that Charter, and should fully receive a great Benefit to himself, by taking the Sovereignty to himself, to whom it justly belonged: And in that case they did red in their own Name, and for the sake of the Planters who were in the Island, to consent unto any Imposition of so much upon the Hundred, which they constantly asked would amount to at least Ten thousand Pounds a Year, out of which his Majesty's Government might be well supported, and his Majesty dispose of the Overplus as he thought fit. Secondly, If his Majesty would not suffer the Cause to be repealed, that he would leave those who claimed with the Earl of Carlisle's Patent to their Remedy at Law, and leave the Planters to their own Defence; which they hoped in Justice could not be denied to them, since they alone had been at the Charge to settle the Plantations, which a benefit so great a Revenue every Year to his Majesty, when the Earl had not been at the least Expence thereupon; and if his Majesty should not allow their Petitions with his Royal Authority, they must all quit the Plantation, which would be to his Majesty's great Damage.

Thith

These being the several Pretences of the several Persons; and nothing being to be done by any Agreement between themselves, their Interests being so different and inconsistent with each other, his Majesty thought fit, in the first place, to refer the Consideration of the Legality and Validity of the Patent to his Council at Law; who, upon full Deliberation, after the hearing of all Parties, returned their Opinion, that their Patent was void, and that his Majesty might take the same into his own Power. This Report was so far from made to his Majesty, but that he very graciously declared, he would not forerunne receive any Benefit and Advantage to himself, until all these Pretences had received Satisfaction, and that he would make no other Use of avoiding the said Charter, than to dispose the Profits of the Plantation to those who in Justice had any Pretence in Law or Equity to receive the same; and therefore, that the Lord Willoughby should proceed in his Voyage to the Barbadoes, and should receive according to his Bargain a Majority of the Profits, and that the other should be disposed of for the Satisfaction of the Legality and Validity of the Patent; in order to which, his Majesty appointed the same Committee of the Lords to meet again, and to adjust the several Pretences.

When they met, they had all the Persons concerned present with them, or ready to be called in upon any Occasion; and they all appeared very glad that the King had taken the Care and Protection of the Plantation upon himself, which was all the Security the Planters had or could desire; and the Lords first Care was to make some Computation of what might be depended upon as the yearly Revenue that would arise upon the Imposition within one Island: But the Planters could not be drawn to any particular Agreement in that Point, not so much as to confess or what should be imposed upon every Hundred; but, on the contrary, declared, that two-thirds had been undertaken in that kind by one of their own Number (Mr. Kewley) in his Discourse before the King in the Council, and declared that the Plantation could not bear the Imposition he had undertaken; that whatsoever was to be done of this Nature was to be transacted by an Assembly in the Island, and that all that they could promise for themselves was, that they would use their utmost Endeavours with their Friends in the Island, that when the Lord Willoughby should arrive there, and call an Assembly, they should consent to as great an Imposition as the Plantation would bear; by which a good Revenue would arise to the King for the Purposes aforesaid.

The Creditors had great Reason to be glad of the Resolution his Majesty had taken; for though it would be a long Time before they could be fully satisfied out of a Majority of the Profits, though it should bring to the highest Consequence; yet Time they should receive all, and should every Year receive more. Which would lessen their Debt, and relieve those who were in the highest Necessities, of which there was a great Number; whereas they had hitherto, in so many Years, received none Penny; and it was evident, that without his Majesty's Authority they never should, since the Planters were resolved never to consent to any Imposition, or submit to any Authority that should be exercised under the Earl of Carlisle's Patent without a due Course of Law, the Way to obtain which would be very difficult to find out; and they understood well enough, that without his Majesty's Grace and Bounty to them, the Request, or revoking the Earl of Carlisle's Patent, would put a quick End to all their Pretences.

The greatest Difficulty that did arise was from the Earl of Arundel, to whom the late Earl of Carlisle had devised these Islands by his Will, and he had a great Mind to go further himself, and take Possession of his Right; and his Counsel had persuaded him, that the King's Charter granted to the first Earl of Carlisle was good and valid in Law, and that they believed they could maintain and defend it in any Court of Justice. Then his own Estate in Arundel was totally left by the Iniquity of the Times, and by his Father's having so frankly declared himself for the King, when very few of that Number lost any thing by their Loyalty, that he had very little left to support himself; and therefore was willing to retire into any Place abroad, where he might find but a bare Subsistence: But when he considered again, that he could have no Pretence to any thing in the Barbadoes, all after all the Creditors were fully satisfied, and how long it was like to be before they could be furnished, there remaining still due to the Creditors of both kinds no less than Fourteen Thousand Pounds Sterling principal Money, he did not believe that his insisting upon the Patent would be worth the Charge and Hazard he might inevitably be put to; and therefore, upon further Deliberation with his Friends, he willingly referred himself and all his Interest to the King's gracious Determination, as all the rest of the Pretenders and interested Persons had done.

The Case being thus fully stated to the Lords, and every Man's Interest or Pretence clearly appearing to them, they considered privately amongst themselves, when they might reasonably propose to the several Persons, in order to their Agreement amongst themselves; and that proving ineffectual, what Advice they might reasonably give his Majesty. They were unanimously of Opinion, not to advise his Majesty to cause the Patent to be called in Question; for though they doubted not, upon the Opinion of his learned Council, that the same would be adjudged void and illegal, yet they did not think it a seasonable Time, when the Nation is so active and industrious in foreign Plantations, that they should be a Charter or Patent questioned, and avoided, after it had been so many Years allowed and countenanced, and under which it had so long flourished, and was almost grown to Perfection; and that since his Majesty had declared, that notwithstanding any Right of his own, all possible Care should be taken for the Satisfaction of the Creditors, in order to the Preservation and Support of the Plantation, it would be equally equitable and honourable in his Majesty, not to leave the Earl of Arundel the only Person unconsidered, and bereaved of all his Pretences; but that they would humbly move his Majesty, that he would graciously vouchsafe to assign some proper Maintenance to the said Earl, which his unhappy Condition required, out of the Revenue which should be there sent, and until the Debts should be paid; and that after that Time such an Augmentation might be made to him as his Majesty in his Royal Bounty should think fit; in Consideration whereof the Earl should procure the Patent to be brought in and surrendered: Which he promised should be done accordingly, as soon as the Settlement should be made of that Property which should be assigned to him.

That the Lord Willoughby should enjoy the Benefit of his former Contract with the Earl of Carlisle, and approved by his Majesty, during the Remainder of those Years which are not yet expired; that he should make what Haste he could thither, and call an Assembly, to the end that such an Imposition might be agreed upon to be paid to his Majesty as should be reasonable, in consideration of the great Benefit they had already and should still enjoy, in being countenanced and secured in their several Plantations, of which at any yet were, as it were, but Tenants at Will, bearing no other Pretence of Right but the Possession; and therefore, that such Merchants and Planters who had petitioned the King, should, according to their Obligation and Promise made by them to his Majesty, use all their Credit with those in the Island, that the Imposition might arise to such a Proportion that the Revenue might answer the Ends proposed, and that one Majesty of that Revenue should be enjoyed by the Lord Willoughby for his Term.

That the Annuity of Three Hundred Pounds a Year should be paid to the Earl of Arundel, according to the original Contract mentioned before; and that the Assignment that his Majesty would likewise be pleased to make to the Earl of Arundel, should be likewise first paid; and then that the Remainder of that Money should be received to the Use of the Creditors; and that when the Lord Willoughby's Term should be expired, his Majesty should be desired, after the Refutation of so much as he should think fit for the Support of his Governor, that all the Remains might be continued towards the Creditors, whilst their just Debts should be paid.

Their Particulars appearing reasonable to the Lords, all Persons concerned were called, and the same communicated to them, who appeared all well contented; and thereupon the Lords resolved to present the same to his Majesty, which they did accordingly at the Board, and his Majesty, with a full Approbation and Advice of the whole Council, ratified the same; whereupon that Order was made by his Majesty in Council, which comprehends all the Particulars mentioned before, which was delivered to the Lord Willoughby, with his Majesty's express Command, that he should see it punctually and precisely executed; and the like Order was directed to the Clerk of the Council, to every other Person mentioned, who define the Time: To which Order I do for the more Certainty refer myself, being in no Degree conscious (having at this Time no other Help than my Memory) that it is let down with that Exactness as it ought to be. As I have thoroughly Affair taken very great Pains to reduce it to this particular Agreement, which at that Time seemed to be satisfactory to all the Persons concerned, and I do not the least Temptation of particular Benefit to myself, and I do still believe it to be very just and reasonable, and agreeable to his Majesty's Justice and Goodness, all Circumstances being considered; and though it may be, in strictness of Law, and by the avoiding the Grant made to the Earl of Carlisle, his Majesty might have possessed himself of the whole Island, without any further Consideration of the Planters or of the Creditors, I am not ashamed that I never gave his Majesty that or the like Council, in this or any other Matter of the like Nature; and if I had, I am confident his Majesty would have abhorred it, and not have thought the better of me for giving it.

The other Part of this Article, That I have caused such as complained of the arbitrary Government in the Plantations before the King and Council, to be long imprisoned for so doing, does refer, I suppose, to the Commitment of one Farmer; who being sent over to a Prisoner by the Lord Willoughby, in a Ship that came from thence, made his Appearance at Oxford, his Majesty being then there in the Sickens-Time, which was the first Time I ever heard of the Matter, or of the Manner, and at the same Time one of the Secretaries of State received a Letter from the Lord Willoughby, which was first by the same Ship, in which his Lordship had sent a direct, full Charge of Mutiny, Sedition, and Treason against him; and by his Letter informed the Secretary of all the Behaviour and Carriage of the said Farmer, with all the Circumstances thereof; and that he had, by his sedition Practices, prevailed so far upon a dissatisfied Party in that Island, that the Lord Willoughby was obliged in the instant to send him aboard the Ship, without which he did apprehend a general Revolt in the Island from his Majesty's Obedience: And the Lord Willoughby likewise desired that he might not be suffered to return thither before the Island should be reduced to a better Temper. The Man was called in before the King and Council, and the Charge which the Lord Willoughby had sent read to him: The greatest Pain whether he could not deny; and in his Discourse upon it he showed himself so prematurely and insolently before the King, that his Majesty thought it very necessary to commit him, nor did any one Counsellor then present appear to think otherwise: And I do confess, that the discharging him from his Imprisonment was some time afterwards moved, and that I was always against his Discharge; being of Opinion that it was impossible for the Lord Willoughby, or any other Governor in any of the Plantations, to preserve his Majesty's Right, and support the Government, if he should be so far discontinued, that a Man sent over by him as a Prisoner, under such a pretence and so heinous a Charge, should be upon his Appearance here in as Liberty, as any other Person; that he should be sent back a Prisoner thence, that he might be tried by the Law and Justice of the Island, and receive the ordinary Fundament for his Offence. And I cannot deny, but that I am still of the same Opinion; and if it be an Error, it proceeds from the Weakness of my Understanding, which is not in my Power to reform.

What I have here set down, is all that occurs to my Memory with reference to the Island of the Barbadoes, which being not particularly mentioned in the Article, but comprehended under the general Expression of his Majesty's foreign Plantations, I take myself obliged to give some Answer, even to that General: And I hope it will not be suggested as a Crime to me, if I have taken more Pains than other Men in this important Service of his Majesty concerning his foreign Plantations, which I did not think was enough taken to Heart; and if my Desire and Readiness to take any Pains, or give any Assistance to the Advancement of that Service, did induce many Persons to apply themselves to me on those Occasions, I hope it shall not be charged upon me as over Affecting, or Ambitious to ingratiate myself into his Majesty's Hands: thus I was intreated, for which I have this Excuse to make for myself, that I found the Pains I took to be acceptable to his Majesty: And I was so far from having any particular Design or Advantage to myself, that I do profess and declare, that for all or any of his Majesty's foreign Plantations I never had the least Interest, or the least Profit made me, except that the new Lord of Barbadoes once told me, that his Brother had found some Pieces of the speckled Wood which grows in Barbadoes, with Dead-on, that if I liked it, I might have what I would of it; whereupon I had some Pieces, which I thought might have been applied to the making of Cabinets, or the adorning of Windows; but as they were very small, to the Model. Every Piece was wind-shaken and rotten, that they could not be applied to any considerable Use; and except some Blocks of Walnut-Tree which the Governor of Virginia sent to me, and of which I made some of the Boards and Frames for Chairs, the Workmanship whereof cost me much more than the Wood was worth: And these two Particulars contain all the Rewards and Profits, that ever I received from all his Majesty's foreign Plantations, or any body, to my Use.

The Tenth Article is, That I did reject and frustrate a Proposal and Undertaking offered by his Majesty, for the Preservation of Nova and St. Christopher, and reducing the French Plantations to his Majesty's Obedience, after the Commission was drawn for that Purpose, which was the Occasion of the great Loss and Damage in this Part.

I never did reject or frustrate any such Proposal or Undertaking, never taking upon me in the least Degree to make a Judgment of Things of that Nature, nor was ever any such Proposal made to me; but I do very well remember, that his Majesty himself did once deliver to the Council a Paper, which he had sent out of his Service, Mr. May, had delivered to him, containing some Propositions for Ships and Men to be sent by his Majesty for the Recovery of St. Christopher, which had been newly taken by the French. Upon the reading of which Paper and Propositions, the same were referred to the Consideration of the Lord-General, one of the Secretaries of State, and to the Vice-Chamberlain, as I remember; who were to confer with Mr. May, and each others as joined with him; and they were at the first Time appointed to consider of another Proposition delivered in Writing by the new Lord Walsingham and some Merchants of London, who were Planters in the Barbadoes, for the supplying and better securing that Island, and the rest of those Barbadoes Islands, and for the reducing and recovering any of them which were at that time taken by the Enemy; upon the latter of these Proposals it was afterwards made: And if the other concerning Nova and St. Christopher was rejected, of which I knew nothing, I presume it is, because it either appeared ungratifiable, or not consistent with his Majesty's other Affairs.

The Eleventh Article is, That I advised and effected the Sale of Dunkirk to the French King, being Part of his Majesty's Domain, together with the Ammunition, Artillery, and all Sorts of Stores there, and for no greater Value than the said Ammunition, Artillery, and Stores were worth.

It is very well known to his Majesty, and to several Persons yet alive, that the partying with Dunkirk was resolved upon before ever I heard of it, and that the Purpose was therefore conceived from the beginning; and I believe that I was not of that Opinion, and that I would not concur in the Advice. When it was afterwards proposed and debated, when I was present, there likewise attending upon his Majesty and his Royal Highness the late Lord Treasurer, two Secretaries of State, and some other of the Lords of the Council, the Reasons that were given for the partying with it, were, First, That the Profit which did or could accrue to the Kingdom by keeping it, was very considerable, whether in War or Peace; that by Sea it was very little useful, it being no Harbour, nor having Place for our Ships to ride safe in, and that if it were in the Hand of the Enemy, it could do us much Injury, because three or four Ships might block it up, and keep it out of our Neighbourhood; and that though heinous it had been a Place of Licence at Sea, and had much obstructed Trade by their Men at War, yet that proceeded only from the Weakness of that Time, in applying proper Remedies as it, which was manifest by Cromwell's blocking them up, and restraining them when he made War upon them, inasmuch as all the Men of War left that Place, and broke themselves to other Harbours; that it was so weak in the Land (notwithstanding the great Charge his Majesty had been at in the Fortifications, which were not yet finished), by the Situation and the Soil, that it required as many Men within to defend it, as the Army should consist of that besieged it, otherwise, that it could never hold out and endure a Siege of two Months, as appeared clearly by its having been taken and given in many Times within the last Year, in all which Times it was held out so long, though there was always an Army at no great Distance to relieve it. Secondly, That the Charge of keeping and maintaining it, without any Accidents from the Attempt of an Enemy, did amount unto above One hundred and twenty thousand Pounds a Year, which was a Sum the Revenue of the Crown could not support, without leaving many other Particulars of much more Importance unprovided for; and this was not lightly urged, but the State of the Revenue, and the constant and insupportable Issues were at the same Time presented. Thirdly, It could not reasonably be believed, but that if Dunkirk were kept, his Majesty would be shortly involved in a War with one of the two Crowns: The Spanish Ambassador had already demanded the Restoration of it in Point of Justice, it having been taken from his Master by the late Union, in a Time when there was not only a Peace between his Majesty and the King of Spain, but when his Majesty ended and was entertained by the Catholic King in Flanders; and at the same Time, both France and Spain withheld their Subjects from paying their small Contributions to the Garrison at Dunkirk, and endeavored to relieve the Governor himself from enjoying those Privileges which had been always enjoyed by him, from the Time that it was put into Cromwell's Hands; and it was then concerted, that as it would be very good for the King to prefer a Neutrality towards both Crowns, even during the Time of the War between them (which Temper was thought very necessary for his Majesty's Affairs), so it would be much more difficult to avoid a War with one of them upon the keeping of Dunkirk, if the Peace that was newly made should remain firm and unbroken. Upon these Reasons, (the major Part whereof were out of my Sight, and I could only govern myself by the Opinion of those who understood Matters of that Nature, nor could I answer any of the Arguments which have been offered) his Majesty resolved to safe himself of the Burthen of maintaining Dunkirk, and to part with it in such a Manner as might be most for his Advantage and Benefit. There remained then no other Question, than into what Hand should it? And the Measure of that was only who would give most Money for it, there being then no Inclination to prefer one before another. It was enough understood, that both Crowns would be very glad to have it, and would probably both make large Offers for it; but it was then so evident, that whatsoever France should choose for, the King might be fain to receive, and the Subjects would be least displeased; whereas, on the other Hand, it was as notorious, and as evident to his Majesty, and to all who had any Knowledge of the Court of Spain, and of the Secretary of Statey there and in Flanders, that how large Offers never the Spanish might make, they could not be able in any Time to pay any considerable Sum of Money; and that there would be so much Time spent in Contests between Madrid and Bragg before it could be dispatched, that the keeping it so long in his Majesty's Hands would be an insupportable Burthen to him, besides that, it seemed then probable that the Spanish would shortly declare himself an Enemy, for besides that he demanded Dunkirk as of right, so he likewise required the Restoration of Tanager and Jamaica upon the same Reason, and declared, that without it there could be no lasting Peace between England and Spain, and refused so much as to enter into a Treaty of Alliance with the King, before he would promise to make such a Restoration. There wanted not in this Conference and Debate the Consideration of the States of the United Provinces, as Persons here enough to declare the Pollution of Dunkirk, from whence they had formerly received so much Damage, and were too much to receive more whenever they should be engaged in any War; and it on Truth they had any such Desire, more Money might reasonably be required of them, and probably be obtained, than could be expected from either of the Kings. But upon Discussion of that Point, it did appear to every Man's Reason very manifest, that though they had rather that Dunkirk should be put into the Hand of the Spanish than delivered to France, or that it should be detained by the English, yet they durst not more to it into any such Pollution, which neither of the Kings would have approved of, and so it would have required them to the Displeasure, if not to the Hostility of both Crowns. Upon this full Deliberation, his Majesty inclined rather to give it up to France than to Spain; but deferred any positive Resolution till he had imposed the Matter to the Council-Board, where the Debate was again renewed, principally concerning the keeping or the partying with it, in which debate the Memory and Mention of what had been done in the House of Commons heretofore upon that Subject was not omitted, nor the Bill that they had sent up to the House of Peers for annexing it inseparably to the Crown; but after a long Debate of the whole Matter, there was no more said, above one Lord of the Council who offered his Advice to his Majesty against his partying with it, and the Grant of the Lord's dissenting was enough understood to have nothing of Publick in it. In conclusion, his Majesty resolved, for the Reason aforesaid, to put it into the Hands of France, if that King would fairly his Majesty's Expectation in the Money he would request for it.

Monfieur D'Estrades came privately over to treat upon it without any Character, but pretending to make it his Way for Holland, whither he was designed for Ambassador. After he had waited upon the King, his Majesty appointed four or five of the Lords of his Privy-Council (whereof I was required to be one) to treat with Monfieur D'Estrades upon the Sale of Dunkirk, and at that our first Conference, before, after we had in a modest Court to persuade him to make more Offer, we did demand the Sum of seven hundred thousand Pounds Sterling to be paid by the King of France for the Delivery of Dunkirk and Mardyke (which is always understood to be included when Dunkirk is mentioned) into his Possession. Which sum appeared to him so huge, that he seemed to think the Treaty at an end, and relived not to make any Offer at all on the Part of the King of France, and to the Conference broke up. At the next Meeting he offered three Millions of Livres, which, according to the common Account, amounted to three hundred thousand Pounds; which we as no more understood: So that any further Conference was discontinued till he had sent an Express or two into France, and till their Return, and afterwards, upon one infirm word which he thought too much, and his Offer of what we esteemed too little, the Treaty seemed to be at an end, and he preparing for his Return. In conclusion, his Majesty being fully as desirous to part with it, as the King of France could be to have it, it was agreed and concluded, that upon the Payment of five hundred thousand Pounds in Specie at Calais to such Persons as the King should appoint to receive it, his Majesty's Garrison of Dunkirk should be withdrawn, and that Place put into the Hands of the King of France: All which was executed accordingly; and I believe was a greater Sum of Money than was ever paid at one Payment by any Prince to Christendom, upon what Occasion soever. And that all this should not amount to a greater Value than the Ammunition, Artillery, and Stores were worth, which were delivered with it, is very strange, and cannot be supplied by any reasonable Computation. I do

G E E

I do very well remember, that in the Treaty we did with much Rapacity and Recklessness inflict upon the degrading and enervating us to England the Cannon and other Artillery and Ammunition; but Monsieur D'Albion did not consent to it, it being, as he said, necessary for the Defence of the Place, which probably might be attacked by the Spaniards within few Days after it should be delivered into the Hands of the French; and upon our inferring that Exception of the Cannon and Ammunition in said Demand, he was at last induced to consent to the Payment of five hundred thousand Pistoles, which he had never before yielded unto; and when his Majesty plainly discerned that the King of France would in Truth give no more, and had caused some Librarians to be made of the Cannon and Ammunition, the Value whereof, as I remember, was not thought to am't to more than twenty thousand Pistoles sterling, or thereabouts, his Majesty refused to accept what was offered, for which I have not heard that he hath ever been sorry; and his Majesty did at the same Time refuse, and positively declare, that all the Money which should be received for Dunkirk, should be brought to, and deposited in the Tower of London, and so Part of it applied to any ordinary Occasions, but to be reserved for some pressing Accident, as an Intemperance, or the like, which was reasonably enough apprehended; and I presume it was all infused into his Majesty's Bladder, and at such Seasons, as his Majesty found necessary for such important Affairs, of the Particulars whereof I can say nothing. This is all I can say concerning the Sale of Dunkirk, and of my Part in that Transaction. To which I shall only add, that I aided that Part in it which I was obliged by my Duty to do, in Obedience to the King's Commands; and that before, or in, or after the Transaction, I never valued the Value of our Shilling for Reward, or Present, or any other Consideration relating to that Affair; and I believe the Treatment I have received since my coming into France is an unquestionable Evidence that that King did never take himself to be beholden to me for that, or any other Service, as in Truth he never was.

The Twelfth Article is, That I did utterly crush his Majesty's Letters Patents under a Great Seal of England (so we Dr. Crautcher) to be altered, and the said Letters Patents to be wholly raised.

When I first heard of this Charge, I could not comprehend what the Meaning of it was, being most assured that I had never caused any Alteration to be made in any of his Majesty's Letters Patents under the Great Seal, or the Infringement thereof to be raised; but upon Enquiry I was informed, that Dr. Crautcher, who was Chaplain to his Royal Highness the Duke of York, and had attended upon his Person during the whole Time that his Highness was beyond the Seas, upon his Majesty's Return into England, had obtained from the King his Royal Permission to the Passage of Tenderloin in the County of Worcester; which Permission, according to Custom, passed under the Great Seal of England, that when he brought his Address upon the Permission against the Intruder, who refused to give him Possession, and the Record was carried down to the Affairs in the Country, when the Doctor's Counsel was to open his Title, and thereupon was to produce the King's Permission, they found, upon Perusal thereof, that either by Misinformation, or Negligence of the Clerk, instead of the County of Worcester, where the Rectory was, the County of Warwick was inserted; upon which Mistake, the Doctor was necessitated to be mentioned; and thereupon he freely with me a Journey to London, to advise with his Counsel, and the most experienced Clerics, how to remove the Misfortune that had befallen him, and that his Majesty's Right might not be distressed by such an Oversight in the Clerk; and it seems he was by them advised, at the usual Way in Cases of that Nature, to petition the King, that in his Majesty's Presence, the Permission might be amended, and Worcester inserted instead of Warwick, and that thereupon the Great Seal might be again affixed to it, all which was done accordingly, as in such Cases is usual. And this is all I know of that Affair.

The Thirteenth Article, That I have, in an arbitrary Way, assumed and drawn into Quodam divers of his Majesty's Subjects concerning their Lands, Tenements, Goods and Chattels, and Properties, determined thereof at the Council-Table, and stopped Proceedings at Law, and threatened Justice that should the Statute of 17 Car. 1.

I must here again lament my own Misfortune, that I am exposed to public Reproach under a general calumnious Charge, without offering any one Particular, to which I might answer my Defence. I have therefore no more to say, but that I am very innocent as to any Crime laid to my Charge in this Article; and I have been so far from examining and drawing into Question any of his Majesty's Subjects concerning their Lands, Tenements, Goods and Chattels, and Properties, and determining the same at the Council-Table, and stopping Proceedings at Law, that I do not know or believe that any one Case of that Nature hath been ever determined there, at least when I have been present; I having always discomfited all such Addresses, and procured all Petitions of that Kind to be rejected as often as they have been tendered; and I take myself obliged to lay, for the vindication of his Majesty's Honour and Justice, that there have not been in many Years passed since the Enactment of the Council-Table, with its single Disfranchisement or Disquiet to the Subjects concerning their Lands, Tenements, Goods and Chattels, and Properties, as hath been since his Majesty's happy Return, nor hath the arbitrary Course of Proceeding in Law been less obstructed.

The Fourteenth Article is, That I did cause Quo Warrants to be issued out against most of the Corporations of England by All of Parliament, and the same I might receive great Sums of Money from them for removing their Charters; which when they complied withal, I caused the said Quo Warrants to be discharged, and Proceedings therein to cease.

I never caused any Quo Warrants to issue out against any one Corporation in England, but by his Majesty's express Command, or by Order of the Board; which was always upon some Mismanagement or Misbehaviour in the Corporation: And I do not remember that I ever moved the King against any particular Corporation, but that of Windsor; and which my Duty to his Majesty obliged me to do, being intrusted by his Majesty with the Command of his Horse and Pikes there, and being his Majesty's Secretary and his Honour and Master of Windsor, upon which the Borough had always depended. His Majesty having conferred that Charge upon me, I was no longer possessed of it by the Death of the late Earl of Lindley, who enjoyed that Place before, than I received a Petition from several Inhabitants and Burgesses of the Borough of Windsor, who complained that the Mayor and Juricks had lately procured their Charter to be renewed, without the Privy or Consent of the Borough; and that under Pretence of renewing it, they had procured many new Clauses to be inserted, and thereby reduced much of the Government, which before depended upon the whole Corporation, into their own Hands; and had thereby likewise procured a Piece of Ground, the Benefit whereof did formerly belong to all the Burgesses, and was usually applied to the Relief of such of them who were decayed in their Estates, to be now granted to the Mayor, and a select Number of the Juricks; and the Profit thereof to be at their Disposal, to the great Prejudice of the Borough and the Inhabitants thereof. I referred that Petition to Mr. Justice Mordaunt, who lived within four or five Miles of Windsor, and desired him to examine the Truth of these Allegations, and to certify me whether the Complaints were just and reasonable. Whereupon he took the Pains to go over to the Town, and confer with the Mayor and Juricks, and heard the Allegations of the Petitioners; and upon the whole Matter certified me, that the said four or five postal Alterations in the new Charter from that which was in the old, and from some Concessions; and at the same Time, Sir William Fitzmaurice, who is Ranger of the Parks, certified me, that since the renewing of this Charter, the Mayor and Juricks were not so good Neighbours to his Majesty's Game, as they had formerly been, and had withdrawn many of those services which they had used to perform; and that when any Trespassers were committed by those of the Borough upon his Majesty's Woods or Game, which happened very frequently, and Complaint was thereof made to the Mayor and Juricks, who had the sole Jurisdiction within the Borough, there was to fight and peremptory Examination thereof, that the Prosecutions were waived out, and no Justice could be obtained. It was my Duty to inform his Majesty of these Proceedings, who was much surprised thereat, and thereupon gave Direction to his Attorney General to bring a Quo Warrant, and to request that Charter which had been so unduly procured, and in which his Majesty had been so grossly deceived and abused; and I belov'd there was the left Vague used in the Production of that Quo Warrant, because the Mayor and Juricks, for some Time, pretended that they would forswear the said Charter, and receive a new one in such Manner as his Majesty thought fit, though they afterwards changed their Mind. And this is the only Charter which I gave Direction for the Production of, to the best of my Memory: Nor did I ever give Direction, upon the Receipt of any Money, to discharge any Quo Warrant, or cause the Prosecution thereupon to cease; nor did I ever receive the least Sum of Money for the granting or renewing any Charter, other than the usual Fees received for the same by the Clerk of the Hattage, and accounted to the Great Seal; which Fees, as I remember, amounts to thirteen Shillings and four Pence, or thereabouts.

The Fifteenth Article is, That I procured the Bills of Attainder for John, and removed great Sums of Money for the same, in a most corrupt and unbecomming Manner.

I do confess, if I have received the least Sum of Money for or upon the passing any Bills for the Attainder of Ireland, I have done the same in a most corrupt and unlawful Manner; nor need I have been so solicitous in procuring any of the said Bills to pass, or been more concerned in or for the passing them (except for his Majesty's Service, and the Publick Peace), than any other Counsellor present at those Debates hath been; but because this Assertion upon my Honour and my Honesty hath been by so much libelously continued by some Men, who very well know my Innocence in this Particular, and may yet have gained Credit with many upon the Credulity of bold Reporters; I do not know a better Way for my own entire Vindication, than to set down an entire Relation of all that hath passed by my Hand, or with my Privy, with reference to Ireland, since the Time of his Majesty's happy Return into England. When his Majesty issued, at his coming to Windsor, several Proclamations of Honour and Quality departed from Ireland, to tender the humble Duty, Obedience, and Submission of that Kingdom to his Majesty's Government and Subjection; the present Government of Ireland, at that Time, being constituted in a Military Way, by those who had the Command of that Part of the Army, which, upon the Revolution in England, had declared their Purpose and Resolution to return to his Majesty's Obedience; and there could not be too much Expedition used in settling it under those Laws, and that Form of Government it had been formerly accustomed to. Every Body remembers the Multiplicity of Business which was incumbent to at that Time, being to reduce his Three Kingdoms to that old Order and Form of Government which they might in Justice require, and which for so many Years had, by the Confusion of the late Civil War, been discontinued; and therefore it will not be much wondered at, that the Settlement of Ireland did not proceed with that Expedition as the distracted Interests of that Kingdom did require.

Within few Days after the King's Arrival at Windsor, the Commissioners or Deputies from Ireland (which I know not upon what other Name or Title to mention them) taking Notice of the Truth the King then reposed in me, (a genuine Trust God, and the King well knew, that I was in my Degree unworthy of it) addressed themselves to me, desiring that I would receive from them an Information of the present State and Condition of that Kingdom; which his Majesty had likewise commanded them to impart to me; and that I would assist them in procuring his Majesty's Favour, that as little Time might be lost as was possible, in endeavouring to settle and compose the distracted Condition of that Kingdom: And upon Conference with them, I quickly found that it was in a distracted Condition indeed, so hopelessly distracted, that I could not comprehend any practicable Way to compose it. There had been an Act of Parliament made in the Beginning of the Rebellion for the Encouragement of Adventurers, that was, to encourage all Persons in giving in Money for the carrying on the War, upon the Alliance of having a Remission for their Money out of the forfeited Lands of those who were at fault in the Rebellion, according to an Edict of the Value by the said Act of Parliament, in which, for their better Security, there was likewise a Clause, that his Majesty should not grant a Pardon to any of those Rebels: And upon this Invitation many honourable Persons, and others, had brought in great Sums of Money for the carrying on that War, upon the Security aforesaid. But the Rebellion shortly breaking out in England, the Persons in Power in both Houses quickly violated that whole Act, by taking the Money raised, and lent for the Service of Ireland, without, and contrary to the Consent of those who lent it, and applying it for the Support of the Rebellion in England, and employed those Regiments of Horse and Foot, who were lent for Ireland, to fight against the King, under the Command of my Lord of Egger, and who did serve under his Command, at the Battle of Eger-Hill, where four of them, out of the Detachments of being to be employed into Ireland, quitted my Lord Egger's Arms, and went to the King. The Service of Ireland being thus negl'd, and to such a Degree that the Rebels there increased in Number and in Strength, many Persons of Honour in that Nation, who had contained themselves within their Obedience, and were in no Degree praiseworthy for their Infidelity and breaking out into Rebellion, found it now necessary for their own Preservation, to secure themselves in those Towns and Places which were possessed by the Rebels, and to join with them in these Counties, yet making still the Pretence of Duty to the King, and of an innocent Defect towards this Subjection, which many of them made good afterwards upon the first Opportunity. By this means the Rebels in Ireland advanced every Day in Power, and had several Armies in the several Provinces of the Kingdom, much superior in Power to the English Forces, whilst they were every Day diminished by their Want of Victuals, Want of Cloaths, and Want of Pay, which the Parliament neglected to supply them with, and the King could not. His late Majesty, after about a Year's Time that the Rebellion in England had been prosecuted against him, notwithstanding all Overtures of Accommodation, found it necessary to make a Cession to Ireland, which was after some Years transacted into a Peace, which though it was quickly afterwards most wickedly and perfidiously broken by the Irish to their own Destruction, yet many principal Persons of Honour and good Fortune adhered afterwards constantly to the King, without any Intermission from their Allegiance; and such Men believed the full Benefit of that Peace, as being thrust to their Estates which did no Justice belong to them, and expected the same accordingly.

After the Murder of his late Majesty, the King that now is receiving an Address from his Roman Catholic Subjects in Ireland, with great Acknowledgements of their past Crimes and Errors, and of ample Prolifications of their Duty and Obedience for the Time to come, during the Time of his being in France, I sent the Lord Marquis of Ormonde into Ireland as his Lieutenant of that Kingdom, and with Authority to make such Concessions to his Roman Catholic Subjects as might unite them to his Obedience; and that thereby such an Union might likewise be made between his English and Irish Subjects, the Lord Marquis having noticed the whole Province of Munster, and the Army, and Gentlemen to make, to make Profession of Fidelity to their King, that Dublin might quickly be recovered, which was the only considerable Place that then continued in Rebellion, and in which there were very many of known Affections to the King, who would quickly have rendered that City to the Lord Lieutenant, if a great Supply from the Parliament, immediately after the Murder of the late King, had not unhappily arrived the very Day or two before the Marquis of Ormonde marched with his Army to recover Dublin, and within very few Weeks after, Ormonde himself landed there with a great Army of Horse and Foot, and all Provisions necessary for the Support and Maintenance of it.

It is not necessary in this Place, and upon this Occasion, to mention what befel that unhappy Kingdom after Ormonde's Arrival there; the quick and speedy Reduction of Towns and Garrisons, the dissolving and dismissing of the Troops and Army under the Command of the Lord Lieutenant, and he being forced to withdraw himself out of the Kingdom, and to return into France; which, although it proceeded from the miserable and foolish Jealousies of the Irish, and then from their Treachery and Perfidiousness, yet those Crimes did not cover the whole Nation; yet there remained still very many Persons of Honour and Quality, who never after were false to his Majesty, and therefore respected the Oath of the late Peace, without any Intermission from his Majesty that now is, as of Justice belonging to them; and many of this Condition (some whereof had ever been in Arms against the Crown, but had faithfully served his Majesty's Army in England during the whole Rebellion) transported themselves to his Majesty by beyond the Seas, and many others were taken and put to Death in Ireland.

After all Opposition to the Parliament was totally suppressed in Ireland, and the Kingdom entirely at their Devotion, they began then to think of executing the Act of Parliament of the Seventeenth Year of the late King, for Satisfaction of the Adventurers. But as they had from the Beginning violated that Act, by the multiplying the Debt and the Money, as aforesaid, so they now preferred the gratifying and rewarding, and paying the Arrears due to the Officers and Soldiers, by assigning them the Portions of the Lands which they called forfeited, before they did any Thing for Satisfaction of the Adventurers, except such only who for some other Motive or Interest had a Title to those Vacancies; and amongst the forfeited Lands they reckoned all that which belonged to the Church, to the Marquis of Ormonde, the Lord Inchiquin, and all those who had adhered to the King, and constantly opposed the Rebels there, as Part, and distributed the same accordingly. So that at this Time, when the Commissioners for that King were assisted by his Majesty, the Officers and Soldiers of the Army, and some Adventurers, were and had been in quiet Possession for many Years of all the Church-Lands, of all the Marquis of Ormonde's Lands, and the Lands of all other his Majesty's faithful Friends and Servants; and yet there remained a general Complaint amongst the Adventurers, that they were in no degree satisfied what was due to them upon their Adventures by the Act of Parliament, and desired the King that they might receive what was their Due.

Ormonde had not exercised such a Severity as to eradicate the whole Irish Nation; but had transplanted them with so great Rigour out of the other Provinces into the Province of Connaught, that there was scarce left one Irish Family out of Connaught, where the Ulster had assigned them severally such Portions as he thought reasonable enough for the small Possessions he had formerly taken out of their own Estates, in those Places where their Fortunes had lain: And to this Transplantation there had been forced to give their Consent, having had nothing in their Election but either to accept their Assignations, or to have nothing to live upon in any other Place. But now, upon his Majesty's Return, as well this Men who had been transplanted thither out of other Provinces, as those upon whose Lands the other were transplanted as foremen to the State, were now Strangers to the King, that every one might be refused to his own, and that their past Crimes might be expiated by their extreme Sufferings they had endured for many Years; and that those Men who had been as deep in Rebellion as themselves, and continued much longer, and prospered better so on, might not be gratified and rewarded with that Honour and Fortune.

Many Persons of Honour and Reputation, as is said before, had repaired to the King whilst he was beyond the Seas, and followed and attended him there, many Regiments had been raised and transported with the Consent and Approbation of Ormonde, for the Service of the two Crowns of France and Spain, and many of those Officers had served his Majesty from the Beginning, and had never been in Rebellion, and upon his Majesty's Command, as soon as he was in Ireland, brought their Troops more over thither to serve as he should direct: and as the King had kept Intelligence always with many of his well-affected Subjects in England and in Scotland, he had likewise done with some in Ireland, to the End that they might be ready to make use of the first Opportunity that should be offered by any Divisions in the Army, or other Conjunctions, to join with those who were most forward to advance the King's Retitution; which many considerable Men there had promised to do, and in such Seasons could have rendered themselves very useful, and all these Men had some Pretence to the King's Favour, and an Expectation to be rewarded, at least, to meet Part of their Estate.

This was the perplexed State of that Kingdom when the King returned into England, and when the Commissioners attended the Majesty, and consulted with me, when I protested to them that there were too many Intricacies in the Business, and the whole Kingdom involved in so many contradictory Titles and Interests, that I knew not what Counsel to give, or what to propose, but that I would in public Council give the best Advice and Assistance I could for the settling that Kingdom, when they should make any such Proposition to his Majesty as were practicable. That which was first to be done, and which could only make all other Expedients so practicable, was the settling the Government in such a Form, and by such Rules, as the Kingdom had been accustomed to before the Troubles, and that the Courts and Court of Justice might be opened. Then the Commissioners, themselves proposed, as the first Work incumbent upon his Majesty, in Piety, Honour and Justice, that all such to whom the Lands of the Church, the Lands of the Marquis of Ormonde, and of all his Majesty's Friends who had been faithful to him, should be forthwith removed, that the right Owners might immediately be put in Possession of what in Right belonged to them, which was the more easily to be done, because much of those Lands remained undisposed of, and reserved for Ormonde himself, and much of the rest had been assigned to those Officers who had been the King's Mercenaries; and to those Lands were to be lost from all other Title or Pretence, but what the King himself could make. But then there was great Caution and Order to be observed, lest to assign other Recompense to those who were possessed (how erroneously soever) of any Lands, either as Adventurers upon the Statute, or as Soldiers, for the full Arrears of their Pay; and his Majesty had declared before his coming into England, there should be Satisfaction given to all such Persons; and the Truth is, the whole Kingdom of Ireland was at that Time so much possessed by the Adventurers and Soldiers, that it was thought very necessary in Point of Prudence, to remove some out of Possession of what had been formerly assigned to them, and according to the Rules of that Time, until future other Lands were assigned to them, which was not difficult to be done. Then the Commissioners, observing how much his Majesty was concerned for many of those who had served him beyond the Seas, and for such others who claimed the Benefit of the first and second Truce, understood that his Majesty should not be prejudiced in any of those Particulars, but that all his Persons should be preferred, and their Estates secured; and thereupon a Petition was prepared, containing those Provisions which were approved by the Commissioners, who understood to have such a Bill transcribed as might be the Foundation for a good Settlement, and in which his Majesty might make such Alterations as he did think fit.

There were many Difficulties appeared in settling the Government that were at first apprehended, and nothing was so necessary as sending over the King's Commission, which might determine all other Authorities of Committees and Officers, in which Idea had been steeled by a Common Consent, or rather by the Prevalence of a Party, which already grew into Factions and Contentions. The General who had contributed so much to the King's Restoration, and appeared very zealous for the Advancement of his Service, had been by the Parliament and Council of State (as they called them) declared and created General of all the Forces in the three Kingdoms, and John O'Brien had been chosen, as well in Scotland and Ireland, as in England, before his Majesty's Return, and the King did not think fit in any degree to lessen his Trust and Authority, nor had the General any Inclination to part with his Power in Ireland, where he had procured a great Estate, and could best secure it under his own Authority, and yet be refused not to go thither, and indeed his Presence there, about the King, was thought very necessary. Hereupon the King declared, that he would make the Lord Roberts Deputy of Ireland, who was willing to receive that Charge, knowing, at the same Time, that the Duke of Albemarle was to continue Lieutenant of that Kingdom. But these quickly arose false Differences between the General and the Lord Roberts, about the drawing their Commissions, the latter being so scrupulous and nice in having the least Dependence upon the General, though Lord Lieutenant, and his Pride and Morosity was such towards the Commissioners of Ireland, that they withdrew themselves from giving him further Attendance and Information; so that his Majesty quickly discerned, that though he was a Man of great Parts and Knowledge, yet his Nature and Temper was not fit for that Employment, and therefore resolved for the present to put the Government into the Hands of three Lords Justices, the Lord Chancellor of that Kingdom, the Earl of Mordaunt, and the Earl of Ormonde, who might begin to reduce the Government into some Order, until his Majesty could take a further Resolution for the Establishment of it.

As soon as a Bill was transmitted, according to the usual Course, to his Majesty, for the Settlement of Ireland, with such a Preamble as is before mentioned, though the Body of the Bill did not in Truth correspond with it; his Majesty gave Direction, that it should be shewed and exposed to those of the several Estates, even to the Irish themselves, who were the most likely to receive Prejudice from it: And after a sufficient Time allowed for every Man's Consideration, his Majesty appointed a Trust to have it read in the House, and to hear what Objections could be made against it. The great Debate then was upon the Preamble of the Bill, who appeared with marvellous Confidence, and complained, that by that Act then prepared, and under Consideration, the whole Irish Nation would be extinguished, all their Estates being thereby taken from them. As the present Government in Ireland, which had declared for the King, had lost over Commissioners or Deputies to attend his Majesty, and know his Pleasure, as is mentioned before; so the Body of Adventurers had likewise chosen free Persons to present their Grievances and Petitions; and the Irish, under the Names of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, had likewise chosen others to appear on their Behalf, whereas some were Lawyers and Men of good Parts, who will know all the Trauculations in Ireland, from the Beginning of the Rebellion, throughout all the Changes of Government. The chief Arguments they urged for themselves were, First, Their long and great Sufferings, the Loss of their Estates for Five or Six-and-Twenty Years, the working and spending of the whole Nation in Battles, and in Transportation of Men into the Parts beyond the Seas; whether, as I remember, they reckoned above Twenty Thousand Men to be transported out of that Kingdom in Four or Five Years; the great Numbers which had been executed and massacred after his Majesty's Government had been forced from thence; the great Numbers which had perished by Famine and the Plague; that two great Judgements having raged over the Kingdom for two or three Years, and at last the transcribing the small Remains of the Nation into the Governor of the Province of Connaught, where yet much of the Land was taken from them, which had been assigned to them with all those Formalities of Law which were practised under that Government. Secondly, They demanded the Benefits of the two Treaties of Peace, the one in the late King's Time, and the other confirmed by his Majesty that now is; by both which they had indemnified for all Acts done by them in the Rebellion; and indited upon their Innocence since that Time, and that they had pursued all Ways that were in their Power to manifest their Affection to his Majesty, and to secure an Obedience to his Commands which he was beyond the Seas, that they detested themselves as, and withdrew themselves from, the Service of France or Spain, in fact, inasmuch as his Majesty himself was the Pleader that should be. Thirdly, They urged, and forced, with a little more Liberty and Indifference than became them in that Conjunction, the Unworthiness and Incapacity of those who for so many Years had possessed themselves of their Estates, and fought now a Confirmation of their rebellious Title from his Majesty: That their Rebellion had been more infamous, and of a greater Magnitude than that of the Irish; who had risen in Arms to free themselves from the Rigour and Severity that was exercised upon them by some of the King's Ministers, and for the Liberty of their Conscience and Practice of their Religion, without having the least Intention or Thought of withdrawing themselves from his Majesty's Obedience, or declining his Majesty's Government: Whereas, the others, when they carried on an open Rebellion against his Majesty's Sacred Person, when they had horribly murdered in the Sight of the Sun, with all imaginable Circumstances of Contempt and Deniance, and as much as in they lay, had rooted out Monarchy itself, and overturned and destroyed the whole Government of Church and State; and therefore that whatever Punishment the poor Irish had deserved for their former Transgression, which they have to long since repented of, and departed from the Rebellion when they had Arms and strong Towers in their Hands, and put themselves again under his Majesty's Protection; this Part of the English, who were possessed of their Estates, had broken all their Obligations to God and the King, and so could not merit to be granted with their Ruin and total Destruction. That it was too evident and notorious to the World, that his Majesty's Three Kingdoms had been very faulty to him, and withdrawn themselves from his Government, by which he had been compelled to live in Exile for many Years; and yet, that upon their Return to their Duty and Obedience, his Majesty had been graciously pleased to grant a free and general Pardon, and Act of Indemnity, in which many were comprehended who had in Truth been the Contrivers and Fomenters of all the Mischief and Defolation which had involved the Three Nations for so many Years; and therefore they hoped, that when all his Majesty's other Subjects (as criminal at least as the others) were, by his Majesty's Clemency, restored to their own Estates which had been seized, were in full Peace, and Mirth and Joy, the poor Irish alone should not be totally exempt from all his Majesty's Grace, and left in Tears and Mourning, and Lamentation, and be sacrificed without Redemption to the Avarice and Cruelty of those, who had not only spoiled and oppressed them, but had done all that was in their Power, and with all the Indulgence imaginable, to defray his Majesty himself, and his Posterity, and who now returns to their Obedience, and submitted to his Government, when they were no longer able to oppose it; nor did they yet return to it with that Joy and Alacrity, and Relinquishment as the Irish did, and desired to do. And to conclude with those pathetic Applications and Appeals to his Majesty, as Men well versed in Discourses of that Nature are accustomed to do.

This Discourse carried on, and urged with more Passion, Vehemence and Indignation, than was suitable to the Condition they were in, and in which, and the Excellency of their Rhetoric, they had let fall many Expressions very indelicate and unwarrantable, and in some of them confidently asserted, if not justified their first Entrance into Rebellion, (the most barbarous, certainly, and unexcusable, that any Christians have been engaged in, in any Age,) they intercalated themselves to many who had Compassion enough for them, and gave their immediate Adversaries (who stood upon the Advantage Ground) both Provocation and Opportunity to lay many Things to their Reproach, which probably would else have been forbore. They enlarged upon all the odious Circumstances of the first Year of the Rebellion, the most horrid of above a Hundred Thousand Persons in cold Blood, and with all the Barbarity imaginable, which Murders and Barbarities had been always excepted from Pardon: And they told them, that if these were not some amongst themselves that then appeared, they were sure there would be many found amongst those for whom they appeared, who would be found guilty of those odious Crimes, which were excluded from any Benefit by those Treaties. And so that first Agitation being his Majesty vented itself in so much Bitterness and Animosity on both Sides, that his Majesty thought it best to conclude it with such Reprehensions and Annals, as might dispose them to a better Temper when they should be next admitted to his Majesty's Presence.

At their next Attendance upon his Majesty, which was within few Days after, the Commissioners for the Protestants, taking Notice of what the other Party had alledged for their Defence, the Protest that they had to the two Acts of Pacification, and their exulting their own Innocence from that Time, and their great Affection for his Majesty's Service, declared, that whatever legal Title the Adventurers had to the Lands they were in Possession of, many of whom had always doubtfully served the King, yet they would be content, that all those who had in Truth preserved their Integrity towards his Majesty from the Time of either or both the Pacifications, and not swayed afterwards from their Allegiance, should partake of his Majesty's Grace, and Royal Bounty, in such a Manner, and so such a Degree, as his Majesty thought fit to exercise towards them. But they were confident they should make it appear, that their Promises to that Grace and Favour were not founded upon any reasonable Title, that they had never consented to any one Act of Pacification, in which the Loss they had been assured, which they had not waited and broken through, but Ten Days after, they returned to all their Acts of Disaffection and Rebellion, that after the first Act of Pacification, ratified by the late King, in very few Days after they treated the Herald, his Majesty's Officer, who came to proclaim that Peace, with all manner of Indignity, tearing his Coat of Arms (the King's Arms) from off his Back, and beat and wounded him so, that he was hardly rescued from the Loss of his Life; that about the same time they endeavoured to surprise and murder the Lord Lieutenant, and pursued him to Drogheda, which they forthwith besieged with their Army, under the Command of the General who had signed the Peace; they imposed their Commissioners who were authorised by them, for consenting to those Articles which themselves had confirmed, and so professed the War with as much Alacrity as ever; and refused to give that Aid and Assistance they were obliged to, for the Recovery and Restoration of his late Majesty, who was then in Prison at the Isle of Wight; the Promise and Expedition of which Supply and Assistance, was the sole Ground and Consideration of that Treaty, and of the Conditions therein made to them; that they thereupon renounced their Obedience to his Majesty, and put themselves under the Protection and Disposal of Riomond, the Pope's Nuncio, whom they made their Generals of all their Armies, their Admiral at Sea, and to preside in all their Councils. After their Divisions amongst themselves, and the Burden of the Tyranny they suffered under, had disposed them to justify this King, who was then in France, to receive them into his Protection, and to send the Marquis of Ormonde over again into Ireland to command them, and his Majesty was so far provoked with, as to send the Marquis of Ormonde into Exile, with such a Supply of Arms and Ammunition as he could procure; where the Lord Inchiquin, Lord President of that Province, with the Protestant Army, received and joined with him; and shortly after, the Confederates Irish made that second Treaty of Pacification, of which they now likewise demanded the Benefit: But that it is notoriously known, that they no sooner made that Treaty than they broke it, in not bringing in those Supplies of Men and Money which they were obliged to do, and the Want wherein exposed the Lord Lieutenant to many Difficulties; and he had no sooner undergone the first Misfortune before Drogheda, than they withdrew from taking any further Care of the Kingdom, raised Scandals upon, and Jealousies of the whole Body of the English; who, being so provoked, would no longer venture themselves in any Action or Conjunction with the Irish. They called an Assembly or Convention of the Clergy to meet without the Lord Lieutenant's Authority, and put the Government of all Things into their Hands; who, in a short Time, imposed the Jealousy in the Minds of the People towards the few Protestants who yet remained in the Army, and who had served the King with all imaginable Courage and Fidelity, from the very first Hour of the Rebellion in the Three Kingdoms, to that degree, that the Marquis was even compelled to disband his own Troop of Guards of Horse, consisting of such Officers and Gentlemen as are mentioned before, and to trust himself, and all his remaining Town and Garrison, to the Fidelity of the Irish; promising, that upon such a Confidence the whole Nation would be raised, as did Men, to his Majesty's Service, under the Command of the said Marquis: But they had no former received Satisfaction in that Particular, (which was not in the Marquis's Power to refuse to give them,) but that they raised several Commissions, against the Marquis himself, and declared against his Religion, and inhibited the People upon Pain of Excommunication, not to submit to this or that Order signified by the Marquis; and, upon the Matter, inhibited any Obedience they paid to him: Instead of raising new Forces, that they were raised run from their Colonies and dispersed themselves; they who were troubled with the keeping of Towns and Forts, either gave them up by Treachery to Cromwell, or left them through Cowardice to him upon very feeble Attacks: Their Great General Ous O Nelly had made a formal Council and Signification with the Parliament; and in the End, when they had divided the Marquis of all Power to oppose the Enemy, and gave him great Cause to believe his Person to be in great Danger to be betrayed, and delivered up to the Enemy, they volunteered to petition him as deare out of the Kingdom, which they could easily compel him to do, so that he would leave his Majesty's Authority in the Hands of one of his Majesty's Roman Catholic Subjects, to whom they promised to submit with the most punctual Obedience. Whereupon the Marquis, finding that he could not unite them in any one Action worthy of the Duty of good Subjects, or of prudent Men towards their own Preservation, and so, that his Resistance amongst them longer could in no Degree contribute to his Majesty's Service or Honour, and that they would make it be believed that if he would have committed the Command into the Hands of a Roman Catholic, they would have been able to have possessed those Towns which still remained in their Possession, which were Lincoln and Colchester, and some other Places of less Importance, and likewise by Degrees recover from the Enemy what had been lost; which was very possible for them to have done, having great Bodies of Men to perform any Enterprize, and some good Officers to lead them, if they would have been obedient to any Command: Whereupon the Marquis had resolved to gratify them, in placing the Command in such a Person's Hand, whose Zeal for the Catholic Religion was unquestionable, and whose Fidelity to the King, and entire Affection, was unblemished; and to make Choice of the Marquis of Gloucester, a Name, the of an English Extraction, had for so many Hundred Years resided in that Kingdom, and had the greatest Favour amongst them, that he had the Reputation of being of the best Family of the Irish, and whose Family had, in all former Rebellions, as well as in this, professed their Loyalty unto the Crown. The Roman Catholics of all Kinds perceived as least a wonderful Joy at this Election, acknowledged it a great Obligation to the Lord Lieutenant for making it, and applied themselves to the other with all Profusion of Duty and Submission, to induce him to accept the Charge, when indeed knew them too well to be willing to trust them; yet upon the Marquis of Cromwell's earnest and solemn Entreaty, and out of his great Zeal for his Majesty's Service, and to support his Government there, until his Majesty could procure other Supplies, or give better Orders for doing it, he was contented to receive such Commission from the Lord Lieutenant, and gave necessary for the Execution of that Commission, and Privilege of the Government. Upon which the Marquis of Cromwell embarked himself, with some few Friends and Servants, upon a little Pinn that was bound for France, where he arrived safely about the Time that his Majesty transported himself thither, when his miraculous Escape from Wexford.

Caution

The Lord Lieutenant was no sooner gone, but that the Marquis of Gloucester, the new Lord Deputy, found himself no better treated than the Lord of Cromwell had been: That Part of the Clergy which had continually opposed the Lord Lieutenant for being a Protestant, were now as fully satisfied with the Deputy's Religion, and as violently opposed all his Orders, and visited their own Protestants, and quickly made it evident, that his Affection and Loyalty to the King was that which they disliked, and a Cause that could not be weighed down by the undoubted Sincerity of his Religion. They entered into secret Correspondence with the Enemy, and Conspiracies between themselves; and though there were some Persons of Honour and Quality with the Deputy, who were very faithful to him and to the King, yet there were so many about him of another Ality, that all his Councils, Resolutions, and Delights, were soon enough discovered to the Enemy to be prevented; and though some of the Letters were intercepted, and the Persons discovered who gave the Intelligence, he had not Power enough to bring them to Justice, but being commonly Friends and Clergymen, the Privilege of the Church was profusely insisted upon, and so they were rescued from the secular Prosecution and their Effects were contrived. That perfidious and treacherous Party had so great an Interest in all the Towns, Forts, and Garrisons, which yet pretended to be subject to the Deputy, that all his Orders were still contradicted or neglected; and the Enemy no sooner appeared before any Place, but some Faction in the Towns caused it to be delivered up and rendered. Nor could this fatal Southsides be informed even by the Severity and Rigour which the English exercised upon them; who, by the wonderful Judgment of God Almighty, always executed those Men who put themselves and the Towns into their Hands, finding them to have had some barbarous Part in the foul Murders which had been committed in the Beginning of the Rebellion, and who had been, by all the Acts of Grace granted by the several Powers, still relieved for Justice: And of this Kind there were so many Inhabitants in about Lime-ox and Galway, that they desired to be collected and mentioned in a Discourse by itself, to observe and magnify the wonderful Providence of God Almighty, in bringing heinous Crimes to Light and Punishment in this World, by Means unperceived by the Guilty; inasmuch, as there was scarce a Person of the Clergy or Laity, who had had a single Hand in the contriving and forwarding the first Rebellion, and in the Perpetration of those horrible Murders, who had obstructed all Overtures towards Peace, and caused Peace to be broken as soon as made; who had adhered to the Enemy, and endeavoured most maliciously to exclude the King and his Royal Authority from the Dominions of Ireland. I say, there was scarce a Man very notorious, and connot in Transgressions of this Kind, who did not by some Act of Treachery try full Endeavour to merit from the English, and by that, or by some other Means, fall into their Hands, and were by them publicly and reproachfully executed and put to Death.

This being the sad Condition the Lord Deputy was in, and the Irish Party having without his Leave, and against his express Command, taken upon themselves to send Messengers into Flanders, to desire the Duke of Lorraine to take them into his Protection, offering to deliver several important Places and Sea-Towns into his Possession, and to become his Subjects; upon which Intimation the Duke sent over an Ambassador and a good Sum of Money for their present Relief: The Deputy was at a short Time reduced to those Straits, that he durst not remain in any Town, nor even in his own House for three Days together, but was forced for his Security to shift from Place to Place, and sometimes to lodge in the Woods and Fields in cold and wet Nights, by which he contracted those Indisorders and Debilities which shortly after brought him to his Grave; and, as the End, he was compelled to accept a Pardon from the English, who had a Reverence to his Person and unspotted Reputation, to transport himself into England, where his Wife and Family were, and where he died before he could procure Means to carry himself to the King, which he always intended to do.

When the English Commissioners had enlarged themselves with these Considerations in this Narrative and Discourse, they again provoked the Irish Commissioners to continue one Person amongst themselves, or those for whom they appeared, who they believed could in Justice demand his Majesty's Favour; and if they could not make it evidently appear, that he had forfeited all his Title to Pardon after the Treachery, and that he had again been as faulty to the King as before, they would be very willing he should be made the Object of the King's Grace and Bounty, and be restored to his Estate. And then applying themselves to his Majesty, with great Duty and Submission, they concluded, that if any Persons had, by their faithful and secret Services, or by their Attendance upon his Majesty, rendered themselves grateful to him, and worthy of his Royal Favour, they were very willing that his Majesty should restore all, or any of them to their Honours and Estates, in such Manner as his Majesty in his Wisdom should think fit, and against all Impediments whatsoever. And hereafter several Acts of Parliament were passed, for the Indemnity and the relieving several Persons of Honour and Estate to take Estates who either in Judgement could not be the same, as having been always faithful to the Crown, and suffered with us, and for it; or who had for merited their Affliction and Duty for his Majesty, that he thought fit in that Consideration to wipe out the Memory of whatsoever had been formerly done against: And by this Means many were in a short Time put into a full Possession of their Estates, to which they could make a good Pretence at the Time when the Rebellion began.

The Consideration and Debate about the Settlement of Ireland, upon the Bill proposed, took up many many Days, his Majesty being always present, and in which there arose every Day new Difficulties. It appeared plainly enough, that the Cause was in general, that if the Letter of the Act of Parliament of the Sixteenth Year of the Late King were strictly pursued, almost an Extirpation of the whole Nation would follow, and which at best would be very miserable. Then the Transplantation into Connaught had been added, and finished so many Years before (which was very probably done in Point of Government, in respect of the untidy Humour of that People, and their natural Inclination to rebel, if the same had been executed by any Rules of Justice), and the Soldiers and Adventurers had been likewise for many Years in the Possession of their Lands, and had had so much Money in building and planning, that if his Majesty had restored all that had been done, and taken those Advantages upon themselves, Miscontents and Misapprehensions might have been raised, the whole Foundation upon which all the Hopes rested of pacified that Kingdom without their Obedience to the Crown of England must have been shaken, and even dissolved. And then the Memory of the Beginning of the Rebellion in Ireland (how many other Rebellions sooner had followed it, as bad or worse in respect of the Consequences that attended them) was as fresh and as odious to the whole People of England, as it had been the first Year, and the whole Nation upon the Matter (though there were many Persons of it of great Honour and Virtue) was fallen into that Complaint, that they feared indeed in the Eyes of Christendom worthy of the mildest Execution they were not to: And so down it was a Consideration that reformingly made them choose a Person worthy of extraordinary Favour and Compassion, that when both the other Nations had made many noble Attempts for redeeming their Liberty, and for the Restoration of his Majesty (for Ireland still had done much towards it), and his present Restoration was by God's Blessing, and only with his Blessing, the sole Effect of the Courage and Affection of his own Subjects; so that England and Ireland had in a great Degree redeemed, and even undone what had before been done against; and his Majesty had approved and secured those Afflictions to them, by their Promises and Concessions which he was in Justice obliged to perform: But the miserable Irish alone had no Part in the Benefit his Majesty had received, nor had God suffered them to be the least Influencers in bringing his good Providence to pass, or to give any Testimony of their Repentance for the Wickedness they had wrought, or of their Resolutions to be hence Subjects for the future. Is that they found as a People left out and exempted from any Benefit from that blessed Conjunction in his Majesty's Restoration: And this Disadvantage was imputed towards them by their frequent Malignity of an inveterate Animosity against the English Nation and English Government; which again was recompensed to them by an unextinguishable Jealousy of all the English towards them, declaring plainly, that they could be no longer secure of any thing they had, or should have in Ireland, than it should evidently appear that it was not in the Power of the Irish to take it from them, and to this Conclusion their present Confidence and Impudence contributed very much: And it appeared plainly enough, that they expected the same Conditions (which the Necessity of that Time had made fit to be granted to them) in respect of their their

their Religion, and Liberty of Conscience, as they called it, should be now likewise confirmed, without which all other Graces would not be sufficient to constrain them within the Limits of Subjection. This State and Condition of Affairs, and the Temper of the People, made it very necessary to the King to be very wary in dispensing his ordinary Favour (which his natural, merciful Inclination prompted him to) to the Irish, and in the Alterations which Justice obliged him to make in that Kingdom, that the Manner of it should make it appear, that it was the particular Justice in a particular Case, which could not be attended with a Consequence prejudicial to any general Interest.

There appeared in this Debate an Intention in the Soldiers and Adventurers, who were to have great Conscience and Approbation in the Bill now under Examination, to destroy all Estates and Settlements at Law upon Consideration of Marriage, or any other Contracts which had been made before the Rebellion; nor had there been in the whole former Proceedings, in the Time of the Disruption, any Consideration taken of Mortgages or Debts due by Statute or Recognition, or upon any other Security, so that all such Debts must be either left to the Proprietors, or must fall with the Interest upon the Land, whosoever had enjoyed the Benefit or the Profit thereof: All which formed very unreasonable and unjust, and that such Estates should remain fortified by the Treason of the Father, who had been only Tenant for Life, against all Defences and legal Titles of Innocent Children, and of which on all legal Attenders the Crown never had or could receive any Benefit. Yet, how unreasonable former these Pretences appeared to be, the Rule and Discretion for the Remedy thereof were not very easy; the English declaring, that if such Titles were preferred and allowed to be good, there would not in that universal Guilt which upon the Matter comprehended and ascribed the whole Irish Nation, there would not be one Estate safe from Treason, but Estates and other civil Concessions would be forged to defend and secure the same; nor would there be Witnesses wanting to justify and prove whosoever their Evidence could be applied to: And at such Trials were to be by the known Rules and Customs of the Law in Cases of the like Nature, there was too much Reason to suspect and fear that these would be little Justice done, since a Jury of Irish would be sure to find against the English; and there was as much Reason to apprehend that the English would bring in their Verdict against the Irish, let the Evidence on either Side be what it would. However, the King was in no degree inclined, upon any Suggestions, to countenance such a baseless Violation of the Law by any Declaration in the Act; and after many Alterations, Amendments, and these resulting still in many Difficulties and Intoxications, he foresaw that all Matters were not yet so closely stated, that the Settlement could be made by this Bill; but that such Preparations might be made towards it, and such Examinations taken, and some Particulars settled and adjusted, and what remained stated with more Clearness for his Majesty's Determination, he passed the said Act at Parliament, and committed the Execution thereof to too many Commissioners, nominated to his Majesty by those who were most conversant in the Affairs of Ireland; nor, or very few of which were known to his Majesty, or to any of those who had been so many Years from their Country, in their constant Attendance upon his Majesty's Person beyond the Sea. And upon this Conjunction, and the Dispatch, the Commissioners from Ireland of all kinds returned thither, the Earl of Ormy being one of the three Justices who were entrusted with the Government.

After a Year spent in the Execution of this Commission, there was very little done towards the settling the Kingdom; but, on the contrary, the Breaches were made wider, and so much Passion and Injustice flowed, that Complaints were brought to his Majesty from all Parts of the Kingdom, and from all Persons in Authority. The Number of the Commissioners were so great, and their Interest so different, that they made no Dispatch, very many of them were in Possession of such Lands which others sued for, and sought the broken Tithes and Portions of others for themselves; many of Money, which they supposed and made good by their own Authority; and those Men, who had their own particular Concernment chiefly to maintain, attended the Service very negligently: The few who were more indifferent, by having no Interest of their own at stake, were weary of their Attendance and Expence (there being no Allowance for their Pains), and offended at the Partiality and Injustice they saw practised, withdrew themselves, and would be no longer present at those Transactions, which they could not regulate or reform: All Interests were equally offended and ascended; and the Soldiers and Adventurers complained on both of the Corruption and Injustice done the Irish side, so that the Lords Justices and Council found it necessary to transmit another Bill to his Majesty, which as I remember they called an Explanatory Bill, for the better Understanding by which they had provided, that no Person who lived in Ireland, or had any Pretence to an Estate there, should be employed as a Commissioner; but that his Majesty should be desired to send over a competent Number of well-qualified Persons out of England to attend that Service; upon whom a fit Salary should be settled by the Bill, and such Rules set down as might direct and govern the Manner of their Proceedings; an Oath being likewise included in the Bill which the Commissioners were to take for the impartial Administration of Justice. And for the Prosecution of this new transmitted Act, several Persons were sent over to attend, and inform his Majesty and the Council upon any Difficulties or Scruples that might arise upon the several Claims and Pretences which were made.

The second Act took as much Time as the former; all that had been said in the former Debate being again repeated, and almost with the same Passion and Impertinence, the Irish making large Observations upon the Proceedings of the late Commissioners, to justify those Fears and Apprehensions they had formerly expressed. And there is too much Reason to believe, that their greatest Design now was rather to keep off any Settlement, than that they hoped to procure for it some such delay, relying more to that they Account from a general Dissatisfaction, and the Diffusion and Confusion which was like to attend it, than from any Determination that was like to be given in their Favour: Which yet they did not despair of, as well by some Promises their Friends at Court had made to them, upon great Promises made first by them, as well as for the Prejudice they found was generally conceived against those of the Soldiers, and many of the Adventurers, who were like to gain most upon the Division. And though the Irish were in general Great and Desperate for the Reclaiming of Ireland, yet there were many particular Men, both of the Soldiers and Adventurers, who, in respect of many Concessions and Approbations Admitted against the Crown throughout their whole Employment, were as little satisfied with this Revolution as any Men could be, and were so universally odious both in England and Ireland, that if the King's Justice could have been observed, and then particular Cases feared from the rest, without Violation of the Rule which feared the rest, any thing that could have been done to their Detriment would have been grateful enough. However, after a very tedious Debate his Majesty being assured by those who were thought to understand Ireland very exactly, and upon the Surveys which had been taken of Ireland with great Partisanship, undertook that there was Land enough to satisfy all the Soldiers and Adventurers, and that there would be enough left for the Accommodation of the Irish in a liberal Proportion; and having given some Rules likewise and Limitations to the immoderate Pretences and Demands of the Soldiers and Adventurers upon the Dublin Oath, and imperfect Advertisements and four other Irregularities which in the Execution of the former Commission they had lodged to themselves, his Majesty likewise dispatched the 4th and 5th Bill.

Whilst this second Bill was under Debate, and there fell out some Accidents which produced great Alterations with reference to the Affairs of that Kingdom: The Earl of Monmouth, who was one of the Justices, was lately dead; and it had been very apparent, that whilst he was alive, the Difference between the three Justices, and their different Humours and Affections, had little advanced the settling the Government; so that they who took the most important Survey of all that was done, did conclude that nothing could be so reasonably done towards a Settlement, as the deputed one single Person to exercise that Government: And the Duke of Ormonde himself, who had a very considerable Estate in that Kingdom, which made him long for a Settlement, and who had both before the King's Return, and ever since, passionately insisted that the Duke of Ormonde should not be employed there; who likewise had as great an Aversion from the Thought of it, I say, the General now built is totally changed his Mind, that he said the King, that there was no Way to expedite the Kingdom out of their Intemperance in which it was involved, but by sending a Lord Lieutenant thither: That he thought it not fit for his Majesty's Service, that himself, who had the Consideration of Lord Lieutenant, should be absent from his Majesty's Person, and therefore that he was very ready and desirous to give up his Commission, and that in his Judgment Nobody would be able to settle and compose the several Factions in that Kingdom but the Duke of Ormonde, which he thought would be very grateful to all Sorts of People, and therefore his positive Advice was, that his Majesty would as soon as was possible grant his Commission of Lieutenantcy to him, and send him over into Ireland; and both the King and the General had spoken with the Duke of Ormonde, and prevailed with him to accept the Charge, but ever I heard of it, all of them believing that the Uncertainty of his being able to go the King Service, is in general a Diffusion and Jealousy of Persons, and Contradiction of Interests, and the great Affection and Friendship I had for the Duke of Ormonde, would make me dissuade him from exposing himself to so hazardous an Undertaking; which was very true: But his Majesty believing that it was very necessary for his Service, and the Duke having always resigned himself to his Majesty's Disposal, he cheerfully undertook the Employment; and his Majesty named and appointed Sir Richard Rainsford, Sergeant at Law, (since made one of the Justices) as his Majesty's Exchangeer at Windsor, Sir Edward Smith, one of the Benchers of the Middle-Temple, (afterwards made Chief Justice of his Majesty's Court of Common Pleas in England) Henry Grey, one of his Majesty's Bed-Chamber, Sir Walter Churchill, Colonel Edward Cadogan, Sir Edward Dering, and Sir Thomas, all Persons of very good Parts and very clear Reputations, to be his Commissioners for the Execution of the Bill of Settlement of Ireland: And with these, and all other Persons who attended that Interest, the Duke of Ormonde entered upon his Journey for that Kingdom about July or August, in the Year One Thousand five hundred fifty-four, full four Years after the King's happy Return into England. And when Mr. Grey there shortly preceded his Majesty's Leave to return to his Attendance upon his Person, Sir Allen Broome was appointed to serve in his Place as a Commissioner. There was some Alteration before the Governor's coming, after their Arrival in Ireland, could settle these Orders and Rules for future Proceedings, which one of the Benchers of the Middle-Temple, who was as necessary before they appointed the People to attend, and was as necessary that they should, in the Order of their Proceedings, first proceed upon the Irish, both because there should be no Settlement of Soldiers or Adventurers in Possession of any Lands, before the Title of the Irish was determined; and because there was a Clause in the last Act of Parliament, that all the Irish should put in their Claims by such a Day, and be determined before such a Time; which Time might be prolonged for once by the Lord Lieutenant and Council. So that the Delay for so many Months before the Commissioners first, gave great Argument of Complaint to the Irish, that it could not possibly be avoided, in regard that the Commissioners themselves had not been nominated by the King above twenty Days before they began their Journey for Ireland; so that they could never so much as reach over the Acts of Parliament together before they came to Dublin; and then they found so many difficult Cases in both Acts of Parliament, and so contrary to each other, that it was no easy Matter to determine how to govern themselves in Point of Right, and to reduce themselves to any Method in their Proceedings: But after they had adjusted all things as well as they could, they published their Orders in what Method they meant to proceed, and appointed the Irish to put in their Claims by such a Time, and to attend the Prosecution of them them accordingly. And they had no sooner entered upon their Work, but the English thought they had begun it soon enough; for they found every Day many of the Irish, who had been known to be the most forward in the first Beginning of the Rebellion, and the most malicious in carrying it on, declared innocents; and Deeds of Settlement and Entails, which had been never heard of before, and which would have been produced (as they reasonably believed) before the former Commissioners, if they had had them to produce, now declared good and valid; by which the Irish were immediately put into Possession of a very great Quantity of Land taken from the English. So that in a short Time the Commissioners had rendered themselves generally odious as the Irish, and were looked upon as Persons corrupted for that Intercourse, which had every Day Success almost in whatever they presented, and their Determinations happened to have the more of Prejudice upon them, because the Commissioners were always divided in their Judgments; and it is no Wonder that they who formed most to adhere to the English Interest were most censured by them. The Parliament in Ireland was then sitting, and the House of Commons (consisting of very many Members who were either Soldiers or Adventurers, or had the like Interests) was very much offended at the Proceedings of the Commissioners, made many Votes against them, and threatened with them their Authority and Jurisdiction; but the Commissioners, who then knew their own Power, and that there was no Appeal against their Judgments, proceeded still in their own Method, and continued to recover the Claims of the Irish beyond the Time that the Act of Parliament or the Act of Settlement limited to them, as was generally understood; and during their last eight or ten Days Sittings upon those Claims, they passed more Judgments and Determinations than in near a Year before, indeed with wonderful Expedition; when the English, who were dissatisfied by those Judgments, had not their Witnesses ready, presuming that in Point of Time their Cause could not have been heard. By their Sentences and Decrees, many hundred thousand of Acres were assigned to the Irish, which had been looked upon as unquestionably forfeited. This raised the great a Claimant, that the English refused to yield Possession upon the Decrees of the Commissioners; who, by an Omission in the Act of Parliament, were not qualified with Power enough to provide for the Execution of their own Sentences: The Court of Law established in that Kingdom would not, nor indeed could, give any Assistance to the Commissioners; and the Lord Lieutenant and Council, who had, in the Beginning, by their Authority, put many of their into Possession of those Lands which the Commissioners had decreed to them, were now more and more referred to the Malcontents of Decrees which had lately passed: so that the Irish were using their utmost Endeavours by Force to recover the Possession of those Lands which the Commissioners had decreed to them, whilst the English were likewise resolved by Force to defend what they had been so long possessed of, notwithstanding the Commissioners Determination; and the Commissioners themselves were so far troubled and dissatisfied with these Proceedings, and with some intestine Clashes in the Act of Parliament concerning the future Possession of that Affairs, that though they had not yet made any Entrance upon the Decision of the Claims of the English, or of the Irish Plaintiffs, they declared that they would proceed no further upon the Execution of their Commission, until they could receive his Majesty's Pleasure; and for the better doing thereof, they desired his Majesty's Leave that they might attend his Royal Person; and there being at the same Time several Complaints made against them to his Majesty, and Appeals made to him from their Decrees, his Majesty gave the Commissioners Leave to return; and at the same Time all the other Interests sent their Deputies to solicit their Right: In the Prosecution whereof, after much Time spent, the King likewise thought fit to receive the Advice and Assistance of his Lieutenant; and to the Duke of Ormonde likewise attended his Majesty, and the Settlement of Ireland was the third Time brought before his Majesty and his Council; there being then likewise transacted a third Bill, an additional and supplemental in the other two, and to rectify many of the Decrees made by the Commissioners, they bearing the Reprehension of all that had been done, or had succeeded in, and of all Persons who were grieved by any Kind sever.

The King was very tender of the Reputation of his Commissioners, who had been always esteemed Men of great Probity, and unquestionable Reputation; and though he could not refuse to receive Complaints, yet he gave those who complained no farther Countenance, than to give the others Opportunity to vindicate themselves; nor did there appear the least Evidence to question the Sincerity of their Proceedings, or to make them liable to any reasonable Suspicion of Corruption; and the Complaints were still prosecuted by those who had taken from them what they desired to have kept for themselves. The Truth is, there is Reason enough to believe, that upon the first Arrival of the Commissioners in Ireland, and some Conversation they had, and the Observation they made of the great Bitterness and Animosity from the English, both Soldiers and Adventurers, towards the whole Irish Nation, of what Kind soever; the scandalous Proceeding of the late Commissioners upon the first Act, where they had not been guided by any Rules of Justice, but rejecting all Evidence which might operate to the taking any thing from them which they refused to keep, the Judges themselves being both Parnes and Witnesses in all the Causes brought before them; together with the very ill Reputation very many of the Soldiers and Adventurers had, for extraordinary Malignity in the Crown, and to the Royal Family; and the notable Barbarity they had exercised towards the Irish, who, without Doubt, for many Years had undergone the most cruel Oppressions of all Kinds that can be imagined, many thousands of them having been forced, without being covered under any House, to perish in the open Fields for Hunger; the infamous Purchases which had been made by many Persons, who had compelled the Irish to sell their Remains and lawful Pretences, for very inconsiderable Sums of Money; I say, these, and many other Particulars of this Kind, together with some Attempts that had been made upon their first Arrival, to corrupt them, against all Pretences which should be made by the Irish, might probably dispose the Commissioners themselves to such a Prejudice against many of the English, and to such a Compassion towards the Irish, that they might be too much inclined to favour their Pretences and Claims; and to believe that the Peace of the Kingdom and his Majesty's Government might be better provided for, by their being settled in the Lands of which they had been formerly possessed, than by supporting the ill-gotten Title of those who had manifested all imaginable Infidelity and Malignity against his Majesty, whilst they had any Power to oppose him; and had not shown any Justice to many of their Contentions, or of their Resolution to yield him for the future a perfect and entire Obedience, when they could oppose him no longer; as if they desired only to retain their Lands they had gotten by Rebellion, together with the Principles upon which they had received them, until they should have an Opportunity to justify both by some new Power or Continuance amongst themselves. Whensoever it proceeded, it was plain enough the Irish had received more Favour than was expected or imagined; and in the very Entrance into the Work, to avoid the Partiality which was too apparent in the English towards each other, and their Animosity against the Irish as evidence, very strict Rules had been set down by the Commissioners, what Kind of Evidence they would admit to be good, and receive accordingly; and it was provided, that the Evidence of no Soldier, or Adventurer, should be received in any Case, to which himself was never so much a Stranger, as, if his own Lot had fallen in Maynoir, and that he had no Pretence to any thing out of that Province, his Evidence should not be received as to any thing that he had seen done in Leinster, or Connaught, or Ulster, wherein he was not at all concerned; which was thought to be a very unjust Rule, after so many Years expired, and so many Persons dead, who had likewise been present at those Actions: And by this Means many Persons were declared not to have been in Rebellion, when there was full Evidence that they had been present in such and such a Battle, and in such and such a Siege, if the Witnesses might have to be received, who were then present at those Actions, and ready to give Testimony as to it, and of such Circumstances as could not be forged, if their Evidence might have been received. That which raised the greatest Unbalance against the Commissioners was, that a great Number of the most virtuous Persons of the Irish Nation, who were looked upon by those of their own Country with the greatest Esteem, as Men who had been the most violent Fomenters and Professors of the Rebellion, and the greatest Opponents of all moderate Councils, and of all Expedients which might have contributed towards a Peace in the late King's Time, whereby the Nation might have been redeemed, and who had not had the Confidence to much as to offer any Advice before the late Commissioners, were now advanced and declared innocents, and to be settled in their Estates; and that many others, who had in Truth never been in Rebellion, but notoriously faced the King against the Rebels, both in England and in Ireland, and had never been put out of the Possession of their Estates, were now upon some slight Evidence, by the Imposition of Letters, or Confession of Messengers that they had some Correspondence with the Rebels, though it was evident, that even that Correspondence was perfunctory, and only to secure them that they might pursue his Majesty's Service, were condemned, and had their Estates taken away from them. Many who had formerly made their Claims, without infusing upon any Deeds of Settlement, or other Conveyances in Law, now produced former Settlements, in consideration of Maynoir, or other like good Considerations in Law, made before the Beginning of the Rebellion; which being now proved by Witnesses enough, Decrees were every Day obtained for the Rehibition of great Quantities of Land upon those Deeds and Conveyances: though the Urgency of those Deeds, and Perjury of the Witnesses, were very notorious, and some Instances were given of the Manifestation and direct Proof made of the Forgery of Deeds, upon which Decrees had been made, to the Satisfaction of the Commissioners themselves, within a very short Time after the promulgating such Decrees, and yet no Reputation was given, but the said Decrees proceeded, and were executed with all Rigour. The Commissioners saw well, that they had made no Decrees but according to their Conscience, and such as they were obliged to make by the Course and Rules of Justice; that they did not doubt, but in truth did believe, that there had been evil Practices used, both in forging of Deeds and corrupting of Witnesses, and that the same was equally practised by the English as well as the Irish, and therefore that they had been obliged to make that Order which had been so much excepted against, not to admit the Testimony of any English Adventurer or Soldier in the Case of another Adventurer or Soldier; for that it was very notorious they looked upon the Whole as one joint Interest, and so justified each other in their Testimony; and of this they gave many bad Instances, by which it was too evident, that the Perjuries were mutual, and too much encouraged by the one and the other Side. That they had used the best Providence and Vigilance they could, by the careful Examination of the Witnesses, which were produced apart, and never in the Presence of each other, and by asking them all such material Questions as occurred to their Understandings, and which they could not expect to be asked, to discover the Truth, and to prevent and manifest all Perjury: That they had likewise used their utmost Diligence and Care to prevent their being imposed upon with false and forged Deeds and Conveyances, by taking a present and first View themselves of all Deeds produced; and interpreted the Writings made all themselves of the Cunning they could, upon the Matter and Consideration upon which such Deeds had been entered into, and upon the Manner and Circumstances in the Execution thereof; which was all the Providence they could use; and tho' they met with many Reasons oftentimes to doubt the Integrity of the Proceedings, and in their own private Consciences to apprehend there might be great Corruption, yet that they were obliged judicially to determine according to the Testimony of those Witnesses, and the Evidence of those Deeds in Law, against which no Proofs were made: That they had constantly heard all that the adverse Party thought fit to object, both against the Credit of any Witnesses, and the Truth of any Conveyances which were produced; upon which they had rejected rejected many Witnesses, and disallowed some Conveyances: but when the Objections were only founded upon Presumptions and Probabilities, as most usually they were, they could not weigh down the full and categorical Evidence that was given: That if they had yielded to the Importunities of the Persons interested, who oftentimes pressed to have further Time given them to prove such a Perjury, or to disprove such a Conveyance, it must have made their Work endless, and stopped all Manner of Proceedings, for which it appeared that they were brightened too much in Time, and that in truth would have but opened the Doors wider for Perjury and other Corruptions; hence it was very plain to them, that either Side could bring as many Witnesses as they pleased, to prove what they pleased, and that they would bring as many as they believed necessary for the Work on hand: And therefore the Commissioners having before prescribed a Method and Rules to themselves for their Proceedings, and that no Man could have a Cause in which he was concerned brought to hearing without his knowing when it was to be heard, and to it was to be presumed that he was well provided to support his own Title, and therefore that they had thought fit, upon mature Deliberation amongst themselves, to adhere to the Order they had preferred to themselves and others, and to conclude that they could not be able to prove that at another Day, which they were not to prove then: For the Discovery of any Forgery after the Decree had been passed, and after which they had given no Reparation, they confessed some few such Discoveries had been made to them, by which the Forgery appeared very clearly; but as they had not Power by the Act of Parliament to punish either Forgery or Perjury, but must leave the Examination and Punishment thereof to the Law, and to the Judges of that Law; so that they had only Authority to make Decrees upon such Grounds as were raised in their Conferences, but had not any Authority to reverse those Decrees after they were once made and published, upon any Evidence whatsoever. They concluded with their humble Desire to the King, that the strictest Examination might be made of their Corruptions, in which they were sure to be found very innocent, against all the Malice that was discovered against them: That if they had proceeded in all Things according to the Integrity of their own Hears, and the best of their Understandings; and if they had, through the Defect of that, erred in any Part of their Determinations, they hoped their Want of Wisdom should not be imputed to them as a Crime.

Many who had a very good Opinion of the Person and Ability of the Commissioners, were not yet satisfied with their Decrees, nor did they believe that they were to be finally bound to judge upon the Deposition of suspected Witnesses: But that they were therefore troubled with an arbitrary Power, because it was foreseen that Juries would not have been intrusted, so that they were, upon weighing all Circumstances, to declare what in their Conferences they believed to be true and just: That if they had bound themselves up by too strict and unreasonably Rules, that they should rather have in Time reformed those Rules, than thought to support what was done unjustly, by the Observation of what they had preferred to themselves; and it was believed that the entire Exclusion of the English from the proving of what could not be in Nature be otherwise proved, was not just or reasonable: That their Want of Power to reverse or alter their own Decrees, upon any new and better Reasons which could afterwards occur, was a just Ground for their honest Deliberation in and before they passed any such Decrees; and their Excuse for not granting longer Time, when it was pressed for, upon Reasons which were very visible, was not to be justified, it not being possible for any Man to defend himself against the Claims of the Irish, without knowing what Deeds or Witnesses they would produce for making good their Suggestions; and therefore it was as impossible for them to have all their Evidence upon the Place: Besides that, it was very evident, that in their last ten Days of their Sitting (which were likewise thought to be when their Power was to be put to the test), and in which they had made more Decrees than in all the Time before) they had made in many a Day (contrary to their former Rule and Method), that Men were plainly surprised, and could not produce those Proofs which in a very short Time they might have been supplied with; and the refusing to allow them that Time, was upon the Matter to determine their Interest, and take away their Estates, without being once heard, and upon the bare Allegations of their Adversaries; and in those latter Decrees many Injustices were given of that Nature, wherein the Evidence appeared to be very full, if Time had been given to produce it.

There was one very notable Case decreed by the Commissioners extremely complicated of, and tried out upon by all Parties, as well English as Irish; and for which the Commissioners themselves made no other Excuse or Defence but the Receipt of a Letter from the King, which was not thought a good Excuse for sworn Judges, as the Commissioners were: It was the Case of the Marquis of Antrim, which Case having been so much upon the Stage, and so much enlarged upon, to the Repose of the King, and even to the weakening of the Memory of his blessed Father; and some Men, who most continued to what was unwisely done in that Affair, having done all they could to wound my Reputation, and to get it to be believed, that I misled his Majesty, by my Advice, to oblige that Marquis; I think it is Due both to Truth, and to the Honour of both their Majesties, as well as for my own Vindication, to set down a very particular Narration of that whole Affair; by which it will appear how far the King was from so much as wishing that any Thing should be done for the Benefit of the Marquis, which should be contrary to the Rules of Justice. Whilst his Majesty was in foreign Parts, he received frequent Advertisements from England and from Ireland, that the Marquis of Antrim behaved himself very unduly to him; that he had made himself very grateful to the Rebels, by counselling the late King; and that he had given it under his Hand to Ireland, or some other principal Person employed under Cromwell, that his late Majesty had sent him into Ireland to join with the Rebels, and that he was not offended with the Irish for entering into that Rebellion. Which was a Calumny so false and so odious, as reflected so much upon the Honour of his Majesty, that the King was long resolved, as soon as God should put it into his Power, to cause the strictest Examination to be taken concerning it: The Report having gained much Credit with his Majesty, by the Notice that the Marquis had procured great Recommendations from those who governed in Ireland to those who governed in England; and that upon the Prefumption of that he had come into England, and as far as St. Albans towards London; from whence he was forced suddenly to return into Ireland by the Activity of his many Creditors, who, upon the News of his coming, had provided for his Reception, and would undoubtedly have called him into Prison; and no Recommendation could have inclined those who were in Authority to do any thing extraordinary for the Protection of a Person, who from the Beginning of the Irish Rebellion lay under so ill a Character with them, and had fed ill a Name throughout the Kingdom.

The King had been very few Days in London, after his Arrival from the Parts beyond the Sea, when he was advised that the Marquis of Antrim was upon his Way from Ireland towards the Coast; and the Commissioners from Ireland, who have been mentioned before, were the first (if I remember well) who gave his Majesty that Information; and at the same Time told him all that his Majesty had heard before concerning the Marquis, and of the bold Calumnies with which he had traduced his Royal Father, with many other Particulars; all which they affirmed would be proved by unassailable Evidence, and by Letters and Certificates under his own Hand. Upon this full Information (of the Truth whereof his Majesty entertained no Doubt), as soon as the Marquis came to Town, he was, by his Majesty's special Order, committed to the Tower; not only upon Pretence from his, or baseness of his Person (of which he had some very powerful) prevail with his Majesty to admit him into his Presence; but by the first Opportunity he was sent Prisoner to Dublin, where he was committed to the Castle, his Majesty having given Direction that he should be proceeded against with all strictness according to Law; and to that Purpose the Lords Justices were required to give all Orders and Directions necessary. The Marquis still professed his Innocence, and said all the Means he could so procure that he might be speedily brought to his Trial, which the King likewise expected; but after a Year's Detention in Prison, and nothing brought against him, he was set at Liberty, and had a Pail given him by the Council there to come into England. He then applied himself to his Majesty, demanding nothing of Favour, but expected Justice, and desired that many Years hence, deprived of his Estate, he might at last be restored to it, if nothing could be objected against him wherein he had deserved his Majesty. He was a Gentleman that from his Youth had been bred up in the Court of England; and having married the Dutchess of Berwick, he had been very well received by both their Majesties, and was frequently in their Presence; he had spent a very vast Estate in the Court, without ever having received the least Benefit or Advantage from it; he had retired into Ireland, and lived upon his own Estate in that Country five Years before the Rebellion broke out; in the Beginning whereof he underwent some Sufferings, having had some Correspondence with them, and possibly made some Faults in Undertaking to them; but he went speedily to Dublin, and from thence transported himself to Oxford to his Majesty, to whom he gave for good an Account of all that had passed, that the King had no Doubt of his Affection to his Service, though he had little Confidence in his Judgment and Understanding, which were never very remarkable: Besides that, it was well known that he had a very unreasonable Envy towards the Marquis of Ormonde, and would have felt it believed that his Interest in Ireland was so great, that he could easily reclaim that whole Nation to his Majesty's Obedience; but that Vanity and Presumption never gained the least Credit with his Majesty.

Upon the Complaint sent into England with their Army upon the Obligation of their Covenant, and all his Majesty's Endeavours to prevent it being disappointed, the Marquis of Antrim had proposed to his Majesty to make a Journey privately into Scotland, and to get into the Highlands, where, with his Majesty's Authority, he hoped he should be able to draw together such a Body of Men as might give his Countrymen Cause to call for their own Army out of England to secure themselves; and with this Overture, or upon the Debate thereof, that the Earl of Antrim (for he was then so named) might be likewise sent into Ulster, where his Interest lay, from whence he would be able to transport a Body of Men into the Highlands, where he had likewise the Claim of the Abbot, who acknowledged him to be their Chief, and would be consequently in Undertaking; by which means the Marquis of Antrim would be enabled the more profitably to proceed in his Undertaking. The Earl of Antrim entered upon his Undertaking with great Alacrity, and undertook to the King to perform great Matters in Scotland, to which his own Interest and Ambition enough disposed him, having an old and sharp Controversy and Contention with the Earl of Argyle, who had dispossessed him of a large Territory there. All Things being adjusted for this Undertaking, and his Majesty being well pleased with the Cheerfulness of the Earl's Undertaking, he created him at that Time a Marquis, gave him Letters to the Marquis of Ormonde, his Lieutenant there, as well to satisfy him of the good Opinion he had of the Marquis of Antrim, and of the Truth he had repaid in him, as to wish him to give him all the Assistance he could with Contentment for the carrying on that Expedition for Scotland; and for the better preventing any Intercourse that might fall out by the Rashness and Inadvertence of the Marquis towards the Marquis of Ormonde, his Majesty sent Daniel O'Neil, one of his Bed-chamber, into Ireland with him, who had great Power over him, and very much Credit with the Marquis of Ormonde, and was a Man of that Address and Dexterity, that no Man could so well prevent the Inconveniences and Prejudice which his natural Indifference and Levity might tempt the Marquis to, or more displicate and incline the Lord Lieutenant to take little Notice of those Vanities and Indiscretions; and the King did likewise, having no Desire that the Marquis should lay long in Dublin, and he pressing at his going from Oxford, that he would in Person go into Self with his Forces, give him Leave to hold that Correspondence with the Rebels (who had the Command of the most Northern Parts, and with a whole Cantonment at least he would very hardly be able to make his Levee, and transport his Men) as was a relief to that End: Within the Limits of which it is probable enough that he did not consider himself, and might for many Things which he had not the least Authority to warrant him in.

Upon his coming to Dublin, the Lord-Lieutenant gave him all the Consideration he could wish, and assisted him in all the Ways he could to procure his Deputy; but the Men were so beset in or near the Rebels Quarters. And it cannot be denied but that the Levee he made, and sent over into England, under the Command of Kilmer, was the Foundation of all those wonderful Acts which were afterwards performed by the Marquis of Albany; in this Exile Hundred was good Mrs. with very good Officers, all in Kings, that neither the ill Fate, nor the ill Lucking in the Highlands gave them any Discontentment, and gave the full Reputation to the Marquis of Albany of being at the Head of an Army, under which he drew together such of the Highlanders, and others of his troops who were willing to regard him; but upon any Military Action and Disaster given by them to the Army, which happened as often as they encountered the Army, they went always home with their Booby to their Heads, and the Army only stood together with their Generals. And from this it grew the Marquis of Albany grew to that Power, that after many Battles won by him with notable Slaughters of the Enemy, in one of which he defeated the Marquis of Argyll, with his Army of above twelve thousand of men, Albany had, and in which the Marquis of Argyll was forced to make his Escape, by putting himself almost single into a Boat, and to putting himself off into the Sea, having left, besides others, many of his own Name and Family dead upon the Ground; after which the Marquis of Albany marched victoriously with his Army, till he made himself Master of Edinburgh, and redeemed out of the Prison there the Earl of Crawford, Lord Ogby, and many others of his Friends, who had been taken and fast there, with the Rebellion that they should all leave their Heads; and the Marquis of Albany himself did always acknowledge, that the Rise of his good Success was due to and to be imputed to that Body of Men, which in the beginning bore him over by the Marquis of Argyll, to whom the King had acknowledged the Service by several Letters all in his own Hand, in which were very gracious Expressions of the Grace his Majesty had of his great Services, and his Reliance on to reward him. It is true, the Marquis of Argyll himself had not gone over with his Men, as he promised to do, but stayed behind in England, under Pretence of raising a greater Body of Men, with which he would venture his own Person; but either out of Jealousy or Displeasure against the Marquis of Albany, or having, in truth, no Mind to that Service, he never pursued the one nor the other, but remained not only in the English Quarters, but in their Councils, taking all Occasions to enquire whatsoever the Lord-Lieutenant might do, by which he gave great Advantages against himself and might, in the Queen's Letter, have been as severely punished by the King as the worst of the Rebels. At last, after he had been taken Prisoner by the English at Scotch, and made his Escape out of their Hands, he transported himself into France, and from thence came into the West into the Harbour of Falmouth, when the Prince (his Majesty that now is) was in Germany; to whom he immediately made Tender of his Service with two good Frigates which he had, and in which were likewise a Quantity of Arms, and some Ammunition, which he had procured in France, for the Supply of Ireland. Most of the Arms and Ammunition were employed, with his Consent, for supplying of the Troops and Garrison in Germany; and his Majesty made use of one of the Frigates to transport his Protein to Scotch, and from thence to Jejy, without which Convenience, the Prince had been exposed to very great Difficulties. And after all which, Dublin being given up to the Parliament, as the King's Authority withdrawn from that Kingdom, he again transported himself into England, and joined with the Army, and was by them sent into France, to deliver the Queen-Mother and the Prince to find the Marquis of Ormond to exercise his Majesty's Government in that Kingdom; which was done accordingly, in the Manner as is mentioned before.

The Marquis of Argyll alleged all these Particulars, and produced many original Letters from the late King, the Queen-Mother and the Prince, in all which his Services had been acknowledged, and many Promises made to him; and concluding with a full Protestation, that he desired no Pardon for any Thing he had ever done against the King; but if that were the least Proof that he had tried in his Fidelity to him, or had not, according to the best of his Understanding, advanced his Service, he looked for no Pardon. But if his being in the English Quarters, and consulting with them, without which he could not have made his Levee for Scotland, and his joining with them afterwards, when his Majesty's Authority was withdrawn from thence, do, by the strict Letter of the Law, expose him to Ruin without his Majesty's Grace and Favour, he did hope his Majesty would relieve him from that Malignity, and that the Forfeiture of his Estate should not be taken, as if he were a Traitor; and that he should be treated as he was entitled to by his Country, as he could pretend, his Debts were so great, and his Conditions, at best, would not be liable to much Ease. Though the King had never been taken Notice of to have any great Inclination to the Marquis, who was very little known to him; yet this Representation, and clear View of what he had done, and what he had suffered, raised great Compassion towards him in his Majesty's Royal Breast; and he thought it would, in some Degree, reflect upon his own Honour and Justice, and upon the Memory of his blessed Father, if, in a Time when he passed by so many honest Transgressions, he should leave the Marquis to the Fury of his Enemies, for no other Crime upon the Matter, than for not having that Prudence and Justice in his Endeavours to serve the King, as he ought to have had, and the Recour he had exercised towards him upon his first Arrival, at Vol. VIII.

finding him so to be tried in England by those who enough valued his Disaffection, and that they had not been able to make the least Proof of his Innocence, and that his Majesty's good Disposition towards him, by the satisfied and only with a Letter to the Commissioners on his behalf, which the Marquis could not importunately defend, as the only Thing that could do him good, but his Majesty desired a Letter to be prepared in the Lord-Lieutenant, in which all his Allegations and Suppositions should be set down, and the Truth thereof examined by the Lord-Lieutenant; and that if he should be found to have committed no greater Fault against his Majesty than that which he confessed, that then the Letter should be sent to the Commissioners, that they might for both their Masters Testimonies on such Particulars as were known to themselves. And this Letter was very warmly drawn, and being approved by his Majesty, was sent accordingly to the Lord-Lieutenant; and shortly after was, contrary to his Majesty's Resolution, and contrary to my Advice, and without my Knowledge and Power, likewise sent to the Commissioners; who had themselves made such a Decree as is before mentioned, and declared that they had made it only upon that Ground: Which gave his Majesty some Trouble, and obliged him to send a Clause in the next Bill concerning that Affair. And this was the whole Proceeding that related to the Mirrors of Argyll, in which I had so Temptation of any Kind to be in love me; and I do not yet Understanding to comprehend how there was more Favour shewed towards him by his Majesty, than he might as Justice reasonably pretend to; what Note never hath been raised, and what Clubs for ever have been made upon that whole Transgression.

When his Majesty entered upon the Debate of this Third Bill, it was transmitted to him for a Supplement and Addition to the former Two; he quickly passed the Settlement proposed, and which was the last of the Three Bills, was now grown more difficult than ever; All his Measures which had formerly been taken, from the great Proportion of Land which would remain to be disposed of, were so much to be relied upon, his appeared to have been a strong Foundation from the Beginning, which was now made more desperate, by the vast Proportions which had been assigned to the Army by the Commissioners Decree; and somewhat had intervened by some Acts of Bounty from his Majesty, which had not been carefully enough watched and represented to him. The King had, upon passing the former Bills, and upon discussing how much the Army were like to forfeit, resolved to mean all that should by Possibility, or otherwise, come to his Majesty, in his own Power, to the End, that when the Settlement should be made, he might be able to gratify those of the High Nobles, who had had any thing of Ment towards him, or been least faulty, but he had unawares severed from that Rule, and had made several Grants, out of his Royal Bounty, to many of his Servants, who had been encouraged by those Friends in England to make their Suits, and had procured Certificates from thence; which being produced to his Majesty, had disquieted him to those Considerations, which otherwise he would not so easily have passed. There was besides, in all such Grants, a new Clause introduced, of a very new Nature, for they had granted always upon Letters out of England, and passed under the Great Seal of Ireland, the Letters were formed there, and transmitted hither only for his Majesty's Sign Manual; it is neither his Majesty's learned Council as Law, nor any other his Ministers (the Secretaries only excepted) had any Notice of such Grants. The Clause was, That if any of those Lands be granted by his Majesty should be otherwise decreed, his Majesty's Grant should be required with other Lands, so that in many Cases the present Indebtedness to his Majesty's Bounty being the Uncertainty of his own Right, which the Person to whom it was granted was obliged to vindicate at his own Charge, his Majesty was now bound to make it good if his Grant was not a Gift; and that if any of those Grants were granted by his Majesty, was inserted into a real and substantial Burden, as a Debt from his Majesty; which caused another Difficulty in the Settlement, which was yet the more hard, because there were many Claims of the High Nobles not yet raised, all the late Advertisements to be examined, and many other Uncertainties to be determined by the Commissioners, which left those who were in Possession, as well as those who were not, in the highest Insecurity and Apprehension.

This Insecurity, and even Doubt, which possessed all Kind of People, of any Settlement, made all of them willing to contribute to that which could be proposed. They found his Majesty very unwilling to consent to the repeal of the Decrees made by the Commissioners; which must have taken away the Confidence and Assurance of whatsoever should be done hereafter, by making Men see, that what was Acted by the Act of Parliament might be subjected by another; so that there was no Hope by such an Expedient to increase the Number of Acres, which being left might in any Degree comply with the several Pretences. The High Nobles found that they might be only able to shew any Settlement, but should never be able to get such a one as would turn to their own Satisfaction. The Soldiers and Adventurers agreed less upon themselves; and the Clergy was as great against them, who by the late Advertisements had got more than they should have, as from those, who had received less than their Due; and they who had feared any new Examination could not yet have any other Title, before all the bill were settled. In a Word, all Men found that any Settlement would be better than none, and that more Profit would arise from a smaller Proportion of Land, quietly possessed, and husbanded accordingly, than of a much greater Quantity, but a doubtful Title, and an Uncertainty which must distract any Industry and Improvement. Upon these Considerations and Motives they met amongst themselves, and debated together by what Expedient they might draw Light out of this Darkness: There appeared only one Way which admitted any reasonable Hope, which was, by increasing the Stock for Rewards to raise a Degree, that all Men's Prizes as might, in some Measure, be provided for; and there was no other Way to arrive to this, but by every Man's parting with somewhat which he thought his own: And as this they had seen Inconvenient, which was of the highest Importance to them, which was, that this Way so bad would be put to the unlimited Jurisdiction of the Commissioners, which was very terrible to them) who from henceforth would have little other Power than to execute what should be here agreed upon. In Conclusion, they brought a Proposition to the King, raised and digested between themselves, that all Persons, who were to receive any Benefit by this Act, should share and give a fourth Part of what he had towards the Stock for Repayment, all which the Commissioners should distribute amongst those who should appear most fit for his Majesty's Bounty; and this Agreement was so unanimous, that though it met with some obstinate Opposition after it was brought before his Majesty, yet the Number of his Opposers was so small in respect of the others who agreed to it, that they grew weary and ashamed of further Contention; and thereupon this Third Act of Settlement, as I say, to the other Two, was confirmed by the King, who, to publish to the World that nothing stuck with him which seemed to reflect upon his Commissioners in their Proceedings, resolved to make his Majesty and I, though Mr. Baron Rainsford, and Sir Thomas Boreham, made their humble Suit to his Majesty, that they might not return again into Ireland, his Majesty did not grant their Request, and continued Sir Edward South, who was now Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas in that Kingdom, Sir Edward Durning, Sir John Bradstreet, (who had succeeded Mr. Conway in that Office, when he returned to Court) Sir Thomas Charnell, and Colonel Cade, his Commissioners, to execute what was done by this new Act, and to perfect the Settlement. There were all the Translations with reference to Ireland, which I was busy to, and in which I assisted, as all the rest of my Lords of the Council who were present did, and did very little more in this any of the rest did, except when any Difficulties occurred in their private Meetings and Debates, they sometimes related to me for Advice, which I was very ready to give them to the best of my Understanding, being very ready and willing to take any Pains which might make that very difficult Work more easy to be completed; but as I never desired any Reward for so doing, so I never received the Benefit of one Shilling in Money, or Money-worth, for any thing that was done in that Affair; and was so far from entreating any Oblivion made to that Purpose, that it is notoriously known to some Persons of Honour, who I presume, will be ready to testify the same, that when, upon his Majesty's last Return into England, these Propositions were made to me, of recovering the Grant of some forfeited Lands, and for the buying of other Lands there, upon the Defeat of the Owners thereof, and at so low a Price, that the very Profit of the Land would in a short Time have paid for the Purchase; and other Overtures of immediate Benefit in Money, which others did, and lawfully might accept; I rejected all Propositions of that kind, or relating to it, and declared publicly and privately, that I would neither have Lands in Ireland, or the least Benefit from thence, till all Differences and Prejudices there were fully agreed and settled, that there could be no more Appeal to the King, or relying on his Majesty and Council for Justice, in which I told them, I should never be thought so competent an Adviser, after I had any Life of my own in that Kingdom, to bias my Inclinations, and I never took a former Resolution in any Particular in my Life, that to adhere to that Conclusion: Yet, because it is notorious enough, that I did receive afterwards some Money out of Ireland, and have a very lawful Title to receive more, it is necessary, for my own entire Vindication, to set down particularly how that came to pass, and to mention all the Circumstances which preceded, accompanied, or attended that Affair.

Amongst the Bills which were sent transmitted from Ireland after his Majesty's happy Return, there was an Imposition of a certain Sum of Money upon some fenced Lands, as in the several Provinces, (the Nature whereof I cannot change my Memory with) which were to be paid to his Majesty within a limited Time, and to be disposed of by his Majesty to such Persons who had served him faithfully, and suffered in his doing, or such Persons who for I may say with a very good Confidence say, that I never to this Minute read the Act of Parliament, and am almost confident that I never heard of it at the Time when it passed, being often absent from the Council, by reason of the Court, or other Accidents, when such Matters were transacted. But very near two Years after his Majesty's Return, I received a Letter from the Earl of Orrey, that there would be in his Hands, and the Earl of Argyll's and Lord Menzies's, (who it seems were appointed Treasurers to receive the Money raised by that Act of Parliament) a great Sum of Money for me; which he gave me Notice of, to the End that I might give Direction for the Disposal thereof, whether I would have it returned into England to me in Money, or laid out in Land in Ireland, and he desired that I would speedily give my Direction, because he was confident that the Money would be paid in, less by the Time that my Letter could arrive there. No Man can be more surprised with any thing, than I was at the Receipt of this Letter, believing that there was some Mistake in it, and that my Name might have been used in Trust by somebody who had given no Notice of it; and without returning any Answer to the Earl of Orrey, I went by that Post to the Lord-Lieutenant, (for it was after his first going into Ireland) to inform him what my Lord of Orrey had writ to me, and to desire him to inform me, by his own Inquiry, what the Meeting of it might be. Before I had an Answer from the Lord-Lieutenant, or indeed before my Letter could come to his Hands, I received a second Letter from the Earl of Orrey, in which he informed me, that there was now paid in, to my Use, the Sum of Twelve Thousand six Hundred Pounds, or thereabouts, and that there would be the like Sum again received at the End of Six Months; sending me likewise a particular Direction to what Person, and in what Form, I was to find my Order for the Payment of the Money. I forbore likewise to answer this Letter, till I had received an Answer from the Lord-Lieutenant; who then informed me at large, what Title I had to this Money, and how I came to have it: That shortly after the passing of that Act of Parliament, which had given his Majesty the Disposal of the Money before-mentioned, the Earl of Orrey had come to him, and putting him in mind how the Chancellor had made all Overtures which had been made to him of Benefit out of that Kingdom, (which Refusal, and many others, which show how much I have always been in the Way of getting, is not there known to me) in being thus to the Lord-Lieutenant, wished that he would go to his Majesty to confess some Part of that Money upon him; which the Lord-Lieutenant very willingly did, and his Majesty is cheerfully granted: That a Letter was accordingly prepared, and his Majesty's Royal Signature procured by Mr. Secretary Nicholas, who was at the same Time commanded by the King not to let me know of it; and to which Purpose there was likewise a Clause in the Letter, whereby it was provided that I should have no Notice of it, which the Lord-Lieutenant said was by his Majesty's Direction, or with his Approbation; because it was said, that if I had Notice of it, I would be so foolish as to obstruct it myself: And that there was a Clause likewise in the said Letter, which directed the Payment of the said Money to my Heirs, Executors, or Assigns, if I should die before the Receipt thereof. Of all which things I was afterwards advised by the Lord-Lieutenant, and of which, all that Time I had not the least Notice or Intimation. I desired Mr. Secretary Nicholas to give me a Copy of that Letter, (which had been first passed as a Grant into me under the Great Seal of Ireland, according to the Form of that Kingdom) which he gave me, with a large Account of many gracious Circumstances in the King's granting it, and the Obligation laid upon him of Secrecy, and the great Caution that was used that I might have no Notice of it. After I was informed of all this, I did not think there was any thing left for me to do, but to make my humble Acknowledgement to his Majesty for his Royal Bounty, and to take care for the receiving and transmitting the Money to me, and that I might receive the same very honestly: I did thereupon wait upon his Majesty with that Duty which became me, and his Majesty was graciously pleased to enlarge his Bounty with thank Expressions of Favour, and the Satisfaction he had vouchsafed to take himself in the conferring his Donative, that my Joy was much greater from that Grace, than in the Graciousness of the Gift.

At the very same Time, and the very Day that I received the Letter from the Lord-Lieutenant, the late Earl of Portland came to me, and informed me of a Difference that was fallen out between the Lord-Lieutenant, and Sir Baylyde Whithelm, upon a Debt in the Title to certain Lands purchased heretofore by the said Sir Baylyde Whithelm from the Lord-Lieutenant, and possessed by the latter for many Years; that the Lord-Lieutenant had been compelled, in the late old Times, for the raising of Money to pay his Commissions, and other necessary Uses, to make Sale of his Manor of Biddulph in the County of Wilt, and that Sir Baylyde Whithelm had purchased the same from him at a less Price than in truth it was worth: That though the Commissions had been made and executed with all the Formality the Doctrine of that Time required; and that the Lord-Lieutenant had consented, that his Son, who was then under Age, should pass in the same Assurance when he should accomplish the Age of One-and-Twenty, which he had now newly done about the Time we are now mentioning; and that the Lord-Lieutenant was resolved, though he was in his Person liable to the Covenant, to take Advantage of the Alteration of the Times, and to compel Sir Baylyde Whithelm to pay him more Money, or that his Son, who was Tenant in Remainder, should enter upon the Land. The Earl said, that he desired to make an End between them, and that the Lord-Lieutenant (whose great Friend he was) should receive some more Money, which his Condition required, without do him any Damage to Sir Baylyde Whithelm, as by the Law he would be liable to, between the other might suffer in his Person; that upon Conference between them, he found that the Manor of Biddulph was joined to some Land I had in Wiltshire, and would be very convenient to me, and therefore wished that I would purchase it at a just Value, which would produce a Satisfaction to both the other. This Proposition being made upon the said Day, I said before, that I received the Letter from the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, by which it appeared that there was now as much as Money already received for me as would pay for that Purchase, besides what would be more received within Six Months after, I wished the Earl of Portland to bring both the Parties concerned to me within Two Days, in which Time I would resolve what to do; nor did I need much Time to consider of it, the Person who then rented the Whole, and the Lord itself, being very well known to me: So that when they all came to me at the Time appointed, after a very short Conference together, we agreed upon the Purchase, and appointed the Writings to be prepared and executed as soon as might be; when I promised to pay some Money together than is usual in such Purchases, promising I could not at all be disappointed in the Return of the Sum of Money from Ireland, which was the sole Ground and Encouragement I had to undertake that Bargain: But the very next Letter I received from thence informed me, that the Negotiations of that Kingdom had been such, that they could only receive me six Thousand Pounds, and that they had been forced to make use of the rest for the Publick, which would without doubt take care to repay me again within a few Months; and so I found my self engaged in a Purchase which I could not retract, upon a Permisson of Money which in that manner I was disappointed of. And I have not only never since received a Penny of what was due upon the Second Payment, (and which I presumed would have been to me, as certain, that I signed it upon the Marriage of my Second Son to him, as Part of his Portion), but the Return of the first Sum was so increased or taken from me, that no Part of it hath been paid to me, or to my Use: By which, and the Inconveniences and Damage which hath since ensued to me from thence, I may reasonably say, that I am yet a Loser, and involved in a great Debt by that equal Bounty of his Majesty, which I hope will, in due Time, be made good to me under so good a Security as an Act of Parliament; and I have great Reason to complain of those my very good Friends who have disposed his Majesty to that Act of Grace, and were not afterwards cautious enough in their several Offices to make it effectual to me. And this is a very true Account of all that Business, and of all the Money which I ever received from Ireland, with all the Circumstances thereof, which, I hope, in the Justi-

Judgment of all impartial Men, will not reflect to the Prejudice of my loyalty and Honour.

The Sixteenth Article in, That I have debated and betrayed his Majesty and the Nation, in all Foreign Treaties and Negotiations relating to the late War.

I do heartily wish that those particular Treaties, and the Particulars in those Treaties, had been mentioned, wherein it was conceived that I had debated and betrayed his Majesty, that I might have at large set down whatsoever I have known and done in these Treaties, and then it would easily have been made appear how I have been from betraying and deceiving him. It was never any Ambition of my own that I sought me to have a Part in any Treaty; God knows, I heartily wished to have meddled in nothing but the Administration of that great Office the King thought fit to entrust me with; but his Majesty had so good an Opinion of me, that, that he required and commanded my Service in many of these Treaties, and therefore it will be necessary for me, according to the Method I have hitherto used, to mention every particular Treaty that has been entered into, since the Time of his Majesty's Return into England, and the Part that I have had in it: Being as willing to be called to the strict Account for any other Treaty he had made when he was Abroad, or for any other Council I have ever given in my Life, publick or private; whereas, I doubt not, I shall be found to have behaved myself (according to the weak Abilities God Almighty hath given me) with Fidelity to my Master, and with all imaginable Affection to my Country, how unhappily former I am repented.

The first Treaty was with the Crown of Denmark, in which I was one of the Commissioners who treated, and was only present when any Report was made by the Commissioners to the Council-board, when all the Articles were debated, and I do not remember that there was any Difference of Opinion upon any of them; and that Treaty hath been generally held the best that hath been made with any Crown, the Merchants having thence greater Advantages in Trade than they have in any other Place, besides many other great Benefits, with a great Enlargement of his Majesty's Empire.

The second Treaty was with the State of the United Provinces, in which likewise I was one of the Commissioners who treated; but all that was by them transacted was full brought to the Council-board, and debated there in his Majesty's Presence, in which the Rule by which his Majesty guided himself was, as I remember, that he would not consent to any of those Concessions which had been formerly made by them in their Treaty with Granada; and their Unwillingness to consent to that was the Reason that their Ambassadors proceeded so slowly: And his Majesty had the less Reason to be impatient for Expedition, because the King of France had given him his Royal Word, and proposed it himself, that the two Crowns might proceed in their several Treaties with the Dutch together, that so they might be brought to such good Conditions, that they might have like good Neighbours with both the Crowns, which, as offered, they were not naturally inclined to do; and promised positively, that, for his Part, he would not conclude any Thing with the Dutch, before he had actually communicated the same to his Majesty. Notwithstanding which Engagement, France entered into and finished their Treaty, and in it made that secret Article, which they declared afterwards to be the Ground and their Obligations to assist the Dutch in the ensuing War.
However, his Majesty proceeded not, till the Holland Ambassadors confessed to all which had been granted before to Granada; which being done, the Peace was made and ratified on both Sides, and, without Doubt, with more Advantage and Honour to the English, than ever had been provided by any former Treaty between the Crown of England and those States.

From the two Crowns of Sweden and Denmark, Ambassadors Extraordinary arrived here shortly after his Majesty's Return; and the several Treaties were made with both those Crowns before the Departure of the Ambassadors; in neither of which Treaties I was a Commissioner, nor knew any Thing that passed in either, but so it was registered at the Council-board, and debated in his Majesty's Presence; nor did I ever hear that either of them was reckoned a disadvantageous Treaty, both of them containing much Benefit to the English as any Treaties which had been made before with those Crowns. It is very true, there were some unusual Expressions of Kindness and Friendship in the Treaty with Denmark; which in respect of that King's being at that Time in a very low Condition, under the disadvantageous Conditions of the Treaty of Copenhagen newly submitted to, and under almost all a Treaty extorted from him by the Dutch, and yet being in terrible Apprehension of some new Oppression from the one and from the other, the Ambassadors did very carefully infer, and were, upon great Deliberation, allowed and intreated by his Majesty's own particular Direction. In consideration of the new Alliance in Blood between his Majesty and that King; and the Civilities and Obligations his Majesty had received from Denmark, during his Majesty's being in Holland, after the Murder of his Father, and during his being in Sweden, when the King of Denmark sent him Holm, Arnis and Arranion; of which his Majesty had so great a Sense, that he was often heard to say, That if it had pleased God to have brought him Home before that disadvantageous Peace at Copenhagen had been made, which was done by the Consequence of the English Ships, and the Arrest of trade who went. Then Ambassadors of the English Ships, and the Arrest of trade, that he would have done the best he could to have defended and protected him, and therefore he did very readily yield to that Article drawn by the Ambassadors; his Majesty declaring at the same Time, that he was very willing that their Princes who were Neighbours to Denmark, and from whom that Kingdom apprehended new Oppressions, should know his Majesty's Readiness to support that King, and defend him from new Injuries, to which the Policy of his Government, as well as his Inclination, urged and obliged him; though it is very true, the King of Denmark did shortly after make very ill Returns to his Majesty for that his signal Affection.

There were all the Treaties made by the King before the War with the Dutch, for there was very little Progress made either with Sweden or Spain for the Reasons mentioned before, except only a short Treaty with the Electress of Brandenburg which Treaty, for the most Part, was put together with reference only to the Prince of Orange, his Majesty's Nephew, and for the better ordering of his Affairs, in which Treaty his Majesty himself employed few or six of his Privy-Councillors; and all the Affairs between his Majesty and that Electress in Point of Trade, were then transacted by them, and debated and considered at the Council-board; and so which all Things were referred for his Majesty's Return and consideration; and if they had not been afterwards voided by the Electress, his Majesty had respected much Fruit and Advantage even by that Treaty.

After the War was entered into with Holland, his Majesty sent Mr.
Grosvont to Sweden, and Sir Robert Talbot to Denmark, to dispute those two Crowns to a Conference, each other, and then to dispute them both to adhere to his Majesty, or at least not to favour or assist the Dutch. The Treaty with Sweden succeeded to his Majesty's Will, and was concluded in a League Defensive, very much to the King's Satisfaction, and with the full Approbation of the whole Board; that Crown having manifested so much Affection to his Majesty, and such an Inclination to an entire Conjunction with him, that upon a very reasonable Condition they would have been inclined to have entered into a League Offensive, and even in the present War against the Dutch. In order to which, they lost their Armaments, and at the same Time when Mr. Grosvont returned, and they became the Mediators for the Peace, having first declared to his Majesty, that if the Treaty should prove successful, the Crown of Sweden would immediately join with his Majesty in the War against the Dutch. What became of the other Treaty with Denmark is publickly known, his Majesty having declared to all the World how particularly he was touched by the Dutch.

There remains only One other Treaty to be mentioned, which is the last with the Dutch, upon which the Peace was made, and therefore it will be necessary to set down the Issues many to that Treaty, the able Progress and Conclusion of it: By all which it will easily appear that his Majesty was neither betrayed or deceived in it, or if he were, that it was not done by me. After so many Encounters and various Successes in the War, which had been carried on with a much greater Expense than his Majesty, at his first Entrance into it, was persuaded it would cost him, when he saw the Strength and Power of the Dutch so much increased by the Conjunction of France and Denmark, which supplied them with Many, Ships, and (what they had more wanted) with Men as fast as they desired; and that all the Propositions he could make to Spain could not induce them to enter into such an Alliance with him as might enable them to resist France, notwithstanding it was evident to all but themselves, that the French refused to break the Peace with them, having at that Time published those Declarations, which they afterwards made the Ground of the War: His Majesty clearly discerned, that the Dutch grew less weary of the War than they had before seemed to be; and that they would be able, with that Assistance and Conjunction, to continue the War with less Inconvenience than his Majesty was like to do. He had found it necessary for the lengthening the Trade of the Enemy (the depriving them of which could only induce the Dutch to desire the Peace, and which he could not do by the Strength of his own Ships, which he still kept together to encounter their Fleet) to grant as many Commissions upon Letters of Mart to private Men of War as desired the same, and with such strict Orders and Limitations as are necessary in such Cases; and he found indeed the Advantage very great, in the Damage those Men of War did to the Enemy, which was considerable, and gave them great Trouble: On the other Side, the common Sense chose much rather to go on board those Men of War, where their Profit out of their Shares of the Booty was greater, and their Hazard much less than in the King's Ships, where they got no Share without Booty, and were not any way or Provisions were much greater than they had been in a former Time; for when the Royal Fleet was to be sent out, there was greater Difficulty in procuring Seamen and Mariners to man it. And then, whereas the Advancement of Trade was made the great End of the War, it was now found necessary to suppress all Trade, that there might be Manner enough to furnish the Ships for the carrying on the War; and this Inconvenience produced another Mischief, for, by the great Diminution and even Suppression of Trade, there was likewise so great a Fall in the Customs, Excise, and all other Branches of the King's Revenue, that it was evident enough, that his Majesty would have very little to carry on the War, who would have been by Impulsion in Parliament upon the People, who already complained loudly at the Decay of their Rents, of the small and low Price which their Commodities yielded by the Cellation of Trade, and especially by the carrying out of all the Money in Specie from the several Counties, to London, for the carrying on the War; and the Parliament itself appeared to be so weary of it, that instead of granting a new Supply, proportionable to the Charge, they fell upon Expedients to raise Money by Sale of Part of the King's Revenue, which was already too small to support the ordinary and necessary Expense of the Crown. But above all, his Majesty was most discouraged by the extreme Licence of the Seamen in general; but especially of those who were called Privateers, for out in the particular Ships of War upon Adventure, who made no Distinction between Friends and Foes; but, as if the Sea had been their own Quarters, they seized upon all Ships which came within their View, and either pillaged them entirely, and so disarmed them, (which they usually did to those which they thought would be delivered by the Court of Justice) or else brought them into the Harbours after they had taken from them what they left aboard. And then the formal Proceedings in the Court of Admiralty, were so dilatory and involved in so many Appeals, that the Prosecution of Justice for Injuries received grew as grievous as the Injury itself; which drew a universal Clausure from all Nations, that, without being Parties to the War, they were all treated as Enemies. France had made the Damage they had the War received, and the Interruption of their Trade, a great Part of their Quarrel, and one of their Grounds of their Conjunction with the Dutch. From Spain, which really would better to us than our Enemies, the Complaint that his Majesty desired nothing more than a just and an honourable Peace, and upon such Conditions as might make it lasting.

While this Matter was in Agitation in France and in Holland, the Swedish Ambassadors earnestly solicited for an Answer to the Letter they presented to his Majesty from the States, concerning a Neutral Place; which put his Majesty to another Dilemma. Not to answer any answer, would be interpreted a Refusal of the Treaty, and to make his Majesty appear to all Christian Princes to be better pleased with no War. To accept of any of those Places infested from the Dutch, would be against his Dignity, in so far as contradicting to the unreasonable Impudence of the King of France; and yet to nominate any Place in Flanders for the Treaty, after France had so positively declared itself, would be interpreted both by France and Holland as a Rejection of the Treaty, at least would make France look suspicious for a good End of it. When his Majesty call'd a Committee of the Board to consult upon them, his Majesty call'd a Committee of the Board to consult upon them, which I am sure I have not heard of before; which was, to make Choice of the Hague for the Place to treat in. The Confederation in Holland, in sending his Ambassadors to treat in their own Province, was not, upon a Disquisition of it, thought to be of that Importance, as to neglect the Benefits and Conveniences which might result to be expected from the having it in that Place. The People were not only naturally very weary of the War, and desirous of a Peace, but the States themselves were very much divid'd, and Dr Witt had been exposed to many Difficulties and reproaches under the Character of being the sole Person who directed the Prosecution of the War; and he had prevailed more by raising upon him to assist the States, than the King had any Thoughts of Peace, but only laboured to separate France from them, and divide them amongst themselves. There could not be a greater Manifestation of his Majesty's sincere Desire of Peace, than by offering to send his Ambassadors to the Place where the Body of the States themselves refused, and who would be the only Judges of the Reasonableness of what his Majesty should propose; and by being upon the Place might give all Expectation to the Work: Besides, that all other Princes concerned had their Members likewise there; and therefore if his Majesty's Overture in this Particular should be rejected, all the World would conclude that the Dutch would not endure to touch as to Peace. And upon this Reason the Resolution was taken to send the Hague for the Place of the Treaty, and his Majesty's Letters were dispatch'd accordingly.

The first News we heard from Paris and the Hague, after the Earl of St. Albans being arrived there, and the Baron De Jöle at English, was a great Complaint, that the King had sent the Baron De Jöle privately to the Hague with Offers of Peace; but especially with Design to divide Holland from France, and to persuade them to break their Alliance with them; in which there were some particular Expressions which his Majesty had in such used to the Baron De Jöle, and many other which he had never said. The King had Reason to conclude from hence, that Dr Witt was never to be treated with privacy; and that the Baron De Jöle was not to be trusted, he having persuaded and prevailed with his Majesty to give him Leave to speak with Dr Witt upon some Letters he had sent the King from Monsieur Fagon, the Emperor's Envoy at the Hague, a Gentleman not unknown to his Majesty, and of a very clear Reputation, wherein there was Mention of a Dilemma made by Dr Witt to him, which might very well encourage the King to give that in Charge to the Baron, which his Majesty had in truth considered to him: Not in truth had it been material, if he had said no more than his Majesty gave him Leave to do; which yet he promised not to mention, except he clearly discerned the other to be very willing to deal as freely with his Majesty; but it plainly appeared that the Baron had far exceeded his Commission, and said many Things for which he had not any Power, and which in truth had never pass'd in Discourse between the King and him. And as the Earl of St. Albans had always expressed the greatest Prejudice, and the most bitter Jealousy, from the Time that the Baron was defected for England, as a Person who delighted in nothing so much as in quarrelling and perverting, and creating Intestines in all Treaties in which he had ever been engaged, which had been many in several Courts of Christendom, so indeed his Part was most proportioned for embroiling and for preventing any Conclusion, in which he gave himself Leave to say and do any Thing which he thought would contribute to his End, without the least Consideration of Integrity or Sincerity in the Matter; though otherwise it cannot be denied that he was a Man of great Parts, and of a universal Understanding in the Affairs of Christendom.

At the same time the King of France complained of the Authority given by his Majesty to the Baron De Jöle, as that he had sent the Duke of Guise the Copy of a Letter written then by the King of France himself, in which he informed them of the Earl of St. Albans being newly come to him with Propositions from the King of England in order to Peace; and that he had a Plenipotentiary Commission to treat and conclude, mentioning some of the Conditions he had offered; and therefore desired that they would arm their Ambassadors in France to join in the Treaty. This gave his Majesty great Offence, and just Cause to suspect that whatever Pretences France had made, it did not at all desire the Peace; and he had the more Reason to complain of this Injury, because there was not the least Colour or Ground of Truth in the Relation, the Earl of St. Albans having not say thing like a Commission; nor, as he protested upon this Occasion, (as he had he likewise taken Notice at Paris) and complained before he could have any Adventitious from England; he had not ever promised to have the least Power from his Majesty; nor had he ever mentioned any of those Particulars to any Person which were so formally inserted in that King's Letter to the States: And his Majesty was the more confirmed in his Belief that France would not contribute to the Peace, because they did at this very Time, with equal Passion to Dr Witt himself, oppose the Treaty at the Hague; against which they could have no Reason to except, if they had a Mind to the Peace, unless they hoped, by the Trick that a mentioned before, to have got the Treaty to Paris by a Commission to the Earl of St. Voet-VIII.

Others, which they had tried all the Ways they could to oblige, and his Majesty had as positively refused to grant, and then retired to seek on the Hague, or upon some Place in Flanders, let the Success be what it would.

During this Agitation, an Express was sent over from the Earl of St. Albans, with two Papers which he had received from Monsieur De Lamoignon, and both in his own Hand, which Originals were sent to the King; the one contained a Proposition for the Peace, that there should be no Admission of the Charges of the War, or the Damages received by it on either Side; but that it should be in his Majesty's Choice, whether all Things should remain in the State they were at present, or whether he would keep what it had taken, and were possessed of by reason of the War; or that both sides should come to an Account, and either Side be repaid by the other for the Damages it had sustained; and that after his Majesty had made his Election of these two Propositions, in such manner the Peace should be entered into in the King and the Dutch according to the last Treaty which had been made at London after his Majesty's Return.

The other Paper was a Proposition made to his Majesty, that he would promise under his Hand that he would not, during the Space of a Year to come, enter into any Treaty to the Negatives of France, nor give any Alliance against France during that Year, this Overture being made about the Beginning of March, and in Consideration hereof, the King of France would restore the Island of St. Christopher's, which he had newly taken from the English, and would undertake that the Dutch should consent to the Peace upon his Conditions formerly mentioned; and that the Treaty being made, if his Majesty desired it, as Duke of Cambridge, since it would not be possible to persuade the Dutch to consent that it should be at the Hague; which he looked upon as a Design only to encourage the Party of his Enemies: And at the same time the States went again to the King, and offered to meet at Dover or Canterbury.

Though his Majesty had, in all his Answers to the Dutch, demanded Satisfaction for the Damages he had sustained, and for the Charge of the War; and made little Doubt, if France had not entered into that Conjunction, that they would have been induced to have made some Compensation towards it, yet the Case was now altered, and they thought themselves by the new Alliance to stand upon the Advantage Ground, so that his Majesty found any Demand of that kind would not be admitted; nor, in truth, had the Use been insisted upon in any Treaties of this Age, after the longest or shortest Wars that had been made. Hereupon, after full Deliberation, his Majesty was well contented to accept of the Propositions made by the King of France for the Peace, and made choice of the First Alternative, that both Parties should be contented to enjoy what they had got without any Account, the Dutch having lost very much more than the English, and we having taken from them in Guiana, and upon that Coast, more important Places than they had taken from us: And the Restoration of St. Christopher's by the King of France, put his Majesty into the same Condition as his Plantations in the West-Indies, as he had been before the War.

When his Majesty thought that all Things upon the Matter had been adjusted, and that the last where the Treaty should be, and having been sent such an Answer from France as was particularly agreeable to what had been there desired, he received another Dispatch from thence, with infinite Excuses, and Protestations of Sincerity, that the Dutch had expressly refused to consent to a Peace, and so the King would omit and part with the Island of Palawan in the East-Indies, an Island which had been formerly taken by the Dutch from the English with very full Circumstances, and the Re-delivery thereof was promised by them in their Treaty with Ceylon, and again renewed in their last Treaty with the King, and his Majesty had sent Ships thither to receive it; which had been delivered upon the Pretence of Want of formality in the demand; it was not of the Contents of the present War, as an Indignity and Breach of Faith towards his Majesty; though they protested that it was only the Fault of their Government in those Parts, who for want of an Order from the East-India Company, though he did receive the Order of the States-General, had not refused, but delayed its Delivery; and that that, and all other Orders that could be required, were again renewed, and already sent thither, and they were confident the Piece was by that time given up. It was alleged by the King of France, that the Dutch had always declared to him, in all the Discourses which had been between them of a Treaty, that they would never restore Palawan. And Monsieur De Lamoignon protested, that he had never known that the Restoration thereof was comprehended in the last Treaty, but conceived that it would fall within the Alternative, if the King should make Choice of that; which he had done, or otherwise would fall into the Account; and concluded with a very exact Definition, that the King would rather yield in that Particular, than break the Treaty for an Island which was nothing worth for the present, nor could be made valuable in less than seven Years; with a Protestation still, that he would do all that was in his Power to persuade the Dutch to part with Palawan; but if they should deny to do it, he could not separate himself from them upon that Point, since they had still mentioned it as a Condition; but if his Majesty would yield in that Particular, all Difficulties should be removed, and the Treaty concluded without any new Obstruction. This unreasonable Intimation, and the proceeding from what had been so fully understood, which caused all Confidence from his Majesty of the sincere Intentions of France, are now to be considered what other new Scruples would arise from the one hand, and be admitted by the other. However, after a full Deliberation with his Council upon the whole State of his Affairs, and after having communicated to them all that had passed, he did resolve not to reject the Treaty, but was contented that London should be the Place; not thinking it fit, for many Reasons, to bring the Treaty to Dover or Canterbury, to give the Enemy that Advantage if it should prove ineffectual, that it should be known in his own Dominions, or to make other Advantages by Influence to the People, who were generally more dissatisfied than they had Reason to be.

And

And thereupon his Majesty named six hundred Habs, and Mr. Henry Coventry, for his Majesty's first-Chamber, for his Ambassadors in that Treaty, Men very well qualified for the Service, who were dispatched to Brada as soon as was possible, which was about the Beginning of May, France having promised, that the Fleet under the Command of the Duke de Beaufort should remain in the Port, and that he would use his utmost Power to disperse the Dutch, in the Entrance into the Treaty, to consent to a Cession, that so there might be no more Acts of Hostility on either Side, until it might appear what Success the Treaty was like to have towards a Peace: And concerning the Ballots of Palermus, he gave them Charge to sail upon the Delivery, and first to the English Company, who had the sole Interest in that Island, to send their Deputies to the Treaty, who should be privy to all that should be treated upon that Affair, and who might propose or accept whatsoever they thought best for themselves, towards the obtaining whereof, France was fully engaged to use their utmost Intercession.

What passed during the Treaty is known to so many, that I need not mention it here, every Dispatch from the Ambassadors being read and debated at the Council-Board, and when such Difficulties did arise that the Ambassadors would not take upon them to make any Conclusion without a particular Communication of the Temper, and Disposition, and Resolutions of all the Parties concerned, they thought fit that one of themselves (the Lord Ambassador Coventry) should attend his Majesty, being obliged to return with his Majesty's Answer within so many Days; and so soon as he arrived, he gave his Majesty a full Account, before the whole Council-Board, of all that had passed in the Treaty, that the Dutch behaved themselves very sullenly, and that the Authority of De Witt was so great at the Hague with the States, that Nobody durst oppose any thing he desired; that the Dane, by his Indignation, had made Demands of a very insolent Nature; that they believed that the French Ambassadors had behaved themselves very well, and done all that was in their Power to do, and had refrained the Dutch from their Insolence by Threats and Menaces, which they likewise used towards the Dane: In fine, he read all the Articles which were concluded between them; with all those which remained undetermined and unconcluded to, on either Side; with what the French Ambassadors related to persuade and reduce the Dutch to consent to yield to, or to desist again from in their Master's Name. Upon which Reports, every particular Article was at large debated at the Board, which took up many Days. The Ambassador said, there was not the least Hope of having Palermus refused to the English; that they had it was contained in that Alternative which the King had made Choice of; and when it was replied to them, that the Words of that Alternative clearly determined the contrary, for that either Side was to remain possessed of what they had got by reason of the War, which could not be applied to this Island, which they had unjustly taken and usurped so many Years before; and that they were obliged, by the last Treaty, to restore it, so that the War had no Operation upon that; so that they answered, That they had, according to the Treaty, sent Orders for the Redelivery of it, and that they believed it had been delivered accordingly; and that, upon the News of the War, their Subjects had re-taken it again, which would bring it within the very Letter of the Alternative: And this our English-India Company was so far from contradicting, that they believed it to be true, and had showed me, before the Treaty began, a Letter they had received from one of their Factors in the Indies, that there was a Report there, that the Dutch had delivered up Palermus to those who were sent to receive it, and that shortly after that they had taken it from them again; and therefore they thought that a special Article might be inserted in the Treaty, whereby the Dutch might be obliged to give it up again, if they had in truth so indirectly delivered it, that they might again repossess themselves of it, which could not but be understood to be a plain Violation of their Publick Faith, or a vile Artifice to elude it. The Ambassadors replied, that if it had been as truth delivered by them, though so indirectly taken, they could not insist upon it, but allow it to be in the Alternative; they desired only that it might be inserted in the Article, that if in Truth it had never been delivered, they should be obliged to do what so long since they should have done. The Dutch answered, That the End of this Treaty was to establish a firm Peace, and therefore they would admit of no doubtful Expressions which might cause future Disputes. The Ambassadors said, It was very evident, and the French Ambassadors had acknowledged the same to them, that they were resolved never to part with the Island, so that there remained no more to be considered upon that Particular, but whether, upon the Redelivery of Palermus, the War should be continued. The English-India Company were sent for to deliver their Opinions, and they very frankly declared, that they believed a Peace to be very necessary for the Kingdom, and therefore would not that the War should be continued upon any particular Interest of theirs; and it was evident enough, that if the War continued, their whole English-India Trade must be destroyed, the Dutch being so much superior in Shipping, and all kind of Strength, in those Parts. Hereupon the King related to consent to their keeping of Palermus, and I do not know that there was any Man at the Board of another Opinion. To conclude, after a long Debate for so many Days upon every Particular, the King resolved, with the Concurrence of the whole Board (one or two Persons only excepted), to consent to the Peace upon such Conditions and Provisions as the French Ambassadors had obliged themselves to bring the Dutch to consent to; and thereupon the Ambassadors returned with full Power, and in a short time after that Peace was concluded and published. And therefore I cannot understand how his Majesty could be deluded or betrayed in this Treaty, which passed with such a full Examination and Disquisition; and in all which Debates his Majesty himself had taken the Pains to discourse more, and to enlarge himself in the Answer of all those Objections which were forced on him; had I ever known him to do upon any other Article.

It is very true, that I had been commanded by the King to write most of the Letters and Dispositions which had been made in the Parliament of St. Asaph from the Time of his going out, concerning the Treaty, his Lordship having (I presume by the same Direction) directed most of his Letters to me; and most of the Dispatches to the Ambassadors were likewise prepared by me, they being by their Instructions (without my Deliber or Privy), to transmit their Account to one of the Secretaries, or to myself: But it is as true, that I never received a Letter from either of them, but it was read instantly in his Majesty's Presence to those Lords of the Council, who attended, where Directions were given what Answer should be returned; and I never did return any Answer to either of them, without having first read it to the Council, or having first sent it to one of the Secretaries to be read to his Majesty; and I can with a very good Confidence profess to all the World, that I never did the least Thing, or gave the least Advice relating to this War, or relating to the Peace, which I would not have done if I had been willing, and to have given an Account thereof to God Almighty that Minute: And as his Majesty prudently, and possibly, and passionately desired to put an End to that War; so no Man appeared more delighted with the Peace when it was concluded than his Majesty himself did; though, as far as I could make any Judgment of the Publick Affections, the Publication of that Peace was attended with the most universal Joy and Acclamation of the whole Nation, that can be imagined: Nor is it easy to forget the general Contentment that the City and the People of all Conditions were in, when the Dutch came into the River as high as Chatham; and when the Difference in the Court itself was so great, that many Persons of Quality and Title in the Galleries and Privy Lodgings very indecently every Day vented their Passions in bitter Exclamations against those who had first counselled and brought on the War, wishing that an End were put to it by any Peace, some of which Persons, within very few Days after, as bitterly inveighed against the Peace and against the Promoters of it. But I am far yet from repenting or being ashamed of the Part I did in it, that I look upon it as a great Honour, that the last Service performed for his Majesty was the sealing the Proclamations, and other Instruments for the Conclusion and Perfection of that Peace, the Great Seal of England being that very Day sent for, and taken from me.

The Seventeenth and last Article is, That I was a principal Author of that fatal Council of Dividing the Fleet about June, 1666.

How far I have always been from giving Advice in the Prosecution of the War either by Land or Sea (except by being present at some of the Debates) I have at large set down before; I never in my Life having pretended, either in the Time when I served his late Majesty during the War, or in this King's Time, to understand any thing of that Affair: But when I have been present in Councils of that Nature, I have always governed myself by their Opinions who had the greatest Reputation of Skill in that Profession; and I never presumed less in my Life to give an Advice, than I did in this Particular concerning the Division of the Fleet; and I should make a full Answer to this Charge, if I should say no more, than that I am not guilty of it. But since it hath made so much Noise, to the Disadvantage of the King, and of the Conduct of his Affairs, and that no Care hath been taken to inform Men of the whole Carriage in that particular; I will, as I have done at large to the other Articles, for his Majesty's Honour, and for the Vindication of those of his Council who were present in those Debates, (how unjust soever many of them have been to me) set down very particularly all that I know of that Matter, and how the Fleet came to be divided; upon the View of which, I am of Opinion, what Misfortune never attended it, no Man will have Cause to be ashamed of any Fault he committed in it. From the Time that his Majesty resolved to send Prince Rupert and the General with a joint Power and Authority to command the Fleet, there was Cause enough to apprehend that there would not have been so good an Accord between them as the conducting to great a Service required; and I was then thought to have so great an Interest in both of them, that his Majesty commanded me to use the utmost Endeavours to disperse them to a good Understanding towards each other; and I believe they will both confess, that I performed all the Offices I could, and with some Success, so that good End: And I was the more cautious in it, because I found that the Prince was much unsatisfied with the Resolution his Majesty had taken, that they should both go in one and the same Ship; and that his Highness was very desirous to be in a Ship by himself, and even to command a Part of the Fleet upon any Enterprise that should offer itself, separate from the other: And there was too general an Opinion, from what Ground I knew not, that at the Time when our Fleet was ready, and when the two Generals went to it, that the Dutch were in any degree ready to come out; that the greatest Ships had not taken in their Provisions, and that they had not been enough to man the Fleet; and that they had no Design to come out of their Port all the Duke de Beaufort should be ready upon the Coast to join with them; which Fleet was then at Brill, and in great Readiness. I had no Part in managing the Intelligence, nor in such so much as a Correspondence by Letter at that Time, with any Man as France or Holland. The two Generals were not many Days at Sea, when my Lord Drax informed his Majesty and my Lords, that he had received Intelligence from a good Hand, that the Dutch were in no degree ready to come out with their Fleet; and that the Duke de Beaufort on such a Day of the Month had all his Fleet ready, and by Men on Board, to take the first Opportunity of the Wind to set sail from Brill; that the Wind had been fair these two last Days, and therefore that it might be presumed that he was by that time at Sea, and making his Course for Holland: Whereupon it was concluded, whether any Order should be sent to the Fleet, that Prince Rupert with Part of it might bend his Course towards Brill, whilst the General, with the other Part, waited the Hollander at Monroe. There had been a long Prospect and frequent Debates upon this Conjuncture, and how advantageous a thing it would prove, if we could have timely Advancement of the Duke of Beaufort's Motion, that the Fleet might be sent to encounter him before his Conjunction with the Dutch; and to that Purpose the Lord Arlington had taken all the Pains he could to get particular Intelligence of the Motion of that Fleet. When this Intelligence was communicated, four were of Opinion that his Majesty should send present Orders to the Generals, that Prince Rupert should, with such a Number of Ships as they should think fit, head his Course as it before-mentioned. The late Lord Treasurer and I were present at this Debate; and though we seldom offered Advice in such Cases, yet being now both of one Opinion, we did defer to the King, that he would not take upon himself to send present Orders in an Affair of such Moment, upon so Intelligence that might not be true, though we believed it to be very probable, that the Generals were like every Day to know more of the Motion of the Enemy than we could do: And therefore we humbly offered it to his Majesty, whether it might not be fit in this Case to send forth of the Council then present, and who had been the Intelligence, and heard the whole Debate, presently to the Fleet, to inform the Generals of what his Majesty had heard, and of the Considerations which had been thereupon; and if they had received no Advancement to the contrary, and upon Conference together, thought fit to divide the Fleet, and that Prince Rupert should set Sail in order to engage the Duke of Beaufort, his Majesty would be well content that they should not that Day go to Execution, with an intent to farther their Orders. His Majesty was pleased (upon the concurrent Opinion of every Person present) to approve of this Proposition; and immediately made Choice of Mr. Vice-Chamberlain, and Sir William Coventry, to use all possible Expedition to find out the Fleet, and inform the Generals of all that had passed. I must not need to say, that at this Conference, and before the Messengers were dispatched, Mr. Secretary Aylmer informed the King, that he had received Intelligence very different from what my Lord Arlington's was; which was, that the Dutch Fleet was even ready to come out, all their Men being aboard, which was likewise commended to those two honourable Persons to make Part of their Information. The Winds were so favourable, that the two Messengers went to, and returned from the Fleet with more Speed than could reasonably have been expected; they reported to the King, that they had imparted all his Commands to the Generals, and that they had had full Conference together upon it; that by all the Intelligence they had received, they did conclude, that the Dutch were not ready to come out; and therefore they thought it very countenable, that the Prince should endeavour to meet with the Duke of Beaufort; and in order to that, they had agreed before their coming away, and had agreed what Ships should attend Prince Rupert, and what should fly behind with the General, which they related should be executed by such a Time, if they did not receive his Majesty's Orders to the contrary; which his Majesty did not think fit to send, since they were of the same Mind, and so they separated each from other, as was agreed. I have heard (but I was not then present) that upon a more certain Intelligence that the Dutch Fleet was come out, Orders were sent to hinder the Prince from going out, which, if they had been transmitted with Care enough, would have come to him in Time; but there being least Negligence in that, they came not to him Time enough to return till the second Day of the Engagement; which is as well known, that I need not enlarge upon it. And this is all that I know of the dividing the Fleet; in which I do not know that any Man can be justly blamed with more Reason than all Men may be, whose Councils have not that Success which is desired; and if there were any Fault committed, I am sure there is no Colour to impute it to me, nor am I in the least Degree responsible for any Consequence upon it.

These now, according as my Memory hath been able to supply (for I have not any Paper or Note by me for my Assistance), answered every particular Charge against me; I hope so fully, that, how powerful soever my Enemies shall be yet able to appear, as they do continue very powerful, all ill-disposed Men will abate me from any Guilt. And though I neither do or can expect any thing of Justice or Integrity from those Persons who have by all the evil Arts imaginable contrived my Detraction, by insinuating into his Majesty's Ear Stories of Words spoken, and Things done by me, of which I am as innocent as I was when I was born, and other Jealousies of a Nature so odious, that them I have sent the Confidence publicly to own; yet, I say, notwithstanding all this Detraction for the present, I do not doubt that Posterity, if not the present Age, will clearly discern my Integrity and Innocence in all the Particulars which are objected against me, and lament my present Sufferings, that after so many Years of very faithful and painful Service, I should be banished my Country, and forced to seek my Bread in foreign Parts at this Age. However, it concerns me very much to wipe off one Reproach which I may seem to have brought upon myself, by my withdrawing and secretly flying out of the Kingdom, to avoid, as it may be thought, the Justice of Parliament; which, as it made the Ground and Foundation of the Act of Banishment, so I may reasonably presume that it hath made deep Impression in the Minds of many worthy Persons, who were not over-inclined to entertain a Prejudice against me, and who, by my withdrawing, may reasonably believe, that if I were in Truth so innocent as I have persuaded myself to be, I would not have declined the most severe and strict Examination of all my Actions, of which I ought to be very ambitious; and that an exact Inquiry might be made into my whole Life, from which, and from which only, if I am so innocent as I pretend to be, I might reasonably promise to myself such a full Vindication, as might amply repair me in Point of Integrity and Honour, not only to the Shame of my Enemies, but to my full Reparation for the Damages I have sustained, if I could prove such a gross Combination and Conspiracy against me as I have feared to accuse them of: And therefore it concerns me very much to make such a Defence for myself in a clear Relation of all the Motives and Circumstances which prevailed with me at that Time to withdraw me, as may give to all such as shall be called to turn and Advice to that Purpose, and to all such as shall be called to rather undergo a Trial, than to contribute to my own Liberty, by making out to decline the Trial: And I hope that when I have made a full and Narration of all these Reasons and Motives which obliged, and even forced me to do what I did, I shall be thought by all dispassionate Men not only not to have declined and betrayed my own Innocence, but to have complied with that Obligation and Duty which I have always paid to his Majesty, and to his Service, and against which I hope, and am most confident, that God Almighty will always preserve me from committing the least Fault or Offence.

When his Majesty was pleased first to find me an Intimation of his Purpose to take the Dutch upon me, which was by the Duke of York, he vouchsafed to use all the usual and usual Expressions that can be imagined, the great Satisfaction and Benefit he had received by my Service, the Assistance he had of my Faculty, and that he was confident nothing could be objected against me, which I would not be well able to answer; but that the Parliament had committed to great Prejudice against me, that if they had but one Day longer before their last Adjournment, they would have acknowledged me of High-Treason, and that he was well assured that they continued in that Resolution, and would execute it the first Day of their next Meeting; that I well knew the Condition of his Affairs, and how much he depended upon the House of Commons for a Supply of Monies, without which he should not be able to support his Government. His Advice therefore was, that I should deliver up the Seal to him out of my own Choice, by which he should be able to protect me from further Inconvenience; and it would be so grateful to the Parliament, that he should, in Consideration thereof, receive all that he could desire from them. It will easily be believed that I was enough surprised with this Message, it being a Time when my Mind was broken with the Loss of my Wife, for which his Majesty had vouchsafed us his Royal Person to console with me very few Days before, and when my Condition in all Respects was in no Degree pleasant to me. I asked the Duke that he would procure an Audience for me with his Majesty; which his Royal Highness had not the less thought of obtaining, and made as little Doubt but that his Majesty, in respect of my Losses and Infirmities, would be graciously pleased to come to my House, which his Majesty the next day promised to do; but upon Conference with others, afterwards changed that his gracious Purpose, and appointed me to attend him in a Morning in my own Chamber at Whitehall, which, being a Ground Room, would not put me to the Trouble of going up stairs; and thence his Majesty did vouchsafe to come to me, there being Nobody then present but his Majesty and the Duke. The King received me very graciously, with all those Expressions which he had said to the Duke; and when I asked him whether he had taken any Offence at my Carriage, and whether I had misbehaved myself in his Service? He said, No, but the contrary, that I had served him very well, and that he believed no Prince had a more devoted Servant; and that the Resolution he had now taken was for my Good and Preservation; and he enlarged himself upon the Resolution the House of Commons had taken to accuse me of High-Treason, and the Prejudice they had against me. I told him, that he might possibly be deceived in that Information, and that if he examined it better, he would find that I was not a Man so universally odious to any Persons of Power and Interest to serve him; at least, that my Lord Arlington, a noble Sir William Coventry, who were my known Enemies, would not be bound to become popular than myself; that the Manifestation of his Disposition in this Matter would be so far from preferring me, that it would infinitely expose me to the Malice of my Enemies, and was upon the Matter as call for Acknowledgment to me to gratify his Majesty, and I told him then, as I had done before, that Sir William Coventry had taken upon him, upon the Day of the last Prosecution, to offer four leading Men of the House of Commons, that the Chancellor should be favoured to them, if that would content them. His Majesty told me, That he knew such state of the Combination that was against me than I did, and that he was well assured, that if I were not removed before the Parliament met, it would not be in his Power to preserve me, but if I voluntarily gave up the Place, and withdrew into the Country, he would undertake I should not receive the least further Trouble. I told him, the Seal was in his own Disposal, he might take it when he pleased, but that I would not bring the Remembrance upon myself, by voluntarily giving it up, that I devoted his Service at a Time when first I should would believe that I might be of some Use to him. His Majesty seemed to be related upon our Matters, but dissembled me with many gracious Expressions of his good Opinion, which he continued long after to do to those Persons, who of themselves taking Notice of this Discourse in the Court, preferred to speak to his Majesty, and to dissuade him from proceeding in that Matter towards me; as the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord General, the Earl of Bridgwater, and others; to all whom his Majesty mentioned me as a Person of whole Affection and Integrity to his Service he had an unquestionable Assurance. And I do in Truth believe, that his Majesty at that Time had been persuaded to believe that my Removal was necessary for his Service, and had in himself no Disposition towards me, in order to any further Prosecution.

As soon as the Seal was taken from me, and delivered to the King, I heard that Mr. May had asked the King's House, and told him he was then King of England, and never before; and then every Day my Enemies declared their Animosity against me; and Sir William Coventry declared publicly in all Places, that he had advised the King to remove me, as a Thing upon which his Welfare depended; My Lord Arlington had persuaded the Duke of Buckingham, that I had been the sole Person who had contrived the Prosecution that had been lately sent all him, whereas, in Truth, I had never heard any thing of it till the King told it me, and the Lord Arlington brought me the Examination which had been been taken, and assured me those would be more proved against him; upon which I gave such Advice as my Honour and duty to do: but so far as I from Malice towards the Duke, that I did him all the Office I could with the King, and contributed at least as much as any Man, as soon as I found by the Lord Abington that some of the Witnesses were dead, and that the Proofs would not make all that good which he had pretended; but the Duke of Bedford was informed that I was the only Cause of his Suffering, and thereupon inveighed against me with his usual Liberties.

As soon as the Parliament came together, it quickly appeared that my Enemies had so far prevailed with his Majesty as to declare his own Displeasure against me, and against all those who appeared to take on all Opinions of me; and then nothing was spoken in much of as the Resolution to take my Life; and the Lady Catherine declared that the Duke of Bedford was to sit Lord High Steward of England upon my Trial, my Wagers being laid in the Court that I should lose my Head; and Sir Thomas Osborne, a Person of great Intimacy with the Duke of Bedford, had declared in the Country, before his coming up to the Parliament, that if the Chancellor were not hanged, he would be hanged himself. All which unusual Proceedings did not in the least degree terrify me; only the Manifestation of the King's great Displeasure against me (for what Cause God of Heavens knows, I cannot to this Day assign) did afflict me as it ought to do: Upon which I wrote to the King, beseeching him not to give Ear to the Reports raised by my Enemies; but to let me know in what I had offended him, and to bestow him to be satisfied with the Defence and Damage I had already received.

From the Beginning of the Prosecution in Parliament against me, seven Persons who wished me very well, and were well informed of the severe Injustices against me, earnestly desired me to withdraw myself, and thereby to provide for my Security, which I utterly refused to do. And it is well known, that the Day when the House of Commons sent up their General Impeachment of High-Treason against me, that my Couch was ready, and would three or four Hours to carry me to the House, I expecting to be sent for till the Rising at the House. When the Debate grew so hot in the House of Peers, and that after many Expostulations from the House of Commons, the House of Lords still refused to commit me to Prison, I received new Importunities from my Friends to make my Escape; and they were perfused by some who had had the greatest hand in contriving my Ruin, to believe that it would be grateful to the King, and that there should be no Means said to obstruct my going away. And when nothing of this could work upon me, the Bishop of Hereford (who had not earned himself to tilt towards me as those Men thought I had derived from him) first sent to the Bishop of Windsor, to persuade him to get me out of the Kingdom; and conferred to him, that it was the King's Desire, though he would not own it to any body else; and then came to me himself, pressing the same Thing to me; and undertook, upon his Salvation (which was his own Expression), that I should neither be stopped in my Passage, nor suffer in the least Degree in my Honour or my Fortune by my Absence; which he said I could not believe he would undertake without very good Authority; and thereupon enlarged upon the Calamities the Kingdom must suffer by this Difference between the two Houses, of which I should be looked upon to be the sole Cause, and therefore had Reason to apprehend what Benefit the People were like to have of it; and Mr. Erasmus had the Chancellor in his Name, to tell the House, who had vigorously opposed my Commitment, that those House of Peers did not comply with the House of Commons, nor I myself would not only pull down my House, but the House of all their Lords who adhered to me. I told the Bishop, I was very innocent in all Things laid to my Charge, and therefore I was not to be terrified by any Threats; however, if it were thought fit for his Majesty's Service that I should myself, I would, without any Consideration, how far I might offer in Point of Reputation, submit to his Majesty's Directs as early I desired that I might have such a Pass to might secure me from being stopped, and expedite as a Spectacle to the People, and as a Man running away from Justice, which the Bishop thought I might reasonably require, and made no Doubt of finding it me accordingly. But the next Morning he told the Bishop of Windsor, that if the King should grant such a Pass, it might give great Offence to the Parliament, which Hazard his Majesty would not run, but renewed all the Affairantes he had before given for the recovery of my Passage: And I as positively refused to accept thereof, and so continued in my House, and spoke every Day publicly with many Persons a full Week after the Time that the Bishop had been with me, notwithstanding the daily Advice and Importunity I received from my Friends and nearst Relations to withdraw.

I pleased God that the Duke of Dev had been for some Weeks sick of the Small-Pox, so that Nobody had spoken with him of any Business for the Space of near a Month; but the Maligancy of the Disease being gone, his Majesty himself had, upon the last Friday in November, visited his Royal Highness; and having little more than, than in negotiating his Recovery, and expediting his own great Joy in it, he came again to him the next Morning early, and had some private Conference with him. And the King no longer departed from him, but the Duke bid his Wife and privately to me, and request me presently to be gone; that the should let me know that it was absolutely necessary for the King's Service; and that I might be very confident and secure, that I should meet with no Obstruction in the Way, nor undergo the least Damage in my Honour or Fortune by being gone. And upon this Authority and Command I did the next Night, on Saturday the last of November, one thousand six hundred forty and seven, leave my own House, and went by Coach to Exeter, where I embarked; and I pleased God, all a four Days struggling with Wind and Weather, I arrived at Calcutta on Wednesday following. And I did not move in the Adventure, whenever Providence I have undergone by it, than I shall always do, in sacrificing my Honour, and my Life itself, upon the least Intimation of his Majesty's Pleasure, and whenever he thinks his Service may be advanced by it. And if any Man shall yet think, notwithstanding all that I have said, that I ought not to have withdrawn myself, but to have remained there in Prison, or any other Condition they would have put me in, until I had been fully cleared upon a fair Trial, he will, I hope, have a much Compassion of me, as to think I had great Difficulties to contend with, and will lament, on my Behalf, that I am forced to undergo to hard a Fate, after the Age of Threescore Years, whereas I should have been spent in the Service of the Crown; and for the Prosperity whereof, and the Happiness of his Majesty's Royal Person, my daily Prayers shall be poured out, in what Condition soever I am so, and in what Corner of the World soever I shall be confined or confined to.

*The Proceedings before the Lords of the Articles, &c. against CHARLES MAITLAND, of Halton, Treasurer Depute, for Perjury, in having given a false Testimony, at the Trial of James Mitchel .

PARLIAMENT being summoned and held at Edinburgh the 28th Day of July, 1681, by his Royal Highness, the King's High-Commissioner, on the ——— Day of ———, William Nidd, of Drover, did deliver the following Petition, or Accusation, into the Hands of the Lord Register, to be by his Lordship presented to his Royal Highness, and the Lords of the Articles.

To his Royal Highness, his Majesty's High-Commissioner, and the Right Honourable his Lords of the Articles,

It is humbly represented,

THAT, Whereas the deceased Mr. James Mitchel being converted before the Judges, for attempting to suborn the late Archbishop of St. Andrews, and his Coadjutors before the Duke of Lennox, his Majesty's Commissioner for the Time, and the Lords of the Privy-Council, being adduced in solemn Proceedings, against him, the said Mr. James to perjure this Defence, that his Confession was extorted upon Promise and Assurance of Life made to him; for proving whereof, he did address Charles Maitland, Lord Treasurer-Depute, as a Witness, who deposed negatively, notwithstanding that by Letters under his Hand, directed to the late Earl of Kinnaird, he expressly writes, That the said Mr. James had confessed upon Assurance made to him of his Life. And that he was brought to his Parliament would be the Lord of his right Hand, which Perjury will be clearly proven by Production of the said Letters and Deposition; for which is humbly craved, a Warrant may be granted against the Havers for Exhibition of the same, and that the Lord Treasurer-Depute may be declared infamous, and suffer the other Punishment appointed by Law in such Cases.

By Edinburgh,

W. NOBLE.

* This should be read after Mitchel's Trial, Vol. II. P. 616.

The Letters which the Petition refers to, and upon which the whole Accusation is founded, are these two that follow, both sent to my Lord of Kinnaird.

Edinburgh, 10 Feb. 1684.

THIS Afternoon yours came, which should have come this Morning, so that the Post is now more regular.

I read it all, and it is a full Account of all Passages: I hope shortly we may find Matters grow better, and indeed there is great Need of it here, for at present we are out of just Saturday last, in the Morning Information was given, That was Mr. James Aitchison, who was alleged to have been at the Archbishop of St. Andrews, was discovered by ——— and Sir William Stirling, and being sent to come down Sir William's own Clerk, by Sir William and two of his Brother's Footmen, he called to Mr. Aitchison, and carried him back to his House (his Signet-Office). He had a long Hair Pistol, and a short Sword about him, in Shoes and Stockings, and thought he was to arrest, yet he did not resist, though some came upon him, but Sir Philip was alone, till he came up his Stair. Being sent, his Name, he denied it, and carried in several others of his Acquaintance, and a Woman of the Chancellor, was committed into Prison. This Day he was examined by Order of Council, by the Chancellor, Register, Adv. Gen. and others: The Chancellor had ordered us to charge him with his being in the Register's bellm, and that he was suspected by Name with all the Adv. of Indignity, and to let him for his Confession, as he led to Execution.
This was done very late, and against his next Examination he confessed his being with the Rebels, but denied this Attestation of the Archbishop, yet acknowledged his being in Town at that Time, and that the Pistol he was taken with he had bought at that Time; so it was moved by one, That the Chancellor might take him apart, to see what he would then say. This being done, upon Assurance of Life, he in St. Andrew's, and Duke of Lauderdale, His Royal Highness was pleased to say in the Articles, that he did not see how he, being the King's Commissioner, could give Way to any such Accusation against one of his Majesty's Servants and Officers of State, or that any such Matter should come to a Trial, unless it had been the Treasurer-Depute's own careful Defect: And thus now their Lordships having seen and considered the whole Matter, it was for them to consider what was to be done. Whereupon, the Lords of the Articles declared their Sense of the Treasurer-Depute's Innocence in this Crime of which he was accused; and they did humbly offer to his Royal Highness, that he would be pleased to transmit the whole Affair to his Majesty, and submit the same to his Royal Consideration; so the End his Majesty might declare his Royal Pleasure, both for the Treasurer-Depute's Vindication, and punishing the Accuser according to the Punish usually by Law inflicted in such Cases.

What follows is the Copy of Mitch's two Confessions.

I, the Prefence of the Lord Chancellor, the Lords Register, Advocate, and Treasurer-Depute.

MR. James Mitchell being call'd before the Committee, and examin'd as to his Affection to the Revolution in the Year 1666, acknowledges he was in that Revolution, and join'd with them at the Burgh of Am, and stay'd with them until the Night before Pentecost, at which Time, at the Desire of Captain Arnot, he came into Edinburgh, to speak with Mr. James Scrimgeour, and Mr. Robert Pennington, and the Laird of Pennance, who were then in Edinburgh, and an Address to be given as to the Council, in Behalf of stay in the Revolution, declares he was in Edinburgh, and stay'd in the House of Griffith Whytford, in the Cannon-Gate, before he was ask'd; and having Notice from Col. James Wallace, Capt. Arnot, John Lindsay, and any William Young, from whom he receiv'd a Harp, and set in Southburgh, about Eight o'Clock at Night, and immediately after midnight, was join'd with them that were there in the Revolution. Declares, that he was in the House of Griffith Robertson in Carnie's Close, that he spoke with Pennington.

It is certain, that Mr. Noble had, by the Advice of his own Friends, without the Knowledge of any Lord Holmes, published that Paper, wherein he mentioned and touch'd his Accusation, and that he had shewn the same to John Campbell, of Dumfries, Commissioner for James II. in 1666, when it was published by him before Wintour. He, in Edin. was pleas'd to think fit to deny it, but being immediately confronted with the said Mr. Campbell before the Articles, he then confess'd he had shewn that Paper published by him to that Gentleman; by which a Man may easily conclude at the Nature of both his Accusation and Accuser.

NUMBER XIII.

An Account of the digging up of the Quarters of WILLIAM STAYLEY, lately executed for High-Treason, for that his Relations abused the King's Mercy (a).

WHEREAS William Stayley, being found Guilty of High-Treason, at the King's Bench Bar, on Thursday the 23^d Day of November, 1678, received then his Sentence, to be driven on a Sledge to the Place of Execution, there to be hang'd by the Neck, cut down alive, his Quarters to be sever'd, and disposed of as the King should think fit, and his Body burnt; which Sentence, on Stayley next following, was accordingly executed at the common Place of Execution, and his Quarters were brought back, and left at Newgate, in order to their being set up on the Gates of the City of London, and his Head on Landon-Bridge, as Treason Quarters usually are. But the said William Stayley having behaved himself very penitently, from the Time of his Conviction until the Time of his Execution, which was attested by the several Ministers that visited him during that Time; And the Relations of the said William Stayley humbly petitioning his Most Sacred Majesty, that he would be graciously pleas'd, that his Quarters might be deliver'd back to them, to be privately buried, and not to be set up on the Gates of the City. Which his Most Sacred Majesty, out of his Princely Clemency and Compassion, was pleas'd to grant, and ordered the Sheriff of the County of Middlesex to deliver the Quarters to his Friends, by whom to be disposed of as aforesaid; which were delivered accordingly.

But since that, (to the great Indignity and Affront of his Majesty's Mercy and Favour) the Friends of the said Stayley could find no Malice to be laid over his Quarters, and with other Circumstances, according to the Manner of the Church of Rome, and appeared a Time for his Interment, viz. Friday the 10th of November, 1678, in the Evening, from his Father's House in Green-Garden, at which Time there was made a pompous and great Funeral, many People following the Corpse in the Church of Saint Paul's, Green-Garden, where he was buried. Which his Majesty hearing of was justly displeas'd, and commanded the Council of the Liberty of Windsor to take up the Body of the said William Stayley, and deliver it to the Sheriff of the County of Middlesex, and that the said Sheriff should cause the Quarters to be set up on the Gates of the City of London, and his Head on Landon-Bridge. The Council, according to his Majesty's Command, did immediately go to the Churchwardens of Saint Paul's, Green-Garden, and caused the Body of the said William Stayley to be taken up, and the Coffin to be broken open, to see that he had the right Body, which when he had done, he caused the Body to be carried to Newgate, and there deliver'd it to the Sheriff of Middlesex, to be disposed of as aforesaid.

Imprimatur November 30, 1678.

NUMBER XIV.

Mr. Ireland and Mr. Groves were carried on the 24th of January, 1678-9, to Tyburn, where Mr. Ireland made this following Speech (b).

WE are come hither, as on the lost Thrones of the World, and do therefore give thanks to our oblig'd Friends.

First then, I'll do myself, that we pardon all and every one who has been any Intensity, Contumacy, or Hard in our Death.

Secondly, I'll do myself, that we pardon all and every one who has been any Intensity, Contumacy, or Hard in our Death. And as for the guilty sinners of our Tongue, to declare it, and that, if we have any Person's family therein, (although he were our Father) we would desire and deliver him, and as for ourselves, we would beg a Thousand and a Thousand Pardon, both of God and Man: But saying we cannot be forgiven, we must beg Leave to commit ourselves to the Mercy of Almighty God, and hope to find Pardon of him through Christ.

As for my own Part, having been twenty Years in the Low-Countries, and then coming over in June last Year, I had returned again, but not I have hinder'd by a Fit of Scurvy. On the third of August last I took a Journey into Staffordshire, and did not come back in Time before the fourteenth of September: so many can witness for a Hundred and more Years in Staffordshire; therefore, how I should in this Time be sitting here, I do not well know or understand.

Here Mr. Sheriff advertised the Print me, he would do well to make better Use of his Time, than to spend it in foolish-like Expeditions, for no Body would believe him; and that they thought much of their Time, for they would say: but such kind of Words did arraign the Proceedings of the Court, by which they were tried.

Wherefore Mr. Ireland concluded, and said: I do here beg of God Almighty in answer to a Thousand and a Thousand Blessings upon his Majesty, in our beloved Kingdom, in the City of York, and all the Royal Family, and all who are in London. As for the City of York, which has been so long in our hands, we desire their Prayers for a happy Passage into a better World, and that he would be merciful to all Christian Souls. And as for all our Enemies, we earnestly desire that God would pardon them again and again, for we pardon them heartily, from the Bottom of our Hearts; and so I beseech all good People to pray for us and unto us.

Then Mr. Groves said:

We are innocent; we live our Lives innocently; we pray God to forgive them that are the Causes of it.

Piercing was repeated till the Ninth of May, 1679, at which Time he was executed. Arriving at the Place of Execution, he appear'd to the Spectators (after a Manner very unusual to Persons in his Condition) with a Countenance not only calm, sweet, and serene, but even cheerful, smiling, and pleas'd, solemnly protesting upon his Salvation, He was innocent in Thought, Word, and Deed, of all that was laid to his Charge. Then devoutly praying for his Accusers and Enemies, he laid on the Hangman, Friend, to do his Office, and soon after, quietly left the World.

(a) To be read after his Trial, in Vol. II. Pag. 426.

(b) To be read after their Sentence, in Vol. II. Pag. 396.

Should not engage me in this Matter, to get the poor Man's Money, for that I would not do it for any Consideration! You said, indeed, you would not, nor would have me do any Thing, 'till I had seen and discours'd with the Man. You then call'd to Capt. Harb, and invited him and me to come to Dinner on the Morrow, to your Lodging; to which I agreed, and said, 'you where you lodg'd you said, you had told me oft enough, but I had not been to look to come for you, and then told me where it was, which I have now forgot, but think it was in or near White-chapel. After this Discourse, you know, we parted, and you and Capt. Harb left me at Derby-House, and engaged me, I suppose, to Dinner next Day; but I, indeed, desirous to be quit of any Thing that appear'd to all as the Harlots propoised to me, came not to it, nor ever heard more of it from yourself, or Capt. Harb; nor low you again, till the sixteenth I twenty-first of October. This, Capt. Atkins, you know, is all true; I agree to yourself if it be not.

Ld. Shaftsb. Come, come, Mr. Atkins, you are a seeming hopeful young Man, and, for aught I fee, a very ingenuous one: Capt. Atkins has sworn this positively against you, to whom he bears no Prejudice, or Malice, but has acknowledged several Obligations from you; and to tell you truly, I don't think he has Wit enough to invent such a Lie; be ingenuous, promise with us, and confide what you said.

S. At. I assure your Lordship, upon my Faith, which I am ready to bind with my Oath, if you please, I never said one Word in all my Life like it.

Ld. Shaftsb. Indeed, we believe Capt. Atkins to be a Man that has loved Wine and Women, and been a debauch'd Man; but whome you would say to think him to be a Rascal?

S. At. Why, my Lord, I would offer this, and submit to you to judge how far a Criminal it is to be reckless? And, however, I related also the forwarding of the King's Ship Swiftly to the Turks, and being near a Prisoner. To which no Answer was given.

Ld. Shaftsb. Pray, Mr. Atkins, What Religion are you of?

S. At. A Protestant, Sir, and my whole Family ever so.

Ld. Shaftsb. Did you ever receive the Sacrament, or take the Oath?

S. At. No, Sir, but was under an Intention to do it on Sunday next.

L. G. It is indeed Time.

Ld. Shaftsb. Now, I am sure you won't do it; you can't forgive Capt. Atkins?

S. At. Yes, my Lord, I assure you I can, and do; and so throw it to you, I also remit to him the Money he owes me, [about Fifty Shillings], and am ready to receive the Sacrament with a clean Conscience. I confess I have not done it, as not thinking my self oblig'd by any Employment I had to do it, and many Thousands of my Age [God Preserve] will be like me to have done it.

Ld. Shaftsb. How long have you lived with Mr. Pegg?

S. At. Four Years last August.

Ld. Shaftsb. How old are you?

S. At. Twenty-one Years, the twenty-ninth of that Month.

Ld. Shaftsb. Where did you live before you came to Mr. Pegg?

S. At. I lived, Sir, formerly with Commissioner Middleton.

Ld. Shaftsb. Then I am sure he was a Protestant; [But now you are brought into Business, and have Access to Sir James's, 'tis to be fear'd you may be otherwise, for we are apt to suspect People inclining to the Sea.]

S. At. I never had Temptation from within, or without, to alter my Religion, and hope in God I never shall. Then the Duke of Buckingham came from the other Side of the Room towards me, and said, Ld. Buck. Well, Mr. Atkins, I'm for you before that I remember, but I fear you are an ingenious Man, and I fee (seeing a Paper in his Pocket) the great Workings of your Brain, and would gladly, for your own sake, have you declare to us what you know of this Matter.

S. At. My Lord, I can never say otherwise than I have, (I thank your Lordship for your good Thoughts of me) nor do I know one Word more.

And to this Effect, we after another, did wail of the Lords of the Committee as we me to say Amoribus, repeating very often their good Opinion of me, and their great Sorrows for my Obstinacy, which would bring the Prejudice to myself, while by a Confession I could not injure, but advantage myself, Captain Atkins joining with us to urge me to it, with Promises of making my Fortune thereby. I still gave the same Answer, declaring my utter Inability to say one Word, and answering I never had to Captain Atkins.

Hereupon we were both order'd to withdraw, which we did, and after a little Stay without, they call'd me again to them, and my Lord Shaftsbury began.

Ld. Shaftsb. Mr. Atkins, truly we are, every Lord of this Committee, very desirous to be thus plain with you, but here being to perform an Oath against you, we cannot answer to the Parliament the doing less than consulting you to Negate.

S. At. What your Lordships please, if you find me to be hang'd, I can say no more, or otherwise.

Then they again repeated their Advices severally to me, to declare what I knew, and graciously asked me if I had in first, of my knowing nothing of what Captain Atkins had sworn. At last Sir Philip Howard (who stood by all this while) told me, I could not have lived so long Time in an Office of Business, but I must know the Laws of this Nation to be such as would bring me under severe Punishment, if I should be found to contest this Matter, which I well persuaded you must know of, (says he,) for that I have to seriously and very briefly examin'd Captain Atkins about it, and I know he would not tell me a Lie. Besides, he has no Reason to do it towards you, and being a Gentleman, Son of Sir Yonathas Atkins, my Nephew, otherwise well related, and man's want as Edith of his Father (if he please) when he dies, he can't be thought to attempt to do it against any Body. I told him, I very well knew the Laws of this Nation in that Point, and as well knew the Laws of Guthrie (such as would draw a worse Punishment upon my Head, if I could tell a Lie, or mention any thing to the Prejudice of another Man, and that I wish, if I had any thing in this Matter different from what I have done.

After this, I was order'd to withdraw, and Captain Rickard, Keeper of Newgate, (who waited without with the aforesaid Child, called in, and a Warrant deliver'd to him in the following Words, for his keeping me in his Custody, viz.

You are herewith to receive the Body of Mr. Samuel Atkins, for Suspicion of Felony, in concealing the Murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, and him safely to keep, until he shall be releas'd deliver'd by due Course of Law: And for so doing, this shall be your Warrant sufficient. Given under our Hands and Seals this first Day of November, 1678.

To the Keeper of the Goal of Newgate, for the City of London, and County of Middlesex.

Sig'd,

Beckingham,
W. Riches,
P. Howard.

Memorandum. The Deposition made by Captain Atkins against me, from whence the Examinations proceeded, and my being committed to Prison were ground'd, hereafter follows in the aforesaid Words uttered, as they were reported by the Committee to the House of Lords, and enter'd in their Book, viz.

Die Martii 12^o Novembris. 1678.

The Examination of Charles Atkins, Esq. taken upon Oath before us, One of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the County of Middlesex, and Liberty of Westminster, this first Day of November, 1678.

S A I T H, That in Derby-House, being in D^o House with Samuel Atkins, (Clerk to Mr. Pegg, Secretary of the Admiralty) the last Sunday did say, That Sir Edmundbury Godfrey had very much vilified his Master, and that if he liv'd long would be the Ruin of him, upon which the said Samuel did ask this Examination whether he did think Child to be a Man of Courage and Secrecy, so which this Examination did reply, That the said Child had been at Sea, and had behaved himself very well, as he had been inform'd; upon which the said Samuel did bid this Examination send the said Child to his Uncle, Mr. Pegg, but not to turn the said Samuel, for that he would not be loath to know any thing of it. This Examination did endeavour to find out the said Child, but did not meet with him till the Day after that Discourse had happened between him and Samuel Atkins, at the Three Tobacco-Pipes in Holborn, where this Examination did tell Child, that Secretary Pegg would speak with him; and the next Time that this Examination did for the said Child, (after that he had given him that Direction) he, the said Child, did endeavour to engage the said Examination to join with him in the Murder of a Man. The Particulars of which, this Examination hath declared before the King and Council, Wednesday last past.

Taken before me, One of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the County and Liberty aforesaid.

P. HOWARD.

Upon this Deposition was ground'd the afore-said Warrant for my Commitment, by Venue whereof, Captain Rickard carried me presently to Prison, where I remained in a Room of his own House, without having Liberty to write to, or, or speak with any Body, till Wednesday the sixth Day of November, 1678, when having well remitted on what had past at my late Examination, I desired Captain Rickard to accompany the Lords of the Committee, that at their next Meeting I would pray to be brought before them; which he promised to do, and did, and on the said sixth of November, 1678, being Wednesday, I was carried by him to the Committee, consisting of the same Lords as before, then sitting at the Lord Privy-Seal's Chamber by the Parliament-House, where the following Questions were asked:

Ld. Holcar. Well, Mr. Atkins, we hope you have consider'd No. 4, of this Business, and are ready to give us some Light in it.

S. At. My Lord, I have well indeed consider'd of it, and I hope am prepar'd to show your Lordships that nothing is to be expected from me, and to my Liberty will not be denied me.

Ld. Holcar. Nay then, Mr. Atkins, if you come to that, you must say till we find for Captain Atkins, if it be sought you would fly against him, or his Accusation.

S. At. My Lord, I hope I shall continue him in several Circumstances, which I have better consider'd, and clear to you my Innocence.

Ld. Shaftsb. Why, Mr. Atkins, Captain Atkins declares to us he has much more against you, and several other Circumstances, by which he says, you'll appear the worst Man living.

S. At. My Lord, if you please, I deliver he may be free too.

Upon this I was order'd to withdraw, and Captain Atkins being sent to Sir Philip Howard's, in St. Dunstons-Yard, came in about Half an Hour, and meeting me in the Passage leading up the Stairs to the Chamber where the Council was sitting, I observed his Countenance altered extremely, and took Notice of it to him. He pass'd by me, and went up the stairs, and laying there on an Expedition of being call'd, I went to him with my Keeper, (Mr. Linn), and discoursing together, I said him what had induced him to being this Murther upon me, and whether he design'd to run me, that had prefer'd him from us? He answer'd, No, no, no, no. I further said him, I look'd like one that had done, or knew of any Murder, and whether he thought in his Conscience I did? No, faith he, I dare swear for you for this Matter, only these Words pass between us: Well, says I, you fly 'twixt between us, 'tis impossible to contradict your Oath, but God, you and I know, 'twas not so. Hereupon, after some little other Discourse, he went down Interests, for private Ends, will find they are rather troublesome than necessary; and the greatest Mischiefs they will be able to effect, will be upon themselves.

In short, it is the proper Business of this Court, and our Duty, that we take care, to take care to prevent and punish the Mischiefs of the Press. I am of this mind, with any Safety, wit and good sense; and every person, who is of this mind, will be sure to put us in the right way. So that what between the Court, and the Patriots, and the Moderates that write for him that sits, and for what they are hated, we shall be infected with the French Government, and be over-run with Lies and Labels; which is a great evil, and which we shall not, not Courage, who were worst of us, to say what they could not own.

Mr. Justice Jones.

WE have a particular Case here before us, in a Matter of Scandal against a great Judge, the greatest Judge in the Kingdom, an Criminal Cause, and it is a great and an high Charge upon him. And certainly there was never any Age, I think, since Licentious than this, as appearing Guiltless, featuring of Labels and scandalous Speeches against those that are in Authority; and, without all doubt, it hath become this Court to show their Zeal in suppressing it.

I am old enough to remember (and, perhaps, feel the Smart of it yet) the Beginning of the late Rebellion (for a Rebellion it was, and deserves no other Name). I know it had the Fore-runner of such Labels, and such attacks against the Government, as this is; and it followed almost to the Success of the Happiness of the Kingdom. As for the Trial hinted at in this Affidavit, I was not present at it myself, I was detained by my own Infirmary, so that I could not attend that Service, nor indeed have I read the Relation of it in Print, so confidently as to give a Judgment upon it. But I am very confident, upon my knowledge of the Integrity of my Lord, and the rest of my Lords the Judges that were there, for there were all the Chief Judges, and almost all my Brethren) that that Trial was managed with exact Justice, and perfect Integrity, by them.

And therefore I do think it very fit, that this Person be proceeded against by an Information, that he may be made a public Example to all such as shall presume to scandalize the Government, and the Government, with any false Aspersions or Accusations.

Mr. Justice DOLBER.

I Am of that Mind, truly; and am very glad we have let upon one of the Druggers of these Scandals. I was present at that Trial, and, for my Part, I think the Scandal so my Lord Chief Justice was a Scandal to all that were there; for if he had misbehaved himself in such a Manner as has been reported, we had been strange People to sit still and say nothing, or not interpose to rectify wherein he did amiss. And therefore I desire this Man may be proceeded against, for an Example to others.

May 29, 1680, this Richard Radley was convicted of speaking scandalous Words against the Lord Chief Justice Burgess, and fined 200*l*.

NUMBER XX.

Mr. THWING being condemned at the Summer Assizes at York, and after three Months Reprieve, was at last, viz. October 23 next ensuing, Hanged, Drawn, and Quartered, at the usual Place of Execution there: Arriving at the Gallows, he delivered in Writing the following Speech.*

THIS sudden News of my Execution (after my Reprieve) coming so unexpectedly, made me (as I should have more Security feared me than has been to others) and, consequently, that I should not love my tall Liberty, to declare my Mind in the Place of my Execution, therefore I have briefly expressed myself in Writing, as followeth.

First, As I hope for Salvation and Benefit of the Blood and Passion of my Beloved Saviour, I most sincerely protest, that what Rich. Baines, and L. Manners were against me, was absolutely false, for here, in the Presence of the Eternal God, I declare I never knew of any Confess at Barnack, the last judgment to the King or Kingdom; nor was I ever at any such Confess, or Meeting, with Sir Thomas Gascoigne, Mr. Gascoigne his Son, Sir Miles Stapleton, the Lady Toppoff, Mr. Ingley, or any other, where any thing was treated, spoken, or written, about killing the King, or Murther of the Government, nor did I ever see, or know of any List of Names of Persons mentioned, and sworn by them against me.

Secondly, Upon my Salvation I declare, that I never had been in my whole Life-time guilty, even so much as in Thought, of any Treason against his Majesty, or the Kingdom, being directly contrary to the Principles of our Faith.

Thirdly, That although I have, and do declare against the Oath of Allegiance, as it is worded, yet it is only by reason of some Clauses therein contained, not pertaining to Allegiance; and therefore if an Oath, containing nothing but Allegiance, had been legally tendered me, I should have thought it a Sin to refuse it.

Lastly, I acknowledge myself a Priest, and to have (about Fifteen Years) performed the Priestly Function; which I am so far from denying, that I thought it the greatest Honour imaginable.

Now, dear Countrymen, having made this Protestation in the most plain and serious Terms I could, without all Equivocations, or mental Reservation whatsoever; I appeal to the Eternal Judge, whether all good Christians ought not rather to believe what is here in this manner sworn by me, in my present Circumstances, than what was sworn by my Accusers, whom, notwithstanding, I beg of God Almighty to forgive, as also the Jury, and all others, who have, in any kind, concerned to my Death.

Then again professing his Innocence, and praying for his King and Country, he concluded with these seeming Prophetic Words:

Though I know the Affairs of the Kingdom are in a bad Posture, yet I hope they will be cleared ere long; and then the Actors thereof will be more fully known.

The Examination of Captain WILLIAM BEDLOW, deceased, relating to the Popish Plot; taken in his last Sickness, by Sir Francis North, Chief Justice of the Court of Common-Pleas. Together with the Narrative of Sir Francis North, at the Council-Board: And the Letter of Sir Francis North, to Mr. Secretary Jenkins, relating to this Examination. Perused and signed to be printed, according to the Order of the House of Commons, by me William Williams, Speaker†.

The Examination of Capt. William Bedlow, taken upon Oath before the Lord Chief Justice North, at Bristol, on Monday the 16th of August, 1680.

THE Examination sheweth, That the Duke of York hath been so far engaged in the Plot, as he hath been by Letters in Cardinal Berber's Secretary's Study, that so Part that hath been proved against any Man already, that hath followed, but that to the full these Letters have made him guilty of it; all but what tended to the King's Death. And at Rome I asked Father Auderius, and Father Lodge, two Jesuits, What would the Duke do with his Brother when he was King? And they answered me, They would find a Means for that; they would give him no Trouble about it. Thus I told them, I believed the Duke loved his Brother so well, he would suffer so Violence to be done to him: They said, No; if the Duke could be brought to that, as he had been religiously to every thing else, they might do their Work; their other Business was ready, and they might do it presently. But they knew they could not bring him to that Point, but they would take care for that themselves. And they did not begin with him, so leave him in such Struggles as that, but they would fit him into his Torment, and there he should begin himself about three or four Days, for they had desired him they should watch the Affairs upon, should clear their Party, and then should fly upon them with the Sword of Revenge.

And this Examination doth further add, That the Queen is not, in this Examination's Knowledge, nor by any thing that he could ever hear out, any way concerned in the Murder of the King, but barely by her Letters confirming and promising to contribute what Money she could to the introducing the Catholic Religion. Nay, twice a great while, and it made her weep, before she could be brought to that.

William Bedlow.

The NARRATIVE of Sir FRANCIS NORTH, Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, at the Council-Board.

AT my first coming to Mr. King's House, where I was to lodge at Bristol, upon Monday the 15th Day of August in the Afternoon, being the first Day of the Assizes, Sir John Knight came to me, and said, That Mr. Bedlow lay dangerously ill of a Fever, and had little Hopes of

* Bedlow having been so remarkable a Witness in the several Trials of the Popish Plot, it is thought proper to insert here what he declared upon Oath to the Lord Chief Justice North, some Days before his Death, (which happened August 20, 1680,) which should be read after Duke Trist, as Vol. II.

My Lord Mayor,

I AM, by the King's Command, to tell you, That he hath consider'd the humble Petition of the City of London, where so many of the greatest Magistrates, and other eminent Citizens, are of undoubted Loyalty and Affection to his Service; that, for their sakes, His Majesty will show the City all the Favour they can reasonably desire.

It was very long before His Majesty took Resolutions to question their Charter: It was not the seditious Discourses of the Coffee Houses, the treacherous Pamphlets and Libels daily published, and dispersed thence into all Parts of the Kingdom; the outrageous Tumults in the Streets; nor the Affronts to his Courts of Justice, could provoke him to it.

His Majesty had Patience until Disorders were grown to that Height, that nothing less seem'd to be design'd, than a Ruin to the Government, both of Church and State; for the seditious Party were not content with the Practice of these Insolencies, but endeavour'd to have them publicly countenanced by the Magistrates: And for that End, in all Elections they were to choose the most disaffected into Offices of the greatest Trust in the Government; and carried themselves with that Heat and Violence, that it was a Terror to all sober and discreet Citizens: And the City was to unhappily divide into Parties, that there was no Likelihood it could return to good Order, so long as the Factions retain'd any Hopes of procuring the Election of Magistrates of their own Party for their Impunity.

It was high Time to put a Stop to this growing Evil. This made it necessary for His Majesty to enquire into their Abuse of Franchises, that he might be in his Power to make a Regulation, sufficient to reform the City to its former good Government.

It was not for Punishment, but merely for the Good of the City, that he took this Course.

And now the King hath obtained Judgment in a Quo Warranto, it is not his Intention to prejudice them, either in their Properties, or Customs. Nay, lest the execution of a Judgment so sacred might have Consequences fatal to them, his Majesty was to tender them, that he caus'd His Attorney to forbear the same at present, that the City might have some Time to consider their new Condition.

My Lord,

I must needs say, the City hath not been well advised, to defer their Application to his Majesty till now, even till the Court hath pronounced Judgment: It had been done with a much better Grace, if it had been more so.

His Majesty's Affection to the City is too great to reject their Suit for that Cause.

But for that Reason you will have the less Time to deliberate upon the Particulars the King doth require of you.

And indeed there will be little need of Deliberation; for his Majesty hath resolv'd to make the Alterations as few and as easy as may be, consistent with the good Government of the City, and Peace of the Kingdom. They are these:

His Majesty requires your Submission to these Regulations:

That no Lord Mayor, Sheriff, Recorder, Common Serjeant, Town-Clerk, or Councillor of the City of London, or Steward of the Borough of Southward shall be capable of, or be admitted to the Exercise of their respective Offices, before his Majesty shall have approved them under his Sign Manual.

That if His Majesty shall disapprove the Choice of any Person to be Lord Mayor, and signify the same under his Sign Manual, to the Lord Mayor, or, in Default of a Lord Mayor, to the Recorder, or Senator-Alderman, the Citizens shall, within one Week, proceed to a new Choice. And if his Majesty shall, in like Manner, disapprove the second Choice, His Majesty may, if he so please, nominate a Person to be Lord Mayor for the ensuing Year.

If his Majesty shall in like Manner disapprove the Persons chosen to be Sheriffs, or either of them, his Majesty may appoint Persons to be Sheriffs for the ensuing Year, by his Commission, if he so please.

Nevertheless, the Estates of these Officers may be according to the ancient Usage of the City, with single Restrictions.

The Lord Mayor, and Court of Aldermen, may, with Leave of his Majesty, displace any Alderman, Recorder, Common Serjeant, Town-Clerk, Councillor of the said City, and Steward of the said Borough.

Upon the Election of any Alderman, if any of the Peers that shall be presented to the Court of Aldermen by the Ward shall be judged unfit, upon such Declaration by the said Court, the Ward shall proceed to the Choice of other Persons in the Room of such, or as many of them as are so disapproved: And if the said Court shall disapprove such second Choice, they may appoint any others in their Room.

The Justice of the Peace to be by the King's Commission, which his Majesty will grant according to the usual Method; unless upon extraordinary Occasions, when his Majesty shall think it necessary for his Service.

These Matters are to be settled in such a Manner as shall be approved by his Majesty's Attorney and Solicitor General, and Council learned in the Law.

My Lord Mayor,

These Regulations being made, his Majesty will not only pardon this Prosecution, but confirm your Charter in such Manner as may be consistent with them.

The City ought to look upon this as a great Consideration on his Majesty's Part, it being in the Nature of a Reversion of a small Part of what is already in his Power, by the Judgment: And of those Things which will conduce as much to their own Good and Quiet, as to his Service.

If the City should look upon it with another Eye, and neglect a speedy Compliance; yet his Majesty hath done his Part, and demonstrated his Affection to the City, by giving them that Opportunity.

And if there shall be any heavy Consequence of this Judgment, which it will be upon you well to consider, the Fault will lie at their Doors, in whose Power it now is, to bring this Affair to a happy Conclusion.

My Lord Mayor,

The Term draws towards an End, and Midsummer-Day is at Hand, when some of the Officers are to be chosen, whereof his Majesty will relieve the Appointments; therefore it is his Majesty's Pleasure, that he may return to the City, and consult the Common-Council, that he may speedily know your Resolutions thereupon, and accordingly give his Directions.

That you may see the King is in earnest, and the Matter is not capable of Delay, I am commanded to let you know, he hath given Order to his Attorney-General to enter up Judgment on Saturday next, unless you prevent it by your Compliance in all these Particulars.

But the City not complying, Judgment was enter'd. Vide Vol. IV, Pag. 551, 552.

NUMBER XXIII.

An ANTIDOTE against Poison: Composed of some Remarks upon the Paper printed by the Direction of the Lady Ruffel, and mentioned to have been delivered by the Lord Ruffel to the Sheriffs at the Place of his Execution (a).

[By Sir Bartholomew Shower.]

THE publishing of this Paper, as the last Speech of a dying Man, cannot but surprise all Persons who were present at the Trial of the Lord Ruffel, to read such Reflections upon the Judges, the King's Counsel, the Sheriffs, and the Jury; the Fact is universally represented, and the Offender's Innocence is strongly asserted, when they can all sit still to the Pursuits of his Trial, the respectful treating of him by the King's Council, as far as was consistent with their Duty, without any Strains upon the Evidence, to the favourable Discreetness of the Court towards him, not in the least aggravating the Crime beyond the Evidence, and so the Fallacies of the Evidence upon the Proofs produced: And therefore those who heard the Evidence must acknowledge, that that Paper is so far from containing the whole Truth of the Lord Ruffel's Case, that what of Truth is therein intimated, is wholly disguised, and artfully, and uncharitably set down. Neither doth the Lord Ruffel, in his Speech to the Sheriffs, ever all contain'd in that Paper to be true, nor the Paper to contain the whole Truth of his Case; only such, he had set down in that Paper all that he thought fit to leave behind him. No doubt, he might as well have said, All that his faithful Confessor advised him to leave behind him.

For whosoever strictly peruseth the Paper, will not find the Ingenuity, Sincerity, or plain Style of a dying Gentleman, may discover the peculiar Distinct of an Assail, accus'd to shadow Truth with doubtful and ambiguous Expressions; and the Paper artfully contrived and design'd to gratify a Party by a colourable asserting the Innocency of the Criminal, condemn'd by the Law for High-Treason, and laying a malicious Imputation upon the Government, for an unjust Prosecution of an innocent Person to Death.

Whether the Paper doth truly state the Crime, upon the Fact proved, for which the Lord Ruffel was condemn'd; and whether it contain any plain Denial of that Fact; will best appear by truly stating the Crime charg'd upon him by the Indictment, and the Fact proved upon him at his Trial.

The Lord Ruffel, with others, are charg'd by the Indictment with High-Treason, for conspiring, compassing, and imagining the Death and Destruction of the King, and raising of a Rebellion within the Kingdom. And the Overt-Acts whereunto they are charg'd, are their meeting together, consulting and agreeing to raise an Insurrection and Rebellion, and to raise upon the King's Guards.

At the Trial, Colonel Ruffel did swear, That there was a general Rising intended in October and November last, and that he was engaged therein; and that the Earl of Shaftsbury, who was likewise engaged therein, in November last, acquainted him, that the Duke of Monmouth, the Lord Grey, Lord Ruffel, Sir Thomas Armstrong, and Mr. Fergyn, were to meet at Mr. Shophard's House in Sharders-Lane, and sent him thither with a Message to them; that accordingly he went thither, and found the Lord Ruffel, and the rest there, and delivered to them the Message from the Earl of Shaftesbury; which was, That it was high Time to come to these Resolutions about the Rising; That Answer was returned, That Mr. Trevelyan had assured them, That, in four Hours Time, one Thousand Foot, and two or three Hundred Horse should be ready at Twickenham; but now Mr. Trevelyan required two or three Days Notice of the Rising, and therefore they could not go on at present; and that my Lord Shaftesbury would be consulted.

(a) To be read after Lord Ruffel's Speech, Vol. III. Pag. 448, 449, and 450. It is observable, That in the State-Trial, Vol. III. Pag. 679, is inserted Sir Robert Aikley's Defence of the late Lord Ruffel's Innocency: By way of dispute or Confutation of a Libellous Pamphlet, intitled, An Antidote Against Poison. But the Antidote itself (withally's 3 support) contains.

He said, The Answer was pronounced by Mr. Fergyn, and the Lord Grey spoke to the same Purpose. And being interrupted, whether the Lord Ruffell were to rise to hear the Message, he said he was so near, and could not but hear it. And being asked by the Lord Ruffell, whether he consented to the Answer, he declared upon his Oath, that the Lord Ruffell did consent; and that they then treated and consulted of the General Rising; And both Colonel Ramsey and Mr. Skelton did swear, That the Lord Ruffell and the self did consent at Mr. Skelton's about joining of the King's Guards. And having at a former Meeting appointed some of their Number, viz. the Duke of Monmouth, Lord Grey, and Sir Thomas Armstrong, to view in what Posture the Guards were, they made Report to the rest there. That they found them very remote in their Duties, and might be easily seized. Mr. Skelton swore, That their Meeting at his House was secret, but appointed by themselves; and that they came late in the Evening; and that my Lord Ruffell was not any person. But that he told him; neither had he then any private Business with the Lord Ruffell. But the Lord Ruffell pretending he came to take some Sherry, which he had brought from Mr. Skelton, Mr. Skelton denied upon his Oath, that the Lord Ruffell had brought any Sherry of him, or mentioned any such Thing then to him.

The Lord Howard gave in Evidence upon his Oath, That there was a Design of a General Rising, both in October and November last, and that the Earl of Shaftesbury then acquainted him, he had Ten Thousand brisk Boys ready. And after the Departure of the Earl of Shaftesbury, it was thought necessary, for the preventing of Confusion, and more orderly managing of the Rising, that a select Council should be held for that Purpose. And accordingly, the Duke of Monmouth, the Earl of Essex, the Lord Ruffell, Colonel Ramsey, Mr. Skelton, Taylor, and himself, met in January last, at Mr. Skelton's House in Ruffell-Street, and debated certain Preliminaries to the Rising. Amongst others, Whether the Rising should be in London first, or in the Country first, or in both at once? And the major Opinion inclined to have the Rising both in London and the Country at one Time. That soon after, they held a second Meeting at the Lord Ruffell's House, where all the last mentioned Persons were present; and where they again debated of the Rising, and then came to this Resolution, That some Person should be sent into Scotland, to invite some Persons thence, from the discontented Scots, to treat with them, that they might be assured of what Assistance they might expect from the Scots: That that Matter was committed by them to the special Care and Conduct of Colonel Skelton; And that Col. Skelton acquainted him he had sent some Person into Scotland accordingly; and that he had given him therefore Guidance to delay the Charges of his Journey.

The Lord Howard, interrogated by the Lord Ruffell, Whether he said any thing in those Debates, declared upon his Oath, That though his Lordship never said to speak much, yet he did speak in those Debates, and consented to what was done.

This was the Substance of the Evidence, though delivered by the Witnesses more at large, as will appear by their Depositions, printed with the Trial. A clearer Evidence to prove the Facts charged, of meeting and consulting to raise a Rebellion within the Kingdom, and to seize the King's Guards, I believe the most experienced Person in the Laws can never draw was ever produced at the Trial of any Traitor. To the great Strengthening Part of the Evidence, which is that of the Lord Howard, and of much of Colonel Ramsey's, I have added some other Evidence, of which the Witnesses make full Proof, the Paper gives no Answer at all. With what Confidence then can the Author of that Paper introduce a dying Man, asserting his own Innocency, and charging the Jury with Forwardness and Injustice, when the Criminal cannot deny the Facts upon which the Jury gave their Verdict? But these Facts, whether true or false, the Criminal would not examine. And if he could not, or would not assert them to be false, no Man of any common Integrity can doubt them to be true, when sworn by credible Witnesses, and found by a substantial Jury. Yet, to satisfy the Conscience of a dying Man, and to cover the Scandal of so great a Crime from vulgar or partial Eyes, these Confessions and Confessions to raise a Rebellion, and seize the General Rising, are repeated to the People only as some Discourses about some Scots. They may be in Scotland some Scots, but in England they are, and ever were, Seditious Rebels.

As to the other Branch of the Over-Acts, of consulting to seize the Guards, which the Paper makes the only Crime for which the Lord Ruffell was condemned; this Account is given by the Paper, That the Lord Ruffell was at Mr. Skelton's House with that Company but once, and there was no Undertaking then of seizing and seizing the Guards, nor none appointed to view or examine them: Some Discourse there was of the Feasibility of it, and several Times by Accident in general Discourse elsewhere.

This Account which the Lord Ruffell gives of this Matter is rather a Confirmation of the Testimonies of Colonel Ramsey and Mr. Skelton, than an Avoidance thereof: He admits the Feasibility thereof was then discussed of, and at other Times likewise. They swear, That the Persons appointed to view the Guards, reported them, they found them to be very remote in their Duties, and might be easily seized. The Lord Ruffell remembers he was at Mr. Skelton's House but once; Skelton swore he was there with that Company twice; and at the last Time the Report was made after viewing of the Guards.

The seizing of the Guards was not the only nor principal Fact upon which the Lord Ruffell was condemned, as appears by the Proof before; but it was one of the Influences to make out against him the general Design of raising a Rebellion, as one of the proper Ways to secure the General Rising, and was sufficiently proved by two Witnesses to have been consulted upon to that Purpose.

Indeed, to what other Purpose can any Man imagine the Lord Ruffell, and his Accomplices, who appeared to have been engaged in a Design of a general Insurrection, upon such Proof as the Criminal could not deny the Facts, should so often discourse of the Feasibility of securing the Guards, as is evidenced by the Lord Ruffell, than in order to facilitate and secure their Design of the General Rising? And the Discourse the Paper owns to have been at the Lord Shaftesbury's, touching the first Matter, who throughout appears to be a principal Agent in the Design of the General Rising, proves the seizing of the Guards to be Part of the Design. And though the Lord Ruffell then expressed a Tenderness of shedding cold Blood, as a Thing detestable, and so like a Popish Practice; yet that Deluge of Blood which most successfully has ensued in the Hearts of a General Rising, which is evident he pursued to his last, did not at all affect him, because this might become any heretic Christian drawn in Armour by the Pencil of the Author of Julius; and is not unlike to the Practices of the ancient Chirillians, so basely disguised by the same Author.

If then the Facts whereof the Lord Ruffell was found Guilty by the Jury, upon such pregnant Proof, be evident, how is it possible for a dying Man, before God and Men, to assert his Innocency with such Assurance, and so frequently repeated in his Speech to the Sheriff, though short, yet twice repeated? 1. A God knows how far I was always from a Design against the King's Person, or of altering the Government. 2. I protest I know of no Plot, either against the King's Life, or the Government.

In the Paper delivered, it is thus expressed: 'Whatever Approaches I gave I had of Popery, and of my own fervent and heavy Share I was like to have under it, when it should prevail, I never had a Thought of doing any Thing against it, basely or inhumanly, but what could consist with the Christian Religion, and the Laws and Liberties of this Kingdom.' Again: 'I have always loved my Country much more than my Life, and never had any Design of changing the Government; and would have suffered any Extremity, rather than have consented to any Design to take away the King's Life.' In another Place, he thinks God his Part was honest, and well meant, and affirms his Crime to be but a Design of Treason at most; and asserts, 'I did intend of the Crime of Treason at most; for I do not think I was guilty of any other Crime, or of Treason.' In the last Place, he concludes: 'As I never had any Design against the King's Life, or the Life of any Man whatsoever, so I never was in any Controversy of altering the Government.'

Half an Eye may see these Strokes are all drawn by the same Hand, with all imaginable Skill, to quash the Conscience of a dying Criminal; and at the same Time, by calling a Mill before the Eyes of the unthinking Multitude, to pollute them with the Innocency of the condemned Person, and the Cruelty of the Government towards him. Let it be considered with what careful Reflections and Lamentations his Innocency is asserted in: That he knew of no Plot or Design against the Person of the King, or to kill the King, or to alter or change the Government: That he never had a Thought of doing any Thing basely or inhumanly, but what could consist with the Christian Religion, and the Laws and Liberties of this Kingdom: That his Crime was but Misprision of Treason at most, and so he is innocent of the Crime he stands condemned for. What need of all these Cautions, Restrictions, and evasive Circumlocutions, to a plain Man, at the Hour of his Death, to express his Innocency by? If it had been real, a few plain Words would have done it better; viz. That he was not engaged in, nor knew of, any Design of making an Insurrection or Rebellion within the Kingdom. He heard the Proof made, and knew that was the Crime laid to his Charge, which is High-Treason, both as Common Law, and within the fifth Branch of 25 E. III. But that was too clear a Matter for a dying Man plainly to deny, his Conscience must have controlled him.

And let every Man understand the Subtlety of that Paper in Declaration of the Lord Ruffell's Innocency, with such Restrictions, and so necessary to be known, that there were two Parts in this horrid Design: one was a General Rising, managed by a select Council, whereas the Confederates, according to their different Principles, had their different Ends; some were for a Commonwealth, though the fewer in Number; others were for continuing the Monarchy and Government, but with Exclusion of his Royal Highness. Of this latter Sort were the Duke of Monmouth, and the Lord Ruffell, who plainly sets down in the Paper the Duke of Monmouth's Opinion of him, That they were both of a Temper. And the Lord Ruffell gives his Opinion of himself, That his Ensigns of the Master of the Bill of Exclusion had no small Influence in his project's Success: Though opposed by him with great Reflection upon the Government, yet it truly seems to have been the natural Cause of those Extravagances he was led into, by Zeal in that Matter transporting him to seek that by Force, which the King had before denied in a Court of Parliament.

The other Part of the Plot was downright assassinating of the King and the Duke of York; this was managed by a Council of Ruffians, who, according to their Principles, judged this the most expeditious and safest Way to secure the General Rising, and render it more effectual. This was made out beyond all peradventure by many Witnesses at the Trials of Captain Wolton and Hove, the latter whereof, besides the Proofs against him, confessed himself to be one of the Number who had engaged themselves to kill the King. For this latter heinous Fact of killing and assassinating, the Lord Ruffell was not accused thereof, nor any Proof offered to make it out.

And therefore his Request of President of his Innocency, as to any Plot or Design upon the King's Life, or to kill the King, or his knowing any thing thereof, and of his Abhorrence thereof, as an inhuman, base, vile, and barbarous Act, (which Epithets the Paper gives to that fact) Paris, are no plain Declarations of his Innocency as to the Crime charged and proved upon him, of conspiring and consulting to raise an Insurrection within the Kingdom.

And 'tis evident, by the Lord Ruffell's restraining the Expression of his Innocency to the Design upon the King's Life, and to killing of the King, and entering to mention the General Rising, which was fully proved upon him, that the Lord Ruffell intended only that Crime for which Hove and Wolton were condemned, of assassinating the King.

The other Restriction of his Innocency, as to any Design for Alteration, or Change of the Government, which he asserted the best in the People themselves have looked on, and examined his Evidence, by their late open and avowed Violations of our Rights, Liberties, and their late House of Commons will vindicate the Liberties of former Parliaments, and discharge your Petitioner from any necessary and scandalous Judgments, and the unjust Imprisonment of your Petitioner.

Your Petitioner doth therefore most humbly beg your Lordships and your Honours, to take this opportunity to lay out your goodness and tender Consideration, and to give your justest Orders, as your Lordships and your Honours graciously will, Justice and Goodwill shall from me.

And your Petitioner shall ever pray, &c.

In the House of Peers, on the Fifth day after the Judgment against THOMAS OATES.

Die Sabbato, 25 Marti, 1689.

WE differ, for these Reasons:

1. For that the Kings Bench, being a Temporal Court, made it Part of the Judgment, that John Oates, being a Clerk, should for his said Perjury be deprived of his Canonical and Priestly Habit, and be forever disabled all his Life; which is a Matter wholly out of their Power, belonging to the Ecclesiastical Courts only.

2. For that the said Judgments are barbarously inhuman and unchristian, and there is no Precedent to warrant the Punishments of Whipping and Committing to Prison for Life, for the Crime of Perjury; in which yet was but one Part of the Punishments that were inflicted upon him.

3. For that the particular Matters upon which their Indiscretions were founded, were the Points objected against Mr. John Oates by his Testimony, in several of the Trials in which he was allowed to be a good and credible Witness, though testified against him by most of the same Persons who testified against him upon their two Indiscretions.

4. For that this will be an Encouragement and Allowance for giving the like barbarous, illegal, and cruel Judgments hereafter, unless this be reversed.

5. Because Sir John Holt, Sir Henry Pollock, the two Chief Justices, and Sir Robert Atkins, Chief Baron, with for Judges some (being all that were then present) for their and many other Reasons, did before us solemnly deliver their Opinions, and unanimously declare, that the said Judgments were contrary to Law and ancient Precedents, and therefore erroneous, and ought to be reversed.

6. Because it is contrary to the Declaration of the twelfth of February last, which was ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons then assembled, and by their Declaration engrossed in Parliament, and enrolled among the Records in Parliament, and recorded in Chancery, it does appear, that excessive Bails ought not to be required, nor excessive Fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual Punishments inflicted.

Edmund Knott, in his Complete History of England, Vol. III. says, "On May the thirty-first the House of Lords having heard the Opinion of all the Judges concerning the illegality of two Judgments given against John Oates, upon the Point of Perjury, for which he had brought his Writs of Error, the House did this main Question propose, Whether the said two Judgments should be reversed? Which being resolved in the Negative, and the said Judgments confirmed, three Lords moved that their Discretions, for the before-mentioned Reasons, "That Perjury is a Crime (says the Bishop) looked to powerfully in the House of Lords, that the following Day their Lordships, after hearing Counsel at the Bar, to argue the Errors assigned by Oates, did order and adjudge, That the Judgment given against the said Oates should be reversed: And Leave was given for the bringing in a Bill for the reversing Perjury brought from the Procurator which might come from his Majesty. A Bill of Reversal passed the Lower House: And upon a second Reading in the Upper, there were several Amendments made, and a Proviso inserted, whereby it was declared, That none of the said Oates for which the said Oates was committed for Perjury, were heard and determined in Parliament, the said Oates should not be received in any Court or Judge without first being by a Writ. Against which Proviso and Amendment a Petition was moved, by the Earls of Oxford, Devon, Devonshire, Montagu, Manchester, Bedford, Somerset, and Suffolk, and the Lords Newcastle, Berkeley, Cornwallis, Paget, and Mordaunt. When the Bill was sent back to the Commons, they disagreed to the Amendments: Upon which a memorable Conference began between the two Houses on July the twenty-ninth, which occasioned great Heat, that might have risen into greater Flames, if the Parliament had not been suddenly adjourned. And all that Oates was able to obtain in this Session was only, on June the sixth, an Address from the Lords, at the Commons Desire, requesting his Majesty, That whereas Thomas Oates, Clerk, had formerly received a private Punishment, for the Perjury whereof he had been formerly convicted, and that of the said Punishment would still be continued upon him, unless they should be removed by His Majesty, His Majesty would be graciously pleased to grant His Petition in the said Oath. The King readily complied with the Lords Desire: And moreover, as soon as, by their Lordships Order, Oates was discharged from his Commitment, his Majesty received him into his Protection, and allowed him a considerable Pension; which occasioned various Reflections."

Informations and Examinations, taken upon Oath before a Committee of the House of Lords, appointed to inspect who were the Advisers and Prosecutors of the Murders of the Lord RUSSELL, Colonel SIDNEY, Sir THOMAS ARMSTRONG, Mr. CORNISH, and others*; whereof a Report was made by the Right Honourable the Earl of Stamford, upon the twentieth Day of December, 1689.

MR. John Phelps, Mr. Thomas Morris, Mr. Peter Hager, Mr. Robert Bates, Mr. Richard Hoyle, Mr. Horsey, and Mr. Griggs Graze, (all Persons of good Value and unspotted Reputations) being examined upon Oath, in relation to John Knott, deposed in Substance as follows, viz.

That Knott, three or four Days or a Week before his Discovery of the Protestation Plot, came into their Company at the Flow Tavern in Cornhill; where he appearing to be much disturbed and confused, one of their Company enquired of him, Why he seemed to be so disordered? To which he answered, That he lay under a great Temptation; for he was sent by the Lords in the Tower; and some Gentleman that came to him from them told him, his own Party had disabused him, and he had now an Opportunity to be revenged of them; that he could not be unfaithful of some Person that designed against the Government; and that if he would discover, he might make himself and his Family; that he had great Profers of Money, and a Place of a Hundred Pounds per Annum, and might go in a Coach and six Horses to Windsor: And that he was to meet those who treated with him again that Night, at the Ball-Hall Tavern near the Tower.

That upon Knott's talking at this Rate, one of the Company asked him, why he troubled them with this Discourse; and told him, if he knew any thing against the Government, he ought to discover it; but if he knew nothing, he would do well to keep out of such Temptations, and not go to the Meeting appointed: But he said he would go, because he had promised them in the Morning that he would meet them again; but declared that he knew nothing, and said that he acquainted them with it, because if he should be prevailed upon, by Temptation of Money, to witness any thing they should be able to witness against him, that he had declared that he knew nothing in Agitation against the Government; and that they should testify, that he was the greatest Rogue and Villain living, if he should swear against any Man.

Mr. Phelps (in particular) deposed, That he attended to have testified this at my Lord Raglan's Trial, but was not asked to do so in any other of the Trials, and did not appear unless desired; that he remembers not whether or no he knew of Knott's Trial before it was over; but that he knew not that Knott was a Witness against him till after the Trial was over.

Mr. Morris deposed, That he knew not that Knott was a Discoverer of a Plot till after Knott's Trial; but believes he acquainted Sir Will. Petyway what he heard Knott say before the Lord Raglan's Trial, and also told it to Mr. Jones; whereupon he was subpoenaed to that Trial, and went; but the Trial was not till three or four Days after the Time he was desired to attend; that a second Subpoena came the Night before the Trial, but he being from home did not receive it till after the Trial.

Mr. Hager deposed, That he thinks he knew Knott was a Witness against Charles Holat, but did not then offer himself to be a Witness, because Times were so difficult; but when he heard of my Lord Raglan's Trial, he acquainted his Lordship's Servant with what he has now sworn, and that he attended at the Trial, but Knott was no Witness.

Mr. Bow deposed, That he believes he told what he hath now sworn about Knott's Declaration at the Finch Tavern to twenty Persons, before the Lord Raglan's Trial; and that he heard Knott say, in the Ansford Coffee-house, It is reported that I have discovered a Plot of the Duke of Monmouth, my Lord Russell, and others; but I know nothing of it, and am innocent, and fully acquitted.

Mr. Hoyle deposed, That he remembers not that he spoke of what he has now sworn to any Person, for Times were such, he was afraid to speak of it.

of his Highness's Judge born of the Queen, and of their Wickedness, who have nullified and degraded, what I as innocent Prince in her Imposition. I am Love and Compassion that I have for my native Country, as well as Charity, engages me humbly to employ Almighty God to be merciful to us, and not to charge the guilt of a the public Account, and thus we may not further provoke his Justice, by our wilfully continuing in Error and Mistake. I beseech him to put it into the Hearts of the Lords, &c. at their next Meeting, to examine into that whole Matter, and (if before that Time this be published) to enquire after, call for, and, if possible, retrieve those Papers that were taken with me; whereby the Obsolete will most certainly be convicted, and the Ignorant informed, the Dashed confirmed, the Eyes of all opened, and a sacred mail important Truth made apparent to the whole World.

What I have next to impart, is not left material, I leave.

[But I do not think it a proper Time to publish what follows next, and therefore, according to the Will and Desire of my dear Friend, expressed in his following Letter, 'tis referred to a fitter Opportunity: and shall now only refer what he wrote in the relating to Mr. Elliot.]

But I must not end this Paper till I have done one Act more of Justice, as well as Charity, in behalf of my Fellow-Sufferer, Mr. Elliot, who was, as I do most sincerely believe, altogether ignorant, not only of the Contents of the Papers, but even of the Papers themselves, and noway concerned, but as a Passenger; and yet, if Providence had not prevented our being all tied together, as was intended, that virtuous Gentleman had most certainly lived in our Faces, for the Prince, even at my Trial, lay stronger against him than myself: For Captain Boly did then, upon Oath (unconsciously, I think) declare him to be much more concerned and importunate than I was, to have the Persecution thrown over-board; and yet singly from my being concerned, and speaking to him on that Subject, a preponderant Evidence (injustice, as it proved, with that Jury to find me guilty upon) was drawn, that I knew what was contained therein.

But I do most heartily forgive them, and pray to God, that this poor Gentleman, by getting of Time, may escape better, and that his innocent Blood may not be lost. And I hope these Words of a dying Man (though an legal Person) may have some Weight with an impartial, conscientious Jury (if such a Jury he can get), whenever as a brought to his Trial.

John Ashton.

[This Paper, &c. came in (as it was from Mr. Ashton, before his Execution, in the following Letter.)]

SIR,
KNOWING your Friendship and Fidelity, to your, and your only, as unto safe and secure (though distant) Hands, I recommend the inclosed Papers; which chiefly relates to myself, being the first Part, I design to leave with the Sheriff; nor shall I be anxious about his Disposal of it: But the following Paragraphs, that concern the Prince of Wales, and ———, I beg you to preserve as Jewels, and publish them, either Part or all (chiefly that about the Prince), whenever Time or Occasion seems to permit or require. And as to the French of either, you may be pleased to consult A. B.'s Advice; I doubt not that sooner or later they will all be useful. And that you may the more value them, I do most solemnly protest, I have been as careful in what I have asserted for Truth, as if I were now at God's dreadful Tribunal, where I expect suddenly to appear, and by his Mercy hope to hear that ravishing Sound, Come, ye blessed, &c.

What relates to Mr. Elliot, though I design to declare as much to some, as to his Trial may give it in Evidence, yet I thought it just to leave a Record of his Innocency under my Hand.

I have nothing to add, but to request your Prayers, That God, of his infinite Mercy, would support and strengthen me in my last Moments, and take to himself, Newgate, Jan. 27, 1692-93.

Sr, Yours,

John Ashton.

NUMBER XXXII.

*A true Account of the Behaviour, Confession, and last Dying Speech, of Captain HARRISON: Together with the Paper writ by his own Hand, and delivered to a Minister at the Place of Execution, on Friday the fifteenth of April, 1692.

[By Samuel Smith, Ordinary of Newgate.]

HENRY HARRISON found guilty of the wilful, barbarous Murder of Dr. Clerk. He was bred up a Lawyer's Clerk; afterwards he left himself to be a Trooper in the Lord Denham's Regiment. Upon the 10th of January last, he offered to dispute with me upon the Cause of his Condemnation: I declared that whatever he said, he would do it in the Presence of the Heart-Searching God, and as if he were at the Point of Death: He did profess he would do so. He said, that he had been arraigned before for Murder; but it was only found Misdemeanor: That he did not after this walk so circumspectly as he ought, but was guilty of prophesying the Jehovah, and many great Sins, which he lived in very securely; but that God by this Death had awakened him to call to Mind those great Sins which he had committed, saying, that God had strange Ways to bring Sinners to Repentance. Upon this I advised him sincerely to justify God, as righteous, in finding him out in his Iniquities; or else Death would be more terrible, and his eternal State very hazardous, if he now united with God, and did not ingeniously confess his sinful Course of Life. Hereupon he spoke very wisely of himself, as having been of a dissolute Life; that he seldom minded the Publick Worshipping of God, nor the private Duties of Religion; that he was a common Swearer in ordinary Discourse, and guilty of numerous Sins, that he never received the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, because it is an Obligation to amend an evil Life, which he being accustomed unto, he forgot the Sacrament, that he might not aggravate his Sin and future Condemnation. I told him, that his being unwilling to come under such a sacred Tie of Reformation, exposed him deeper into Satan's Snare of Temptation.

After that he freely acknowledged, that he had some acquaintance with Dr. Clerk, and too much Familiarity with the Woman to whom the Doctor lent Money; and that upon his not liking of the Security given for the Repayment, the Doctor would not forbear any longer: Harrison said, this did fret him, yet he used no threatening Words; and said, that if his Son had been accessory to his barbarous Murder, and himself knew it, he would discover him. Harrison made frequent Appeals to God, that he knew nothing of this Crime, in Thought, Word, or Deed. I replied,

That if he made any false Appeal to God, it would very much hazard his Salvation; yea, that this would bring his eternal Destruction upon him; and that his pretending to deny the Murder, would make him to be less credited; because two Persons who lately murdered their Wives, imprisoned themselves if they knew any thing of it, and yet, after an Hour's denying of it at the Place of Execution, confessed it at last. I told Mr. Harrison, that he would be an inveterate Atheist, if he should dare to die with an execrable Lye in his Mouth: He said, after all Advice, that he would at his Death deny that he knew any thing of the Murder of Dr. Clerk: He confessed, that he could not reflect on the Justice of the Court, nor the Leniency of the Jury in their Verdict, who had proceeded according to what was deposited against him; and that he expected that the Sentence of Death would pass upon him; yet he blames the Witnesses for their being so positive in their Allegations against him, when himself is clear of Murder in his Conscience: He said, that God had justly suffered a shameful Death to befall him, because he lived so long in an unhabited Course of Wickedness, without any Remorse for it till now.

This is all the Account I can give of Mr. Harrison; though I frequently, with others, sollied him to an ingenuous and free Confession of his Crime, assuring him, that if he durst die in the Denial of it, by any mental Retraction, or Equivocation, he would surely cast his Soul eternally.

A Copy of the Paper writ by Captain Harrison's own Hand, and delivered to a Minister at the Place of Execution.

NOW I am come here to die, the People expect a Speech and Confession; for the Words of dying Men always ought to be delivered by the Survivors. I thank God, I am not an Atheist, nor a Man that makes Equivocations or mental Retractions; but was educated in the Protestant Religion. The greatest Grief I have (next unto my offending my great and gracious God) is that of my Relapse; for so Dissolute was ever as the Family before, (but I pray God give them Comfort) being all of them People of Reputation, as is well known to a great many Chances of a better Decodion, with a Tincture of Myrrh and Aloes; during which, I can safely say, I never heard any such Complaint, though I have purposely enquired.

Your Citation of Mr. Boyle's Citation from Wallius, if Master of Fact, might be prepossessing: And as to his finding the same diverse Times, how diligent I ever he might be, farther than draw myself unconvinced to him, by saying 'his tale, I shall turn Sceptique, and disprove my self till I am better satisfied: And, I protest I cannot live, if there was an Admission of Air, through Pores much smaller than those made by the longer Sort of Peas, into the Cavity of the Chest, how Respiration could be carried on. And I must needs think, that Dr. Boyle's Remark upon the Trial is very pertinent; where he tells us, There is a great Providence in such a Texture; for if (such be) there were any large Pores in this Membrane, the Air would pass through into the Cavity of the Thorax, and prevent the Distention of the Lungs, and consequently there would be an End of Breathing.

But that I might put this Master yet further out of Controversy, being willing to be made sensible of the utmost Effects of a drowning Creature, and the Relief of the most violent Struggles it could make to save itself, I sent for a Dog, and left you should find Fault had I made use of a Tube, I intended the Use of a Driller's Back, which, if I may call it so, is a Sort of Trough, containing in Dimension thirty Feet of Length, and half as much of Breadth: Into this, when filled with Water, I caulked the Animal so he cull, having before ordered his Fore-Foot to be tied together.

By the Force of the Fall he was plunged over Head and Ears, and after rising up again, made to the Side as well as he could; and though several Times repulsed, continued struggling, and by the Liberty of his Hind-Foot often raised his Head above the Water: Upon which, being no Likelihood of his being drowned under a very long Time, I ordered him to be taken out, and his Hind-Foot also to be fastened together. Thus he was a second Time thrown in, and continued struggling, sometimes up, and sometimes down: Water, reaching his Head and Neck, in a Quarter of an Hour's Time his Navel flared, and from there there was a visible Protrusion of the Intestines: Having thus continued while he had the Liberty of an imperfect Respiration, it was half an Hour before he had done struggling; after which, under Water he gaped several Times. When done, I left him, and returned five Hours after; at which Time I desired he might be taken out with his Head erected, that we might lose no Water.

I think, if it had been possible, I had Reason in this Case to expect Water in the two Cavities, i. e. the Thorax and the Abdomen, which seemed much terrified; but was so far from it, that upon the opening the Foramen, without an Inundation, I found not a Drop of Water; and even the small Arteries had received very little, if any at all from the Pulmones. What was contained in the Stomach was much short of half a Pint, or little more than four or five Ounces. Having raised the Sternum, we perceived the Thorax, in like Manner as the Abdomen, perfectly clear of Water. Out of the Windpipe there issued a spongy Matter, and the whole of what we perceived from its Raniscium was about three Ounces.

Thus, Sir, have I given you a faithful History of the Fact; but if you think the Experiment was made clandestinely, or that the Dog was made strange before thrown into the Water, as you justly intimate about Mr. Cropper's Experiments, for your further Satisfaction, you may be assured of Mr. Harcourt without Hypocrite, of Thomas Simpson, Esq. Gentleman Porter to the Tower of London, Mr. John Lincolns, Surgeon, with sundry other Physicians, as honest and just as I. But to proceed.

See Page 491. Water is not frequently found in the Cavity of the Abdomen as in the Thorax.

It may be so; but if the Stomach, Guts, &c. in the former, and the Lungs in the latter, continue firm and found, (as is reported they were in Mr. Simpson) I cannot see how it should happen to be found in either. I must confess, I have never seen it, nor was there any thing like it in my late Experiment. If the Fibres are perished, I should not wonder at it; but if otherwise, I should be thankful to your microscopical Anatomist to show me how or which way it should enter.

As soon as the Lungs, Stomach, &c. are full of Water, the Body naturally sinks. Page 491.

I suppose the Idem includes the Thorax and Abdomen, as well as the Guts; but though the Lungs, Stomach, and the Idem are full of Water, in the Sense of Fulness here meant, I deny that the Body will always sink, as having been the contrary, and can bring Proof of the same.

Page 491. It is observable (you say) that human Bodies after Death admit no Water, inasmuch as soon as Death falls a Man, the Spiritus Maje in all Parts do naturally contract themselves.

How it is in human Bodies I cannot say, having made no Experiment of that Kind; but that it is always so in other Animals, I deny, and indeed can see no Reason why it should not be admitted for a parallel Case: For though you say, the Spiritus Maje do contract themselves, yet the Epiglot does open; so that unless the Tongue, and Palate, by their Constriction, or some other Cause, make already in the Windpipe, intercept the Passage, what Windings, as a superfluous Portion of the Body, but that some small Quantity of Water may slip within the Rima? But whether or not the Spiritus do always naturally contract themselves before Death, may be disputed; as they sometimes labour at that Time with such a Paralysis, as occasions a Relaxation of their nervous Fibres, and forces them involuntarily to let go their Contents: That nothing is more common than to dying Animals, whether rational or irrational (if soon before they did not exonerate) to let fall their Urine and satiate their Feces.

That I might inform myself whether the Water would get into a dead Body, I caulked a Dog to be suffocated over the Furnace of a spongyous Liqueur, prepared for Diffusion, in the Time of its Fermentation; and though his Neck was held some little Distance from the Surface, yet it sufficed him to Death in two or three Minutes Time; after this he was thrown into the Water, and sunk presently to the Bottom, where he lay several Hours. Being carefully taken out, I opened his Throat, and found the Epiglot (as is always usual) raised from the Windpipe, which inclining downwards, there was discharged about three Spoonfuls of pale Water.

Page 491. The immediate floating of human Bodies, thrown dead into the Water, I believe to be very uncertain; and whoever goes about to establish it for an infallible Hypothesis, I must needs think very rash, if not guilty of a downright Folly: For, though your Seamen should tell me a thousand idle Stories, I know there are so many Causes that may alter the Case, that it would be very ridiculous to credit to hold an Assertion. I cannot say, I have as yet tried the Experiment on a human Body, but of their other Animals (both alive and dead when thrown into the Water) which I have made use of, there was but one which floated, and that I thought most likely to be found at the Bottom, as having received most Water into the Lungs and Stomach. If the dead Body of an animal Person should not sink, it might from Strangeness: On the other Hand, if that of a purely symmetrical should not float, it would be equally a Wonder.

Page 492. If the Person died in the very Act of Inspiration, the Lungs (you say) will be full of Air, &c.

Here, Sir, you must give me Leave to think you very much out of the Way, for unless in the Case of some very sudden and violent Death, I am apt to believe all Persons finish their Lives at the Act of Expiration, and even in the most sudden, leaving aside that of Strangling by a Ligateur, where the Air is forcibly included, and its Passage from the Windpipe intercepted, I make it a Question, whether the last Motion of the Lungs is not that of its Sympole or Contraction: For although to common Appearance, a Man in other Causes may be thought to be inspirating, and from perfectly dived of Sense and Motion, yet by laying any polished or diaphanous Body on the Mouth and Nostrils, there is often seen a Damp contracted on the face, which is nothing but the Air insensibly proceeding out of the Lungs, and considered on the Surface of the said Body.

'Tis the general Opinion that each given Rite to that very common Expression, when he would signify the Death of a Friend, by saying, He expired, or halt expired out his Self. But admit the Assertion good, of expiring in the Act of Inspiration, it will not follow that any dying Person can take a breath Part of the Air he did in perfect Health; and to consequently cannot fill his Lungs with Air: For, not to instance in all other Persons, who at all Times take but little Air, by reason of the Obstructions of the Bronchia; and are therefore forced upon quick Breathing; it is very unusual to believe, that immediately before Death the coarctive Fibres are much weakened, the Blood begins to stagnate in all Parts, and being carried by the Arteries only into the Lungs faster than drawn off by the Pulmones into the left Ventricle of the Heart, a great Part of the pulmonary Cells are so filled that they can admit but little Air: so that the Quantity of what we take in perfect Health, and that which we receive dying, is vastly disproportionate.

By filling the Thorax with the same Air forced into the Windpipe, unless you mean filling the Lungs in the Thorax, it seems as Kin to the Jargon of filling the Thorax with Water out of the Lungs. For my Part, I have fewer Times, through a Tube, blown with as great Force as I could into the Lobes of the Lungs, and caulked at the Gate time a lighted Candle to be held near their Extremities, and round about them; I never could perceive the least Motion of the Flame, whereby I might conjecture the Air had any Vent: So that I must think it impossible that either Air or Water, whilst dear Tessie continues firm, can insinuate itself into the Cavity of the Ventricle, still you can bring me some of the dissent Wallius's Gentlemen, that have Peers in the inviolable Membrane of their Lungs at big as the longer Sort of Peas.

Page 42. I think it very likely, that a dead Body will be more buoyant in salt than in fresh Water: But your Experiment I take to be inconclusive, for unless you had had that a Slip will sink some Inches lower in a Sea of fresh Water than in one of Salt, your Adversary may object, that the Reason of the lower sinking in the Tissot, may perhaps be as much owing to the Want of Depth, as Salt.

The Discrepancy of the Physicians is best perceived by reading over the Trial: Some Part of the Disagreement, as I remember, did consist in this, That whereas on the King's Part, it was affirmed, the Lungs of Mrs. Stone were firm and found, and the least Appearance of Water in the Thorax; for the Prosecutor, Mr. Cropper, it was replied, That in the inviolable Membrane of the Lungs was found, it was ridiculous to expect Water in the Chest, their Enclature.

Again, for the King, it was thought impossible that any Person thrown alive into the Water, should be drowned without swallowing or taking in a great Quantity of the same into the Stomach, and other Cavities; whereas, for the Prosecutor, it was thought very possible two or three Ounces might be sufficient to drown any submerged Person. And this leads me to a Passage in the last cited Page, where I find you much concerned, that Mr. Cropper's Physicians should strenuously urge, that so small a Quantity of Water was sufficient for this Purpose: Which you say they grounded on a private Experiment on a Dog half-hanged, you telling us to think that there were Artifices in the Case; and indeed to doubt it, if I were sure they had half-hanged him: But, Sir, you were told so in your Sleep, it may happen to be false; or not, I think you are but little obliged to any Person, who was so officious as to tell you an Untruth. However, that you may not be told of any Artifice made use of in my Experiments, I shall refer you to the affidavit Mr. Simpson: He is a Gentleman very curious in their Enquiries, a Man of unquestionable Probity, and very well known in our City of London.

In his Presence, with divers others, I caulked a Dog, who had been kept falling almost twenty Years, to be plunged under Water, without suffering him to rise: When he had been dead some Time, I took him with his Head erected, that we might not lose a Drop of Water he had taken in.

Having made a Ligature on the Gale, I turned down the Larynx, and with a moderate Pressure there was discharged of Water, mixed with a Sputum or Froth, about four large Spoonfuls.

After this I came to the Stomach, which I perceived to be very lax and flaccid, when cutting into it, there was not a Drop of Water to be usually inferred: Dead Bodies thrown into Water, I am satisfied, will sink; and drowned Bodies sometimes will not. But as to the Case before us, in plan that some of those who viewed the Body gave a different Relation from some others. Thus some of them said the dead float, though it was under Water; whilst others, who should know best, being the Parish-Officers, and employed by the Coroner to take her out, deposed that the Body lay half a Foot under Water; and that, for any thing they could perceive, her feet might touch the Bottom; and farther, that when she was hauled up, there were several Sticks and Flags on which she rested: But without all this, Sir, I think it very natural for a dead Body, which is always buoyant in a Current four or five Feet deep, by the bare Force of the Stream, when it meets with a flaming Opposition, to be raised from the Bottom.

Page 494. Thirdly, Because her Body was not at all fresh.
Nor was it at all necessary, though drowned, that it should.

Fourthly, Because the Water came out of her when lifted out of the Water, was judged from her efforts and the Water.

This, with Submission, is a Mistake: For the there is no Quantity of Water taken notice of as due from her, yet it is agreed on both Sides, that she did purge at the Mouth and Nostrils; some say more, others less. The two Principal, who took her out, and stood by for some time afterwards, do affirm, that the Froth came out after such a Manner as to run down the Sides of the Face, and that as it was wiped off, fresh Froth came profusely on again; which Dr. Grew does affirm could not have happened, had she been strangled, or otherwise killed, before. Whether this be so or not, I believe it very possible, when little Water is received (and very little will suffice to drown a Person), if there be no great a Purgation at the Mouth and Nostrils, most, if not all the Water may be turned into a fermenting Matter, as last is much, that there will be no absolute Necessity for Water to run out upon the Motion of the Body afterwards.

Fifthly, Because her Limbs were not purged.
After the Weeks Time I should indeed have expected Purification from the Pores under Ground, that had not been embalmed, without Regard to Water taken into the Body; which, whether or no it had been Purification, is very disputable: What it may do under the Earth, I know not; but I much question, whether dead Flesh, covered over with Water, will grow purged to such a degree as that which is exposed to the immediate Contact of the Air. On this I shall be able to say more in a little time, and for the present leave it as a Problem undecided.

Sixthly, From the several different Setups of Blood, washed in drowned Persons.

Upon the Trial, it is affirmed by Mr. Conda, that both Mr. Douglas and himself having viewed the Body, did give in as their Opinion to the Coroner, that there were no other Settlements or Stagnations of the Blood, than what may usually happen to drowned Bodies: Mr. Conda instances in the Child for one; but whether that were so or not, I am perceived myself on the Supposition of a drowned Body, nor do I for why it may not be found on the Neck and Breast, as soon as on other Parts.

Page 495. Seventhly, From the unusual Disfigurement Mrs. Gurney was found in, both in Mind and Body, especially that she would not discover it, till she was almost frightened out of her Senses, by the Force, as she thought, of Mrs. Smart, who asked her Words, Douglas, several things.

If Mrs. Gurney was disturbed in Mind, it would seem strange that she should not be disturbed in Body; the latter being, as I suppose, seldom or never easily withheld the former in under Trouble or Disfigurement. But whether Mrs. Gurney's mighty Disfigurement had other Rise than a Whim of the Brain, founded upon a strong Propensity of Fancy, may very reasonably be questioned: For my Part, I look on it as natural for a dejected, ignorant old Woman to be terrified with the Disfigure of her own Imagination, before-hand prevented by too deep Reflection, though the same has nothing but a Chimera to support it, that I am never startled when I hear of their Pretences to Visions and Revelations. These you know are not unfrequent, though more peculiar to a delirious Soul. So that if such such Persons happen to be first frightened that any thing may be so, they need not but afterwards, for a Confirmation that it is so.

Had you not already acquainted us with the Weakness of your last self, and your Incapacity, &c. I should have been startled that a Man of Learning and solid Judgment should build on the idle Fancies of a decrepit old Woman. I think, how greatly fewer he might be disturbed by the Brain, founded upon a strong Propensity of Fancy, may very reasonably be questioned: For my Part, I look on it as natural for a dejected, ignorant old Woman to be terrified with the Disfigure of her own Imagination, before-hand prevented by too deep Reflection, though the same has nothing but a Chimera to support it, that I am never startled when I hear of their Pretences to Visions and Revelations. These you know are not unfrequent, though more peculiar to a delirious Soul. So that if such such Persons happen to be first frightened that any thing may be so, they need not but afterwards, for a Confirmation that it is so.

Could I believe all to be true that the Gurneys swore, I should make us Question of the Likelihood of these Men's Guilt: But that they did flinch in some things, is very easy to believe, by some Particulars at the Trial; and by their Behaviour before, at, and after the same, we have great Inducements to persuade us that they did so in others. Thus it is proved that Gurney himself went out of the Court in a boiling way, to sell some of his Acquaintance, that he had done Gurney's Business, or so that Effect. And at another time he said, that if Mr. Gurney had visited old Mrs. Smart, none of this Trouble had befallen him. Another thing discloses the Malice of the Prosecution, in that though themselves suspected Mrs. Smart's Mind, yet this was not to be taken Notice of, for fear of taking off her Evidence. And if her Wife could so readily turn the Fifty Shillings Mr. Mayne had into Fifty Pounds, furnished to be paid him for murdering Mr. Sarah Smart at Harford; the might by the same kind of improvement, or by a Mistake, undo all the rest.

It seems indeed to me the most notorious Absurdity that can be imagined, that had their Men really come down on such a Design, they should go directly to tell their Landlady, Mrs. Smart's Business was done; they had paid her counting Days, and that one of them had received Fifty Pounds for doing her Business.

In Matters of this Nature, where we can have nothing but idle Stories and an Old Wife's Dream, to mislead the Suggestion, I am very highly behoves us, before we pass our Sentence, to pay just regard to the Character and Reputation of the Persons. Thus, indeed, there is no more impossible for Mr. Gurney to clear himself in the Opinion of every one, as he knows something of him, yet I am ready to think, there are some who know him, at all some particular Persons, that upon any Trial, would be ready to give evidence in his Favour: In that Case, will you not think, that it could be hazardous to leave his Hands in the Court, and to leave the Court to be persuaded by one thousand Pounds, to mislead the Suggestion, and to leave the other Persons, to decide they live a Crime, and to leave the other Characters well satisfied, and not one of them to be misled, to make an Affidavit for the Loss of Five hundred Pounds?

Page 495. Ninthly, From the Sentiments of some of the Gentlemen, who were present at the Trial.
I must needs think, that on so formal an Indictment, and on so great a Crime charged on them, such a Court must be very attentive, especially when Mrs. Gurney's Tale had been so long, and so full of Aggravation; I do not know, for publick Satisfaction, and for the sake of the Jury, as you call them, I wish you had named some of them who did believe her murdered after the Trial: I am assured that some of them have openly declared, they thought the Gentleman who speak of had been too much abused, that the Professor's Evidence, if it was not true, was at least too much in it, was little enough to make them Repentant.

As to the Letters produced in Court, your Testimony seems to say, that they are not of a desperate, but a furious Man. And why?

Is the Author of the Harford Letter not an extraordinary, or perhaps no Knowledge at all of her, but takes every thing on Trust from her Friends and Relations; he is not to be so positive, that the Style does so very fast her Character. It is by Style, as the World generally is understood, you mean the Order of her Thoughts, as the Manner of her Expression, you must own she might have Sense enough to be the Author of these Compositions. But I find you make too bold with the Utter of Words, and take them so differently from other learned Men, that in some Places it occasions a little Difficulty to understand you. If by Style then, as I imagine, you would signify the Subject of the Discourse, or the Matter of the Composition, I have more Reason to think, that I will at present make nothing of these Letters, do well enough for her Character: work from that know her. And I must tell you, that I am ready to believe, had her Mother been asked the Question some Months before she died, when she had some Words with her on her Evening at the Garden, or about the Time when Theophilus was first set to repose her, about her falling from the Light; I say, at these Times I can't think her Mother would have denied but that these Letters might have been written by her Character. However, she is now out of a Capacity to defend herself; and upon that Account it might seem ill with Contempt to tread upon her Affairs: I shall therefore say no more, but that I would not have you too busy with the Character, left you should happen to make good an old Proverb.

Page 496. The Mother shall affirm, the Letters shown in Court were of a foolish Character, than ever her Mother or Daughter was to write, neither did Mr. Smart show such a regard.

Would it not have been very odd, if the Mother and Brother, who came to secure the Reputation of so near a Relation (though never so well fortified that it was her Hand), should have said otherwise than they did? For my part, I take both their Answers to be so unsatisfactory, not to say foolish, that nothing but the Relation they were speaking for can plead their Excuse.

The Mother being asked by the Judge, whether she thought it was her Daughter's Hand? replies only, How should I know? I know for now no fact, perhaps her Hand may be satisfied. Being questioned again, what she would say to it if it had been written in a more sober Style? she answers, I shall say as to her Hand, which I had first her own.

The Brother being interrogated on the same Question, says, That he is his Sister's Hand: But being asked if he did believe it was her Hand? he replies, No. And why? Because it does not suit her Character. Now let the World judge, if this contains any more than if the Mother had said, Because she was my Daughter, or the Brother, because she was my Sister, we won't believe it, left the World should look on her to have been a bad Woman.

Page 497. Three were as Mr. Smart made of these Letters, all the Common Report of her being with Child (which had been industriously spread abroad by several, but by none more credulously than by a Naval Quaker, her former Admirer) was proved to be false, &c.

These Letters were taken notice of to furnish as the Report of her being with Child, it was very early, so that that Morning she was taken out of the Water, it was whispered in the Country, and at Night I heard from some in London, that they believed it very likely for her to be with Child; and that to prevent the ensuing Infamy her had made herself away. This was no more than what is generally suspected, when a single Gentlewoman is by any means accessory to her own Death. So that without Dispute, if the common Quaker had not been concerned in it, the Report would have spread without him. But I judge this Epithet is bestowed on him, not so much for that he thought and reported her to be with Child, which hundreds did besides him at that time, but because he was so very officious to prove her Hand in his Receipt.

This may indeed be thought a monstrous Indignation from him, as he had been her former Admirer. And I think if her Hand-writing could have been proved without his Appearance, he should have been shamed still. However, I would not have you to say any thing at him, since I don't find that he got any thing more by it, than that his Judge returned that he was one of their own Side. And as for this only he said he was a Naval Quaker, I could tell you of some that have had great Part to act in this Prosecution, that are as far from being such Quakers (it to be so is a Perfection) as Mr. Smart.

Page 498. Mr. Martin and Mr. Archer as the Trial passed, that Mr. Cooper deposed, that Mrs. Smart was a madly Frying, &c.

When

And yet at his Trial both he and his Witnesses pretended to know her to be melancholy as was near to a Delirium. And this Depth of Melancholy, he would impute as for love of him, and therefore the drowned herself.

Now what can be more contradictory, or more fully prove that which he speaks at his Trial to be false, than this which he himself did swear? And this was witnessed by two of the Counsel's Inquest, and several more would have done the same, if they had been suffered to speak; but, as the Trial relates, they were stopped.

Many Observations might be made, and Inferences given, to clear her Reputation, and to prove the Falseness of what was said upon her; as, in particular, her so earnestly loving a young Woman an Acquaintance of hers, who had kept her Company that Afternoon, and used to lie with her sometimes, to stay and be with her that Night her Death was; and her telling her, she could not well fly then, she engaged her to come and dine with her the next Day, and told her what was for Dinner, desiring her Company all Day after, the not intending to go from home; which she promised to do.

And it is very observable, from the Beginning of the Trial to the End, what Shifts and Devices he is forced to make use of to drift out the Time, that there might not be enough for the Witnesses on the other Side to be heard; and also his endeavouring to baffle the Evidence against him; as first, above twenty Involuntary Quells as he asked her Maid about Poison, which he brought to poison a mischievous Dog which haunted the House; and if he could not find a Means to confound and put her out, if he had not had Truth on her Side, and gladly would have picked something out of it, if he could have told what.

Also, the many impertinent Witnesses he calls to prove his Intention to lodge at Bedford's that Night her Death was, and sending for his Bag, &c. and folding his Things there; which is seems was not at all expected by them. For John Bedford's Wife said, upon her Oath, she believed Edward Gwyer did not intend to lodge at her House; but was surprised when he first to her, between Eleven and Twelve o'clock at Night, to get his Bag ready, and came before it was quite dark.

And the next Night after, when he was sent for by the Counsel's Inquest to give an Account where he left her, he said, in the Parlour where we sit. And being asked, if he did not hear her bid her Maid warm his Bed? He said, I thought he had meant her own Bed. But it is very unlikely that he would go to Bed and leave him sitting there, or that when he went out he should fly still, and not light him to the Door. But if it were as he says, that he left her in the Parlour, for a Man of his Education and Figure in the World to go away at that time of Night, when he knew there was a Fire in his Chamber, and his Bed was a warning, and let himself out in the Dark, and say nothing, is not a little extraordinary, looks very darkly.

And then his sending for his Horse three times, to her Mother's House the Night after her Death, before he was examined by the Counsel's Inquest, and would have gone out of Town then, if he could have got him, as he confessed to the Lord Chief Justice Holt; but at the Trial he said, I sent for him, for fear the Lord of the Manor should come home.

Also, when it was taken notice of at his Trial, by the Counsel, that he never came after that Night her Death was, to give her Mother any Account where he left her, or so any wife to give her Satisfaction, so this he answered, It might be strange for me to come and visit a Woman that I never had the least Knowledge of: And yet he had several times lodged at her House when her Husband was living. And that Night also, that he was examined by the Counsel's Inquest, when she asked him, If he disowned her Daughter as he melancholy? He said, No; only he thought she was not to live in Discomfort at Dinner as sometimes he had from her; for most of the Discomfort was between her Mother and him. Surely he will be hard put to it to reconcile himself in this Discomfort.

And it is very remarkable, what great Diffimulation he manifested at that time, for in his Discomfort, he taking Occasion to speak of the People called Quakers, he expressed his great Love for them, and for their Principles, that if ever he changed his Religion, he said, it should be for them: Notwithstanding he denied them in much at his Trial, about their being by Education entitled to the Light within.

Thus, as first, upon the whole Matter, it may be concluded, That the Defence he had made for himself and his three Gentlemen, and the most material Things he made use of, whereby they got off, and were acquitted, were proved false out of his own Mouth before he went out of the Court; as it may be seen in the Trial, where the Counsel for the King says thus:

"My Lord, we insist upon it, that this is a different Evidence from what Mr. Gwyer gave to the Counsel's Inquest; for then he said, he knew none she was in love with, nor any Cause why she should do such an extravagant Action as to drown herself: But now he would make the whole scheme of Things turn upon a Love-Fit." And then he moved the Court to give Leave to call several Persons of Quality and good Reputation, who were there present, to speak to her Reputation, in Contradiction to the Letters produced; declaring, that he believed the whole Town would do the same. The Judge said, they would grant that; and did not question it. So there was leave permitted to say any thing to that Purpose.

NUMBER XXXIV.

A STATE of the PROCEEDINGS in the House of Commons, with Relation to the Impeached Lords: And what happened thereupon between the Two Houses (a).

Refused.

Sabbath, 15 die Februarii, 1700.

THAT an Humble Address be presented to His Majesty, That he will be pleased to order all the Treaties that have been made between His Majesty and any other Prince or State since the late War, to be laid before this House.

Ordered, That the said Address be presented to his Majesty, by such Members of this House as are of his Majesty's most Honourable Privy-Council.

Martin, 18 die Februarii, 1700.

Mr. Secretary Parns acquainted the House, That their Address having been presented to his Majesty, That he would be pleased to order all the Treaties that have been made between his Majesty and any other Prince or State since the late War to be laid before this House; his Majesty had been pleased to give Order, That they should be copied, and that they either the Originals or Copies, as the House pleased, should be laid before them.

Martin, 4 die Martii, 1700.

Mr. Secretary Parns presented to the House Copies of several Treaties, and Translations thereof.

And the Schedule or List of them was read, and is as follows: viz.

1. A Copy of the French King's Ratification of the Treaty of Partition.
2. The Translation of the same.
3. A Copy of the Ratification of the Separate Article.
4. The Translation of the same.
5. A Copy of the Ratification of the Secret Article.
6. A Translation of the same.
7. A Copy of the French King's Declaration upon the Treaty of Partition.
8. A Translation of the same.

Ordered, That all the Proceedings which relate to the Impeachment, and what happened thereupon between the House of Lords and House of Commons, be examined by the Journals, and printed.

In Vol. V. p. 136. are inserted, Proceedings in Parliament against William, Earl of Portland, John Lord Somers, Edward Earl of Oxford, and Charles Lord Halifax, who were impeached at the High Court and Chancery, on an oath against John Lord Mordaunt, for Words spoken at a Conference between the Lords and Commons, 1701. With this it is observable that those are the Proceedings as published by the Order of the House of Lords only: These have selected are what were published by Order of the House of Commons; which are printed in Vol. V. but for what Reason no one can tell, when Partiality: For as the Commons were the Prosecutors first their Evidence, and the Commons they were upon, ought not to have been omitted.

House,

Houses, from Time to Time, with the State and Progress of those Negotiations, into which His Majesty has entered, pursuant to the Address of this House:

And also to lay before His Majesty the all Consequences of the Treaty of Partition (passed under the Great Seal of England during the Sitting of Parliament, and without the Advice of the same) to this Kingdom, and the Peace of Europe, whereby such large Territories of the King of Spain's Dominions were to be ceded up to the French King.

Ordered, That a Committee be appointed to draw up the said Address. (And a Committee was appointed accordingly.)

See Editor's Speech reported from the Committee, to whom it was referred to draw up an humble Address to be presented to His Majesty, that they had drawn up an Address accordingly, which they had directed him to report to the House; which he read in his Place, and afterwards delivered in at the Clerk's Table, where the same was read, and with an Amendment agreed upon by the House, and is as followeth, viz.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

“Whereas nothing can more conduce to the Safety and Honour of your Majesty and this Nation, than taking the Advice of your English Councils, we your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Commons in this Parliament assembled, do, with all Humility, return your Majesty our hearty Thanks for your Gracious Message, wherein you are pleased to communicate your Royal Intentions to acquaint this House with the State and Progress of those Negotiations into which your Majesty was entered, pursuant to the Address of this House; which Method had your Majesty been advised to take before the Treaty of Partition was perfected (which was passed under the Great Seal of England, during the Sitting of Parliament, and without the Advice of the same), we had been prevented from laying before your Majesty what we are now bound on Duty (though with Grief) to do, the ill Consequences of that Treaty to this Kingdom, and the Peace of Europe, which is directly tending to increase the Power and Greatness of France, by delivering up to the French King such large Territories of the King of Spain's Dominions, and so the Destruction of the Trade of this Kingdom, to which Treaty may justly be ascribed the Danger which now threatens both this Kingdom and the Peace of Europe.”

Resolved, That the said Address be presented to his Majesty by the whole House.

Ordered, That such Members of this House as are of his Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, do humbly know his Majesty's Pleasure when he will be attended by this House.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee of the whole House, who are upon Tuesday next to take into Consideration the State of the Nation, That they do take into further Consideration the Treaty of Partition.

Ordered, That a Committee be appointed to search the Journals of the House of Lords, what Proceedings are therein, with relation to the Treaty of Partition, and report the same to the House. (And a Committee was appointed accordingly.)

Advised, 26 die Martii, 1701.

Sir Edward Seymour reported from the Committee appointed to search the Journals of the House of Lords, what Proceedings are therein with relation to the Treaty of Partition, and report the same to the House, That they had searched the Journals of the House of Lords accordingly, and take Copies thereof, which he read in his Place, and afterwards delivered in at the Clerk's Table, where the same were read, and are as followeth, viz.

(A Copy of the Lords' Journal.)

June, 10 die Martii, 1700.

The House being moved, That a Day may be appointed for taking into Consideration the Treaties now lying before this House, it is ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the said Treaties shall be taken into Consideration on Wednesday next at eleven o'clock in the Forenoon.

Advised, 21 die Martii, 1700.

The Order being read not making into Consideration the Treaties now lying before this House, the several Translations of Treaties were read, as followeth, viz.

1. The Treaty of Defensive Alliance between England and Holland, 1677-8.

2. The Renewal of the Treaties between England and the States-General of the United Provinces, Aug 17, 1695.

3. The Renewal of the Treaty of Alliance between England and Holland, Aug 24, 1696.

4. Ratification of the Treaty of Ryswick.

5. Convention between England, Sweden, and Holland, Aug 11, 1698.

6. Treaty between England, Savoy, and States-General, in January 1700.

7. Separate Articles between England, Sweden, and Holland.

8. Ratification of the Treaty, January 11, 1700.

9. The Ratification of the Separate Articles.

10. The Ratification of the 5th and 6th articles.

11. The King's Declaration.

12. The Dauphin's Declaration.

After which the House came to this Agreement, That the Lord Chamberlain do humbly move his Majesty, That all Minutes or Papers any way relating to the Negotiations of the Treaties be laid before this House.

Advised, 14 die Martii, 1700.

The Order being read for taking into further Consideration the Treaties: The House was acquainted, That Mr. Ford attended with the Papers, as agreed on Yesterday; he was called in, and delivered the Papers following at the Table, and then withdrew.

1. Copy of the King's Warrant for advancing the Treaty to the full Powers.

2. A Copy of the Ratification of Partition.

3. A Copy of the King's Ratification of the Separate and Secret Articles.

4. A Copy of the King's Warrant for affixing the Great Seal to the Treaty of Partition, Separate and Secret Articles.

(These Papers were all read by the Clerk.)

Lords Commissioners appointed to draw up and send the Faith as to the Treaty now in Debate, and all Things and Circumstances relating to the same, and to draw an Address to be presented to his Majesty thereupon, and report to the House.

The 6 Lordships, on the 5th of them, to meet To-morrow at eleven of the Clock, in the Prince's Lodgings, near the House of Peers, and to adjourn as they please.

Sabbath, 15 die Martii.

The Earl of Nottingham came from the Lords Commissioners appointed to draw up, and state the Faith, as to the Treaty now in Debate, That the Commission had met, and thought it proper to lay down such Facts as appeared to them, viz.

1. That by the Treaty of Partition, Naples, Sicily, &c. were to be given to the Dauphin.

2. That the Emperor was not a Party to this Treaty, though principally concerned.

3. That on the 11th of the States-General met with the Plenipotentiaries of England and France, as were required by the Powers, at the making the Treaty in Lens.

4. That there were no Instructions in Writing to our Plenipotentiaries, though the Powers were all signed, and that if there were no such Orders given, yet it appears not as they were considered in any Council.

5. That the Treaty, when perfected, was not considered as any Treaty concluded before it was ratified.

6. That it appears, That the Warrant for Ratification was countersigned by one of the Plenipotentiaries.

7. That the Treaty was translated and signed, and the Great Seal affixed to it during the Sitting of a Parliament.

Then the House, upon Consideration of all of the full Head in the said Report, agreed to the same, with the Alterations following, viz.

Instead of (given up) put the Words of.

Then the second Head was read.

After Debate thereupon.

The Question was put, Whether this Paragraph shall stand?

It was refused in the Negative.

Deponitur.

First, Because it is manifest by the Treaty itself, that the Matter of Fact is true.

Secondly, Because the Reporter, as we conceive, had been the most proper to have been treated with on this Occasion, for 'twas more prudent and late to have treated with the Emperor to have submitted the Pretensions of France, than with France to lessen the Dominions of the House of Austria, which in its full Strength, and in Conjunction with the most considerable Powers in Europe, and with the Expense of more than Sixty Millions Sterling to our Share, was scarce able to withstand the Arms of France.

Thirdly, But admitting that the Emperor was not the most proper to be treated with; yet to prevent the Undeign which might be taken by uniting too many Dominions under one Prince, especially such a Prince as without any Additions was formidable to all Europe, of all others the Emperor was the most improper to be left out of such a Treaty, for he was most concerned in it; and our Ministers could not, or at least did not, sufficiently support his Interests, or the just Balance of Europe: But, on the contrary, as we are informed by one Lord who signed this Treaty, it was concluded against the express Desire of the Emperor.

De Legatione.

First, Because the Truth of this Proposition is Reason enough for its being fit, and it will certainly be of fatal Consequence, if admitted, without any Direction by Instructions in Writing, shall presume to act contrary to the very Commission that empowers them: And, in this Case, the Alliance of the Dutch Ministers was the more necessary, because the Emperor was no Party to this Treaty, and the States-General are more immediately concerned than we are to promote his Interests.

Secondly, But if this Treaty was concluded with the Dutch Ministers in 1698, before his Majesty's Return into England, was alluded by one of the Lords who signed it afterwards in London, was alluded by one of the Powers was not granted by his Majesty till the second of January following.

As they acted without Power, so without Instructions too in Writing, which never was practised in any former Transaction abroad.

Lastly, We conceive, that neither of the foregoing Facts ought in Reason, or according to the strictest of Parliaments, to be ordered to be inserted.

Persons, by Letters, of which we have not had a full Account, we think it may be very useful to the Publick to communicate this Address to the Commons, who have better Opportunity than we have had of enquiring into this Matter, which seems to be yet in the Dark, and which their own Member may help to explain to them.

Ordered, That the whole House do attend His Majesty with the Address.
Ordered, By the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the Lords with white Staves do attend His Majesty, humbly to know what Time His Majesty will be pleased to appoint for this House to attend him with the Address.

Martin, 25 die Martii.
The Lord-Keeper reported His Majesty's Answer to the said Address.
My LORDS,

"I have taken Care, that all Treaties I make shall be for the Honour and Safety of England."

Ordered, That the foregoing Report of the Lords Journal do lie upon the Table to be perused by the Members.

Sabbath, 29 die Martii, 1701.
The Order of the Day being read for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, to consider of the Sense of the Nation, and of the Treaty of Partition;

Ordered, That the Treaty of Partition, and the Report from the Committee appointed to inspect the Journals of the House of Lords what Proceedings were therein relating to the Treaty of Partition, be presented to the Consideration of the said Committee of the whole House.

Then the House resolved itself into the said Committee, and after some Time spent therein, Mr. Speaker returned to the Chair, Col. Granville reported from the said Committee, That they had come to a Resolution, which they had desired him to report when the House will please to receive the same.

Ordered, That the Report be made upon Tuesday Morning next.

Martin, 1 die Aprilis, 1701.
Colonel Granville (according to Order) reported from the Committee of the whole House, to which it was referred to consider of the Sense of the Nation, and of the Treaty of Partition, the Resolution, which they had directed him to report to the House, which he read as his Place, and afterwards delivered in at the Clerk's Table, where the same was read, and agreed unto by the House, and is as followeth, viz.

Resolved, That William Earl of Portland, by negotiating and concluding the Treaty of Partition (which was destructive to the Trade of this Kingdom, and dangerous to the Peace of Europe) is guilty of an High Crime and Misdemeanour.

Resolved, That William Earl of Portland be impeached of High Crimes and Misdemeanours.

Ordered, That Sir John Lovell Gower do go up to the Lords, and at their Bar, in the Name of the House of Commons, and of all the Commons of England, impeach William Earl of Portland of High Crimes and Misdemeanours, and acquaint them, That this House will, in due Time, exhibit particular Articles against him, and make good the same.

Ordered, That a Committee be appointed to draw up Articles of Impeachment against William Earl of Portland.

(And a Committee was accordingly appointed).
And Sir John Lovell Gower went up to the Lords with the said Impeachment.

So Sir John Lovell Gower reported, That he had been at the Lords (according to Order) and at their Bar had impeached William Earl of Portland of High Crimes and Misdemeanours, and acquainted them, That this House will, in due Time, exhibit particular Articles against him, and make good the same.

Resolved, That a Conference be desired with the Lords, upon Matters relating to the Treaty of Partition.

Ordered, That Mr. St. John do go to the Lords, and desire the said Conference.

Mr. St. John reported, That he having (according to Order) been at the Lords to desire a Conference, the Lords do agree to a Conference accordingly To-morrow at One o'Clock, in the Painted Chamber.

Ordered, That the Committee who are appointed to draw up the Articles of Impeachment, do manage the said Conference.

Martin, 2 die Aprilis, 1701.
Ordered, That the Managers appointed for the Conference with the Lords, do withdraw into the Speaker's Chamber, and draw up what is to be offered at the said Conference.

Colonel Granville reported, That the Managers appointed to withdraw into the Speaker's Chamber, and draw up what is to be offered at the Conference with the Lords, had drawn up the same accordingly, and directed him to report the same to the House, which he read in his Place, and afterwards delivered in at the Clerk's Table, where the same was read, and agreed unto by the House, and is as followeth, viz.

"I T appearing by your Lordships Journals, That your Lordships have received Information of some Transactions between the Earl of Portland and Mr. Secretary Parnley, relating to the Partition of Spanish Monarchy, the Commons having the said Matter under their Consideration, desire your Lordships will be pleased to communicate to the Commons what Informations your Lordships have had of any Transactions relating to any Negotiations or Treaties of Partition of the Spanish Monarchy by Letters, or otherwise: And the Commons are fully assured, That your Lordships will readily concur in assisting them in this Inquiry, which they conceive absolutely necessary for the Vow, VIII.

"the Safety and Honour of this Kingdom, and the Preservation of the Peace of Europe."

Then the Managers went to the Conference, and being returned, Colonel Granville reported, That they had attended the Conference, and offered what the House had directed.

Martin, 8 die Aprilis, 1701.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, That he will please to give Order, That the Grand Alliance of One thousand five hundred eighty-nine, with the two Secret Articles, may be laid before this House.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty, That he will please to give Order, That the Treaty made in the Year One thousand five hundred ninety-eight, with relation to the Electoral Prince of Bavaria's having Part of the Territories of the Crown of Spain, may be laid before this House.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, That he will please to give Order, That the Powers and Instructions for making the late Treaties may be laid before this House.

Ordered, That the said Addresses be presented to His Majesty by such Members of this House as are of His Majesty's most Honourable Privy-Council.

Martin, 9 die Aprilis, 1701.

Mr. Secretary Parnley acquainted the House, That their Address having been presented to His Majesty, That His Majesty would be pleased to give Order, that the Grand Alliance of One thousand five hundred eighty-nine, and the Treaty of One thousand five hundred ninety-eight, and also the Powers and Instructions for making the late Treaties, might be laid before this House, His Majesty had been pleased to give Order for the Treasures and Powers to be laid before this House; but that there were no Instructions for either of those Treaties in Writing.

A Message from the Lords by Sir Richard Holford, and Sir. Pitt.

Mr. Speaker,
The Lords do desire a Conference with this House To-morrow at One o'Clock in the Painted Chamber, upon the Subject-Matter of the said Conference."

To which the House agreed: And the Messengers were called in, and Mr. Speaker acquainted them therewith.

Paris, 10 die Aprilis, 1701.

Ordered, That the Members who managed the said Conference with the Lords, do manage the Conference this Day.

And the Managers went to the Conference, and being returned, Colonel Granville reported, That the Managers appointed had attended the Conference; That, on the Part of the Lords, the Lord Marquis of Norfolke managed the Conference, and acquainted them, That the Lords had agreed to be laid before this House Two Powers, and also a Paper, which (although not signed by the Earl of Portland) yet was laid before the Lords by him, and that there being some Questions asked him by the Lords, there were his Answers also, which Powers and Paper Colonel Granville read in his Place, and afterwards delivered in at the Clerk's Table, where the same were read, and are as follow, viz.

Resolved, That an Address be drawn up upon the said Resolutions, and upon the Debate of the House, to be presented to his Majesty.

Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee (who are to draw up the Articles of Impeachment) to draw up the said Address.

Resolved, That the said Address be presented to his Majesty by the whole House.

Mr. Bagen reported, That he and Mr. How had (according to Order) translated the Letter from his Majesty to the Lord Somers, and he delivered the same in at the Clerk's Table, where the said Translation was read.

Ordered, That the said Letter and Translation be referred to the Consideration of the said Committee.

Monsieur, 16 de Avril, 1701.

Mr. Bramley reported from the Committee, to whom it was referred to draw up an Address upon the Resolutions Yesterday, and upon the Debate of the House to be presented to his Majesty. That they had drawn up an Address accordingly, which they had directed him to report to the House, which he read in his Place, and afterwards delivered it at the Clerk's Table, where the same was read, and (with an Amendment) agreed unto by the said House, and is as follows; viz.

The humble Address of the House of Commons to the KING.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

WHERE Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Commons in Parliament assembled, do humbly crave Leave to repeal to Your Majesty the great Satisfaction we have from our late Equity concerning the Treaty of Partition made in the Year One thousand six hundred sixty-eight (in which the Treaty in One thousand six hundred ninety-nine was dissolved), to be Your Majesty's great Care of Your People and the Nation, in not entering into that Negotiation without the Advice of Your English Councils. And finding that John Lord Somers (on whose Judgment Your Majesty did chiefly rely in that so important Affair) did, in Concert with Edward Earl of Oxford, and Charles Lord Halifax, advise Your Majesty to enter into that Treaty of dangerous Consequence to the Trade and Welfare of this Nation, and who, to avoid the Censure which might justly be apprehended to fall on those who advised the same, endeavoured to seduce, That Y^r Majesty, without the Advice of Your Council, entered into that Treaty, and under Your Sacred Name to seek Protection for what themselves had so advised; of which Treatment of Your Majesty we cannot but have a just Reformation. And that they may be no longer able to deceive Your Majesty, and abuse your People, we do humbly beseech Your Majesty, That you will be pleased to remove John Lord Somers, Edward Earl of Oxford, and Charles Lord Halifax, from your Council and Privilege for ever; as also William Earl of Portland, who manifested such Treachery, as unjust in their own Nature, and so fatal to their Consequences to this Nation, and the Peace of Europe. And we humbly crave Leave, upon this Occasion, to repeat our Assurances to Y^r Majesty, That we will always stand by and support Your Majesty to the utmost of our Power, against all Your Enemies both at home and abroad.

Ordered, That such Members of this House as are of his Majesty's most Honourable Privy-Council, do humbly know his Majesty's Pleasure, when he will be attended by this House.

Monsieur, 23 de Avril, 1701.

Mr. Secretarie Had acquainted the House, That his Majesty had been pleased to appoint to be attended by this House this Afternoon at Five o'Clock at Kensington.

Jeudi, 24 de Avril, 1701.

Mr. Speaker reported, That he with the House did Yesterday present to his Majesty their humble Address; and that his Majesty was pleased to give a most Gracious Answer thereto as follows: viz.

Gentlemen,

I AM willing to take all Occasions of thanking you very heartily for the Assurances you have frequently given Me, and now repeat of standing by and supporting Me against all Our Enemies, both at home and abroad, towards which nothing, in My Opinion, can contribute so much, as a good Correspondence between Me and My People; and therefore you may depend upon it, that I will employ none as My Servants, but such as shall be found to be most likely to improve that mutual Trust and Confidence between Us, which is so necessary in such Conjuncture, both for our own Security, and the Defence and Preservation of Our Allies.

Resolved, News covered over.

That the humble Thanks of this House be given to his Majesty, for his Majesty's said Gracious Answer to the said Address.

Ordered, That such Members of this House as are of his Majesty's most Honourable Privy-Council, do to his Majesty the said humble Thanks at this House.

Mardi, 29 de Avril, 1701.

Mr. Secretarie Had reported to the House, That their Thanks for his Majesty's said Gracious Answer to the said Address had been presented to his Majesty, and that his Majesty received them very graciously.

Lundi, 5 de Mai, 1701.

A Message from the Lords by Sir Robert Legard and Sir Richard Holford.
Mr. Speaker,

The Lords have ever since we acquainted this House, That they having on the fifth Day of April last, this House having first up to their Lordships an Impeachment against William Earl of Portland, for High Crimes and Misdemeanours; and having also on the fifteenth Day of the same Month severally impeached John Lord Somers, and Charles Lord Halifax, of High Crimes and Misdemeanours: their Lordships in like themselves did send to put this House in mind, That as yet no particular Articles have been exhibited against the said Lords, which, after impeachments have been so long depending, is due in Justice to the Privity concerned, and agreeable to the Methods of Parliament in such Cases.

Resolved, That an Answer be returned to the Lords, That the Art (as against William Earl of Portland, John Lord Somers, and Charles Lord Halifax) are preparing, and in a short time this House will find them up to the House of Lords.

Resolved, That the said Answer be returned to the Lords, That the Art (as against William Earl of Portland, John Lord Somers, and Charles Lord Halifax) are preparing, and in a short time this House will find them up to the House of Lords.

And the Messengers were called in again, and Mr. Speaker acquainted them therewith.

Monsieur, 7 de Mai, 1701.

Sir Bartholomew Shower (according to Order) reported, from the Committee appointed to draw up the Articles of Impeachment against the Lords impeached, That they had drawn up Articles of Impeachment accordingly against the Earl of Oxford.

Ordered, That the said Articles be reported To-morrow Morning.

Jeudi, 8 de Mai, 1701.

Sir Bartholomew Shower (according to Order) reported, from the Committee to whom it was referred to draw up Articles of Impeachment against the Lords impeached, the Articles of Impeachment against Edward Earl of Oxford, which he read in his Place, and afterwards delivered in at the Clerk's Table, where the same were once read.

Resolved, That the said Articles be read a second time, Article by Article: And the same were severally read a second time, and a in the Question severally put thereupon, agreed unto by the House to be the Articles of Impeachment against the Earl of Oxford: And are as follow 518.

Articles exhibited by the Exchequer, Citizens and Burgesses in Parliament assembled, in the Name of themselves, and of all the Commons of England, against Edward Earl of Oxford, in maintenance of their ancient charter against him for High Crimes and Misdemeanours.

[These Articles being printed on the Proceedings of the Lords, Vol. V.
 P. 340 to 344, are not here inserted.]

Ordered, That the said Articles of Impeachment be expressed.

Resolved, That such Witnesses as are necessary to be made use of in relation to the said Impeachment, have the Protection of this House during their Attendance upon that Service.

Vendredi, 9 de Mai, 1701.

The engrossed Articles of Impeachment against Edward Earl of Oxford were read.

Ordered, That the said Articles of Impeachment be carried up to the Lords.

Ordered, That Colonel Spely do carry the said Articles of Impeachment to the Lords; and that he do also demand, That the Earl of Oxford do give sufficient Security to abide the Judgment of the House of Lords.

Colonel Spely reported, That he had (according to Order) carried up to the Lords the Articles of Impeachment against the Earl of Oxford, and had demanded, That the said Earl do give sufficient Security to abide the Judgment of the House of Lords.

Mardi, 12 de Mai, 1701.

Resolved, That a further humble Address be presented to his Majesty, That he will be graciously pleased effectually to enforce the Address of this House, for removing John Lord Somers, Edward Earl of Oxford, Charles Lord Halifax, and William Earl of Portland, from his Council and Privilege for ever.

Ordered, That the said Address be presented to his Majesty, by such Members of this House as are of his Majesty's most Honourable Privy-Council.

Jeudi, 15 de Mai, 1701.

A Message from the Lords by Sir Richard Holford and Mr. Pitt.

Mr. Speaker, We are commanded by the Lords to deliver to this House the Answer of Edward Earl of Oxford, to the Articles exhibited against him by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament assembled, in the Name of themselves, and of all the Commons of England, in maintenance of their Impeachment against the said Earl for High Crimes and Misdemeanours, supposed to be committed by him: And they delivered the same accordingly.

Ordered, That the said Answer be read To-morrow Morning.

A Message from the Lords by Sir Richard Holford and Mr. Pitt.

Mr. Speaker, The Lords have commanded us to acquaint this House,
 That on the fifth Day of April last, this House having first up to their Lordships an Impeachment against William Earl of Portland, for High Crimes and Misdemeanours; and having also on the fifteenth Day of the same Month severally impeached John Lord Somers, and Charles Lord Halifax, of High Crimes and Misdemeanours: their Lordships in like themselves did send to put this House in mind, That as yet no particular Articles have been exhibited against the said Lords, which, after impeachments have been so long depending, is due in Justice to the Privity concerned, and agreeable to the Methods of Parliament in such Cases.

Resolved, That an Answer be returned to the Lords, That the Art (as against William Earl of Portland, John Lord Somers, and Charles Lord Halifax) are preparing, and in a short time this House will find them up to the House of Lords.

And the Messengers were called in again, and Mr. Speaker acquainted them therewith.

Vendredi, 16 de Mai, 1701.

The Answer of Edward Earl of Oxford, to the Articles of Impeachment against him was (according to Order) read, and is as follows, viz.

The Answer of Edward Earl of Oxford, to the Articles exhibited against him by the Knights, Citizens, and Burghs in Parliament assembled, in the Name of themselves, and of all the Commons of England, in maintenance of their Impugnment against the said Earl for High Crimes and Misdemeanours, supposed to be committed by him.

[This Answer being in the Lords Proceedings, Vol. V. Page 340—344, is here omitted.]

Ordered, That the said Answer be referred to the Committee appointed to draw up the Articles of Impeachment.

Ordered, That the said Committee do prepare a Replication to the said Answer, and that the said Committee do sit die de die in due time.

Mr. Harcourt reported from the Committee appointed to draw up Articles of Impeachment, That they had drawn up Articles accordingly against John Lord Somers, Baron of Epsom, in maintenance of the Impeachment against him for High Crimes and Misdemeanours: And he read the same at his Place, and afterwards delivered them in at the Clerk's Table, where they were read, Article by Article; and upon the Question severally put thereupon, agreed unto by the House to be Articles of Impeachment of high Crimes and Misdemeanours against the said Lord Somers; and are as follow: viz.

Articles exhibited by the Knights, Citizens, and Burghs in Parliament assembled, in the Name of themselves, and of all the Commons of England, against John Lord Somers, Baron of Epsom, in maintenance of their Impugnment against him for high Crimes and Misdemeanours.

[These Articles being in the Lords Proceedings, Vol. V. Page 345 to 356, are here omitted.]

Lance, 19 die Maii, 1701.

The engrossed Articles of Impeachment against John Lord Somers were read, and some Amendments were made by the House to one of them.

Ordered, That Mr. Harcourt do carry the said Articles up to the Lords.

Ordered, That Mr. Harcourt do also pray and demand, That the said John Lord Somers do give sufficient Security to abide the Judgment of the House of Lords.

Mr. Harcourt reported, That he had (according to Order) carried up to the Lords the Articles of Impeachment against John Lord Somers, and prayed and demanded that the said John Lord Somers do give sufficient Security to abide the Judgment of the House of Lords thereupon.

Mercurii, 21 die Maii, 1701.

A Message from the Lords by Sir Robert Legard and Mr. Gery. Ad. Speaker. The Lords command us to acquaint this House, That their Lordships having been defied by the Earl of Oxford, that a Day may be appointed for his speedy Trial, their Lordships finding no Issue joined by Replication of this House, think fit to give Notice thereof to this House.

They also command us to acquaint this House, That they having on the fifth Day of April last sent up their Lordships an Impeachment against William Earl of Portland, for High Crimes and Misdemeanours, and having also on the sixteenth Day of the same Month impeached Charles Lord Halifax for High Crimes and Misdemeanours; and these being as yet so particular Articles exhibited against the said Lords, their Lordships think themselves obliged to put this House in mind thereof, which, after Impeachments have so long depended, is a Hardship to the Persons concerned, and not agreeable to the usual Methods and Proceedings of Parliament in such Cases.

Resolved, That this House will send an Answer to the said Messages relating to the said Impeachments by Messengers of their own.

And the Messengers were called in, and Mr. Speaker acquainted them therewith.

Veneris, 23 die Maii, 1701.

Sir Bartholomew Shurre reported from the Committee appointed to draw up the Articles of Impeachment, That they had considered of the Answer of Edward Earl of Oxford, and had drawn up a Replication thereunto, which they had directed him to report to the House; which he read in his Place, and afterwards delivered in at the Clerk's Table; where the same was read, and (with an Amendment) agreed unto by the House: And is as followeth: viz.

The Commons have considered the Answer of Edward Earl of Oxford, to the Articles of Impeachment exhibited against him by the Knights, Citizens, and Burghs assembled in Parliament; and do aver their Charge of High Crimes and Misdemeanours against him to be true, and that the said Earl is guilty in such manner as he stands accused and impeached; and that the Commons will be ready to prove their Charge against him, at such convenient Time as shall be appointed for that Purpose.

Ordered, That the said Replication be engrossed.

Sir Bartholomew Shurre also reported from the said Committee, That they had directed him to move, that they may have Power to send for Petitions, Papers, and Records, that shall be thought necessary to be used at the Trial of the said Earl; and to proceed in the most speedy and secret Way they can for the Advantage of the Prosecution.

Ordered, That the said Committee have Power to send for Petitions, Papers, and Records, that shall be thought necessary to be used at the Trial of the said Earl; and to proceed in the most speedy and secret Way they can for the Advantage of the Prosecution.

Ordered, That the said Committee have Power to send some of their Number to examine Mr. Samuel Shepherd in the Tavern.

Ordered, That the said Committee do consider of the Messages from the Lords relating to the Impeachments, and inspect the Precedents of Messages in relation to former Impeachments, and report the same to the House.

Sabbati, 24 die Maii, 1701.

A Message from the Lords by Sir John Hygham and Sir Robert Legard.

3

Mr. Speaker. The Lords have commanded us to acquaint this House with Copy of the Answer of John Lord Somers, to one of a Message, which Articles exhibited by the Knights, Citizens, and Burghs in Parliament assembled, in the Name of themselves, and of all the Commons of England, in maintenance of their Impugnment against him for High Crimes and Misdemeanours, supposed to be by him committed; and they delivered the same in accordingly.

Lance, 26 die Maii, 1701.

Ordered, That the Answer of the Lord Somers to the Articles of Impeachment exhibited against him, be read To-morrow Morning at Eleven o'Clock.

Mercurii, 27 die Maii, 1701.

The Answer of the Lord Somers to the Articles of Impeachment exhibited against him was, according to Order, read, and is as followeth: viz. The Answer of John Lord Somers, Baron of Epsom, in the Articles exhibited by the Knights, Citizens, and Burghs in Parliament assembled, in the Name of themselves, and of all the Commons of England, in maintenance of their Impugnment against him for High Crimes and Misdemeanours. John said by him to be committed.

[This Answer being in Vol. V. Page 345, & f. g. is here omitted.]

Ordered, That the said Answer be referred to the Committee appointed to draw up the Articles of Impeachment.

Ordered, That it be referred to the said Committee to prepare a Replication thereunto.

The engrossed Replication to the Answer of the Earl of Oxford to the Articles of Impeachment exhibited against him, was read.

Sabbati, 31 die Maii, 1701.

Mr. Bramley reported from the Committee to whom it was referred to draw up the Articles of Impeachment, and who were to consider of the Messages from the Lords relating to the Impeachments, and inspect the Precedents of Messages in relation to former Impeachments, and report the same to the House. They they had considered the said Messages, and inspected the Precedents; and that they had drawn up an Answer to the Messages from the Lords the twenty-first instant, and had directed him to report the same to the House; which he read in his Place, and afterwards delivered in at the Table; where the same was read, and is as followeth: viz.

In Answer to your Lordships Message of the twenty-first instant, the Commons have prepared a Replication to the Earl of Oxford's Answer to the Articles of Impeachment of High Crimes and Misdemeanours, exhibited against him, and at present defer bringing it up to your Lordships, because in the Trial of the several Impeachments now depending, the Commons think it most proper, from the Nature of the Evidence that will be given at the said Trials, to begin with the Trial of the Impeachment of John Lord Somers of High Crimes and Misdemeanours.

As to your Lordships other Message, the Commons take it to be without Precedent, and unparliamentary; they, as Prosecutors, having a Liberty to exhibit their Articles of Impeachment at due time, of which they, who are to prepare them, are the proper Judges; and therefore, for your Lordships to assert, That having not yet exhibited particular Articles against William Earl of Portland, and Charles Lord Halifax, is a Hardship to them, and not agreeable to the usual Methods and Proceedings in Parliament in such Cases, does, as they conceive, tend to the Breach of that good Correspondence between the Two Houses, which ought to be mutually preferred.

Resolved, That the House doth agree, That the said Answer be returned to the Lords to their Lordships said Messages.

Ordered, That Mr. Bramley do carry the said Answer to the Lords.

Sir Bartholomew Shurre also reported from the said Committee, That they had drawn up a Replication to the Answer of the Lord Somers to the Articles of Impeachment exhibited against him, which they had directed him to report to the House; which he read in his Place, and afterwards delivered in at the Clerk's Table, where the same was read and agreed unto by the House: And is as followeth: viz.

The Commons have considered the Answer of John Lord Somers to the Articles of Impeachment exhibited against him by the Knights, Citizens, and Burghs assembled in Parliament, for High Crimes and Misdemeanours. The said Commons do aver their Charge against the said Lord Somers to be true; and do say, that he is guilty in the Manner as he stands accused and impeached; and the said Commons will be ready to prove the same at such convenient Time as shall be appointed for that Purpose.

Ordered, That the said Replication be engrossed.

A Message from the Lords by Sir John Hygham and Sir Robert Legard.

Ad. Speaker. The Lords have commanded us to acquaint this House, That their Lordships have appointed Monday the ninth Day of June next, for the Trial of Edward Earl of Oxford, upon the Articles brought up against him by the House, in Westminster-Hall; and that this House may reply, if they think fit.

They also have commanded us to acquaint this House, That this House having, on the fifth Day of April last, sent up to their Lordships an Impeachment against William Earl of Portland, for High Crimes and Misdemeanours, and having also, on the sixteenth Day of the same Month, impeached Charles Lord Halifax for High Crimes and Misdemeanours; and these being as yet so particular Articles exhibited against the said Lords, their Lordships think themselves obliged to put this House in mind thereof; which, after Impeachments have so long depended, is a Hardship to the Persons concerned, and not agreeable to the usual Methods of Parliament in such Cases.

Resolved, That an Answer be returned to the said Message, relating to the appointing a Time for the Trial of the Earl of Oxford, and to the Articles of Impeachment against the Earl of Portland, and Lord Halifax; and this House will return an Answer by Messengers of their own. And the Messengers were called in again, and Mr. Speaker acquainted them therewith.

Resolved,

Resolved, That a Committee be appointed to consider of the said Messages, and to lay the same before the House, and to draw up an Answer to be presented to the Lords, and a Committee was accordingly appointed, and was to sit at six o'clock.

Mercurii, 4 die Junii, 1701.

A Message from the Lords by Sir Richard Hylford and Mr. Pitt. Mr. Speaker, The Lords do think fit, upon Occasion of the Message from the House of the thirty-first of May, to acquaint that House, That having been delayed by the Lord Somers, that a Day may be appointed for his speedy Trial, and their Lordships being no less joined, by Resolution of the House of Commons, judge it proper to give three Months thereunto, that the Commons may reply, if they think fit; and at the same Time their Lordships by the Commons know, that they will proceed in the Trial of any of the impeached Lords whom the Commons shall be ready first to begin with, so as there may be no Occasion taken from thence for any unreasonable Delay in the Prosecution of any of them: And farther to enquire in them, That having searched their own Journals, they do not find, that after a general Impeachment, there has ever been so long a Delay of bringing up the particular Articles of Impeachment, fitting the Parliament: And therefore the Lords do think they had Reason to advise, That it was a Hardship to the two Lords concerned especially after their Lordships had put the House of Commons in mind of exhibiting their Articles, and not agreeable to the usual Proceedings in Parliament, and as the Lords do not consent what Right the Commons may have of impeaching in general Terms, if they please, in the Lords, in whom the Judicature does entirely reside, think themselves obliged to shew, That the Right of limiting a convenient Time for bringing the particular Charge before them, for the avoiding Delay in Justice, is lodged in them.

The Lords hope the Commons on their Part will be as careful not to do any thing that may tend to the Interruption of the good Correspondence between the two Houses, as the Lords shall ever be on their Part, and the best way to preserve that is, for neither of the two Houses to exceed those Limits which the Law and Custom of Parliament have already established.

Mr. Herriot, according to Order, reported from the Committee, who were appointed to consider of the Message from the Lords of Saturday last, and search Precedents in relation thereto, and prepare an Answer to the said Message, That they had considered the said Message, and searched Precedents, and had drawn up an Answer accordingly, which they had directed him to report to the House; which he read in his Place, and afterwards delivered in at the Clerk's Table; where the same was read, and with some Amendments, agreed unto by the House, and is as followeth; viz.

The Commons, on Consideration of your Lordships Message to them of the thirty-first of May, concerning the Trial of Oxford, think it their undoubted Right, when several Persons stand impeached before your Lordships, to bring to Trial such of them in the first Place as the Commons apprehend, from the Nature of the Evidence, ought first to be proceeded against, so the latest of such Offenders may in due Time be brought to Justice; and that no Day ought to be appointed by your Lordships for the Trial of any Impeachment by the Commons, without some previous Signification to your Lordships from the Commons, of their being ready to proceed thereon.

The Commons could not receive this Message from your Lordships without the greatest Surprise; your Lordships Proceedings in this Case being neither warranted by Precedents, nor (as the Commons conceive) consistent with the Methods of Justice, or with Reason: Wherefore the Commons cannot agree to the Day appointed by your Lordships for the Trial of the Earl of Oxford.

As to your Lordships Message at the same Time, relating to the Earl of Portland and Charles Lord Hylborne, the Commons take the same to be without Precedent, and unparliamentary; and conceive your Lordships frequent Repetition thereof in so short a Time after the Commons had transmitted to your Lordships their Articles against two of the impeached Lords, and were daily preparing their Articles against the others, manifestly tends to the Delay of Justice, is subverting the Trials of the impeached Lords, by introducing Disputes in Breach of that good Correspondence between the two Houses, which ought invariably to be preserved.

Ordered, That Mr. Herriot do carry the said Answer to the Lords. A Motion being made, and the Question being put, That the regretted Repetition to the Answer of the Lord Somers to the Articles of Impeachment exhibited against him, be now read;

It passed in the Negative.

Ordered, That the Message from the Lords this Day reaching the Impeachment, be taken into Consideration To-morrow Morning.

Junii, 5 die Junii, 1701.

The House, according to Order, proceeded to take into Consideration the Message Yesterday from the Lords relating to the Impeachments, and the same being read, Resolved, That a Conference be defined with the Lords, upon the Subject Matter of the said Message.

Ordered, That the said Message be referred to the Committee appointed to draw up the Articles of Impeachment; and that they do draw up what is to be offered to the Lords at the said Conference.

Franci, 6 die Junii, 1701.

Mr. Herriot reported from the Committee appointed to draw up Articles of Impeachment, and who were to consider of the Message from the Lords the fourth of June instant, and to draw up what shall be offered at a Conference with the Lords upon the Subject-Matter of the said Message, That they had drawn up the same accordingly, and had directed him to report the same to the House, which he read in his Place, and afterwards delivered in at the Clerk's Table; where the same was read, and agreed unto by the House, and is as followeth; viz.

* Though this Message is printed in Vol. V. Pag. 361-371, to preserve the Consistency, and as it is printed in the Commons Proceedings, is here inserted, as are some other Messages.

The Commons have defined this Conference upon your Lordships Message of the fourth of June, in order to put a good End to the Trial of your Lordships; which will shew that the Commons are ready to do all that is in their Power, in order to do Justice, and to preserve the Peace of the Kingdom, and to prevent any further Delay in the Trial of your Lordships have thought fit to send to the Commons, and the Commons, from 4 o'clock onwards expediting the Trials, which the Commons in each degree, but may rather furnish Matter of Dispute between the two Houses, the Commons therefore choose to follow the Methods formerly used in good Success upon the like Occasions, and for this purpose speedily and easily adjusting and preventing any Differences, which have already happened, or may arise, previous to or upon these Trials, the Commons do propose to your Lordships, that a Committee of both Houses be appointed to consider of the most proper Ways and Methods of proceeding on Impeachments, according to the Usage of Parliament.

Ordered, That Mr. St. John do go to the Lords, and desire the said Conference.

Mr. St. John reported, That he having (according to Order) been at the Lords to-day - a Conference, the Lords do agree to a Conference accordingly, and appoint the first presently in the next Chamber.

With a Trial, the Commons who were appointed to draw up Articles of Impeachment do manage the said Conference.

And the Message went to the Conference, and being considered, Mr. Herriot reported, That it had been at the Court since, and delivered to the Lords what the House had directed, and that the impeached Lords were sent at the Conference.

Lanc, 9 die Junii, 1701.

Mr. Brage reported from the Committee, so when it was referred to draw up Articles of Impeachment, That they had drawn up Articles accordingly against Gloria Lord Halifax, which they had directed him to report to the House; which he read in his Place, and afterwards delivered in at the Clerk's Table; where the same was read, and agreed unto by the House, and are as followeth, viz.

Articles exhibited by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament assembled, in Maintenance of their Impeachment, against Charles Lord Halifax, of High Crimes and Misdemeanors.

[Their Articles being printed in Vol. V. Pag. 367, & 368, are here omitted.]

A Message from the Lords, by Sir Richard Hylford and Mr. Grey. Mr. Speaker, We are commanded by the Lords to acquaint this House, That

"In Answer to the Message of the House of Commons of the fourth instant, the Lords say, by their Message first on the third, wherein they declare themselves ready to proceed in the Trial of any of the impeached Lords whom the Commons shall be first ready to begin with, they have given a full Proof of their Willingness to comply with the Commons in any thing which may appear reasonable, in order to the speedy determining of the Impeachments now depending: And therefore (as the Lords conceive) the Commons had no Occasion to begin any Dispute on that Head; for these Lordships are careful to decline entering into a Controversy, which seems to them to be of no Use at present."

"The Lords think themselves obliged to affirm their undoubted Right to appoint a Day for the Trial of any Impeachment depending before them, if they see good Cause for it, without any previous Signification from the Commons of their being ready to proceed, which Right is warranted by many Precedents, as well as consistent to Justice and Reason; and that Lordships, according to the Example of their Ancestors, do always use that Right, with a Regard to the equal and impartial Administration of Justice, and with a due Care to prevent any unreasonable Delay."

"This being the Case, the Lords cannot but wonder that the Commons, without any Foundation for it, should make use of Expressions which, as their Lordships conceive, have never been used before by any House of Parliament to another; and which, if the like were returned, must necessarily destroy all good Correspondence between the two Houses."

"The last Part of the Commons Message being in itself a Repetition of only the former of the thirty-first of May, in which the Lords have already returned a full Answer, their Lordships think it not requisite to say more, than that they cannot speak with what Colour they will calling upon the House of Commons to begin their Answer against two Lords, whom the Commons have long since impeached in general Terms, can be said to send to the Del. of Justice. An Expression as the Lords think the Commons ought to have shewn their Reason; for their Lordships, in doing no more upon the Occasion of this Message of the Commons, think they have given a convincing Proof of their Moderation, and of their sincere Desire of preferring a good Correspondence between the two Houses, which is so necessary for the publick Security, as well as doing Right upon the Impeachment."

Ordered, That the said Message, relating to the Impeachment, be referred to the Committee who were appointed to draw up Articles of Impeachment, and to search Precedents, and to draw up an Answer thereunto.

A Message from the Lords by Sir Richard Hylford and Mr. Grey. Mr. Speaker, We are commanded by the Lords to acquaint this House, That the Lords have appointed the Trial of John Lord Somers on Friday next, on the Impeachment against him by this House.

Ordered, That the said Message be taken into Consideration To-morrow Morning.

by not taking Notice of the several just Exceptions to which that Messengers is liable, both as to the Matter and Expressions.

The Lords have nothing, farther from their Thoughts, than the possition to do any thing which might have the least Appearance of Harshness with Relation to the Commons.

But the Answer of the Lord Somers to the Articles exhibited against him, having been sent down to the Commons on the twenty-fourth of July last, and they having by their Messengers the thirty-first of July, signified to their Lordships their Intents not beginning with the Trial of his Impeachment as the first Issue.

The Lords, considering how far the Session is advanced, thought it reasonable to approve the thirteen last Articles for the said Trial, their Lordships finding several Precedents of appointing Trials in Impeachment without a former Trial.

The Lords also think it incumbent upon them to endeavour to dis-patech the Trials of all the impeached Lords before the Rising of the Parliament. This is what Justice requires, and cannot be denied upon a Matter of Impeachment: Nevertheless, that the Commons may be free to defend their Lordships as to comply with them in any Thing which may be consistent with Justice, they have appointed the Trial of Impeachment against John Lord Somers on Tuesday the fourteenth of this Instant June, at ten o'clock in the Forenoon, in the House of Lords, which will be then sitting in High Court. And Altho' I that they were commanded by the Lords to request the House,

That the Lords do agree to a free Conference with the Commons, at the said, and do signify To-morrow at ten o'clock in the Painted-Chamber,

Ordered, That the said two last Messengers deliver to the Commons who were appointed to draw up the Articles of Impeachment.

Passen, 13th July, 1701.

Mr. St. John reported to the Commons when it was moved to draw up the Articles of Impeachment, and to whom the Messengers from the Lords yesterday were directed, That they had drawn up an Answer to the said Messengers, which they had directed to be sent to the House, which he read in his Place, and afterwards delivered in at the Clerk's Table, where the same was read and agreed unto by the House, and it was as follows, viz.

"The House of Commons find greater Reason to insist upon these Precedents, as a Committee of both Houses from the two Messengers received and afterwards delivered in at the Clerk's Table, where the same was read, and is, as follows, viz.

"That the Managers appointed by this House met the Lords at a free Conference, the Subject-Matter whereof was moved by Mr. Hennessy, and immediately afterwards further argued by Sir Bartholomew Shower.

"It was insisted on by each of them, That the Resolutions offered by it to the said Conference, were not sufficient for their Lordships dismissing a Committee of both Houses, desired by the Commons at the said Conference.

"That notwithstanding these Reasons, the Commons still thought a Committee of both Houses absolutely necessary for adjusting and preparing such Differences as had happened, or might arise previous to, or upon the Trials; and therefore insisted that such a Committee should be appointed before the Commons could proceed on any Trial.

"I was urged on this Reason for such a Committee, That many Differences might happen, whereby the Trials might be obstructed, if the Preliminaries should not be first adjusted, as one Speaker, that Point of several Lords being under Impeachments of the same Crimes, voting on each others Trial, was mentioned.

"The Lord Steward replied, and nothing was offered by Sir Grace but what was material and pertinent to the Matter in Question, and agreeable to the Intent of His Majesty's Charter.

"That John Lord Hennessy spoke in some disorderly manner, and in his Lordship's Discourse said things, of the like Impudency."

ON Tuesday there is, though I cannot find it so, because I am tired up by the Orders of the House, yet it might have been done, that I was in the Lords when in the City, as it appears on disputation, though I cannot go to the Debate of it. The Commons resolution, as it is in the President, for the said Impeachments they have almost all the good of the same given to me in the House, and therefore we will not make any deal with us in the House, and we will not make any deal with us in the House, and we will not make any deal with us in the House, and we will not make any deal with us in the House, and we will not make any deal with us in the House, and we will not make any deal with us in the House, and we will not make any deal with us in the House, and we will not make any deal with us in the House, and we will not make any deal with us in the House, and we will not make any deal with us in the House, and Lord-Keeper is to declare it to; and also particularly to the Lord Seers.

Ordered,

That Candles be prepared for the House.
Then the House adjourn'd again to Wythnigher-Hall, and being there, the House was refused, and Proclamation made for Silence, the Lord-Keeper put the Question as follows.

That John Lord Seers be acquitted of the Articles of Impeachment against him exhibited by the House at Commons, and all Things therein contain'd; and that the said Impeachment be dismissed.

Then the Lord-Keeper asked every Lord, Whether Consent, or not Consent?

The Lord-Keeper declared, the Majority was for acquitting; and then declared, That John Lord Seers was acquitted of the Articles of Impeachment against him exhibited by the House of Commons, and all Things therein contained; and the said Impeachment was dismissed; and then declared to the Lord Seers, that he was acquitted.

Then the House adjourn'd to the House above, and being come thither, the House was refused, and the following Orders made.

It is Considered, Ordered, and Adjudged, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That John Lord Seers shall be, and he is hereby acquitted of the Articles of Impeachment against him exhibited by the House of Commons, and all Things therein contained; and that the said Impeachment shall be, and is hereby dismissed.

It is Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled, That the Proceedings in this House upon the Impeachment be printed; And that the Lords Commissions appointed to consider of the manner of Proceedings on Impeachments, do meet To-morrow at Ten of the Clock, and inspect the Journals, and draw up the Matter relating thereto, in order to be printed, and report to the House.

After which Report read,

Ordered,

That the Sergeant do go with the Mace into Wythnigher-Hall, and Courts there, and Court of Request, and Places adjacent, and summon the Members there to attend the Service of the House immediately.

And he went accordingly; and being return'd,

Refused,

That the Lords have refused Justice to the Commons upon the Impeachment against the Lord Seers, by denying them a Committee of both Houses, which was desired by the Commons, as the proper and only Method of settling the necessary Peelmenures, in order to the proceeding to the Trial of the said Lord Seers with Effect: And afterwards, by proceeding to a pretended Trial of the said Lord, which could tend only to protect him from Justice, by colour of an illegal Acquittal, against which Proceedings of the Lords, the Commons do solemnly protest, as being contrary to the Rules of Justice, and therefore Null and Void.

Refused,

That the House of Lords, by the pretended Trial of John Lord Seers, have endeavoured to overturn the Trial of Impeachment done in the House of Commons by the ancient Constitution of that House, and the Safety and Protection of the Commons against the Power of the Lords; and have made an Invasion upon the Liberties of the Commons, and a Foundation of Impunity to the greatest Offenders.

Refused,

That all the ill Consequences which may at this Time attend the Supply of the Supplies given by the Commons for supporting the Publick Peace, and maintaining the Balance of Europe, by supporting our Allies, and the Power of France, are to be imputed to these ill Proceedings, and to procure an Indemnity for their own enormous Crimes, have used their utmost Endeavours to make a Breach between the Two Houses.

Ordered,

That the Message this Day from the Lords be refer'd to the Committee who are appointed to draw up the Articles of Impeachment.

Ordered,

That the said Committee do consider of the Proceedings between the Two Houses relating to the Impeachment of Lords, and state to this House the Matter of Fact, in order to the Justification of this House in their Proceedings.

A Message from the Lords by Doctor Newton and Mr. Gys.

Mr. Speaker, In Answer to the Message of the House of Commons this Day, the Lords do acquaint the Commons, That they might have known by the Records of the House of Lords, that the Lords have proceeded in the Trial of the Lord Seers on Tuesday last, being the Day appointed; and the Commons not appearing to maintain these Articles against the said Lord, the Lords have, by Judgment of their House, acquitted him of the Articles of Impeachment against him exhibited by the House of Commons, and all Things therein contained; and have dismissed the said Impeachment.

And the Lords have appointed Monday next for the Trial of the Earl of Orford, on which Day they will proceed on the said Trial.

The Commons fill going for a Committee of both Houses (which the Lords never can consent to) for the Records already given, their Lordships can infer nothing from their perfidiousity in that Demand, than that they never designed to bring any of their Impugnments to Trial.

As to the Lord Newcastle, his Answer is now before the House of Commons; and the Lords resolve to do Justice in that Matter.

Ordered,

That no Member of this House do presume to appear on Monday next at the pretended Trial of the Earl of Orford, upon pain of incurring the utmost Displeasure of this House.

The Copy of the Answer of Charles Lord Halifax, sent down from the Lords, to the Articles of Impeachment exhibited against him, and the Paper sent down from the Lords, entitled, The Answer of John Lord Halifax, in the Charge exhibited against him, being never read in the House of Commons, cannot be printed among the following Proceedings.

They are inserted in the Lords Proceedings, Vol. V.

Proceedings in the House of Commons and House of Lords relating to JAMES BOUCHER, Gent. *

Febru. 17 de Decembris, 1703.

A Message from Her Majesty, by Sir David Mordaunt, Gentleman-Usher of the Black Rod.

Mr. Speaker,

The Queen commands this Honourable House to attend Her Majesty immediately in the House of Peers.

Accordingly Mr. Speaker, with the House, went up to attend Her Majesty, and being return'd, Mr. Speaker reported, That Her Majesty had been pleas'd to give the Royal Assent to the Bill for granting an Aid to Her Majesty by a Land-Tax; and afterwards to make a most gracious Speech to both Houses, of which he had desired, and obtained a Copy, which he read to the House, and it is as follows, viz.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I thank it proper, upon this Occasion, to acquaint you, That I have had unquestionable Informations of very ill Practices and Designs carried on in & about by Enemies from France, which might have proved extremely dangerous to the Peace of these Kingdoms; as you will see by the Particulars, which shall be laid before you, as soon as the several Examinations, relating to this Matter, can be fully perfected, and made publick without Prejudice. In the mean while, I make no Doubt, but by this reasonable Deficiency, I shall be able to give such Directions for our Security, as will effectually prevent any ill Consequences from these pernicious Designs.

Goodwill of the House of Commons.

I am very sensible of your great Readiness and Affection for the Publick Service, by presenting me so fully in the Session with a considerable Part of your Supplies. I depend entirely upon your continuing with the same Zeal to dispatch the Reminders of them; that so we may be prepared to give the speediest Assistance to our Allies, and so defeat the malicious Designs of our Enemies; who cannot be more industrious to contrive the Ruin of this Kingdom, and of the Protestant Religion, than I shall always be vigilant and careful, both for their present Preservation, and for their future Security.

Refused, Nonne Contradictum.

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, returning the Thanks of this House for Her most gracious Speech from the Throne, and for the communicating the Discovery Her Majesty hath made of the wicked Designs against Her Government; with Assurance, That this House will stand by and support Her Majesty and Her Government against all Persecutors, and all Her Enemies whatsoever.

Ordered,

That a Committee be appointed to draw up the said Address, and a Committee was appointed accordingly.

Ordered,

That the said Address be drawn up on the said Resolutions, and also upon the Debate of the House.

Sabbath, 18 de Decembris, 1703.

Mr. Broudy reported from the Committee, to whom it was refer'd to draw up an Address to his Majesty and Her Majesty, (according to the Order of Yesterday) That they had drawn up an Address accordingly, which they had desired him to report to the House, which he read in his Place, and afterwards deliver'd it in at the Table, where the same was read.

Refused, Nonne Contradictum.

That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Address.

Refused,

That the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by the whole House.

Ordered,

That such Members of this House as are of Her Majesty's most Honourable Privy-Council, do humbly know Her Majesty's Pleasure, when she will be attended by this House.

Ordered,

That some Members be appointed to search the Lords Journals, as to their Proceedings in relation to the Examination of any Person who are disaffected to have a Design against Her Majesty's Government.

And they were appointed accordingly.

The humble Address of the House of Commons to the Queen.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

WE Your Majesty's most humble and loyal Subjects, the Commons in Parliament assembled, do receive Your Majesty our most humble and hearty Thanks for Your most gracious Speech from the Throne.

We are truly sensible of your Majesty's great Goodness, and of the Consideration You report in us, by communicating the Discovery of the ill Practices and Designs that have been carried on

* To be read before His Trial, in Vol. V. Page 300. These Proceedings were published by Order of the Two Houses of Parliament, and saw the Readers both Houses went upon: Which, with the Proceedings of the Journals of the House of Lords and House of Commons, will render them useful to Posterity.

"in Scotland, by Enclaves from France; whereby we have an Opportunity to repeat our unanimous Resolution to stand by and support Your Majesty, and the Succession in the Protestant Line, as limited by Law, against all Pretenders, and all Your Majesty's Enemies whatsoever."

"We want Words to express to Your Majesty the Devotion we have of our Conspiracies and Attempts to disturb the Peace and Prosperity of Your happy Government; under which we most thank our Security sufficiently provided for, since Your Majesty has been pleased to give such Directions as may prevent all ill Consequences from them."

"It is great Satisfaction to us, to find, That the Supplies we have already given are so acceptable to Your Majesty: We shall go on with the same Readiness, and Zeal to dispatch the Remainder of them, that we may enable Your Majesty to give the Speedier Assistance to your Allies, and to defeat the malicious Designs of Your Enemies. Your faithful Commons can never have the least Distrust of Your Majesty's Vigilance and Care for the Preservation of the Protestant Interest in general, of the Monarchy, and the Church of England, as by Law established. And we humbly beg Leave to assure Your Majesty, that we will never be discouraged, but will continue inviolent our Endeavours, by all proper Methods, to transmit them faithfully settled to Posterity."

London, 20th Decembris, 1703.

Mr. St. John reported, That the Members appointed to search the Lords Journals, as to their Proceedings, in relation to the Examination of any Persons, who are discovered to have a Design against Her Majesty's Government, had searched the Lords Journals accordingly; and he read in his Place what they had found therein, and delivered the same at the Table, where the same was again read.

A Motion being made, and the Question being proposed, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, setting forth the great Concerns this House has for Her Majesty's Royal Prerogative, and the Resolution of this House to support the same, and that no Persons accused for Crime, who are Her Majesty's Prisoners, ought to be taken out of the Custody of the Crown, without Her Majesty's Leave; and a Debate arising in the House thereupon;

And a Motion being made, and the Question being put, That the Debate be adjourned, It passed in the Negative.

Then the main Question being put; Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, setting forth the great Concerns this House has for Her Majesty's Royal Prerogative, and the Resolution of this House to support the same, and that no Persons accused for Crime, who are Her Majesty's Prisoners, ought to be taken out of the Custody of the Crown, without Her Majesty's Leave.

Ordered, That a Committee be appointed to draw up the said Address; and a Committee was appointed accordingly.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the said Committee, That they do draw up the said Address upon the said Resolutions, and upon the Debate of the House.

March, 31st Decembris, 1703.

Mr. Speaker reported, That the House did yesterday attend Her Majesty at St. James's, and presented to Her (her Address), and that Her Majesty was pleased to give a most gracious Answer, as followeth:

Gentlemen,

"I am very well pleased with your Assurances of dispatching the Supplies, and with the other Parts of this Address, in which you express so much Duty and Readiness to support, and to assist me. You may depend upon my Willingness to use my Endeavours with you, in securing to Posterity the Protestant Succession in the Monarchy, and the Church of England, as it is established by Law."

Mr. St. John reported from the Committee, to whom it was referred to draw up an Address upon the Resolutions of Yesterday, that they had drawn up an Address accordingly, which they had directed him to report to the House; which he read in his Place, and afterwards delivered in at the Table, where the same was read, and (with an Amendment) agreed unto by the House.

Resolved, That the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by the whole House.

Ordered, That the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by the whole House. That such Members of this House as are of Her Majesty's most Honourable Privy-Council do humbly know Her Majesty's Pleasure, when the will be attended by this House.

London, 22nd Decembris, 1703.

Mr. Comptroller accounted the House, That Her Majesty having been humbly waited upon to know Her Pleasure, when she would be attended by this House. Her Majesty has been pleased to appoint To-morrow at Four o'Clock in the Afternoon, at St. James's.

Jeudi, 23rd Decembris, 1703.

The Humble ADDRESS of the House of Commons to the Queen.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Commons of England in Parliament assembled, beg Leave humbly to lay before Your Majesty the great and just Concern we are under, to see any Violation of Your Royal Prerogative."

"Your faithful Commons believe the Administration of the Government best secured when it is left to your Majesty, with whom the Law has intrusted it, and to be so free a Dependence upon Your Majesty's Affection to Your People, and Your great Wisdom, which they can never apprehend to be in Danger from any Conspiracy, in which the Examination thereof is under Your Majesty's Direction."

"We desire, that by the Lord Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, and by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Privy Council assembled, that the humble Representation of the House, presented to Her Majesty this Day, and Her Majesty's most gracious Answer thereupon, shall be forthwith printed and published."

"We are therefore surprised to find, That when several Persons, suspected of Treasonable Practices against Your Majesty, were taken into Custody by Your Majesty's Officers, in order to be examined; the Lords, in Violation of the known Laws of the Land, have wrested them out of Your Majesty's Hands, and without Your Majesty's Leave, or Knowledge, in a most extraordinary Manner, taken the Examination of them solely to themselves; whereby a due Enquiry into the said Practices and Designs against Your Majesty's Person and Government may, in great Measure, be obstructed."

"Your loyal Commons do, therefore most earnestly desire Your Majesty to suffer no Diminution of this Prerogative, which, during Your Majesty's Reign, they are confident will always be exerted at the Great of Your People."

"And we humbly beg Leave to assure Your Majesty, That should we be obliged by time, and all usual Supplies in usual Your Majesty to carry on the War, which You have so graciously begun, so we will, to the utmost of our Power, support Your Majesty in the Exercise of Your just Prerogative at Home, and the abridging it against all Invasions whatsoever."

London, 3rd Januarii, 1703.

Mr. Speaker reported, That he, with the House, did, before the Receipt, present to Her Majesty most humble Address of the twenty-ninth of December last; and that Her Majesty was pleased thereupon, to give this most gracious Answer.

Gentlemen,

"I have had the Satisfaction to find, that the Matter which may have occasioned this Address, is now at an End."

"I intend to many Thank for the Letter, in which you express my Proceedings, and for your repeated Assurances, in making the Supplies, especially, which will be greatly to the Honour and Advantage of the Kingdom."

"I shall be careful not to give way to any Invasion of the Prerogative of the Crown, or of the Rights and Liberties of the People."

Upon this Address of the House of Commons, the House of Lords drew up the following Representation.

The humble Report of the Lord Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, presented to Her Majesty, on Tuesday the Twentieth Day of January, 1703; and Her Majesty's most gracious Answer thereunto.

Die Lunæ, 17th Januarii, 1703.

May it please Your most Excellent Majesty,

"WE Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, had ourselves under an unhappy Necessity of making the most humble Application to the House, upon a Motion of an Address presented to Your Majesty by the House of Commons, the twenty-third Day of December last, and since that Time published to the whole Nation in Print; by which the House of Lords is charged with the Violation of your Royal Prerogative, and of the known Laws of the Land, with wresting Persons subjected of Treasonable Practices, and taken into Custody by Messengers, out of Your Majesty's Hands, without Your Leave or Knowledge, and in a most extraordinary Manner taking the Examination of them all to themselves; whereby a due Enquiry into the said Practices and Designs against Your Majesty's Person and Government might in great Measure be obstructed. And they conclude their Address by most earnestly desiring Your Majesty to suffer no Diminution of Your Prerogative, and promise to support You in this asserting against all Invasions whatsoever. It is not possible for us to remain silent under this heavy Charge, in unjustly, and without the least Ground or Colour to be laid upon the whole Body of the Peers, which sending directly to create an ill Opinion of us in Your Majesty, puts us under an inevitable Necessity of vindicating both the Legality, and the dutiful Manner of our Proceedings."

The Expressions in the Address of the House of Commons are so very harsh and undecent, that we may truly affirm, that the Lord Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, had themselves under an unhappy Necessity of making the most humble Application to the House, upon a Motion of an Address presented to Your Majesty by the House of Commons, the twenty-third Day of December last, and since that Time published to the whole Nation in Print; by which the House of Lords is charged with the Violation of your Royal Prerogative, and of the known Laws of the Land, with wresting Persons subjected of Treasonable Practices, and taken into Custody by Messengers, out of Your Majesty's Hands, without Your Leave or Knowledge, and in a most extraordinary Manner taking the Examination of them all to themselves; whereby a due Enquiry into the said Practices and Designs against Your Majesty's Person and Government might in great Measure be obstructed. And they conclude their Address by most earnestly desiring Your Majesty to suffer no Diminution of Your Prerogative, and promise to support You in this asserting against all Invasions whatsoever. It is not possible for us to remain silent under this heavy Charge, in unjustly, and without the least Ground or Colour to be laid upon the whole Body of the Peers, which sending directly to create an ill Opinion of us in Your Majesty, puts us under an inevitable Necessity of vindicating both the Legality, and the dutiful Manner of our Proceedings."

The Matter of this Address is no less injurious to us than the Terms; there was not the least Occasion for a full Opposition to any Part of our Conduct in this Business, to which the Address alludes. The Proceeding was highly justifiable by the known Laws and Customs of Parliament; it was called on with the utmost Rectitude in Your Majesty, and with true Zeal for the Safety of your Person and Government; and it was done with agreed on by the concurrent Opinion of the House, without the least Objection from any of our Members, who have the Honour of bearing your Majesty in Your great Officers and Councils."

We humbly represent to Your Majesty, that by the known Laws and Customs of Parliament, the House of Peers has an undoubted Right, in Cases where they conceive to be for the Good and Safety of Your Majesty and the Kingdom, to take Examinations of Persons charged with criminal Matters, whether such Persons be taken in Custody or not, and also to order the Persons to be examined to be taken into Custody by Your Majesty's sworn Officers, attending the House during such Examination, or to commit them to any other safe Custody that they shall think fit."

Mark Jenkins, Clerk of Parliament.

25 April, 1679.

Whereas Sir William Waller is desired, and brought to Town in Custody, as at Agents, in the last stated Conspiracy against the King: It is to be Ordered, That the Officers, in which Sir William Waller is taken, shall forthwith deliver the said Sir William Waller into the Prison of the Gatehouse, at Whitehall, there to remain a Prisoner 'till further Order.

26 April, 1679.

Upon Report made from the Lords Commissioners, for examining Matters relating to the Discovery of the late Lord Conspiring against the King: That first Lordships have required Information made upon Oath, that Sir William Waller, now Prisoner in the Gatehouse, at Whitehall, is engaged in the Conspiracy, as set forth by the Bill in the Commons: It is thereupon Ordered, of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the Keeper of the Gatehouse shall be, and is hereby required to take care, that the said Sir William Waller be forthwith conveyed and shut up into the Tower of London, there to remain a Prisoner, 'till he shall be discharged by due Course of Law; and for so doing this shall be a sufficient Warrant.

21 April, 1679.

Upon Report from the Committee for Examinations, That James Allen, who was taken up in Custody, being charged with encouraging Elizabeth Goody in the Conspiracy, both being examined by the Lordships, and dealt with as they charge upon them, and as regard the Examination taken concerning a White Field in Paris, London, are before a Committee of Council: It is Ordered, That the said James Allen be forthwith conveyed and shut up into the Tower of London to the said Committee, to be examined, and disposed of as they please.

Upon Report from the Committee of Examinations, That their Lordships find it necessary, that William Argus, now a Prisoner in the Gaol at Whitehall, should be brought to Town: It is Ordered, That the Sergeant at Arms attending this House, do forthwith repair to the Gaol at Whitehall, in Essex, and bring thence the Body of the said William Argus, and deliver him into the Prison of the Gatehouse at Whitehall, there to remain a Prisoner 'till further Order.

23 April, 1679.

Upon Report from the Lords Commissioners for Examinations, That their Lordships find it requisite, that David Levy, who hath been tried and condemned as a Popish Priest, at the Affairs held for the County of Monmouth, and is now in Gaol there, may be brought to Town: It is Ordered, That the Sheriff for the said County of Monmouth be, and is hereby required to take Care, and give Order for the speedy conveying of the said David Levy in Safety from the said Gaol, to be delivered into the Prison of Newgate, the Charges of which Service shall be allowed to the said Sheriff upon his Account in the Exchequer.

The like Order for Roger Waller, in the Gaol at Geoffrey.
The like Order for John Kendall, in the Gaol at Whitehall.

And it is further Ordered, That the said Gentleman Usher go to the Lodging of the said Verney, and secure his Papers, and shut them up in his Presence, and let a Guard on his House or Lodging.

PRECEDENTS out of the Journals of the House of COMMONS.

No. II.

21 Martii, 14 Car. II.

UPON Information, That George Waller had been the Author and Publisher of a scandalous and seditious Pamphlet, to enrage the People, and to stir up and seduce the Members of this House, and to blaspheme the Honor and Justice of this House, and these Proceedings, and was now a Prisoner in Newgate:

Resolved, That the said George Waller be brought in Custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House, or his Deputy, to the Bar of this House, at Four of the Clock this Afternoon, to be examined touching the Matters charged against him, and the Keeper of Newgate, or his Deputy, to cause him to be brought accordingly.

Resolved, That this House do adjourn 'till Three of the Clock this Afternoon.

George Waller being then brought in Custody to the Bar of this House, and the scandalous, seditious Libel, with which he stands charged, being shewn unto him, the same being an Two distinct Papers; upon View of the full of them, he declared, That the same were his Hands, but that it was but Parcel of his mind, and the other Writing being shewn unto him, he confessed the same to be of his own Hand Writing; and two Witnesses being called in, was Henry Northey, and Robert Boyle, and testifying that they took the said Papers from under Mr. Waller's Hand, and that he was writing Part of them just when they were taken from him; and that he did, upon Examination before Mr. Attorney-General, confess the said Papers to be of his own composing and drawing.

Resolved upon the Speech, That George Waller, who was this Day brought from the Prison of Newgate to the Bar of this House, be first Prisoner, and delivered into the Custody of the Lieutenant of the Tower, there to be kept in close Custody, and to be denied Pen, Ink, and Paper, and required from having any Company to come unto him. And it is ordered unto Mr. Pope, Mr. Sergeant Charles, Mr. Solomon Graham, Mr. Almon, Mr. Boyle, Mr. Thornhill, Mr. Payne, Mr. Foxwell, and Mr. Gifford, or any Three of them, to peruse the said seditious Libel by him composed, and draw up an Impeachment against him, and report it to the House at their next Meeting.

21 Octobris, 1678.

Ordered, That a Committee be appointed to examine concerning the Murder of Sir Edmund Gaillard, and to enquire into the same: and Means how he came by his Death, and likewise to enquire into the Particulars of the Plot and Government, mentioned in His Majesty's Speech, against his Person and Government, which Committee was empowered to read for Pen, Ink, and Paper, and Records.

Resolved, That an Address be made to His Majesty by such Members of this House as are of His Majesty's Privy-Council, humbly to desire His Majesty, that all Papers which do relate to the Plot and Conspiracy, mentioned in His Majesty's Speech, against his Person and Government, may be communicated to the said Committee.

23 Octobris, 1678.

Resolved, &c. That the Matter concerning the Plot and Conspiracy, mentioned in His Majesty's Speech, against his Person and Government, be heard at the Bar of the House.

Ordered, That Mr. Michael Gaillard be forthwith sent for to attend with the Papers and Examinations, taken by Sir Edmund Gaillard, and now remaining in his Custody sealed up, touching the Plot and Conspiracy mentioned in his Majesty's Speech.

24 Octobris.

Ordered, That the Examinations taken before the Lords of the Treasury, relating to the irregular Indorsement of the Exchequer Bills, be laid before this House.

A Motion being made, That the House will order, that all Prosecutions at Law against the said Mr. Morris, be stayed during the Pleasure of the House.

And a Debate arising thereupon;

Resolved, That the Debate be adjourned 'till To-morrow Morning.
Ordered, That the said Mr. Morris be taken into Custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House; and that no Person be permitted to converse with, or bring any Letters to him, without Leave of the House.

5 January, 1709.

Mr. Lawson, according to Order, presented to the House several Papers relating to the Examination taken before the Lords of the Treasury, touching the false Indorsement of the Exchequer Bills.

The House returned the adjourned Debate of Yesterday, touching the ordering the Stay of any Prosecution at Law against Mr. Morris.

Ordered, Novus Contrahens, et alii Procurator = Law against Mr. Reynold Morris, in relation to the false Indorsement of Exchequer Bills be stayed, during the Pleasure of this House.

But nothing more was done in this Business; for April the third, 1709, her Majesty came to this House, and presaged the Parliament, and concluded her Speech thus:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"*A*T the Opening of this Session, I did earnestly express my Desires of seeing you in perfect Unity among yourselves, in the most effectual Means imaginable to disengage the Amities of our Enemies, and reduce them to an honest and lasting Peace; and though this has not yet been accomplished, yet nothing is so necessary as our common Welfare, I am not discouraged from publishing in the same earnest Desires, That you would go down into your several Counties, to dispel to Malicious and Unjust, as becomes all those who are joined together in the same Religion and Interest."

N U M B E R XXXVI.

An Account of what passed most remarkable in the Sessions of Parliament, 1709, in the House of Commons, relating to the Case of Dr. HENRY SACHEVERELL.

December the 1st day, 1709.

A Complaint being made, this Day, in the House of Commons, of two printed Books, the one entitled, The Communication of Sin; A Sermon preached at the Assize held at Derby, August 15, 1709, by the said Henry Sacheverell: And the other entitled, The Peril of False Brethren both in Church and State; or, Sinners preached before the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Citizens of London, at the Cathedral Church of St. Paul's, on the 5th of November, 1709, preached also by the said Dr. Henry Sacheverell, and both printed for Henry Clowes: These Books were delivered at the Table; where several Paragraphs in the Epistle Dedicatory, preceding the first mentioned Book, and also several Paragraphs in the latter Book, were read.

Resolved, That a Book, entitled, The Communication of Sin; being a Sermon preached at the Assize held at Derby, August 15, 1709: And a Book, entitled, The Peril of False Brethren both in Church and State; or, Sinners preached before the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Citizens of London, at the Cathedral Church of St. Paul's, on the 5th of November, 1709, are malicious, scandalous, and seditious Libels; highly reflecting upon her Majesty and Government, the late happy Revolution, and the Protestant Succession as by Law established, and both Houses of Parliament, tending to alienate the Affections of her Majesty's good Subjects, and to create Jealousies and Divisions among them.

Ordered, That Dr. Henry Sacheverell, and Henry Clowes, do attend at the Bar of the House To-morrow.

John Deane, Esq. made the first Motion against the two Sermons, and was seconded by Speaker Cragg, Esq.

They were opposed by several Gentlemen; who said, they did not perceive there was any thing in the sermons malicious, scandalous, or seditious; nor reflecting on her Majesty and Government, the late happy Revolution, and the Protestant Succession as by Law established; of which they did not observe any Mention; neither had the Paragraphs the least Relation to it. What concerned both Houses of Parliament, was supposed to be the Vote passed four or five Year before, about the Church being in Danger: And as to that, it was affirmed, the Church was then in Danger, was still in Danger, and it was to be feared, would always be in Danger; not from her Majesty's Administration, but from Papists on the one Hand, and Fanatics on the other; from their professed Enemies, and from False Brethren. It was owned, there were some warm Expressions in the Sermon preached at St. Paul's: And no wonder that a true Son of the Church of England should express himself with force and Warmth and Vehemence against the Libertins then taken, and with Impetuosity, to revive the Church, her Doctrine, and Ministers, to blaspheme the Name of God, and to insult, and treat with Contempt, every Thing that is sacred. To this little was returned, besides some objections against the Sermons; and particularly against the Doctrine of Papal Jurisdiction and Non-Resistance.

December 14.

The House being informed, that Dr. Henry Sacheverell and Henry Clowes attended, according to Order, Dr. Sacheverell was called in, and, at the Bar, was examined touching the two Sermons Yesterday complained of to the House: Where he owned the Preaching, the printing, and the Publishing the Sermon preached the 5th of November, 1709, at the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, and the Dedication of it, and also, that the Epistle Dedicatory to the Sermon, preached at the Assize at Derby, the 15th of August, 1709, was verbatim to that which he put to the Impression of that Sermon, and a Question being proposed, That the said Dr. Henry Sacheverell be impeached of High Crimes and Misdemeanours; he was called in again, and asked, if he had any Thing to offer to the House? When he spoke to this Effect:

My Speech,

"I am very sorry I am fallen under the Displeasure of this House; I "did not imagine any Expressions in my Sermons were liable to such a Censure as you have passed upon them. If you had been pleased to have favoured me so far, as to have heard me before you passed it, I hope I should have explained myself so as to have prevented it."

And after being heard, he was directed to withdraw.

Then the Question was put, for impeaching the Doctor of High Crimes and Misdemeanours. And several Gentlemen spoke against it, desiring he might rather be prosecuted by the Attorney-General, and if the Sermons were seditious, it they did reflect on her Majesty and Government, the happy Revolution, and the Protestant Succession as by Law established, the Doctor would be convicted, and punished for them according to his Demerits. But if (as common Fame said) the Judges and the Queen's learned Council, had been consulted, and were of Opinion, the Doctor could not be punished for them by the ordinary Proceedings in the Courts of Law; they thought it was very unreasonable, by an Impeachment in Parliament, to endeavour to make a Man guilty, and a Criminal, that, by the Laws of the Land, was innocent. However, it was Resolved, That the said Dr. Henry Sacheverell be impeached of High Crimes and Misdemeanours.

Ordered, That Mr. Dillon do go to the Lords, and, at the Bar, in the Name of all the Commons of Great-Britain, impeach the said Dr. Henry Sacheverell of High Crimes and Misdemeanours, and acquaint the Lords, that the House will, in due Time, exhibit Articles against the said Henry Sacheverell.

Ordered,

That a Committee be appointed to draw up Articles of Impeachment against the said Dr. Henry Sacheverell.

And a Committee was appointed accordingly. And they have Power to send for Papers, Papers, and Records, and to sit to do so.

Then Henry Clowes was called in, and, at the Bar, was examined touching his Printing and Publishing the said two Books: Which he owned, and that he had the Copies of them from Dr. Sacheverell. After which he was directed to withdraw.

Ordered,

That the said Dr. Henry Sacheverell be taken into the Custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending the House.

On Sunday Gordon, Bart. Lord Mayor of the City of London, was in the House, in his Place: And the Speaker observing to the Doctor, that the House took Notice, he had affirmed, in the Epistle Dedicatory to my Lord Mayor of London, before the Sermon preached at St. Paul's, that he had published it by his Lordship's Command, he was asked, Whether my Lord Mayor did command him to publish his Sermon? To which he answered, "That, in the first Sent of the Word Command, he did not; but in the common Acceptation of the Word, as the Doctor of Supper says to his Inferiors are said to be Commanded, he did command him; for he did desire and press him to print it." Then he gave a particular Account of the Conversation he had, at several Times, with my Lord Mayor about it, though his Lordship thought fit peremptorily to deny it. After this, the two following Resolutions passed:

Resolved,

That the Reverend Mr. Benjamin Hadley, Rector of St. Peter Parva, London, for having often strenuously justified the Principles on which her Majesty and the Nation proceeded in the late happy Revolution, hath justly merited the Favour and Recommendation of this House.

Resolved,

That an humble Address be presented to her Majesty, that she will be graciously pleased to bestow some Dignity in the Church on the said Mr. Hadley, for his eminent Services both to Church and State.

These were proposed by Mr. Hadley, Esq. and seconded by Sir Jos. Yorke. The House was in great Confusion, it being late, and every one expecting immediately to rise. However, there were several N-givers to their Resolutions: And when they came to be considered, they were generally thought to be strange Resolutions, with Regard to her Majesty, who had approved a Sermon preached before her by the Bishop of Exeter, and desired him to print it. Against that Sermon Mr. Hooley went, and engaged in Conversation with the Bishop; yet he is declared to have justly merited the Favour and Recommendation of the House, and the Queen is desired to bestow some Dignity in the Church on him for their eminent Services. This Proceeding was thought to suppose, or impute to her Majesty, that several, who were otherwise against Dr. Sackville, blamed it very freely. And it was very observable, Mr. Lockhart took an Occasion, some Time after, upon another Debate, to confute it.

December 15.

Ordered,

That Mr. Dolben [when he goes to the Lords to impeach Dr. Henry Sackville of High Crimes and Misdemeanours] do acquaint the Lords, That the said Henry Sackville is in Custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending the House, ready to be delivered to the Gentleman-Usher of the Black-Rod, when the Lords shall please to give Order therein.

Mr. Dolben reported to the House, That he had, pursuant to this Order, been at the Lords; and, at their Bar, had impeached Dr. Henry Sackville of High Crimes and Misdemeanours; and had also acquainted the Lords with their other Order.

December 17.

A Petition of Henry Sackville, D. D. in Custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending the House, was presented to the House, and read; praying, That the House would be pleased to order him to be admitted to Bail, that he may have an Opportunity of making his Defence, being informed, that he is impeached at the Bar of the House of Lords for High Crimes and Misdemeanours.

Ordered,

That a Committee be appointed to search Precedents concerning the taking Bail in Cases of Persons committed for High Crimes and Misdemeanours; and that they do make their Report thereof to the House upon Monday following next.

Ordered,

That it be referred to the Committee, who are to draw up the Articles of Impeachment against Dr. Henry Sackville, to search Precedents, and make Report thereof to the House.

Ordered,

There was some Debate before the House ordered a Committee.

December 19.

Mr. Dolben acquainted the House, That the Committee, who were upon Saturday last appointed to search Precedents concerning the taking Bail in Cases of Persons committed for High Crimes and Misdemeanours, and to report the same to the House this Day, had made all the Progress they could in so short a Time; but that they found it required more Time, and had directed him to move, That they may have further Time to make their Report.

Ordered,

That the said Committee do search the Lords Journals, in relation to the Proceedings upon Impeachments by the Commons, and make their Report thereof to the House with all convenient Speed.

Ordered,

That all Committees be adjourned, except the Committee who are appointed to draw up the Articles of Impeachment against Dr. Henry Sackville, and who are to search the Lords Journals in relation to the Proceedings upon Impeachments by the Commons.

December 22.

Mr. Dolben reported, from the Committee appointed to search Precedents concerning the taking Bail in Cases of Persons committed for High Crimes and Misdemeanours, and to search the Lords Journals in Relation to the Proceedings upon Impeachments by the Commons, and to make their Report to the House, That they had searched Precedents, and the Lords Journals accordingly; and had directed him to report what Precedents they had found, which be read in his Place, and afterwards delivered in at the Table, where the same were read.

And a Motion being made, and the Question being put, That Dr. Henry Sackville be admitted to Bail, according to the Prayer of his Petition, it passed in the Negative.

Yea 79, Nay 114.

In the Debate on this Matter, there was a great Variety of Opinions: Some thought the Commons might bail a Person committed by them, but not in this Case: Others, that it was discretionary in them, whether they would bail or not; and that this Person deserved it not from them; and one that the Commons could never bail in any Case. Others insisted, in Favour of Liberty, that if they could bail, they ought to bail; and that they could bail, argued from the Equity and Reasonableness of the Thing, that those who could commit might bail: They showed Precedents in the Case of Mr. Symonds, and the Smugglers, impeached for High Crimes and Misdemeanours; in one of which, the Persons impeached and committed by the House of Commons, were admitted to Bail; in the other, the Commons, upon their Petition, consented to bail them; and they had been bailed, but their Sureties made Objections to the Condition of their Bonds, and would not submit to it. Besides, it was urged, that this Case was an itself bailable, and so agreed by all Gentlemen; and that the Doctor's Hardship might be the greater, because it was probable, if the Commons did not bail him, he might be in Calvary, when bailable by Law, till after the Recess of Parliament: For the Articles not being returned to the Lords against him, it was thought the Lords would not give him one of the Callows of the Commons, and commit him upon a special Charge, and till they committed him, they could not bail him. This was his Case, for upon Application to the Lords, they refused to commit him, till the Commons had exhibited their Articles: The Lords said, the Commons might never exhibit any; and they would not do so unreasonably a Thing, as to commit any one on a general Charge. And so, by a Pillory for the Commitment of the House of Commons, in a Case bailable by Law (and for which there were Precedents, for the Commons admitting to Bail, see Journal 14, to January 11. It is fitting to observe, that some have expected the bailing the Doctor, one Part of the Message delivered by Mr. Dolben to the Lords, when he impeached him at their Bar, to be that the Doctor was in Custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending the House, ready to be delivered to the Gentleman-Usher of the Black-Rod, when the Lords should please to give Order therein: But others, that agreed with them against admitting him to Bail, appeared on Expedients to get off that, and did not think it reasonable to preclude him from it by these own Messages.

There was one Thing at the Debate gave some Direction to the House, An honourable Member declaring himself against bailing Dr. Sackville, said, He would put them in Mind of the Case of Mr. Thompson (ante Vol. VII. Pag. 491.) He was a Parson too, he was impeached by the Commons for High Crimes and Misdemeanours; he was bailed by them; he afterwards ran beyond Sea, turned Priest, and so evaded their Justice; and he believed this Fellow (as he was pleased to call him) would do so too. To this, another Gentleman answered, He believed the noble Lord was at much mistake in his Conclusion, as he was in his Premises: He did not believe the Doctor would run away, if he was to bail. And as to the Precedent of Mr. Thompson, the noble Lord was mistaken in every Part of it, except that he was a Parson; for he was not bailed by the Commons, neither did he run beyond Sea, and turn Priest, and evade their Justice; for the Parliament that impeach'd him was soon after dissolved: He was afterwards made Dean of Bristol, and lived and died so.

January 9.

Mr. Dolben reported from the Committee appointed to draw up Articles of Impeachment against Dr. Henry Sackville, That they had drawn up Articles accordingly, which they had directed him to report to the House: And he read them in his Place, and afterwards delivered them in at the Table, where they were read.

It was then proposed, That it being impossible the Members could make their Observations on the Articles in such Readings, and the Honour of the House being concerned to have these such as might be justified, a little Time should be allowed, before they were read the second Time, to consider them; and to convince others, they intended not Delay in it, they only asked till Wednesday. This was ordered; but then it was moved, that no Copies might be taken of the Articles, because it was not proper they should be made public in the Coffee-Houses, nor showed to the Doctor, before they were agreed on, and carried up to the Lords. On the other Hand, it was urged, this was precluding Members of their Right, by unreasonable Suppositions; that they had a Right to take Copies of any Papers before the House, for their Information; and it was not to be imagined, they would publish the Articles in Coffee-Houses, or show them to the Doctor. And, what if they did show them to him? Were they to be kept a Secret from him? Would he not have a Copy of the Articles ordered him by the Lords, as soon as they were carried to them? And what Advantage would it be to him, or Disadvantage to the Commons, to see them sooner? But if Copies were not to be taken of the Articles, it was no Favour, no Benefit to put off the Consideration of them; it had an Appearance of doing what was fair and reasonable, but would, in Truth, be doing nothing; for without taking Copies of them, they could not be considered. And it having been said, by one Gentleman, That this was an extraordinary Thing, and what had never been done before; another replied, He thought it extraordinary, but could not agree, it had never been done before; he remembered the like, when Sir John Fenwick's Confession had been read in the House of Commons; they were ordered to be read up by the Speaker, that no Copies might be taken of them. He did not approve that Precedent so well as to follow it; he wished Copies had been taken of those Papers, and that they had been printed, he believed, the Kingdom would have been the better for them at this Day.

After these Discourses, this Motion was moved.

January 11.

The Order of the Day being read, for the Reading a second Time the Report from the Committee to whom it was referred to draw up Articles of Impeachment against Dr. Henry Sackville;

Ordered,

That the Report be read Paragraph by Paragraph.

Then the first Paragraph (being the Preamble to the Articles) being read, and a Motion being made, and the Question being put, That the Report be re-committed; it passed in the Negative.

Yea 139, Nay 232.

Ordered,

That Candles be brought in, and Candles were brought in accordingly.

Resolved,

That the House doth agree to the said first Paragraph.

Then the Articles being severally read, one by one, were (upon the Question severally put thereupon) agreed unto by the House, to be the Articles to be exhibited against the said Dr. Henry Sackville.

Then the last Paragraph being read, the same was also agreed unto by the House.

Ordered,

That the Articles be engrossed.

There were great Debates in relation to the re-committing the Articles of Impeachment. In which, great Mistakes were seen in the Preamble to the Articles, the Recitals partial, and wrong Inferences drawn from them. And the Articles were said to be so loose and uncertain, it was impossible any one could plead to them; and it was proposed, that those who drew them up, would let the House know, on what Paragraphs in the Sermon they were grounded. To this was answered, That was too early, when they only had the Preamble under Consideration; when the Articles were read, they would produce the Passages in the Sermon. But then, though the Passages were desired, they called for the Questions, and never performed what they had promised.

January

January 12.

The Engrailed Articles of Impeachment against Dr. Henry Sacheverell read.

Ordered,

That the said Articles be carried to the Lords by Mr. Dolben.

At this Time, there was no Debate nor Division upon the Articles, only a Negative to the Question of carrying them up to the Lords. Gentlemen saw how hardly they had been treated the Day before by the Majority, and therefore contented themselves with swearing their Dislike of the Proceedings in this Manner.

Mr. Dolben carried these Articles to the Lords, who read them the first Time, and took Dr. Sacheverell into the Custody of the Black-Rod.

January 13.

The Sergeant at Arms acquainted the House, That, in pursuance of their Order of the 15th of December last, he did Yesterday deliver Dr. Henry Sacheverell to the Deputy of the Gentleman-Usher of the Black-Rod, and had taken a Dr. charge for him.

Dr. Sacheverell petitioned the Lords to be bailed. Their Lordships ordered a Committee to enquire into the Validity of his Bail; allowed him Council, and a Copy of the Articles.

January 14.

Dr. Sacheverell is obliged to give in his Answer to the Articles next Wednesday. The Lords accepted of Dr. Langley, Vice-Chancellor of Great, and Dr. Roper, for his Bail. And accordingly he was bailed, himself in a Recognizance of 6000 l. and in Sureties twice in speed.

Sergeant Pratt, Sir James Harcourt, Mr. Raymond, and Mr. Phipps, are allowed by the Lords, to be Counsel for Dr. Sacheverell, and Mr. Haggins to be his Solicitor.

January 16.

Dr. Sacheverell, upon his Petition, has farther Time given him to put in his Answer.

January 15.

Dr. Henry Sacheverell attended the House of Lords, and delivered in his Answer to the Articles of Impeachment against him, which was read. And being asked, Whether or no he would abide by it? He answered in the Affirmative; and then the Doctor was ordered to withdraw. These Lordships sent his Answer down to the Commons.

A Message from the Lords, by Mr. Rogers, and Mr. Hinchey, That they were commanded to acquaint the House of Commons That Dr. Henry Sacheverell hath put in his Answer to the Articles of Impeachment, sent from the House of Commons against him, which their Lordships communicate to the House, and desire that the said Original Answer may be returned with convenient Speed.

Ordered,

That the said Answer of Dr. Henry Sacheverell, now sent from the Lords, be read To-morrow Morning.

January 16.

The Answer of Dr. Henry Sacheverell, sent from the Lords Yesterday, was, according to Order, read, and

Ordered,

That the Answer of Dr. Henry Sacheverell, sent from the Lords Yesterday, be referred to the Committee, who were appointed to draw up Articles of Impeachment, which were exhibited by the Commons to the Lords, against Dr. Henry Sacheverell, for High Crimes and Misdemeanours; and that they do consider thereof, and report their Opinion, what is most proper to be done towards the farther Proceedings thereof. And they have Power to send for Persons, Papers, and Records. And they are to meet at such Times and Places as they shall think fit.

February 1.

Mr. Dolben reported from the Committee, to whom the Answer of Dr. Henry Sacheverell was referred to consider of the said Answer, and report their Opinion, what is most proper to be done towards the farther Proceedings thereof. That they had considered the same, and that they do find there are contained therein many Things not warranted by the Course of Proceedings upon Impeachments, foreign to the Charge, unbecoming a Person impeach'd, and plainly designed to reflect upon the Honour of the House; and do humbly submit to the Judgment of the House their Opinion, That for avoiding any Imputation of Delay to the Committee, in a Case of so great Importance, a Replication be forthwith sent up to the Lords, maintaining the Charge of the Commons; and the Committee have accordingly prepared the Copy, which they had directed him to report to the House; and he read the same in his Place, and afterwards delivered the Report as at the Table, where the same was read. And the Replication being read a second Time,

Resolved,

That the said Replication be the Replication of the Commons to the Answer of Dr. Henry Sacheverell.

Ordered,

That the Replication be Engrailed. There were Debates in relation to the engraving of the Replication, when the Commons were desired to flow, that there was in Dr. Sacheverell's Answer, an answer to the Charge; 1. Place days upon Impeachments, foreign to the Charge, unbecoming a Person impeach'd, and plainly designed to reflect upon the Honour of the House.

The ensuing into these Particulars was declined, for which Reason, and because the Answer appeared full and fresh, there was a Division upon engraving the Replication; in which the Yeas were 182, and the Nays 85.

February 3.

The engrailed Replication of the Commons to the Answer of Dr. Henry Sacheverell, was read.

Ordered,

That the said Replication be sent to the Lords.

Ordered,

That the Original Answer be returned to the Lords.

February 4.

That the Debate do carry the Original Answer of Dr. Henry Sacheverell, and the Replication thence, to the Lords.

February 4.

A Message from the Lords by Sir Richard Holford and Mr. Gery, That they were commanded to acquaint the House of Commons, that their Lordships have appointed Tuesday next, at seven of the Clock in the Morning, for the Trial of Henry Sacheverell, Doctor in Divinity, the Bar of their House; and that their Lordships will take Care, that there will be Convenience made there for the Managers of the House, at this Trial, upon the Impeachment against him.

Resolved,

That the Managers be appointed to make good the Articles of Impeachment against Dr. Henry Sacheverell.

Ordered,

That the Committee to whom it was referred to draw up the said Articles, be the said Managers.

Resolved,

That the House will be present at the Trial of the Impeachment against Dr. Henry Sacheverell, as a Committee of the whole House.

Ordered,

That a Message be sent to the Lords, to acquaint them with the said Reference, and to desire, that a convenient Access should be made to be prepared for them. And,

Ordered,

That Mr. Bramley (who moved this Motion) do carry the said Message to the Lords.

The House divided on this Question, Yeas 13, Nays 18.

There was a long Debate upon this Message, in which the several Proceedings of the Trial of Sir John, and the Trial and Verdict of the House of Commons, were taken into Consideration, and the Commons agreed to be present at their Trial, which the Lords agreed to, being convinced by the Reason of the Commons. It was said, that the first regular Trial upon an Impeachment in Parliament, in the present Method, was the Trial of the Earl of Strafford, and the Commons declared and insisted, they had a Right to be present at the Trial as an House, or a Committee of the whole House, as they thought fit, and that they had it in their Power, that they may justify their Proceedings, in the giving in his Case to demand Justice. In the Case of the Lord Viscount Stafford, the like Accommodation was never disputed, but in that of the Smugglers it was, and the Lords would have done justice without an Impeachment for High Crimes and Misdemeanours, and for High Treason; which the Commons insisted, being, That the different Nature of those Crimes related only to the Punishment, and did not alter and change the Nature of the Court. And in the strength of this, and other Arguments, which may be seen in the Reports of the Conference, and free Conferences, entered on their Journals, they did, at last, prevail.

February 6.

A Message from the Lords by Mr. Gery and Mr. Hinchey, That the Lords had commanded them to acquaint the House, that in as much as their Lordships have ordered the Lords with White Staves, humbly to move Her Majesty from their House, that she will be pleased to give Order for a Place to be prepared in Westminster-Hall, for their Lordships to proceed upon the Trial of Henry Sacheverell, Doctor in Divinity, who now stands impeach'd before their House.

February 7.

The Lords received a Message from Her Majesty, that Her Majesty would give Order for a Place to be prepared in Westminster-Hall, for their Lordships to proceed upon the Trial of Henry Sacheverell, Doctor in Divinity, who now stands impeach'd before their House.

February 8.

A Message from the Lords by Mr. Medley and Mr. Follett, That they were commanded by the Lords to acquaint the House, that Her Majesty hath given Order, that a Court be prepared in Westminster-Hall, for the Trial of Dr. Henry Sacheverell, which it will take up some Time, and that therefore the Trial cannot be at the Time appointed, but that as soon as the Place is prepared, the House shall have Notice of the Day of Trial.

Ordered,

That the Managers appointed to make good the Articles of Impeachment against Dr. Henry Sacheverell, have Power to find for Persons, Papers, and Records.

Ordered,

That Mr. William Barron be appointed Solicitor to the said Managers, for prosecuting the said Impeachment.

February 15.

Sergeant Pratt, and Mr. Raymond, having declared being Counsel for Dr. Henry Sacheverell, the Lords, upon his Petition, directed him to Mr. Dan, Mr. Dole, and Dr. Harcourt, for his Counsel; as also, Sir James Harcourt, and Mr. Phipps, before allowed by their Lordships; and Mr. Haggins his Solicitor.

February 18.

The Lords appointed Monday next Seven-night for the Trial of Dr. Henry Sacheverell.

The Trial, accordingly, began on Monday the 27th of February, (Vide the Trial in Vol. V.) Which Day, and the following Days, a great Concourse of People attended Dr. Sacheverell from his Lodgings at the Temple, to Westminster, and at his Return, with great Acclamations and Shouts, &c.

A Complaint was made in the House of Commons of their Riots. And,

That as several Members preferred to Her Majesty, That She will be graciously pleased to take effectual Measures to suppress the profane Tumults, let on foot and fomented by Papists, Nonjurors, and other Enemies to Her Majesty's Title and Government; and to issue her Royal Proclamation, promising a Reward to such as shall discover and seize those Incendiaries, as have been the Occasions of the late Tumults and Disorders.

No Member in the least justified these Tumults; and all professed a Readiness to concur in an Address for the suppressing them; but desired the Address might be so framed, in such general Words, that it might pass unanimously. They excepted to those Words, Set on foot and fomented by Papists, Nonjurors, and other Enemies to Her Majesty's Title and Government; because it did not appear, any Papists or Nonjurors were concerned in them; and there was no Reason to believe they were; but if it was certain, there were such Persons; and at certain, that, by their Principles, they would lay hold on any Opportunity, and join with any People, to disturb the Peace and Quiet of the Government; for they hoped to stir in troubled Waters.

There was a Debate upon adding that Word, in which, a certain Gentleman argued against it, because it was not to be imagined, they would be for pulling down their own Motives-Heads. A plain Confession, that the Designers were Royalists; for which his Party blamed him.

The House divided upon the Word Rebels, Yeas 114, No's 379.

The same Day, Mr. Secretary Boyle reported to the House, That he had attended Her Majesty with their Address: To which Her Majesty had been pleased to give this very gracious Answer:

"HER Majesty is extremely sensible of the great Care and Concern of the House of Commons for the publick Peace, upon this Occasion; and as Her Majesty has a just Reluctance at these tumultuous and violent Proceedings, so she will take immediate Care for suppressing them; and will lose no Time in endeavouring to find out the Authors and Abettors, in order to bring them to Punishment: And so that Purges, will cause a Proclamation to be published, according to the Desire of this House."

Reflected, Nuncio Contradictor.

That the humble Thanks of this House be returned to Her Majesty, for Her most gracious Answer to their said Address.

Ordered, Nuncio Contradictor.

That a Committee be appointed to draw up an Address upon the said Resolution.

And a Committee was appointed accordingly.

And they were ordered immediately to withdraw into the Speaker's Chamber, to draw up the said Address.

March 3.

Sir Thomas Parker reported the Address, which was as follows:

The humble ADDRESS of the House of Commons to the Queen.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

"WE Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Commons of Great-Britain, in Parliament assembled, out of a deep Sense of the repeated Injuries of Your Majesty's unparalleled Goodness, beg Leave to return our most hearty Thanks for Your most gracious Answer to our late humble Address, and for your effectual Care in suppressing these rebellious Tumults, which were set on foot, and fomented by Papists, Nonjurors, and other Enemies to Your Majesty's Title and Government, in Defence of the just Prosecution of the Commons against Dr. Henry Sacheverell.

"And we most humbly beseech Your Majesty to believe, that as this Resolution proceeded only from the indissoluble Obligation which we, Your faithful Commons, looked upon ourselves to lie under, not to sit still and patiently see the Justice of the late happy Revolution, and the Glory of our late Royal Deliverer reflected upon Your Majesty's undoubted Title struck at, Your Administration, by which so many Blessings are derived upon us, endeavoured to be rendered odious to the People, and represented as destructive of the Church and Constitution, the potent Establishment and Protestant Succession undermined, the Resolutions of Parliament treated with Contempt, the Governors of the Church, and Your Majesty, as Supremes, aspersed and vilified, the Toleration exposed as wicked, and Sedition violently availing the Pulpit.

"So the Maintenance of Your Majesty's Right, the Safety of Your Person, the Quiet of Your Government, the Continuance of our happy Liberty under Your excellent Administration, the Succession in the Protestant Line, the Support and Honour of the Church of England, as established by Law, with that Toleration which is by Act of Parliament allowed to Protestant Dissenters, shall be our constant Care and Concern: And we will, upon all Occasions, venture all that is dear to us, in Defence of such inestimable Blessings."

Great Exceptions were taken to the Address; and it was moved, That it might be re-committed, because the Committee had exceeded their Commission, which was only to return Her Majesty Thanks for Her most gracious Answer; but they had taken upon them, in this Address, to state the whole Matter of the Impeachment, and to give their Opinions upon it, which was not only irregular, contrary to the Order of the House, but prejudging a Case then depending before another Judicature. And the last Paragraph there was a Promise, to venture all that was dear to them, in Defence of the Toleration, as well as of the Church of England. This was held to be putting both upon a Level, upon an equal Foot, which as many Gentlemen could not think proper, and never intended, so it was not true; for though they should be always willing to maintain the Toleration, yet they would not venture to venture for this, as for the Church of England. But all these Exceptions were over-ruled, and the Address was drawn up manifestly contrary to the Rules and Order of the House, yet the Majority agreed to it, as it was repeated.

The Trial proceeded, and the Lords gave their Votes for it, Whether Dr. Henry Sacheverell was guilty of High Treason and Misdemeanors, charged upon him by the Impeachment of the House of Commons? And a Majority voted him Guilty.

March 21.

Reflected.

That the Thanks of this House be given to the Members who were appointed the Managers of the Impeachment against Dr. Henry Sacheverell, for their faithful Management, in the Discharge of the Trust reposed in them.

And Mr. Speaker gave them (they standing up in their Places) the Thanks of the House accordingly.

There was no Precedent pretended for this, besides the giving the Thanks of the House to the Attorney-General, Sir Henrery Finch, afterwards Lord Chancellor, and Earl of Nottingham; and the Motion was further supported by some Encomiums on the Managers Performances. This Matter was opposed by several Gentlemen, who showed a wide Difference between this Case and that of my Lord Chancellor Nottingham, who had the Thanks of the House for maintaining their Rights and Privileges at a Conference between the Two Houses, in 1671, concerning the Commons false Right of giving Money; which was the more remarkable, because he was, at first, of Opinion, That, in the particular Point then in Controversy, the Commons were in the Wrong. But the House having determined against his Opinions, and appointed him to be a Manager at the Conference, he applied himself to the searching the Records, and with indefatigable Labour and Study, discovered such Precedents, and so firmly supported the Commons Right, that the Commons thought it proper to make him that honourable Acknowledgement. It was also urged, That there were Managers upon former Trials, that had not the Thanks of the House: And though these Gentlemen might have done their best in the Discharge of the Service the House required from them, yet they deserved not such Distinction. Many declared, the Managers did not speak their Sense, and that they could not approve what they had advanced, particularly, in justifying Resistance, and declaring against Passive Obedience and Non-Resistance, which was the Doctrine of the Gospel, and of the Church of England, and universally established by the Union of the Two Kingdoms; and some of them denied the Queen's Hereditary Right, affirming that she had only a Parliamentary Right; and that, as to the Hereditary Right, the Pretender had a much better Title to the Throne. That in these Influences, they exceeded their Commission, which could not be understood to allow them in any thing more, than speaking in Defence of the Resistance at the Revolution, much less to meddle with the Queen's Title, which gave Offence to many that heard them.

Another Reason against giving them Thanks, was, because of their railing and reviling Language to the Doctor, unbecoming any Council in a Criminal Prosecution, and much unbecoming Managers of the House of Commons. In which it was hard to say, whether they showed more Brutality or Inconsideracy.

And because of their giving up the Honour of the House, in following of Mr. Daboe to explain himself, when the Lords required it: In which Case, he should not have complied, without consulting the House, and taking their Directions.

And one Gentleman spoke to this Effect, just before the Question: That though he was against giving them the Thanks of the House, yet he could not forbear mentioning one Reason for it, that had been omitted by others, but was, in his Opinion, stronger than any they offered; and that was, because he was sure they would have Thanks no where else.

There was a Division of the House, the Yeas were 175, No's 116; and it was observable, that in this Question, all the Managers present at the House (except Mr. Daboe, whose singular Modesty was the more remarkable) voted for their having Thanks.

March 22.

A Message from the Lords by Mr. Rogers and Mr. Hancock, That the Lords had commanded them to acquaint this House, that their Lordships are now ready to give Judgment against Dr. Henry Sacheverell, if this House, with their Speaker, will come and demand the same.

Reflected.

That this House will demand Judgment of the Lords against Dr. Henry Sacheverell.

Some Gentlemen spoke against demanding Judgment, laying down these Reasons:

That the Lords could not give Judgment, unless the Commons demanded it; and that the Commons were at Liberty, whether they would demand it or not, according to the Reason given by the Commons, when they insisted to be present at the Trial of the Earl of Strafford, as a Committee of the whole House, That they held it fit and necessary, that all the Members should be present at the Trial, to the End, every one might justify his own Conscience, in giving his Vote to demand Judgment. And when that Trial was over, no Judgment was demanded. In the present Case, they were against demanding Judgment, because of the Precedent of this Proceeding, which might be very dangerous to innocent Men hereafter; for none could be safe, if mere Innovators, the most forced and strained Constructions, and Passages misapplied, should be admitted for Evidence. They thought the Lords had made dangerous Promises, in taking upon them to declare the Law and Usage of Parliament, without one Precedent for it, and directly contrary to many for the Case of Dr. Momcay could not be a Precedent, he summing, and pleading Guilty. The Lords also put the Question of Guilty upon all the Articles together, which is such a complicated Question, they could not give their Votes freely, and it was said to be a Reason, why some of them did not vote: And the Lords, who are both Jury and Judges, were not under the Obligation of an Oath, or upon their Honour.

Diffident.

Because we humbly conceive, there are no Reflections therein contained on the Memory of the late King William, nor the Resolution; and that there is no Offence charged therein upon Dr. Sacheverell, against any known Law of the Land.

Because by the Laws of the Land, the Laws of Parliament, and the inherent Rights of Peers, every Peer is to judge for himself, both of the Facts, as well as of the Law, and cannot be precluded by any Majority; which indeed must determine the Case in respect of the Criminal; but never did nor can preclude any Lord from voting the Party accused Guilty or Not Guilty of the Facts, as well as of the Crime of such Facts.

It is ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the Question to be put to each Lord in Willingby-Hall shall be,

Henry Sacheverell, Doctor in Divinity, guilty of High Crimes and Misdemeanors, charged on him by the Impeachment of the House of Commons? And the Answer thereto shall be, Guilty, or Not Guilty, only.

1. Because we do humbly conceive, that the obliging every Lord to answer generally, Guilty, or Not Guilty, to a Question containing all the Articles of the Impeachment, is a Kind of tacking upon ourselves, by an unnecessary joining of Matters of a different Nature, and subjecting them to one and the same Determination; and consequently may prejudice the Right every Peer has to give a free Affirmative, or Negative; since whoever thinks Dr. Sacheverell guilty of one Part, and innocent of the other, will be obliged either to approve what he condemns, or condemn what he approves.

2. We do humbly conceive, there is at least a Possibility, that though a Majority of the House, if admitted to vote on the Articles separately, may think him innocent upon each Article; yet, by this Method of a general Answer, he may be condemned of all; which seems not to be consistent with the usual Method of Justice in this House.

3. We do humbly conceive, that since the Judgment of the House in this Case ought to be a Declaration of the Law, the Conduct of the People will be most miserable, to have Punishment inflicted for High Crimes and Misdemeanors, and not to have a Possibility of informing themselves what the High Crimes and Misdemeanors thereby punished are; for the People's only Guide is the Law; and they can never be guided by what they can never be informed of: And we do humbly conceive, that this Uncertainty being in the Case of a Clergyman, for preaching, it may possibly create some Fear in good Men, whose they preach some Doctrines of the Church of England, particularly that of Non-Resistance; and may be made use of by ill men, as an Excuse for the Neglect of that Duty, which, upon some Occasions, is required of these, even by the Laws of the Land.

Is Dr. Henry Sacheverell guilty of High Crimes and Misdemeanors, charged upon him by the Impeachment of the House of Commons?

And having asked every Lord present, and they having declared, Guilty, or Not Guilty, his Lordship having call up the Votes, declared him Guilty.

N U M B E R XXXVII.

The following Address, and Opinions, being authentick, are, it is conceived, of Importance enough to give them a Place in this Collection. The Address was presented by the Lord Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry, and the Lord Bishop of Ely, April 17, 1711, 10 Anne.

To the Queen's most Excellent Majesty,

The humble ADDRESS of the Archbishop and Bishops of the Province of Canterbury, in Communion assembled.

May it please Your Majesty,

WHEREAS one William Whiston, a Professor of the Church of England, and late Professor of Mathematics in the University of Cambridge, who was, in October last, expelled the said Religion received and established by publick Authority in this Realm, has since that Time, and a little before the sitting of this present Convocation, printed and published an Hypocritical Preface to certain Writings of the same pernicious Deist, intended for the Press, in which he has advanced several damnable and blasphemous Assertions against the Doctrine and Worship of the Ever-Blessed Trinity: Expressly contradicting the Two Fundamental Articles of the New Creed; and defaming the whole Atheism; and last had the Confidence to inscribe and direct (as said printed Preface to the Convocation now Assembled:

And whereas we take ourselves to be bound in Duty to God, and to his Holy Trinity, and in Obedience to Your Majesty's pious Instructions signified to us with Your Gracious Licence, to repress the said Blasphemy; and also obliged in Vindication of our firm Adherence to the true Faith, and for the Preservation of the same in the Members of our Communion, to call the said William Whiston before us, in order either to his Amendment, or Exclusion from the Communion of the Church of England; but to yet find ourselves hindered from going on, by some Doubts arising among ourselves concerning our Power to do so; and proceed

For that the Court of Convocation being Final, or the last Resort, from which no Appeal is provided by the Statute made in the 15th Year of Henry the Eighth, Chap. 19. it may seem to be doubtful how far a Prosecution, without Appeal to the Crown, will be consistent with the Statute made in the first Year of Queen Elizabeth, Chap. 1. 1577, whereby all Jurisdiction, and particularly for Reformation of Errors, Heresies, and Schisms, is united and annex'd to the Imperial Crown of this Realm; and also how far it will be consistent with the Statute of Appeals, made in the 15th Year of Henry VIII. Chap. 19. which, in the Courts of the Appeals directed to be hereafter made, doth not mention Convocation. May it please Your most gracious Majesty, out of Your known Zeal for the Honour of God, and the Good of his Church, to lay this Case before Your Reverend Judges, and others whom Your Majesty in Your Wisdom shall think fit, for their Opinion, How far the Convocation, as the Law now stands, may proceed in Examining, Censuring, and Condemning such Tenets as are declared to be Heresy by the Laws of this Realm; together with the Authors and Maintainers of them.

[Upon this Address to the Queen, Her Majesty was pleas'd to refer the whole to the Twelve Judges, and to her Attorney and Solicitor-Generals, who being several Times assembled together, and debating the Matter, came to the following Resolution.]

To the Queen's most Excellent Majesty.

May it please Your Majesty,

IN humble Obedience to Your Majesty's Royal Command, signified to Your Judges by the Right Honourable the Lord-Keeper, We whose Names are subscribed have considered the Questions mentioned in the Address hereto annexed, and are humbly of Opinion, That since the Statute of 23d of Henry VIII. against Crying out of the Diocese, and those Statutes of the Ever-Blessed Trinity, the Convocation hath not any Jurisdiction originally to cite before them any Person for Heresy, or any other Spiritual Offence, which according to the Laws of the Realm may be cited, censured, and punished in the respective Ecclesiastical Courts or Jurisdictions of the Archbishops, Bishops, and other Ordinaries; who, we conceive, have the proper Jurisdiction in those Cases, and from whom and whose Courts the Parties accused may have their Appeals; the last Resort wherein is lodged in the Crown. In which Statute for Crying out of the Diocese, and in the others, as far as relates to Appeals for such Offences, no Notice is taken of the Convocation, either as to Jurisdiction, or Appeal. Nor doth it say any words to us in whom the pretended jurisdictional Power of a Convocation, either before or since the said Statutes, (if any such they ever had) resided; whether in the whole Body of the Convocation, or in Part. But it is plain by the first Statute, That the Archbishops' Jurisdiction, even in Case of Heresy, is bounded so that he cannot proceed against such Offenders within any other Diocese than his own, without the Consent, or in the Default of the Diocesan Bishop. All which Statutes being made for the Safe and Benefit of the Subjects, they cannot, as we humbly conceive, be deprived of the Benefit of them by any Presence of Jurisdiction in the Convocation; from which we cannot find or be inform'd of an Instance of Appeal. Nor have any Judicial Precedents or Authorities for Convincing or Convicting of such Offenders in any Convocation since these Statutes, or the Reformation (which is now near 180 Years), appear'd unto us. And if such Power should be allow'd to the Convocation, we conceive it would invade the ordinary Jurisdiction of the Archbishops and Bishops, which we conceive are preserved by the Act of Parliament made in the 15th Year of the Reign of his late Majesty King Charles the First, Chap. 11. and by another made in the 15th Year of King Charles the Second, Chap. 12. and by the Act made the 29th Car. II. Chap. 9. which took away the Writ De Heretico Comburendo, in some of which any Mention is made of the Convocation. And by the Bill of Rights, 1 Will. & Mar. it is enacted, That the Commission for correcting the late Court of Convocation for Ecclesiastical Causes, and all other Commissions and Courts of like Nature, are illegal and pernicious. But we conceive that Heretical Tenets and Opinions may be examined and condemn'd in Convocation, authorized by Royal Licence, without convening the Authors or Maintainers of them. All which we most humbly submit to Your Royal Majesty's Great Wisdom.

May 26th, 1711.

Edw. Ward, J. Boscawen,
Robert Darnley, & L. Leitch.

The other Paper here follows.

Me, it please Your Majesty,

IN Obedience to Your Majesty's Commands, signified to us by the Right Honourable the Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal, in relation to the Humble Address of the Archbishop and Bishops of the Province of Canterbury, in Convocation assembled, hereto annex'd, We whose Names are subscribed, have taken into Consideration the Doubts and Questions therein stated.

And after Conference with the rest of the Judges, We are humbly of Opinion, that of Common Right there lies an Appeal from all Ecclesiastical Courts in England to Your Majesty, in virtue of Your Supremacy in Ecclesiastical Affairs, whether the Case be given by express Words of any Act of Parliament, or not: And that no Act of Parliament has taken the Issue away. And consequently, that a Prosecution in Convocation, not excluding an Appeal to Your Majesty, is not inconsistent with the Statute of 1 Edw. Chap. 1. but preserves the Supremacy entire.

As to the Question propo'd in the said Address, How far the Convocation, as the Law now stands, may proceed in Examining, Censuring, and Condemning such Tenets as are declared to be Heresy by the Laws of this Realm, together with the Authors and Maintainers of them, we understand it to import only these two things: Whether a Jurisdiction to Examine, Censure, and Condemn such Tenets, and the Authors and Maintainers thereof, could ever be exercised in Convocation? And if it could, Whether it be taken away by any Act of Parliament?

And We humbly lay before Your Majesty, That all our Law-Books that speak of this Subject, mentioning a Jurisdiction in Matters of Heresy, and Condemnation of Heretics, as proper to be exercised in Convocation, both before and since the Acts of Parliament mention'd in the Address; and none of them, that we find, making any Doubt thereof; and we observe nothing in those, or any other Acts of Parliament, that we think has taken it away. We are humbly of Opinion, That such Jurisdiction, as the Law now stands, may be exercised in Convocation.

But this being a Matter which, upon Application for a Prohibition, on behalf of the Persons who shall be professed, may come in Judgment, before such of us as have the Honour to serve Your Majesty in Places of Judicature; we desire to be understood to give our present thoughts with a Reserve of an entire Freedom of altering our Opinions, in case any Records, or Proceedings, which we are now Strangers to, shall be laid before us, or any new Considerations which have not occurred to us, be suggested by the Parties, or their Councils, to convince us of our Mistake.

NUMBER XXXVIII.

A Declaration, signed by ARCHIBALD HUTCHESON, Esq. and given to several of his Acquaintance soon after he had perused the Examination of CHRISTOPHER LAYER, in the Appendix to the Report of the Secret Committee; in which LAYER has made Mention of his Name, as one of Burford's Club, which the said LAYER, in his Examination, saith, he was told by one PLUNKET.

March 4, 1722-3.

HAVING read Part of the Examination of LAYER, of the 10th of January, and 4th of February last, in the Appendix to the Report of the Secret Committee; in which LAYER is mentioned to have said, that one Plunket told him, as explaining a bar was meant by Burford's Club; That Lord Grey was Chairman, and that the Club met weekly, at one another's House; as LAYER thought; and that Plunket told him, That there were eight other Lords, and six Commissioners (whose Names he mentions, and more as of them), of that Club: I do hereby declare, upon the Honour of a Gentleman, That I do not know, or believe, that there was a Club, or Meeting, of any of the Lords or Gentlemen mentioned in the said Examination, nor have I ever heard of any Meeting where Lord Grey was present, except that which was carried on in the two last Sessions of Parliament, when Lord Grey, and several Lords and Gentlemen (not mentioned in LAYER's Examination), met weekly, and I believe, with great Innocence, and at one another's Houses. And I do further affirm, That even on accidental Visits, I have seldom met together any two of the Lords and Commissioners so mentioned in LAYER's Examination: That there are two of these Commissioners (Sir Henry Gwyn, and Mr. Dawson), whose Faces I do not know, and two others (General Webb, and Sir George Phipps), between whom and me there has not been, for fifteen Years last past, the least converse or of occasional Visits, and between me and the fifth Commissioner (Mr. Sturges), but very seldom: That there are three of these Lords, (Sir John, Gwyn, Gwyn), with whom I have very little Acquaintance, but in Visits to others, or in public Places; and a fifth, (the Bishop of Salisbury), in whose Company I have been but twice in three Years Time. I mention this, to show the notorious Falshood of LAYER's Hear-by Evidence of Burford's Club, an Application I never heard of, till some Time after the Appointment of the Secret Committee.

ARCH. HUTCHESON.

The Declaration of William Earl Cowper: shewing, That the Matters contained in four Hear-bys, relating to him, in the Examination of Christopher Layer, are false and groundless.

March 20, 1722-3.

THOUGH Hear-by does not affect any one, either in Law or Reason, yet it deserves Contradiction, where the Truth will bear it, especially if pressed: And therefore, finding that LAYER, in his Examinations of the 19th of Jan. and 4th of Feb. last, hath said, That one Plunket told him (as explaining what was meant by Burford's Club), That Lord Grey was Chairman; and that Lord Cowper, and seven other Lords, and six Commissioners named, were of that Club; and that this Club met monthly, as he, LAYER, thought, at one another's Houses; and not doubting but my Avowment will be believed before any Hear-by, especially from one in LAYER's said Circumstances: I do hereby declare and affirm upon my Honour, That I do not know, or believe, and never heard, before the said Examinations were taken - &c. that there was any such Club, or Meeting: That as to three of the Commissioners named, viz. Sir Henry Gwyn, Mr. Dawson, and Mr. Sturges, I do not know them so much as by Sight, and as for two of the remaining three Commissioners, viz. Sir George Phipps, and General Webb, I have not been in their, or either of their Companies, at any Time within fifteen Years last past: And as to the Lords, I never met them, or any of them, but either accidentally on Visits of Ceremony, or in the Time of Parliament, and that with other Lords, on the Business of Parliament only. And as for one of the said Commissioners, whom I am acquainted with, viz. Mr. Hildesley, I never once was at any Meeting with him together with any of the said Lords or Commissioners. And whereas LAYER, in his Examination of the 19th of September last, first, That Lord Grey told him, that Lord Cowper told him (Lord Grey), that 200 Tories, and 50 Gracianites, would try their last Effort in the House of Commons: And in another Examination, of the 21st Day of the same Month, LAYER repeats the same, except that he useth the Words, Angry Whigs, instead of the Word Gracianites: I do hereby declare and affirm upon my Honour, That I never said so to Lord Grey, nor to that Effect, nor any Thing like it: And I do therefore verily believe, That Lord Grey never said that I did.

COWPER.

NUMBER XXXIX.

Upon the Trial of a PEER†.

THERE is to be a Commission under the Great Seal, constituting a Lord High-Steward for that Occasion.

If the Great Seal be then in Commission, a Speaker of the House of Peers is to be appointed by special Commission.

The King's Writ of Cartamari is to be directed to the Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, for Middlesex, to remove the Indictment found before them against the Prisoner.

The Return whereof, with the Record of the Indictment, is to mention the Time of the Inquest of the Grand Jury, and when the Fact was committed.

A Precept is to be directed to the chief Governor of the Tower, to bring his Prisoner to the Court.

If the Trial be by special Commission, a Sheriff is to be appointed to summon the Lords the Teyers, and so do other Services, who is to have a Writ to Warrant.

The Lord Chamberlain of the Household (or, in his Absence, the Vice-Chamberlain), is to know when his Majesty will be attended for receiving the Lord High-Steward's Staff, and delivering it to the Officers, who are to present it to the High-Steward, and is to give Notice thereof to Garter King of Arms, and to the Usher of the Black-Rod.

Upon this Notice, the Black-Rod is to provide a White Staff, eight or nine Feet long, and he and Garter are to attend with it at the King's Bedchamber, or where his Majesty appoints, and to deliver it to the Lord Chamberlain, who is to present it to the King on his Knee, and Garter, and the Black-Rod in the Bedchamber, or at the Place appointed, are to receive it jointly from the King, on their Knees, with his Majesty's Discretion to whom it is to be delivered.

Hereupon, Garter and Black-Rod are to wait upon the Lord High-Steward, and to give him an Account thereof, and so know when he will please to be attended to the Trial.

On the Morning of the Trial, at the Hour appointed by the Lord High-Steward, the Judges in their Scarlet Robes, (unless in Time of Mourning) together with Garter, and the Black-Rod, and the Sergeant at Arms, who is to make the Proclamation, are to assemble at the Lord

High-Steward's House, and are to wait on him above Stairs, or where he pleases to receive them, Garter being in his Coat of Arms, the Black-Rod having the White-Staff, and the Sergeant at Arms bearing his Mace, where they all have a Collation.

The Lord High-Steward is to be called His Grace upon this Occasion, during the Trial.

After a short Stay, His Grace the Lord High-Steward comes down to his Coach with:

His Grace's Gentlemen, Two and Two, bare-headed.

His Sergeant at Arms, and Seal-Bearer (if the Lord High-Steward be Lord-Chancellor, or Lord-Keeper), both bare-headed, one with the Mace, the other with the Purse.

The Black-Rod with the Lord High-Steward's Staff, and Garter King of Arms on his right Hand, both bare-headed.

Then his Grace the Lord High-Steward, in his usual Habit (unless he be Lord-Chancellor or Lord-Keeper, and then in his rich Gown, his Train borne), followed by the Chief-Justices and Judges.

His Grace's Gentlemen, to the Number of Eight, Twelve, or Sixteen, as his Grace pleases, first take their Coaches without the Gate, four in a Coach, each Coach having two Horses only.

Then the Lord High-Steward takes his Coach with six Horses, within the Court, at the Foot of the Stairs, facing himself on the hinder Seat of the Coach singly, Garter (and the Seal-Bearer), sitting over-against his Grace bare-headed, the Black-Rod in the right Hand-Boot of the Coach, with his Grace's White Staff, and his Grace's Sergeant at Arms in the left Boot, with his Mace.

The Judges take their Coaches without the Gate, and follow his Grace.

When the Trial is by special Commission, a Messenger is to be sent a little before, to acquaint the Lords the Teyers, (who are to assemble in, or near the House of Peers, or in the Exchequer Chamber) that his Grace is coming, in order to their taking their Seats in the Court but behind, and then his Grace goes directly to Hypocrite's Hall, by the Way of the New Palace Yard.

† The Declarations of Mr. Hildesley, and Lord Cowper's, should be read after the Examination of LAYER, in Vol. VI. and after the Appendix to the Report relating to that Trial. Plunket is not to make their own Declarations on LAYER's Hear-by Evidence.

† Mr. Grey King, Jane's Herald having wrote the Misdemeanors upon the Trial of a Peer, we thought it not improper to give it a Place here, so such Account being published in the State Trials.
